Another ugly Circumstance attending this Act was, that the Bishops had it so contriv'd, that the Oath the Ministers were to subscribe to, and swear to, did not come out of the Press till a few Days before the 24th. of August; so that of the 7000 Ministers who kept their Livings, very few of them cou'd possibly have a Sight of the Book with it's Alterations, till after they had declar'd their Assent and Consent; nay, some were ejected, to whom the Book was not brought till after Bartholomew-Day, particularly one Mr. B. by Sir Edward Lake. The Speaker, Turner, among other Nonse, told the King in his Speech about this Bill, That their Forms of Prayer were decry'd as Superstitious, Strange and Wonderful! and in lieu thereof was introduc'd nothing—Echard, for want of Judgment, or what is worse, Sincerity, has borrow'd a Falsity from some such authentick Writer as himself. It was undoubtedly the Faction and Sedition of the several Sects and Parties that work'd up the Wisdom of the Nation, like Barm in a Fat of Wort, into this Expedient: Awe and Restraint upon them; which is as false as it is base and foolish. I shall justify such Language to such Men upon such Things in my Preface. The Faction and Sedition of the Presbyterians never appear'd but in the Times of the Common-Wealth, and the two Cromwells; and by that Sedition and Faction they brought in the King, who had thrice taken Dr. Calamity their Covenant; and the Bishops, who by this my, p. 259. Act rewarded them with Fails and Beggary.

Now it was that the Word Schismatick was invented to be synonymous with Presbyterian; tho' with respect to the Presbyterians 'twas as wild as if they were call'd Charibbeans, or Canibals. Read the most worthy and celebrated Hales of Eaton, and let it stand as an eternal Reproof to all those Vicars and Curates who found it aloud in their Pulpits, whether they do not, or do understand what the Word means.

To load our publick Forms with the private Hales upon Fancies upon which we differ, is the most so on Schism. "vercign Way to perpetuate Schism to the World's End. Prayer, Confession, Thanksgiving, Reading of the Scriptures, and Administration of the Sacraments in the plainest and simplest Manner, were Matter enough to furnish out a Liturgy, tho' nothing either of private Opinion or of Church Pomp, of Garments or prescrib'd Gestures, of Imagery or Musick, of Matter concerning the Dead, of many Superfluities which creep into the Church under the Name of Order and Decency." This excellent Man, the very learned, wise and pious Mr. Hales, was a Royalist and zealous Churchman. Observe what a Bustle they make with those Words Decency and Order. Take away them, and their Argument is left as naked, not as Innocence but as Indigence. The Reverend Mr. Hales proceeds, "To charge Churches and Liturgies with things unnecessary, was the first Beginning of all Superstition; and when Scruple of Conscience began to be made or pretended, then Schism began to break in. If the special Guides and Fathers of the Church would be a little sparing of incumbring Churches with Superfluities, or not over-rigid, either in reviving obsolete Customs, or imposing new, there wou'd be far less Cause of Schism or Superstition, and all the Inconveniencies were likely to ensue wou'd be but this; they shou'd in so doing yield a little to the Imbecillity of their Inferiors." A Thing

A.D. 1662

A Thing which St. Paul wou'd never have refus'd to do, but which every one of his pretended Successors at the Savoy Conference did refuse to do, and therein shew'd how far they were from a true Apostolical Spirit. "Mean while, where-soever false or suspected Opinions are made a Piece of Church Liturgy, he who separates is not the Schismatick; for it is alike unlawful to make Profession of known or suspected Falshood, as to put in Practice unlawful or suspected Actions.

Swadlin.

That holy Man's Learning and Knowledge will more than weigh against all the Ecclesiasticks that have touch'd upon this Controversy, which we leave under his severe Censure. One of the best of them, Dr. Swadlin, speaking of the publick Service, said very roundly in a Sermon on the 30th of January, There is not a Tittle of it but was by the Dictate of the Holy Ghost. The Excuse is, that Doctor was out of his Wits. But Bishop Saunderson told Bishop Walton, That the Holy Ghost seem'd to assist the Composers of the Common Prayer, in those Instances the Regeneration of Infants at their Baptism, and the Salvation of Sinners at their Burial.

I am quite tir'd with such Reasoning, and fear the Reader is so too. Let us now see what were the terrible Effects of this Uniformity Act. Above Two thousand Worthy, Learned, Pious and Orthodox Divines (I take it from the illustrious Mr. Locke) were thrown out of the Church; they, their Wives and Families, aged Relations, and helpless Children, were driven from their Dwellings, from their Bread, from the Society of their dearest Friends, and what is still more killing, from the Charge of their dearest Flocks, the Care of whose Souls they had been entrusted with:

Black Bartholomew Day.

They had merited much of the Government; many of them had ventur'd their Lives for the King; all of them had labour'd indefatigably for his Restoration. He had promis'd all of them the Liberty of their Consciences; but alas! what a Pillar did they build upon! Their Calamities are the Reproach of their Friends whom they deserted, and the Mirth of their Enemies whom they had serv'd. What says Dr. Calamy of them? "They were not a poor inconsiderable Handful, a few Scores only of acceptable and useful Ministers, who were by this Act cast out of the Church, but many Hundreds. They did not throw themselves out of Service, but were forcibly ejected. They begg'd for Continuance with all imaginable Earnestness, and urg'd unanswerable Arguments in their Petition for Peace, but were repuls'd. They were not cast out because not needed to carry on the Work of the Gospel in the Land, for there were, and still are among us many desolate Quarters that are over-run with Ignorance and Profaneness; and there was more to be done in order to general Instruction, Excitation and Reformation, than all their joint Labours wou'd have fully suffic'd for, and yet they were ejected. This was an Action without a Precedent, the like to which the Reform'd Church, nay the Christian World, never saw before.

Who were the chief Agents in that bad Work.

Let the Names of the chief Agents in this dreadful Work be remembred for ever; Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon; Sir Edward Turner, Speaker of the House of Commons; Sir Heneage Finch, Solicitor General; John Keeling, Sergeant at Law; Gilbert Sheldon, Archbishop of Canterbury; George Morley, Bishop of Winchester; Richard Sterne, Archbishop of York; John Cosens, Bishop of Durham; Humphry Henchman, Bishop of Salisbury; Dr. Barwick, Dr. Pierce, Dr. Fearne, Dr. Gunning, Mr. Thorn-dyke, Dr. Sparrow, Dr. Heylin, and all the Doctors who hop'd for Dignities. If such as adore the Memory of these Men and their Works are capable of Shame, what Confusion must they be in at the Reproaches of Mr. Locke, the greatest Genius of that Age!

"Immediately after this followeth the Act of Uniformity, by which all the Clergy of England are oblig'd to subscribe and declare what the Corporations, Nobility and Gentry had before sworn. The Clergy readily comply'd with it; for you know that sort of Men are taught rather to obey than understand, and to use that Learning they have to justify, not to examine, what Superiors command, exactly the Case of the Archdeacon, and the Compleat Historian. And yet that Bartholomew-Day was fatal to our Church and Religion in throwing out a very great Number of worthy, learned, pious and orthodox Divines, who cou'd not come up to several Things in that Act. And it is upon this Occasion worth your Knowledge, that so great was the Zeal in carrying on this Church-Affair, and so blind was the Obedience requir'd, that if you compare the Time of the passing this Act with the Time allotted for the Clergy to subscribe the Book of Common-Prayer, you shall plainly find it cou'd not be printed and distributed so as one Man in forty cou'd have seen and read the Book they did so perfectly assent and consent to.

This Church History is follow'd with the Trial, Sir Henry Vane. Condemnation and Execution of the famous Sir Henry Vane, whose Head, as the Bishop of Sarum informs us, was struck off because they were afraid of it. We have seen the King value himself much before the Lords and Commons, for being a Prince of his Word, nay, to do it when he was breaking an Oath he had thrice sworn; and now, to shew the World how merciful he is, he thirsts after the Blood of a Gentleman whom he promis'd to save. Read Bp. Burnet, The putting of Sir Henry Vane to Death was much blam'd; for the Declaration from Breda being full for an Indemnity to all except the Regicides, he was comprehended in that; since tho' he was for changing the Government, and deposing the King, yet he did not approve of the putting him to Death. An Address was made by both Houses on his Behalf, to which the King gave a favourable Answer; so he reckon'd he was safe, that being equivalent to an Act of Parliament. Yet the great Opinion that was had of his Parts and Capacity, made the Court think it was necessary to put him out of the Way. Again, "When he saw his Death was design'd, he compos'd himself to it with a Resolution which was amazing to those who knew how little of that was natural to him. Some Instances of this were very extraordinary, tho' they cannot be mention'd with Decency." I think the Bishop is too delicate here, and that it is not at all indecent for a Couple in the Conjugal State to perform the Duty of Wedlock; and it is said the Lady Vane began her Reckoning for her Son, the Lord Bernard, from the Night before Sir Henry lost his Head on Tower-Hill, where a new and barbarous Practice was begun. My Lord of Sarum proceeds, "It was observ'd that the Dying Speeches of the Regicides had left Impressions on the Hearers that were not at all to the Advantage of the Government; so Strains of a peculiar Nature being expected from him to prevent that, Drummers were plac'd under the Scaffold, who, as soon as he began to speak of the Publick, upon a Sign given, struck up with their Drums. This put him in

He is murder'd.

 "no Disorder: He desir'd they might be stopp'd, for he understood what was meant by it. Then he went thro' his Devotions; and as he was taking Leave of those about him, he happening to say somewhat with relation to the Times, the Drums struck up a second time:" Upon which he said, 'Tis a wretched Cause that will not bear the Breach of a dying Man. Something like it was said by Scot. Bishop Burnet adds, So he gave over, and died with so much Composedness, that it was generally thought the Government had lost more than it had gain'd by his Death. This Execution was about two Months before the Act of Uniformity was executed upon 2 or 3000 Ministers of the Gospel. Lieutenant General Lambert, who was try'd the same Day with Sir Henry Vane, 16th of June, extenuated his Crime, and pleaded Ignorance of Sir George Booth or Monk's Designs. The Court did not fear him so much as they fear'd Sir Henry Vane; so tho' he was condemn'd, his Life was spar'd, and he dy'd a Prisoner in St. Nicholas Island near Plymouth about twenty-four Years after. Starling was the Sheriff who commanded the Drums to beat when Sir Henry was on the Scaffold. Lieutenant General Ludlow says of Vane, "He left it doubtful which was greater, his Eloquence, Soundness of Judgment, and Presence of Mind, his Gravity and Magnanimity, his constant Adherence to the Cause of his Country, and Heroick Carriage during the Time of his Confinement, and at the Hour of his Death; or the Malice of his Enemies, and the frivolous Suggestions at his Trial, the Breach of the publick Faith in the Usage he found, the Incivility of the Bench, those sanguinary Hirings calling him foul Names, tho' in Comparison with his Birth and Quality, they were all of the Dregs of the People, and the savage Rudeness of the Sheriff, were very remarkable." After what Bishop Burnet and General Ludlow have said of them, what an Opinion must the Reader have of those wretched Writers, who have bely'd and insulted this injur'd Gentleman, even in the Moment when he was about to lay down his Life for the Cause he had engag'd in? One of them, the Compleat Historian, avers, that it was a just Sentence, and that he ran out into Lectures of Treason and Enthusiasm on the Scaffold. He then applauds the Loyalty and Judgment of the Sheriff, who got Drums and Trumpets to drown his Voice, that he might not be heard. Another of them, Echard, tells the World, Nothing cou'd be more surprizing and shocking than his Pride; he tore his Papers on the Scaffold in great Wrath; he fell into Rants, &c. when, directly contrary to both these Ecclesiasticks, my Lord of Sarum assures us he dy'd with great Composedness. Echard blames Sir Henry for two Rants, as he calls them; one was his Answer to a Person who persuaded him to submit to the King, If the King does not think himself more concern'd for his Honour and his Word than I do for my Life, they may take it; nay, I value my Life less in a good Cause than the King can do his Honour. I don't wonder that those two Historians call every thing that has Fervency in Devotion Enthusiasm, as they call every one that will not associate with them a Schismatick. Their Argument is nothing, take away those two Words from them, which, like the Drums under the Scaffold, are to drown the Voice of Religion and Reason. Echard never fails to take notice of his Majesty's unparalell'd Clemency, such as giving a Man's Quarters when the Hangman is cutting him in Pieces to his Friends, and now in admitting Sir Henry Vane to have his Head cut off, when the Judge had doom'd him to be hang'd. But what the Mercies of some are, we are inform'd in Scripture. A.D. 1662

The Princess Katharine, Infanta of Portugal, was marry'd at Lisbon to his Majesty by Proxy, the Earl of Sandwich, who had been one of Oliver's Privy-Council in the Beginning of the War, and that Earl, who had been also an Independant, or Presbyterian, or both, in Honour of the Feast of St. George, took her a-board the 23d of April. The Duke of York met her at the Isle of Wight, and the King receiv'd her at Portsmouth, where the Compleat Historian, and other Historians as compleat as he, assure us, she was marry'd by Dr. Gilbert Sheldon, Bishop of London, to his Majesty. But the same Historian and others also say, she refus'd to be marry'd by any but a Priest of her own Religion, which was also the King's Religion. The King had two Millions of Croisadoes with her, besides the Important Town of Tangier, which was of so much Importance, as to cost England ten times as much Money as the King had with his Wife, and then to be demolish'd and abandon'd, and the Rich Town of Bombay in the East-Indies, which the Company rented of the King for 15 Pounds a Year. Soon after the Arrival of the Queen-Consort, the Queen-Mother, with the Earl of St. Alban's, arriv'd from France, and had a Court settled for her at Somerseth-house.

Echard tells us, he was assur'd by a knowing Person, That the King's first Motive for the Sale of Dunkirk was, the great Expence in the keeping of it. When he gives us Instances of the Knowledge of his knowing Persons, we always find it to be of the Size of his own. The Parliament had just given him Money for the keeping of it, and wou'd have kept it till Dooms-day, if Money wou'd have done it. Bishop Burnet informs us, that the faithful Monk positively advis'd the King to let it go to France for the Money she offer'd; and Marechal Schomberg, who was then in England in his Way to Portugal to command the French and Confederate Forces there, positively advis'd the King to keep it, saying, It cou'd never be taken, considering the Naval Power of England. He added, Tho' France speaks big, as if they wou'd break with England, unless it was deliver'd up, yet they are far from the Thoughts of it; the holding it will keep both France and Spain in a Dependence upon England: So it was sold, and all the Money, says Bishop Burnet, immediately squander'd away among the Mistresses Creatures, tho' he had promis'd he wou'd lay it up all in the Tower, and that it shou'd not be touch'd but upon extraordinary Occasions. Did not his Majesty value himself upon being a King of his Word?

It was not long after the King's Marriage that he gave himself up to an avow'd Course of Lewdness; they are my Lord of Sarum's Words: He continu'd it as long as he liv'd, to the great Scandal of the World, and to the particular Reproach of all that serv'd about him in the Court. The very Bishops and Doctors, who so strenuously promoted the Uniformity Act, say, He usually came from his Mistresses Lodgings to Church, even on Sacrament Days. He held as it were a Court in them.

A few Weeks before the Passing of the Act of Uniformity, Col. Okey, Mr. Miles Corbett, and Col. Barkstead were seiz'd in Holland, and sent Prisoners to England. Col. Okey and Col. Barkstead had been receiv'd into Protection of the City of Hanaw in Germany, where they were made Burgeses, together with Col. Walton and Col. Dixwell. Barkstead and Okey taking a Journey to Holland to meet some Relations, who were contented to banish themselves with them, and to conduct

A.D. 1662 conduct them to the Place which they had chosen for their Residence. Information of it was given to George Downing, a New England Teacher, who had serv'd Col. Okey, as Chaplain to his Regiment, and who had given Okey Assurance, by a Friend, that he had no Orders to look after him; for Downing, whom Cromwel had prefer'd as a gifted Person, to be his Agent in Holland, had accepted of the King's Agency, and acted for him with as much Zeal as he had acted against him, excepting that he did not make so much use of his Gifts. This Fellow, for sure he was not so considerable as Mr. Asham, the Parliament's Ambassador in Spain, whom the Lord Clarendon so stiles, obtain'd an Order from the States to apprehend his old Master Col. Okey, Col. Barkstead, and Mr. Corbett, which was done accordingly. He ship'd them all three for England, where they were shut up in the Tower, and from thence carry'd to Tyburn, being all under Attainder, and there hang'd, drawn and quarter'd. Mind Echard now, Col. Okey having been hang'd, bowel'd and quarter'd, his Majesty was most graciously pleas'd, in regard to his Christian Carriage, to return his Quarters to his Friends.

But notwithstanding this most gracious Act, the Quarters were taken away again. He says, very falsely, on account of the tumultuous Concourse of Fanatics, who wou'd have attended them to the Grave. The Concourse was numerous, several Thousands, but not tumultuous. They behav'd themselves with Decency and Modesty, says Ludlow; however, the King was so alarm'd, that he revok'd his Grant, and dispatch'd Orders to the Sheriffs, Francis Menil and Samuel Starling, to disperse the People.

A Sham Plot.

The next hanging Work for State Matters, were the Executions of George Philips, Serjeant to a Foot Company, Thomas Tongue, a Strong-Water Man, Francis Stubbs, a Cheese-monger, Nathaniel Gibbs, a Felt-maker, who with James Hind, a Gunner, John Sellars, a Compass-maker, one Thomas, one Nye, with Elton, Rawdon, Spurway and Ward, were to turn the King, Lords and Commons out of the Government, to rout the Army and Fleet, and set up a Common-wealth, and a Council of State, which Council of State was to be compos'd of the above-mention'd, Thomas, Nye, Elton, Rawdon, Spurway and Ward. They were to kill all that came in their Way, particularly Monk the General, and Browne the Wood-monger. This Farce has a very tragical End, for Gibbs, Stubbs, Tongue and Philips were actually hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, tho' the most credible Part of the Story was incredible, that Lieutenant General Ludlow was to have headed these obscure Wretches, who I doubt not hated both Browne and Monk, and the Duke of York, and perhaps the King, enough to have taken Arms against them, if Opportunity offer'd, and enough to have talk'd after that idle and treasonable Rate; but to imagine that so wise and wary a Man as Ludlow, wou'd throw himself at the Mercy of his Enemies, under the Protection of a Cheese-monger, a Strong-Water Man, and a Serjeant of Foot, murders all Credibility; and had not the Men dy'd for't, wou'd have been as merry a Plot as ever appear'd on the Stage. But the Men being put to Death, there is no laughing at it. Echard has stamp'd it with his Authority, so that upon the whole, we cannot find upon what Reason this can be reckon'd a SHAM PLOT. Turn now to Ludlow, "In the mean Time, the English Court knowing themselves to be fallen under the Hatred and Contempt of the People, for their Cruelty, Immorality and Corruption, aggravated by the late Sale of Dunkirk, resolv'd by the Contrivance of a Plot, to disarm their Enemies, and provide for their present Safety: To this End, by the Means of Major General Browne and others, Money was advanc'd, and Arms put into the Hands of some Persons, among whom one Bradley, who had formerly belong'd to Cromwel, was the Principal, that by giving small Sums to Indigent Officers of the late Army, and by shewing the Arms they had ready, they might engage them and others in this pretended Design.

An Account of this Plot was printed and publish'd, affirming that divers Thousands of ill affected Persons were ready, under any Command to sieze the Tower, and the City of London; then to march directly to Whitehall, in order to kill the King and Monk, with a Resolution to give no Quarter to any that adher'd to them, and after that to declare for a Common-wealth. By this Means, one Baker, who had been of the Guard to Cromwel, and since the Disbanding of the Army, had been reduc'd to grind Knives for a poor Living, having receiv'd half a Crown from Bradley, and promis'd his Assistance when there shou'd be Occasion, was executed with some others for this Conspiracy. However, this serv'd the Court for a Pretence to sieze five or six Hundred Persons, to disarm all those they suspected, to require those they had taken, to give Bonds of 200 Pounds each, not to take up Arms against the King, and to encrease their standing Guards. They were not asham'd also to give out that their Messengers had been so near to sieze my Person, that they had taken my Cloak and Slippers, and committed two Gentlemen to the Tower, for accompanying me, as they said, to the Sea-side, in Order to my Escape, tho' at the same Time they knew so well where I was, that they employ'd Instruments to procure me to be assassinated, which was discover'd to a Merchant of Lausanne, by a Person of Quality, living in these Parts, who had refus'd 10,000 Crowns offer'd to him by the Dutchess of Anjou, Sister to his gracious Majesty, if he would undertake that Province.

The Lord Clarendon seems to me to be the deepest in these Sham Plots; and if they were Shams, as there is Reason enough to believe they were, what sort of Men must they be, who cou'd make Plots and Plotters, and hang them for Plots of their own making? Such were the Champions of the Cause, which the Compleat Historians have espous'd.

Sir John Lawson, whom the Earl of Sandwich left behind him in the Sreights, brought the Governments of Algier, Tripoli and Tunis to Reason. By good Management, and the Terror of Blake's Name, still fresh in their Memory, he prevail'd with them to confirm the Articles of the former Treaties.

The Earl of Peterborough took Possession of Tangier for his Majesty, and the Earl of Tiviot, who had been Governor of Dunkirk, was sent to command there. The City was made a free Port, and, as the Archdeacon justly observes, it was seated very commodiously for Strength and Safety to guard any Naval Power, and to command those Seas. But the Heads of the Politicians in England were otherwise taken up. Acts were pass'd and passing, that wou'd ruin the Trade at home, and then I know not what the Trade abroad signify'd.

His Majesty's Counsels, says Echard, for above two Years were regular and steady, and carry'd on with Wisdom and Forecast. There is not one Instance of it in any History, whether Church or

A.D. 1663 Presbyterian. Was it a Mark of his Steadiness to pass his Declaration for Ecclesiastical Affairs in October, and the Uniformity Act six Months after, and the Toleration four Months after? Were these Things the Effects of Wisdom and Fore-cast, of Steadiness and Regularity? The Arch-deacon, to lay a Blemish on the King's Declaration of Indulgence, publish'd in the Beginning of this Year, intimates, that it was contriv'd among the Popish Priests at Somerset-House. The Papists were indulg'd as well as the Dissenters, and it was on that Account that the Ministers refus'd to thank the King for it. As soon as the Parliament met, which was on the 18th of February, his Majesty spoke of the Declaration in a favourable Way, which did not hinder the Parliament's presenting an Address against it; wherein they discharg'd him of his Promise at Breda, touching Liberty of Conscience. And that they might not give the Papists too much Countenance by their Severity to Protestant Dissenters, they presented a Petition to the King against Priests and Jesuits. The Declaration of Indulgence was a daring Act of arbitrary Power. Echard calls the Uniformity Act, the Laws of the Land; and it was therefore illegal to dispense with it, but the Kings of this royal House, as a noble Lord once observ'd to me, lov'd the Encrease of Power every way but by Arms. His Majesty spoke very graciously to the Parliament, notwithstanding he was not very well pleas'd with their Petition against the Papists, whose Services and Merits he extoll'd. On the 12th of June he made a Speech to the Commons in the Banqueting-House, which is very long, and has an Expression in it worth Notice: God knows I do not long more for any Blessing in this World, than that I may live to call a Parliament, and not ask or receive any Money from them; which I do verily believe, tho' not in the Sense he spoke, or they took it; for there was at this time a Project on Foot. Father Orleans tells us, 'twas projected by Alexander Popham, Esq; to raise a certain Fund yearly, sufficient to discharge the King's necessary and unnecessary Expences, without a Parliament. Bishop Burnet and Wellwood informs us, the Earl of Southampton, Lord Treasurer, gave into it, not with a View of giving Interruption to Parliaments, but out of pure Affection to the Service of the Exchequer. The Earl of Clarendon secretly oppos'd it. I cannot complement him with an Opinion, that he did it out of a Spirit of Liberty, or to keep the Crown in Dependence upon Parliamentary Subsidies. Every Body agrees, that he was declining in the King's Favour, owing chiefly to the continual Complaints of the Cavaliers, who thought their Merits were not sufficiently rewarded, and to the more successful Arts and Insinuations of the Mistresses, especially the reigning Mistress, the Countess of Castlemain, Roger Palmer's Wife, who hated him for slighting her, whom all others courted. This Scheme coming in the Way, at such a Juncture, the Lord Clarendon thought to arm himself against Disgrace, by a popular Interest, and therefore pretended to be extremely in love with Parliaments. Such a one as the present was, might indeed be much in his good Graces, but a good Parliament wou'd never have done his Business, both in Church and State. Wellwood writes, One might have thought this Parliament had glutted his Ambition to the full, by heaping those Prerogatives upon him, which had been contested for, with his Father, at the Expence of so much Blood and Treasure; but he grasp'd early after more, and from his first Accession to the Crown, shew'd but little Inclination to depend upon Parliaments. Yet he's always telling them, that he's enamour'd with them; A.D. 1663 and wou'd not one think by his Speeches, that Mrs. Palmer had less of his Heart than the House of Commons? Chancellor Hyde knew him too well to believe a Word of it; and having a private Conference with the good Earl of Southampton concerning the Project, he told that Lord, He was better acquainted with the King's Temper and Inclinations than Southampton cou'd expect to be, having had long and intimate Acquaintance with his Majesty abroad, and knew him so well, that if such a Revenue was settled upon him for Life, according to the Scheme, neither of those two wou'd be of any farther Use, and they wou'd not in probability see many Sessions of Parliament, during that Reign: Upon which Southampton thought no more of the Project; but this Passage coming to the Ears of the King, prov'd the true Reason why his Majesty abandon'd Hyde to his Enemies.

Mr. Archdeacon speaking of the Proclamation against Jesuits and Priests, owns, it did not appear to be much more in the real Intentions of the Court, than another popular Proclamation for the better Observation of the Lord's Day, which was generally spent then in Gaming and Revelling of all Kinds, and likewise for renewing a former Proclamation against vicious, debauch'd and profane Persons; when as Mr. Echard justly observes, it became more visible, that Popery and Profaneness, were both in the Encrease at Court; yet at the same Time that he acknowledges it, he highly approves of the Parliament's taking Care of the King's Revenue. They had given him a new Tax, call'd Chimney-Money, amounting to about 200,000 Pounds a Year. He had had 300,000 Pounds with his Wife, 300,000 more for Dunkirk, besides his Sister's Portion paid out of that Sale. He had 1,200,000 Pounds by an Assessment the last Year, and had 1,200,000 Pounds settled Revenue. Thus by the modestest Computation, he had receiv'd about five Millions since he came into England, not full three Years when the last Money was paid him; yet he tells this Parliament, If you yourselves had not in an extraordinary Manner improv'd my Revenue, the Government cou'd not have been supported; and if it be not yet improv'd, the Consequence will be the same. To warm them in their Proceedings, after he has chid them a little for their Coldness, he acquaints them with a Plot in Ireland, for the Surprise of the Castle of Dublin, &c. Thus by his obliging Carriage partly, and partly by other Inducements, says Wellwood, he made a shift to get more Money out of his first Parliament, towards the Expence of his Pleasures, than all his Predecessors of the Norman Race had obtain'd before, towards the Charge of their Wars. We shall not be misled, if we remember this when we read what Lord Clarendon told the Parliament of the Taxes, Burthens, and profuse Expences in the late Times, which amidst perpetual War, did not in the Maintenance of victorious Fleets and Armies come into any Manner of Comparison with the Squanderings of the Court on Mistresses, Minions, on Luxury and Debauchery.

The Parliament gave the King four entire Subsidies. Echard assures us, they were persuaded to it by the affecting Way of his Majesty's Delivery of his Speech. It wou'd have been no great Encomium on their Understandings, if he had said they were mov'd to it by the Strength of Reasoning; for it is certainly a Parcel of smooth Words only without Energy, or any persuasive Power. But what this Parliament were, is excellently well describ'd in the Eloquence of Lawrence Womach, D. D. who was made a Bishop for

A.D. 1663 for that, and other such admirable Performances of his. They were the strenuous Impugners of Schism and Rebellion, the ingenious Assertors of the King's Supremacy, Crown, and Dignity; the zealous Patrons of the Church's Hierarchy and Liturgy; the vigorous Champions of Uniformity, assembled under the most Excellent and Auspicious Majesty of King Charles the Second. About this Time a Book was publish'd which explain'd the good Effects of the late Acts made for the Glory of the Church, as two Reverend Historians and more have assur'd us. It was entitled, The Five Groans of the Church; prudently foreseeing and passionately bewailing her second Fall threaten'd by these Five dangerous, tho' undiscern'd Miscarriages that caus'd her First, viz. 1. Undue Ordination, 2. Loose Profaneness, 3. Unconscionable Symony, 4. Careless Non-residence, 5. Encroaching Pluralities, humbly presented to her Supream Head and Governor the King's most Excellent Majesty, and his great Council the Parliament. The Author, a very strict Conformist, complains with great Warmth of above 3000 Ministers admitted into the Church, who were unfit to teach because of their Youth; of 1500 debauch'd Men ordain'd; of the Ordination of many illiterate Men, of 1342 factious Ministers a little before ordain'd; that of 12000 Church-Livings, or thereabouts, 3000 and more being Improperiate, and 4165 Sine Cures, or Non-resident Livings, there was but a poor Remainder left for a painful and honest Ministry. Had the Bishops, instead of adding another Groan to the Church, employed their Time, Pains, Prayers, and Interest to take away these Five Groans, wou'd it not have been more for the Glory of God, than the Act which made room for the 2842 debauch'd and illiterate Men above-mention'd?

Bishop Morley preaches things that were untrue.

Uniformity and Corporation Acts make Havock.

The Uniformity Act is laying itself about in all Quarters of the Kingdom, particularly in Worcestershire, where Mr. Baxter was unhand- somly if not inhumanly dealt with by Dr. Morley, Bishop of that Diocese, who not only refus'd him a Licence to preach in his Diocese, but went in Person to Kidderminster, and preach'd a long Invective against him. See Mr. Baxter's own Words, "He came himself one Day, and preach'd to them a long Invective against them and me as Presbyterians, and I know not what: So that the People wonder'd that ever a Man wou'd venture to come into a Pulpit, and speak so confidently to a People that he knew not, the Things which they commonly knew to be untrue." Sir Robert Holt, Knight of the Shire for Warwickshire, made a Speech in Parliament against Mr. Baxter, as one who pray'd seditiously, but he did not remember the Words: And the thirteen Capital Burgeses, the Bailiff and Justice of Kidderminster, and almost all the twenty-five inferior Burgeses were turn'd out by the Act, which oblig'd all Persons incorporated to declare they held no Obligation lying upon them or any other Person from the Oath call'd the Solemn League and Covenant, though not above two or three of them had taken it.

The Proceedings were the same all over England, and the Persecuting Acts for Spirituals, and the Corporation Act for Temporals, prepar'd the Way for that Slavery Spiritual and Temporal, which wou'd have been entail'd upon us and our Posterity had it not been for the Revolution.

The Havock and Desolation subsequent to the Acts for Persecution, will not better appear than by

I had exceeded my intended Number before I was aware of it; and to these might be added <sup>Ministers</sup> bully'd and beaten near TwoThousand more, learned, pious, able and orthodox Divines, who were turn'd out of their Houses, thrown into Prisons, plunder'd, whipp'd and can'd, bully'd, cudgell'd and curs'd at the Pleasure of every drunken Justice and lewd In-former. 'Twou'd be endless if I shou'd enter into the Detail of the Usage these venerable Divines met with, not only from the Justices, but even from the Bishops, every County in England had such Worshipful Magistrates, as Sir Edmund Bacon, Sir Gervase Elways, and Sir Algernoon May in Suffolk! The former, Bacon, meeting --- Scandaret, M. A. of Trinity College, Cam-bridge, and Minister of Haveril in that County on the Road, whipp'd him with his Horse-whip first, and then inatching Mr. Scandaret's Cane out of his Hand, can'd him with it till he was weary. Peter Gunning, Bishop of Chichester, ran about with the Constables himself to break open

A.D. 1663 Doors and disturb religious People in the Worship of God after the Way of the Reform'd. Once finding a Door shut against him, he order'd the Constable to break it open; upon which one of the Crowd cry'd out, What has Peter lost his Keys? And upon his firing hotly against the poor praying Garrison within Doors, another call'd him Peter Gunner; but nothing discourag'd him in his Warfare, he sat as a Justice on the Bench at the Quarter-Sessions at Lewis. A Barrister at Law, who was in Commission of the Peace, and us'd to give the Charge, desir'd the Bishop so to do, which sham'd him a little; but tho' he took it as an Affront he sat still to have his furious Will on some Protestant Preachers and Hearers. A Justice, whom he wou'd have spirited up against them, refus'd it, saying, He who wou'd have good Neighbours must be a good Neighbour himself. I have been a Witness of the plundering of Men's Houses and Barns, and driving away their Cattle by Bishops Men and others in Somersetshire, having Warrants from Sir Edward Phillips, Hobbs, and other such Justices as Bacon of Sussex. But it was observ'd of that Hobbs in particular, that from Beggaring others he became a Beggar himself, and that the Plunder taken from Protestant Dissenters, as Dr. Calamy informs us, seldom enrich'd the Plunderers. God so order'd it in his Providence, that the Losers were but little the poorer, and they who were eager for such ill-gotten Goods were not much the richer.

Chancellor Hyde im- for the greatest Part of the Business in this Reign peach'd of is of this Kind. The King's Wars were all with High Treason. Presbyterians, at home and abroad, and if the Activity of the Government, in persecuting the Non-conformists, must not have a Place in our History, it will be a meer Skeleton. The Glory of the Church, as the Ecclesiastical Writers term the Uniformity-Bill, was maintain'd after the above-mention'd Manner, 'till the next Popish King resolv'd to glorify his own Church, that of Rome, and granted a Toleration to Protestants, as well as Popish Dissenters. For the great Share Chancellor Hyde had in the aforesaid Bill and Glory, Mr. Archdeacon will not believe a Word of the Earl of Bristol's Charge of High Treason against him, exhibited in the House of Lords, contrary to the King's particular Injunction, That he arrogated a supreme Direction in all things, with a traiterous Intent to bring his Majesty in- to a Contempt. 'Tis true, he arrogated the su-pream Direction, which of Consequence, render'd the King contemptible: But I do not believe the Earl of Clarendon made himself great on Purpose to make the King little; That he alienated the Hearts of his Majesty's Subjects, by say- ing, the King intended to bring in Popery, and he said nothing but the Truth, knowing him to be a Papist; and what follows is as true, that he had said, The King was dangerously corrupted in his Religion, that Papists had such Access to him, and Credit with him, that unless there was a watchful Eye upon it, the Protestant Religion
wou'd be overthrown, which is what I am endeavouring to prove, that he said, His Majesty had given 10,000 Pounds to remove a zealous Pro- testant, Sir Edward Nicholas, that he might bring into that high Place of Secretary of State, a conceal'd Papist, Sir Henry Bennet. That several of his Dependants did not stick to say, If the Lord Chancellor does not stand in the Gap, Popery will be introduc'd in this Kingdom: That he persuaded the King to allow his Name to be us'd to the Pope and Cardinals, for the Solicitation of a Cardinal's Cap for the Lord Aubigny, which is very likely, and that he employ'd one Richard Bealing, a known Papist, in that Affair, upon

A.D. 1663 Promise of great Favour to Papists: That he had promis'd the Pope to do his Endeavour to take away the Penal Laws against them: That he concluded the Articles of Marriage between his Majesty and the Queen, upon Terms scandalous and dangerous to the Protestant Religion: That he brought the King and Queen together, without any settled Agreement about the Performance of the Marriage Rites; whereby the Queen refusing to be marry'd by a Protestant Priest, in case of her being with Child, either the Succession shou'd be made uncertain for want of the due Rites of Matrimony, or else his Majesty be expos'd to a Suspicion of having been marry'd in his own Dominion by a Romish Priest: That he vented opprobrious Scandals against his Majesty's Person and Course of Life, such as are not fit to be mention'd, but such as were doubtless very true: That he perswaded the King, against the Advice of General Monk, to withdraw the English Garrisons out of Scotland: That he told his Majesty, There never was so weak and inconsiderable a House of Lords, nor never so weak and heady a House of Commons, which as to the latter, is a more just Character of them than Echard's wise Ones and experienc'd Ones: That he had advis'd the King to sell Dunkirk: That he had enrich'd himself and his Creatures by sale of Offices: That he had converted Money, rais'd in Ireland for the publick Service, to his own Use: That he had procur'd a Farm of the Customs at a low Rate to make his Profit of it, &c. I don't think that Echard's scowring has clear'd the Character of Chancellor Hyde as to several of these Articles, which are generally allow'd to be true, but the King cou'd not yet part with him: He had disoblig'd his Subjects of the Reform'd Religion, and if he shou'd disoblige his other Subjects the Papists, and the Promoters of the late Act, he wou'd be in Danger of travelling again, so the Judges were taught to give it as their Opinion, That one Peer cou'd not exhibit a Charge of High Treason against another. The Lords agreeing to it, the Prosecution sunk for the present, and the Earl of Bristol absconded for a while, to avoid the Repentment of his Enemy.

At the Breaking up of the Parliament, Echard brings his Speaker again upon the Stage, with a handsome Speech, tho' the handsomest Part of it is, where he tells the King, that to secure the Peace of the Nation against the Dissenters, the Parliament presented him with an additional Bill for raising the Militia. The King answers him in a Speech, wherein he tells the Parliament, he has given it in Charge to the Judges, to use their utmost Endeavours in their Circuits to prevent and punish seditious Meetings. And as to the Papists, he will take them to Task himself. I will be as watchful, and take all the Pains I can to convict them; and if he had done his Business against them as well as the Judges and Justices did theirs against the Protestants, there wou'd not hath been such an eternal Clamour at the Growth of Popery.

About the Beginning of August, the King and Queen went from London to the Bath. They were entertain'd at Share, near Newbury in Berkshire, by Sir Thomas Doleman; at Littlecot in Wiltshire by Alexander Popham, Esq; one of Oliver's Lords; at Marlborough by the Lord Seymour; at Longleat by Sir James Thynne; at Badminton in Gloucestershire by the Marquis of Worcester; at Cornbury in Oxfordshire by Chancellor Hyde; and at Oxford by the University. In this Progress, Echard takes Care to tell us, his Majesty touch'd above 300 People for the Kings-Evil, which I believe is to be cur'd by a Touch as soon as any other Evil.

During

Yorkshire Plot.

During this Progress, there broke out a Plot in Yorkshire; the main Design of which was to seize Gloucester and Newcastle, Whitehall and Nottingham, Worcester and Boston, and all the Passes on the Severne, the Trent, and the Tine. Boston lay convenient for Assistance from Holland; Newcastle was in the Neighbourhood of the Scots, and Gloucester lay handy to receive the Welsh Army that was to come and join them. Their Pretences were to reform the Lawyers and Clergy, to put down Chimney-Money, and other Taxes, and procure a Resurrection for the Long Parliament, which Chancellor Hyde told both Lords and Commons, had been bury'd at a prodigious Charge, three or four Years before.

More Plot-
ters.

The Forlorn of these Armies appear'd at Farsley Wood in Yorkshire, but the Militia, and some regular Troops meeting them, instead of Dutchmen and Switzers, the Plot was spoil'd, and the Plotters too: The Chief of whom were, Robert Oldroyd, Joshua Ashmith, Peregrine Corney, William Tolson, John Nettleton, Senior, John Nettleton, Junior, Ralph Rimer, Thomas Oates, Samuel Ellis, Robert Scott, John Foster, John Snowden, John Smith, William Ash, Charles Carre, John Errington, Robert Atkins, William Cotton, George Denham, Henry Watson, Richard Wilson, who were all taken, and hang'd at their own Doors, and other Places. The very Names of these Wretches prove the Falseness of General Ludlow's engaging with them, for Reasons more than once offer'd in the preceding Pages. I do not at all wonder that the Court and Ministry are frighted out of their Wits at the Rumour of forty or fifty Rumpers got together, nor that the very Names of Lambert and Ludlow sling them into a Panic. They were told that these Yorkshire Men had sent for Lambert to head them, though they had him safe in the Tower, or in St. Nicholas Island. I doubt not that these rash, desperate Fellows, might have resolv'd to join with any body that shou'd appear in Arms against so unpopular a Government, and that they might be so foolish as to provide themselves of Weapons for such an Attempt, nay, to make a Motion, in hopes the general Hate of the People wou'd stir up a general Rising; for by this Time Court and Courtiers were hated as much as Men cou'd be, who were despis'd: The Reader will probably think Ludlow expresses it better than I can.

"The endless Prodigiousity of the English Court, the Persecution of the Dissenters, the Sale of Dunkirk, the Articles exhibited in Parliament by the Earl of Bristol against the Chancellor Hyde, and the Factions ensuing on that Account, together with many other Causes of Discontent and Division, had so alienated the Affections of the People from their King, that the best Judges were of Opinion, if a favourable Juncture shou'd happen, they wou'd be as ready to shake off the Yoke, as they had been foolish and inconsiderate in putting it on; and our Friends in all Parts began to entertain Hopes that they might be again employed to rescue their Country from Servitude." And it is true, Col. Sidney had an Interview about the same Time with Lieutenant General Ludlow and the Refugees in Switzerland, where they did all agree not to be wanting to the publick Service, if an Opportunity offer'd. But it is monstrous to think they wou'd concert Measures, or engage with such sorry Tools as Oldroyd, Ashmith, Corney, Oates, and the Yorkshire Gang. Echard makes a very silly Reflection on this Passage out of Ludlow; It plainly shew'd his Disposition, and the Disposition of the rest of his Opinion, to do what? to make War upon King Charles, upon Hyde and Menk, and the persecuting Bishops: Who ever doubted it? But does it shew any Disposition in him to join with a rascally Rout, without Ships, without Men, without Money, and without any thing but good Will? Was he such a sort of a Man? A Year after, when the King had declar'd War with the Dutch, who had so highly oblig'd him, both he and Col. Sidney, and every Hand that had held a Sword in what they call'd the Good Old Cause, were certainly very desirous to have taken Vengeance on their Enemies in a military Way.

About the Time that the Yorkshire Men were hang'd, John Twine, a Printer, was executed for printing a Common-wealth Pamphlet; but they pillory'd Simon Dover, Printer, Thomas Brewster, Bookseller, and Nathaniel Brooks, Bookbinder, for uttering something written by Milton, Buchanan, and other such mean Writers. Echard tells us, that what Milton wrote, was in Opposition to that excellent Oath in the Corporation Act, That it is unlawful in any Case whatsoever to abdicate a Sovereign.

Upon the Death of Dr. William Juxon, the Archbishoprick of Canterbury was given to Dr. Gilbert Sheldon, to whom the Protestant Religion and English Liberty were indebted for the Act of Uniformity, and the other stinging Acts against Protestant Dissenters, whose Religion being the same with that of the Dutch, it is not to be doubted but the King's Quarrel with the latter was much more out of Hatred to it, than out of Concern for the Honour and Interest of England, which none of this Royal House were ever much concern'd about till after the Revolution.

The Politicks of this Government had no Disguise but what the weakest Eyes cou'd see thro', and they needed no more Art than the Ministers were capable of, to lead this willing Parliament into any thing. Never was Assembly so prostituted to the Pleasure of the Court, never one so shamefully Betrayers of their Country both in Ecclesiastical and Civil Matters. The Triennial Bill, which pass'd after a long Struggle in King Charles the First's Reign, stuck in the King's Stomach, and therefore in his Speech at the opening of the next Sessions of Parliament, March the 18th, he recommends it to the Commons to be revis'd, in his usual coaxing Way. Having told them of the terrible Rebellion in Yorkshire, and said all he cou'd think of to alarm them, and exasperate them still more against Protestant Dissenters, as at the bottom of that and all other Plots, he comes to the Point.

"Some wou'd still insist on the Authority of the Long Parliament, of which, they say, they have Members enough who are willing to meet: Others have fancied to themselves, by some Computation of their own, upon some Clause in the TRIENNIAL BILL, That this present Parliament was at an End some Months since, and that for want of new Writs, they may assemble themselves, and choose Members for Parliament; and this is the best Expedient to bring them together for their own Purposes. For the Long Parliament, you and I can do no more to inform and compose the Minds of all Men, let them proceed upon their Peril. But methinks there is nothing done to disabuse them in respect of the Triennial Bill. I confess, my Lords and Gentlemen, I have often my self read over that Bill; and though there is no Colour for the Fancy of the Determination of this Parliament, yet I will not deny to you, that I have always expected you wou'd, and even admir'd you have not consider'd the wonderful Clauses in that Bill (and he might very well have admir'd, Parliament imposed on by the King.

A.D. 1664 mir'd, if he had before intimated his Desire to have it repeal'd; for he can hardly be fonder of absolute arbitrary Power, than they are become fond of absolute Submission) "which pass'd in "a Time very uncareful for the Dignity of the "Crown, or Security of the People."—So uncareful, that they were at the Expence of many Millions of Money and Blood in Proportion for their Security. "I pray, Mr. Speaker, and you Gentlemen of the House of Commons, give that Triennial Bill once a Reading in your House, "and then, in God's Name, do what you think "fit for me, and your selves, and the whole Kingdom. I need not tell you how much I love Parliaments (Their Ears are all stretch'd out to hear this) "never King was so much beholden "to Parliaments as I have been, nor do I think "the Crown can ever be happy without frequent "Parliaments; and to shew how much he valu'd himself on being a Prince of his Word, he kept this near eighteen Years, and sometimes saw them not for ten or twelve Months. "But "assure your selves, if I did think otherwise, I "would never suffer a Parliament to come together by the Means prescrib'd by that Bill." He tells them there very plainly, that he matters not the Law, and intimates, if they don't repeal it, he would do it himself, and never let it be put in execution: But he need be in no Concern about it. This Assembly had no relish of English Liberty, they fled from her, adorn'd as she is with Celestial Beauty, and ran into the Arms of Slavery, the foulest of all Shadowy Beings. The Bill soon pass'd to repeal the Act for Triennial Parliaments, but they were asham'd to let it go by its right Name, so it was stil'd, An Act for assembling and holding of Parliaments once in three Years at least. Bishop Burnet informs us what an absurd ridiculous Business it was; pray turn to the King's wheedling Speech about it, and then read what his Lordship says. "The Parliament repealed the Triennial Bill, "which had been obtain'd with so much Difficulty, and was clogg'd with so many Clauses, "which seem'd to transfer the Power from the "Crown to the People, that when it was carried, it was thought the greatest Security the "People had for all their other Liberties. The King has been just telling the two Houses of Lords and Commons that it utterly destroyed their Security. "It was now given up without a Struggle, "or any Clauses for a Certainty of Parliaments, "besides a general one; that there shou'd be a "Parliament call'd within three Years after the "Dissolution of the present Parliament, and so "ever afterwards; but without any severe Clauses "in Case the Act was not observ'd." However, both Echard and the Compleat Historian are in the best Humour in the World on this Occasion; when it is impossible for a good Englishman to behold his dear Country in the Hands of such a Parliament, without trembling with Fear, and melting with Compassion.—The Speech-making Speaker, when the Parliament was prorog'd, told his Majesty, That the Act of Security, spoken of by my Lord of Sarum, was impracticable, and only useful to learn the People how to rebel. Then comes some elegant Nonsense: Therefore we melted it down, extracted the pure Metal from counterfeit and drossy Alloy, and then presented it to your Majesty to be stamp'd, and made current Coin. He return'd the Parliament's most humble Thanks to the King, that he had been most graciously pleas'd to pass that new Bill, which threw down the Fences of their Security, and laid them at the Mercy of Mistresses and Minions. Echard tells us, the Yorkshire Plot gave Occasion to that infamous Bill call'd the Conventicle Act. The Infamy of it arose from the vile Arts made use of to give a Colour to it, and the Cruelty and Inhumanity of the Penalties. We will repeat what Turner the Speaker said of it in his Prorogation Speech; it will shew us what his Head was, and what his Heart. "Whilst we were intent upon "these weighty Affairs, we were often interrupted by Petitions, and Letters, and Motions, representing the unsettled Conditions of some "Counties, by reason of Fanaticks, Sectaries, "and Nonconformists. They differ in their Shapes "and Species, and accordingly are more or less "dangerous; but in this they all agree, they are "no Friends to the establish'd Government either "in Church or State. And if the old Rule be "true,

Qui Ecclesie contradicit, non est pacificus, "we have great Reason to prevent their Growth, "and to punish their Practice. To this Purpose "we have prepar'd a Bill against their frequenting of Conventicles; the Seed-Plots and Nurseries of their Opinions, UNDER PRE-TENCE of Religious Worship. "The first Offence is made punishable with "five Pounds, or three Months Imprisonment. "The second Offence with ten Pounds, or six "Months Imprisonment.

"But the third Offence is Banishment to some "Foreign Plantation.

The two Reverend Historians are not at all mov'd at this; or if they are mov'd at all, 'tis with an Emotion of Pleasure, as much as it is scandalous and shameful to Christianity itself. The Bishop of Salisbury says, All People were amaz'd at this Severity, and well might it strike them with Amazement and Horror. To see People pretending to be Protestants making a Law to ruin and destroy their Brethren of the same Religion, for worshipping God in their Houses, after they themselves had driven them out of their Churches.

All this while was the Design of a War with Holland working. Bishop Burnet informs us, he was positively assur'd by Statesmen on both Sides, that the French set it on in a very artificial Manner. They encourag'd the English to insist on some extravagant Demands, and at the same Time press'd the Dutch not to yield to them. These were Finesses in Politicks, too subtil to be observ'd by a Court and Ministry, whose Heads were full of Sham-Plots and Persecution, and a Parliament that had given themselves up to Bigotry and Pensions. As the French put the Dutch in hopes that if a Rupture shou'd follow, they would assist them according to their Alliance, so they assur'd the English they would do them no hurt. Downing before-mention'd, the New-England Pulpit, was then unemploy'd in England.

The Bishop of Salisbury tells us, "He was a Down-crafty fawning Man, who was ready to turn to every Side that was uppermost, and to betray those who by their former Friendship and Services thought they might depend on him; as he did some of the Regicides, whom he got into his Hands under Trust, and then deliver'd them up, particularly Col. Okey, whose Chaplain he had been. Cromwel employ'd him as his Agent in Holland, where he had offer'd personal Affronts both to the King and to the Duke; yet he had by some base Practices got himself to be so effectually recommended by Monk (Observe what Instruments are made use of) "that all his former Offences were forgiven, "and he was sent into Holland as the King's Ambassador; whose Behaviour to the King himself the States had observ'd, so they had Reason to conclude he was sent over with no "good

A.D. 1664 "good Intent, and that he was capable of managing a bad Design, and very ready to undertake it. There was no visible Cause of a War, a Complaint of a Ship taken was ready to have been satisfied, but Downing, the quondam Independant Parson hinder'd it; wherefore it was plain the King hated the Dutch, and some cry'd they were so feeble, and the English so much superior to them, that a War wou'd humble them to an entire Submission. The States had treated and presented him with great Magnificence, and at a vast Charge, &c. as "has been shewn already." But out of hatred to the Presbyterian Religion, and love to the French, who desir'd to see the English Hereticks destroy the Dutch, that they might the more easily destroy the English afterwards, no Endeavours were wanting in England to set both City and Country against the Hollanders, as Incroachers on the Commerce of the English Merchants. Turner, the Speaker, said in his Speech, We find that besides the insufferable Indignities offer'd to your Royal Majesty, the Dutch have in a few Years spoil'd your Subjects to the value of 800,000 Pounds. The insufferable Indignities were not spoken of when they were waisting their Treasure in Treats upon him at the Hague, before he took Shipping for England. Both Houses of Parliament had address'd him to procure Satisfaction of the Dutch, with Promises to stand by him with their Lives and Fortunes; and they gave him Money enough to have maintain'd the Honour of England, if he had had it at Heart so much as maintaining the Profusion, Luxury, and Vanity of the Female Court.

Coke, The greatest Cause of Complaint against the Dutch, was for Injuries done to Sir William Courteen, and Sir Paul Pindar, and the Person to whom he granted Letters of Reprisal, Sir Edward Turner did, no doubt, forward the Business in Parliament to the utmost of his Power: But the true Reason was probably the secret League between Lewis XIV. and Charles II. suppos'd to be concluded by the Queen Mother, with the Assistance of Monsieur Colbert, who succeeded as Prime Minister in France after Cardinal Mazarine's Death. Colbert's Agent, Abbot Primi, gave a clear Account of this Treaty, in a Book printed by Authority at Paris, in the Year 1682, and suppress'd upon Complaint of Lord Preston, the English Ambassador, and the Abbot sent to the Bastile for ten Days only. However, we have another Authority for it in Sir William Temple's Letters, and another still, that of Dr. Jonathan Swift, Dean of St. Patrick's, who testifies, that he had that Information from the Author himself, That the Discovery happen'd to fall from the King's own Mouth, when an accidental Passion had render'd him unguarded. In pursuance of this League, the learned Acherly tells us, "Was the Declaration of War made the 22d of February, 1664, against the Dutch, in order to bear down that Protestant Power? The Pretences were, to recover Satisfaction for the Wrongs which the English had suffer'd in Trade.

Sir Richard Fanshawe was sent Ambassador to Spain, to engage that King in the intended War against the Hollanders; but alas, the Spanish Court knew better than to be led away with the Bugbears, Common-wealth's Men and Schismatics, while the French King was daily encreasing in Ambition and Power, and threaten'd to break in upon them on all Sides, as soon as their weak Monarch dy'd, which was every Day expected. They no more look'd upon the Dutch as Rebels, but as their best Friends and Allies, in Case of a War in Flanders, which they cou'd no longer doubt wou'd be unavoidable on the King of Spain's Death; and the French King by such an Addition of Power in the Netherlands, wou'd become strong enough to give Laws to all his Neighbours. The English Ministers and Parliament never thought of France and the Netherlands; their Heads were full of destroying the Presbyterians where-ever they found them; and without either Alliances, or any just Reason, they hurry'd the Nation into a War, in which whatever Side was Conqueror, they were both sure to be ruin'd at the end of it. Bishop Burnet has assur'd us, There was no visible Cause of a War; the invisible one must then be, that the Dutch were Protestants, that they were Friends to Liberty, and as such, hated and dreaded by all Promoters of Tyranny, Popery, and Persecution. The Bishop of Salisbury again; The Grounds of this War were so slight, that it was visible there was somewhat more at bottom than openly own'd. A great Comet which appear'd then, rais'd the Apprehensions of the People. The House of Commons was so far from examining nicely into the Grounds of the War, that without any Difficulty they gave the King two Millions and a half for carrying it on; and as soon as the War broke out, a most terrible Plague broke out also.

It may well be wonder'd at, that an English Parliament shou'd not see all this. A true English Parliament wou'd have seen it, and instead of addressing for a War with the Dutch, wou'd have address'd for a Peace with our selves. I have more than once observ'd what kind of Assembly this was, but it is better explain'd in the State Tracts. The Act which repeal'd the Triennial Bill, "left the King at Liberty to continue the same Parliament as long as he pleas'd, and that King accordingly continu'd that same Parliament near eighteen Years; all which Time they cou'd not be said truly to represent the People of England, many of them who chose them being dead, and others were either grown up, or had purchas'd Estates, whose Opinions both of Persons and Things might be much chang'd from what the Sense of the Nation was when the Parliament was first call'd. But having got a considerable Party in the House of Commons, they labour'd to confirm and encrease it. Places and Pensions were liberally bestow'd on all that cou'd be brought over to them; and 'tis no wonder they gave such prodigious Sums of Money out of the poor Peoples Pockets, when a great Part was again to be refunded into their own. This scandalous Proceeding was manifest, and confirmed by the open Confession of a Gentleman (through whose Hands much publick Money then pass'd) in the House of Commons, who acknowledg'd he paid annually many and great Pensions to Members of Parliament, of which still more hereafter." What cou'd be expected from such an Assembly, but such Bills as Bartholomew Acts, Conventicle Acts, Corporation Acts, Acts against Parliaments, &c.

Downing demanded Reparation of the States in so insolent a Manner, that the French Ambassador D'Estrades was asham'd of him. The States sent Van Gock into England to ward off the Blow, and to offer Satisfaction, when the Accounts of Damages on both Sides were liquidated. Echard picks up a silly Pretence for the War, out of a Letter written by a conceal'd Papist to the Ambassador Fanshawe in Spain, which is that upon Downing's bullying the States, and threatening them with War instead of paying down the 800,000 Pounds at Demand, they order'd Ships to be got ready for their Defence in case they were attack'd before the Accounts were fairly stated, and that conceal'd Papist Bennet, so the Lord

A.D. 1664 Bristol call'd him, tells Ambassador Fanshawe, that to prepare for Defence is a Declaration of War. One may expect rare Politicians from such fine Reasoners! The Dutch knew full well what was intended against them, by Intelligence from their Friends both in England and France. Lud-

Growth of Popery,

low writes, "Some of the most eminent Protestants in France sent into Holland, to give Information that the Destruction of the whole Protestant Party was intended, and to advise the States to make the best Preparations they cou'd for their Defence, assuring them, if they shou'd be borndown in the War, the Reform'd Religion wou'd soon be extinguish'd in France."

In the mean time the English King, says the Historian, made it his Business and his great Pleasure to visit his Docks, and in November the Duke of York, Prince Rupert, and the Earl of Sandwich joining several great Squadrons of Men of War, form'd a Fleet, which struck Terror upon the Coasts of Holland, and took several Ships laden with Wine and Brandy, bound from Bourdeaux to Holland, which, according to Mr. Archdeacon, were condemn'd as lawful Prize, tho' no War had been actually declar'd. This Proceeding, continues he, was thought to be more arbitrary than was allow'd by the Law of Nations. But then he advises us not to blame the King or his Ministers for it; it was not their Doing. He seems to be willing to give his Oath, that it was no foreign Project, but the Cry of all the great Merchants, and of the City of London. France, according to his Information or Understanding, had nothing to do with it. The Spaniards were better inform'd, and understood better, who, in a Memorial deliver'd to the States sometime after, say, The French procur'd with a premeditated and private Design, a War with England, to weaken the United Provinces, and afterward to tyrannize over both. He knew not, or takes no Notice of it, that the King and his Ministers had, by various Artifices and Rumours, been working up the Spirits of the trading People with Hopes of procuring them golden Heaps of Satisfaction for small Damages, which are unavoidable between Nations so jealous of their Commerce, and so well able to support it as the English and Dutch. The latter had dispossest the English of their Factories at Cape de Verd, and an Island call'd Gogee, some Months before. What Pretensions they had to them he does not tell us, only offers it as an Excuse for taking the Dutch Bourdeaux Fleet in Breach of the Law of Nations, but does not say a Word of Holmes's Acts of Hostility against the Dutch in Guinea before that, for which the States Ambassador ask'd Satisfaction in vain, nor that Holmes had taken Cape de Verd from the Dutch long before that.

About a Year after the Dutch had spent so much Money on the King and his Brothers, Holmes not only took from them Cape de Verd, and several other Forts in Guinea, but the whole Province of New-Netherlands, now New-York, in America, in the Year 1661; yet does the ingenious and impartial Echard justify King Charles's Breach of the Law of Nations, by the first Acts of Hostility of the Dutch in Guinea and New-York, only to recover those Places which Holmes had surpriz'd and piratically taken by prior Acts of Hostility in time of profound Peace, and just when the State had been squandering their Treasure upon the King and his Family: However, by a strange logical Turn, he and his Flatterers call'd them Ungrateful as well as Insolent, tho' he had never had it in his Power, and much less in his Will, to oblige them.

The Parliament met again on the 24th of November, and the King in his Speech mentions a vile Jealousy rais'd of him, that when the Parliament had given him Money to carry on the War, he wou'd clap up a Peace, and put it into his Pocket. If the War had not been against the Hollanders, I shou'd have thought that Jealousy not so unreasonable as his Majesty conceiv'd it; but there does not seem to be any Grounds for his so saying, from his Opinion of the Dutch Religion and Government. This Parliament then gave him that prodigious Sum of 2,500,000 Pounds before-mention'd, and the King promis'd them, that it shou'd all be expended to the Advantage and Satisfaction of his People.

The Members of Parliament who were most active in promoting this unnatural War, were known Favourers of Popery; the most busy was Mr. Clifford, afterwards Lord Clifford, a Papist, who was Chairman of the Committee, who examin'd into the 800,000 Pounds Damages spoken of by Sir Edward Turner, and reported it to the House.

The Compleat Historian has, in it's due Place, proper Paragraphs, which he calls the State of Religion, and he has some Remarkables that are not to be forgotten. The Church of England, says he, was happily establish'd by the Act of Uniformity, the Wisdom and Moderation of which the World has Reason to admire. The Moderation and Wisdom of this Remark of his will not bear remarking, it is below Reflection. He then informs us, Mr. Edmund Calamy was the first that broke thro' it to preach in his own Church, to which God had given him a Call, when the Congregation was disappointed of a Sermon. It looks like a Plot, says he, for he preach'd upon the Ark of God, and then comes his Wisdom and Moderation. He cou'd not be thought less than a seditious, as well as a disabled Preacher. This Writer being, as I am inform'd, a Preacher himself, wou'd have more adorn'd the Function, had he let his Charity have appear'd more on this Occasion, and not have censur'd two Ministers of the Gospel as in a Plot, one to be absent, and another present, for the promoting of Sedition. Besides, it is not probable, that so good a Churchman as the Minister must be, who was got into Mr. Calamy's Pulpit after he was pull'd out of it by the late Act, wou'd be accessary to such a seditious Lecture. The Truth is, the Discourse was unpremeditated, and purely occasion'd by the Disappointment. What was said in the Sermon about the Danger the Reform'd Church of England was in, is well explain'd by Dr. Calamy, Grandson of the Gentleman we are speaking of. As Circumstances then were, there might well be a Concern stirring for serious Religion, which was in no small Danger. And had this Author wav'd that Reflection, his Work wou'd not have lost any of its Beauty. I shou'd have been at the Pains to have pointed to those Beauties in his Work, as I have done in Echard's, had they been as worthy of it. The Writer is delighted with the Execution of the new Law upon him; Mr. Calamy was committed to Newgate by the Lord Mayor, Sir John Robinson, where, according to the Historian, he lay but a few Days before he was discharged by his Majesty's express Order, without the due Manner of a legal Discharge. You see how sorry he is for it; and again, which brought a Contempt upon the Law and Church. How long it had been a Law, and what a Law it was, we have seen already. Dr. Calamy represents it thus, He was soon releas'd, when it was seen what a Resort of Persons of all Qualities there went to him in Newgate.

The next Ecclesiastical Affair of greatest Importance, says the Compleat Historian, was the providing a better Maintenance for the conforming

A.D. 1664 ing Clergy. There was a pious Disposition in the Commons to make every Benefice a Cure of Comfort and Credit, which is an Explanation of that comfortable Importance elsewhere mention'd: Then he speaks of the Plot in Yorkshire for the Presbyterians and Republicans, and complains that the Uniformity Act, and Conventicle Act, were not steadily executed. A new Order was issu'd for all Rectors, Vicars and Curates, to read Divine Service in their Surplices; and thus stands the State of Religion with him, 'till the breaking out of the Dutch War.

We must not forget that Mr. Pryme, having taken upon him to amend an Act of Parliament, after it had been read in the House, was reprimanded by Mr. Speaker; nor can we be just to Truth, unless we remember that Lord Clarendon was now very cool in the Affair of the Dutch War. The King intended, as he told the two Houses, that the Lord Chancellor shou'd have enlarg'd upon that Matter, but he being indispos'd, the Steps that had been taken in it, were put into Writing, and deliver'd to them: 'Tis suppos'd that his Indisposition was affected, and that observing there was no such thing as a general Cry against the Dutch, but what the Court had work'd up in London and other Places, or else doubting the Issue of the War, or that he shou'd not have the Management of it, he was not forward in concerning himself in it. Indeed his Interest sunk lower and lower every Day, and it was not long before he became the Subject of the Duke of Buckingham, and other witty Lords Mirth and Mimickry; yet he continu'd in his Post as long as he cou'd, and let them be as merry and as witty as they wou'd with him, he thought the Seal was worth more than all that.

1665. This very terrible Year opens with the Dutch War. If I took the same Liberty with divine Providence as the reverend Historians do, I cou'd not avoid applying all the dreadful Calamities of this and the following Year, War, Plague, and Fire, to the Judgments of Heaven, for the Lewdness, Profaneness, Deceit, and Cruelty of the Times; in which there was not the least Appearance of Religion or Virtue in the Courtiers, or their Creatures, and very little any where else throughout the whole Kingdom.

Times wicked.

"As soon as the War broke out, a most terrible Plague broke out also (they are Bishop Burnet's Words) in the City of London, that scatter'd all the Inhabitants who were able to remove themselves. It broke the Trade of the Nation, and swept away about 100,000 Souls, the greatest Havock that any Plague had ever made in England. This did dishearten all People, and coming in the very Time in which so UNJUST a War was begun, it had a dreadful Appearance. All the King's Enemies said, here is a manifest Character of God's heavy Displeasure upon the Nation, as indeed the ill Life of the King, and the Viciousness of the whole Court, gave but a melancholy Prospect.

Another Author represents it thus; "And now after all the Breaches on the Churches, the Ejection of the Ministers, and Impenitency under all, Wars, Plagues, and Dangers of Famine began all at once on us; yet under all these Desolutions the Wicked are harden'd, &c.

I think the Names of them ought not to be forgotten, nor must we forget that we do not find in this List, the principal Counsellors, the Earl of Southampton, and Earl of Clarendon; they wou'd not countenance this unjust War, not only with their Counsel, but with their Presence at the Board.

The States having publish'd a Memorial in Answer to Sir George Downing's, the Compleat Historian calls it a Libel: Downing exhibiting a Memorial, the same compleat Writer terms the States Answer to it, A second Libel, and he affirms, there were several Invectives in it against the English Nation, whereas the Dutch declar'd, their Quarrel was not against the People, but against the King of England, and that their Designs in the defensive War, was only to secure themselves against the double Dealing they had met with from the English Court.

Several Bills being ready for the Royal Assent, the King came to the House of Peers, and pass'd them, particularly one for the Regulation of the Law, which must be an excellent one, it being so well regulated at present by that and other Helps since that. I shall repeat a Paragraph of the Speaker's Speech, and then have done with it, and with the Speaker. It is to shew what a Trifler he is, tho' he's a perfect Narcissus, with respect to his Opinion of his Eloquence. He is about to present the King with a Bill to make a River or two Navigable, such as the Wye and the Lugg, so often spoken of on the like Occasions, and he cannot do this without a Speech too.

Lud. p. 183.

Cosmographers do agree, that this Island is incomparably furnish'd with pleasant Rivers, like ridiculous Veins in the natural Body, which convey the Blood into all the Parts, whereby the whole is nourish'd and made useful; therefore we have prepar'd some Bills for making small Rivers navigable: A Thing that in other Countries hath been more experienc'd, and hath been found very advantageous; it easeth the People of their great Charge of Land Carriages, preserves the High-ways, which are daily worn out with Waggon, carrying excessive Burthens: It breeds up a Nursery of Watermen, which upon Occasion, will prove good Seamen, and with much more Facility maintains Intercourse and Communication between Cities and Countries. It will be a hard Matter to meet with any thing more impertinent than this, in all Orators, ancient and modern. The King's Majesty, the most Honourable Lords, and most Reverend Bishops, the Honourable Representatives of the People of England, are held in Attention by Sir Edward Turner, while he tells them there are Rivers in England, and that Water Carriage is cheaper than Land Carriage. It was in this Session of Parliament that a Clause was put in the Act for the Royal Aid, to oblige the Clergy to pay Taxes in the same Manner their Neighbours did, which before were levy'd upon them by Grants in Convocation, and Mr. Echard tells us, they were pleas'd to submit to it.

Clergy p. 129. Tax'd with the Laity.

He and the Compleat Historian cry out against the Dutch for De Ruyter's leaving Sir John Lawson in the Streights, when he was about humbling the proud Algerines, and passing thence to Barbados, and from thence to Cape de Verd, as has been observ'd already, ingloriously beginning a Piratick War, under the sacred Bands of Friendship. He says not a Syllable of Sir Robert

A. D. 1665, bert Holmes's Piratick War on the Dutch in Guinea, before De Ruyster's Expedition at Cape de Verd.

The Fleet, and the Duke of York the Admiral, being ready, the Archdeacon informs us, that the Court took a proper and pious Care to compleat the Preparations, by an Order for a general Fast, on April the 5th, to emprove the Blessing of God on his Majesty's Forces against the Dutch in an unjust War, as my Lord of Sarum justly terms it. What a monstrous Mixture is here, Fasting and Lewdness, Injustice and Piety! The two Popish Queens, the King's Mother, and his Wife, did eminently manifest their Zeal on this Occasion (It is the Archdeacon who tells it) and commanded all their Friars and Priests, their Men-Servants and Maid-Servants to set themselves apart with entire Abstinence, and extraordinary Devotions for the Service of the Day; to light up all their Tapers, tell over all their Beads, to bring out their most stately Idols, and worship with more than ordinary Idolatry, for the Destruction of the Presbyterian Hereticks of Holland. It requir'd but a small Portion of common Understanding to conceal such Infirmities in this Reign, which there was no need of exposing. But never did Writer set up for an Historian with so little Judgment and Discretion. Acherly the Lawyer observes, The Circumstances which attended this War, demonstrated the secret Meaning to be for carrying on the secret Interest, to make the King absolute Master of his Parliaments; for no sort of People were so zealous in promoting it, as the Papists, the Queen Mother, and the Queen Consort, did both eminently manifest their Zeal, &c.

The Part the French had in this War, is too well known to say any thing of their Endeavours to mediate a Peace between the King and the States, or to take Notice of Monsieur Courtin's, and Monsieur Venetil's extraordinary Embassy on that Negotiation. Their Master, Lewis XIV. must have as mean an Opinion of the Understandings, as of the Honesty of the English, if he thought he cou'd make them believe that he was in earnest, when he talk'd of Peace, while he was on both Sides fomenting the War; but he was oblig'd by his Treaties with the Dutch to assist them, in case they shou'd be attack'd, and this Negotiation was only to amuse them, and gain Time while they were destroying one another, than which nothing cou'd better prepare the Way for his future Conquests.

The first Action of Note which happen'd in this War, was the taking a Dutch Caper of seven Guns, and two Direction Ships, one of Thirty-two Guns and Eighty Men, which was taken by the Diamond, Capt. Golding, who was kill'd in the Engagement; the other of Twenty-two Guns and Sixty Men, was taken by the Tarmouth. Young Evertz, Son of the Admiral, commanded one of the Direction Ships, whose Father having done good Offices for the King when he was in Holland, his Majesty order'd him to be set at Liberty, and an Hundred Pounds to be paid him, to carry him home.

Sea Fight between the English and Dutch.

On the 2d of June, the Duke of York, with about 110 Men of War, gave Battle to the Dutch Fleet off the Coast of Harwich. The Dutch Admiral Opdam, fell Side to Side with him, and the Fight was fierce and bloody; at last Opdam's great Ship was blown up, either by Accident a-board her, or by the Fire of the English, and it threw the Hollanders into so great a Consternation, that the English obtain'd a signal Victory, and pursu'd the Dutch with good Execution, 'till a Stop was put to it. I shall leave Echard here, and borrow none of his Medals nor Mottos on the Destruction of the Dutch, but follow the Bishop of Sarum.

As soon as the Hollanders steer'd off, a Council of War was call'd to consult the Method of Action, when they shou'd come up with them. In that Council Pen, who commanded under the Duke, happen'd to say, We must prepare for hotter Work in the next Engagements. He knew well enough the Courage of the Dutch was never so high, as when they were desperate. The Earl of Montague, who was then a Volunteer, and one of the Duke's Court, said, it very visibly made an Impression, and all the Duke's Domesticks cry'd, He had got Honour enough, why shou'd he venture a second Time? When Matters were settled, they went to sleep, and the Duke order'd a Call to be given him, when they shou'd come up with the Dutch Fleet. It is not known what pass'd between the Duke and Brounker, who was of the Bed-Chamber, and was then in waiting; but he came to Pen, as from the Duke, and said the Duke order'd the Sail to be slacken'd. Pen was struck with the Order, but did not go to argue the Matter with the Duke as he ought to have done. He obey'd the Order, and when the Duke awoke, he came out on the Quarter-Deck, seeming amaz'd to see the Sails slacken'd, and that thereby all Hope of overtaking the Dutch was lost. He question'd Pen upon it; Pen put it on Brounker, who said nothing. The Duke deny'd he had given any such Order, but he neither punish'd Brounker for carrying it, nor Pen for obeying it. He indeed put Brounker out of his Service, and it was said, he durst do no more, because he was so much in the King's Favour, and in the Mistress's. Pen was more in his Favour after that than ever before, which he continu'd to his Son after him, tho' a Quaker, and it was thought that all that Favour was to oblige him to keep the Secret. Lord Montague did believe that the Duke was struck, seeing the Earl of Falmouth, the King's Favourite, the Lord Muskerry, and Mr. Boyl kill'd very near him, and that he had no Mind to engage again. Nay, according to Acherly, it had such an Effect upon him, that it deterr'd him from venturing any more on Board the Fleet. Bishop Burnet adds, 'twas thought Pen had been privately with him. If Brounker was so much in Fault as he seem'd to be, the Duke, in the Passion that this must have rais'd in him, wou'd have proceeded to greater Extremities, and not have acted with so much Phlegm. This prov'd the breaking the Designs of the King's whole Reign. Coke gives it another Turn, tho' not much better; If it had not been for fear of disturbing the Duke's Nights Rest, it's believ'd the whole Dutch Fleet might have been destroy'd. They lost seventeen or eighteen stout Men of War, and besides Admiral Opdam, there fell Canteneere, Stillingwolf and Stamp, all Flag Officers. De Wit, Pensionary of Holland, who had then the Direction of the Dutch Affairs, was so apprehensive of Mismanagement a-board their Fleet, that he resolv'd to share the Command of it in Person. Besides the Persons of Quality above-mention'd, there were kill'd on the English Side, the Earl of Marlborough, who was only a Captain of a Ship, Rear-Admiral Sampson, and Vice-Admiral Sir John Lawson soon after dy'd of his Wounds.

Now, says Echard, the Duke of York was in the Height of his Glory. He then reckons up how it was, and among other Degrees of it, tells us, he had the Wine Licenses bestow'd upon him. Soon after this Battle, the Queen-Mother return'd to France. It being resolv'd that his Royal Highness shou'd not venture his Person in another Sea Fight, the Command of the Fleet was dispos'd of thus; Edward Earl of Sandwich, Admirals.

A.D. 1665, Sandwich, Admiral, Sir George Ayscue, Vice-Admiral, Sir Thomas Tiddiman, Rear-Admiral, Sir William Penn, Admiral of the White, Sir William Berkley, Vice-Admiral, Sir Joseph Jordan, Rear-Admiral, Sir Thomas Allen, Admiral of the Blue, Sir Christopher Minns, Vice-Admiral, Sir John Harman, Rear-Admiral, Sir Edward Spragg, a Papist, Sir ---- Cuttings, and Sir Jeremy Smith were Captains. Which I take Notice to shew how his Majesty rewarded his Sea-Officers, most of these being Knights of the last Dubbing.

Before Eckard enters into the History of the Fleet's next Enterprizes, he tells us, that the Dutch waited for the Return of De Ruyter, who having been beaten off from Barbados, sail'd to Newfoundland, where he plunder'd the English of their very Cloaths, a great Booty at St. John's, and took two Cod Vessels, the Diamond of Plymouth, and the Unity of Dartmouth. I mention this to shew what an admirable Use he makes of his Historical Facts. With these few Prizes, continues he, De Ruyter crept home, and was immediately made Admiral of the Dutch Fleet, tho' the Superintendency was committed to De Wit, Huygens and Boreel, Deputies of the States General.

The Dutch, with very good Reason, were in Pain for their East-India, Smyrna and other Fleets, which were order'd North about, for the Earl of Sandwich was sail'd in quest of them; but they were got safe into the Harbour of Berghen in Norway; upon which the Archdeacon obliges the World with a Manuscript Account of a Negotiation carry'd on with the King of Denmark, by Sir Gilbert Talbot who wrote it, to seize all that Treasure in the Port of Berghen by the English Fleet, his Danish Majesty only breaking the Laws of Treaties and Nations by delivering up his Allies into the Hands of their Enemies. But Sir Gilbert's Negotiation coming to nothing, I shall make no more use of his Manuscript. The Earl of Sandwich did not seem to hearken so much to him as was necessary for carrying off those rich Fleets. Sir Thomas Clifford was a-board the English Fleet, and was sent into Berghen to discourse the Governor, who putting him off with Excuses, 'twas resolv'd to force their Way into the Harbour: Accordingly Sir Thomas Tiddiman got in with a Squadron of Men of War, but had much ado to get out again; for the Commander of the Citadel, with the Assistance of the Holland Gunners, made no Shot in vain. So Tiddiman finding his Squadron ruin'd, and himself ready to sink, was compell'd at length to slip his Cables, and fall off to the grand Fleet. Eckard assures us, He went boldly in, and if the rest of the Knight's Manuscripts is no truer than that, it ought to have no Place in any History but his own. For other Authors, tell us, Sir Thomas Tiddiman was order'd to attack the Dutch in the Harbour, but did not do it, as he might have done upon his first Approach; he only sent to the Governor of the Castle to treat without. The Dutch within, alarm'd at the Danger, set all Hands at work that Night; so that by the Morning they had so fortify'd the Castle, that it was impossible for the English to force a Passage. There were few Persons who did not censure the Attempt to bribe the King of Denmark, by an Offer of sharing the Treasure with him, to betray his Confederates. An Offer that did indeed so stagger his Danish Majesty, that 'tis thought he cou'd not have resisted it, had the English had more Patience, and not destroy'd their Design by precipitating it. King Charles excus'd it, by saying, all Means were lawful to humble an insolent and ungrateful Enemy. What is meant here by Ungrateful? What Obligations had his Majesty laid upon them, besides putting them to the Charge of 2 or 300,000 Crowns for his Entertainment a few Days? Part of the English Fleet fell in with some of the Dutch rich India and other Ships, and took very considerable Prizes. Sir Jeremy Smith was sent with a Squadron into the Streights to carry on the War against the Dutch in that Sea. Sir Christopher Minns commanded in the Channel, and kept the Hollanders from interrupting the English Commerce there; thence he sail'd to the Mouth of the Elbe, where, as Mr. Archdeacon informs us, he had the Honour of a Visit from the famous Swedish General, Count Wrangle, and such was the Conclusion of the first Year's War.

Mr. Coke says, It seems God was not pleas'd at these Things, for this Year he sent a horrible Plague, which rag'd over almost all Parts of England. Indeed it is well worth observing that there have been many Thousands more of Men, Women, and Children, swept away by the Plague since the House of Stuart began their Reigns in England, than is at least recorded from the Beginning of Times to that. I always dread to make Judgments where it may be Heaven left Things to Second Causes, though nothing is more common in Eckard, and other Ecclesiastical Writers; but really one cannot help thinking that the First Cause mov'd in this, and the former Visitations since the Death of Queen Elizabeth. There have been all along such Dissembling with God and Man, such Persecution, Oppression, such Wickedness and Impiety, Superstition and Cruelty, which are the Provocations for Judgments, that it is hardly possible to read of these horrible Pestilences, and of this in particular, without having Recourse to Divine Vengeance. The last mention'd Author proceeds; The greatest Plague which happen'd since Edward the Third's Time in England, was in the first Year of this King's Grandfather, James the First; yet there was a greater in his Father, Charles the First's Reign; and now a greater than either, in the sixth Year of his actual Reign. Though Mr. Archdeacon is no very good Painter himself, yet he sometimes lights upon a better Pencil than his own, and then one may make a little Use of him. "Death now rode triumphant after a very different manner than it had done in the Seas and Ocean, and with a much more melancholy and formidable Aspect, terrifying and confounding Men of all Religions and all Professions. It was certainly a dismal thing to see the great Emporium of the World desolate, and scarce any thing vendible but Coffins (he cannot help quibbling in the midst of the Pestilence) and to be continually entertain'd with the daily Groans and Cries from the Windows, Pray for us! and the Nightly Calls, Bring out your Dead, which like Dung were thrown into Carts and flung into Pits, without numbring. But it was still more amazing to see the prodigious Mixture both of Piety and Profaneness at the same Time, which was thus: In one House you might hear them roaring under the Pangs of Death; in the next Tippling, Whoring, and belching out Blasphemies against God: One House shut up, with a Red Cross, and Lord have Mercy upon us! the next open to all Uncleaness and Impiety, as altogether insensible of the Vengeance of Heaven.

But what is still more amazing than all this, is, that in the midst of these Horrors, when one wou'd think the general Judgment shou'd have united all Minds in general Contrition, and Charity shou'd have melted the hardest Hearts, and have left no room but for Penitence and Pity, then,

A.D. 1665 then, even then, were the persecuting Bishops, Sheldon, Pierce, Wrenn, Ward, Henschman, Blandford, Cofens, Hyde, Morley, Sterne, and the Doctors, their Creatures, contriving new Cruelties towards Protestant Dissenters, as will be seen hereafter. There were several pious, learned, and reverend Bishops and Doctors who abhor'd that unchristian Temper, but the others had the King and his Ministers, if not his Mistresses, on their Side; and those good Prelates and Divines cou'd only pray for the Peace of Christ's Church, under all Denominations.

A particular Description of the Plague. To take a more particular Survey of this devouring Pestilence, let us refer to Authors of Credit and Humanity; Thomas Vincent, M. A. of Christ-Church Oxon, who had been turn'd out of his Living of St. Mary Magdalen Milk-streets, for no other Crime than being of the Reform'd Religion, as profess'd in France, Holland, &c. wrote a Treatise of it, entitled, God's terrible Voice in the City, which he was well qualify'd to write, having continu'd there during the greatest Violence of the Plague, preaching and visiting of the Sick. He tells us in that Treatise, it was in Holland in 1664, and the same Year began in some remote Parts of England, though the Weekly-Bills of the City took Notice but of Three who then dy'd of that Difease. In the beginning of May, 1665, Nine dy'd of it in the Heart of the City, and Eight in the Suburbs. The next Week the Bill fell from Nine to Three. In the next Week it mounted from Three to Fourteen; in the next to Seventeen; in the next to Forty-three. In June the Number increas'd from Forty-three to One hundred and twelve; the next Week to One hundred sixty eight; the next to Two hundred sixty-seven; the next to Four hundred and seventy. In the first Week of July the Number arose to Seven hundred twenty-five. Thus we may observe, that in two Months the Bills of Mortality, in the Plague-Time, were but little more than double in Number to those of the common Deaths, which must give Opportunity to Thousands of Families to remove, and leave the City desolate and helpless. In the second Week of July, the Bills mounted to One thousand and eighty-nine; the next to One thousand eight hundred forty-three; the next to Two thousand and ten. In the first Week in August the Number increas'd to Two thousand eight hundred and seventeen; the next to Three thousand eight hundred and eighty; the next to Four thousand two hundred thirty-seven; the next to Six thousand one hundred and two. In September a Decrease of the Distemper was hop'd for, but it was not yet come to its Height: In the first Week there dy'd of it Six thousand nine hundred eighty-eight; and though in the second Week the Number abated to Six thousand five hundred forty-four, yet in the third Week it arose to Seven thousand one hundred sixty-five, which was the highest. And then of the 130 Parishes in and about the City, there were but four which were not infected; and in these there were but few People remaining who were not gone into the Country. In the House where Mr. Vincent liv'd, there were eight in Family, three Men, three Youths, an old Woman, and a Maid. It was the latter End of September before any of them were touch'd: The Maid was first seiz'd with the Distemper, which began with a shivering and trembling. It seiz'd her Spirits on the Monday, and on the Thursday she dy'd full of Tokens. On Friday one of the Youths had a swelling in his Groin, and on Sunday he dy'd with the Marks of the Distemper upon him. On the same Day another of the Youths sicken'd, and on the Wednesday following he dy'd. On Thursday Night the Master of

The Plague as the Height.

Particulars of the Pestilence.

A.D. 1665 the House fell sick, and within a Day or two was full of Spots, but was strangely recover'd, beyond his own, or others Expectations. I knew a Man and his Wife who liv'd at that time near Spirle-Fields, and were then in so mean Condition, that they cou'd not procure Help when it was to be purchas'd at a dear Rate. The Man was taken first, and so near Death, that his Wife expected she must deliver up his Corpse at the next Call, Bring out your Dead; but he mended visibly before the Hour came, and recover'd. His Wife being seiz'd immediately after, he assisted her in the same manner, till she was in the same Danger, and had the same unexpected Recovery. They grew Wealthy as they grew in Years, and told me this Account of themselves above forty Years after.

In the fourth Week in September there was a Decrease to Five thousand five hundred thirty-eight. In the first Week in October there was a farther Decrease to Four thousand nine hundred twenty-nine; in the next to Four thousand three hundred twenty-seven; the next to Two thousand six hundred sixty-five; the next to One thousand four hundred twenty-nine, and the next to One thousand and thirty-one. The first Week in November there was an Encrease to One thousand four hundred and fourteen, but it fell after to One thousand and fifty, and the Week after to Six hundred fifty-two, and so lessen'd more and more to the End of the Year. By which it appears that the Pestilence did not rage above six Months, tho' some dy'd of it before May, and after November. The whole Number of those who were reckon'd to die of the Plague in London this Number of Year, was Sixty-eight thousand five hundred the Dead. ninety-six; but when we add by Computation, Baptists, Quakers, and others not number'd in the Bills of Mortality, the Sum will be still greater. From London the Plague spread through many Counties. The Towns and Villages near the City were infected in June and July, and those at a greater Distance in July and August. The whole Country infected.

Dr. Calamy informs us, That some Divines of Ministers, the Establishment maintain'd their Stations at Church that Time with a Primitive Zeal and Fervour, and Dis- Which is not to be wonder'd at, there being a great Number of learned, pious, and able Divines of the Establishment, who were Men of true Primitive Zeal, without that Bitterness which never accompanies Zeal but when it is false; and the Memory of those godly, zealous Ministers of the Church of England, is, and will be always respected, as are the Persons of those living Ministers who imitate their Piety and Charity. And whenever another sort of Clergy are mention'd, whether Bishops or others, the Reflection is Personal to the Character of the Men, and not General, to that of the Reform'd Church of England, of which they were unworthy Members. Eckhard owns of the Persecuted Clergy, "Several Ministers in that sad Time of Trial deserted their Flocks, whose empty Pulpits were sometimes charitably fill'd by those of other Persuasions; whose seasonable Fervour is said to have had good Effects upon a wicked People." And to reward them for so doing, or rather to prevent their doing the like Good again, the Bishops before-mention'd, or their Adherents, at that very Time got a Bill pass'd in Parliament, to drive all those Ministers not only out of their Houses in London, and all Corporation-Towns, but five Miles from the said City and Corporations, as will be mention'd again immediately. As to the Ministers of the Establishment, who continu'd Preaching in London all the Time of the Plague, the Names of Dr. Walker, Dr. Horton, and Dr. Meriton, shew of what moderate Principles

A.D. 1665; ciples they were. Among the Presbyterians, who distinguish'd themselves in this dangerous and important Service, were the above-mention'd Mr. Vincent, Mr. Chester, Mr. Franklin, Mr. Janaway, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Grimes; by whose assiduous Labours, and those of their Brethren, Sermons were preach'd, and the Sick visited, to the great Comfort of the Sick both in Body and Mind. The Cures for this raging Disease, besides the Order of the Lord Mayor, Sir John Lawrence, the Aldermen, and Common-Council, of the 2d of September, for keeping constant Fires in the Streets and Lanes of London for three Days and Nights successively, were, according to Mr. Archdeacon, 1. A Form of Prayer, drawn up by the Bishops, and appointed by the King to be us'd in all Churches and Chapels within the Bills of Mortality, on every Wednesday in the Week during the Contagion. 2. A Proclamation requiring all Officers and Soldiers who had serv'd the Parliament, or the two Protectors, to depart the Cities of London and Westminster: He adds, It was believ'd the Bishops Form of Prayer had extraordinary Effects; so liable is it to give the most terrible Subject in the World a Turn that is hardly consistent with the Gravity of History. He adds, The King manifested a Paternal Regard to his Subjects, by retiring first to Hampton-Court, and then to Salisbury, and leaving the City to the affectionate Care of the brave George Duke of Albemarle, and the glorious Behaviour of William Earl of Craven. The latter indeed behav'd very generously, and Archbishop Sheldon continu'd at Lambeth and Croydon all the Time of the greatest Danger.

Echard thinks he has now some good Evidence of the Certainty of the Sham Plots; for that Ludlow freely informs us of some Negotiations between the Dutch and the English Refugees in Holland, Germany, and Switzerland, for their putting themselves a-board the Dutch Fleet, and serving against King Charles in this War. But is it of Consequence, that because Lieutenant General Ludlow was willing to put himself at the Head of an Army of Republicans, to restore his darling Republick in England, that therefore he wou'd engage with a Serjeant of Foot, and a Brandy-man at one Time, and with Oldroyd, Ashmole, Corney, and the Yorkshire Fanaticks at another? What Logick is this! But 'tis the best he has. General Ludlow owns he was ready to make an Attempt with an Army of Foreign Protestants, to restore the Common-wealth. Several of his condemn'd Companions abroad express'd the same Readiness, so did Col. Sidney. It will not be deny'd; What then? Did they think that the doing so was what Echard calls Serving against their own natural Prince and Country? A late Author writes of this Matter with more Sobriety.

"I do not question but General Ludlow did hold Correspondence with Mynheer Newport, and the Dutch Ministers of State, during their War with the King of England; and that if they wou'd have furnish'd him with an Army, as they once offer'd to do, he wou'd have landed with them; as also, that Rathbone and his Brother Soldiers wou'd have been among them. But I can as soon believe Ludlow wou'd have made Mr. Echard one of his Cabinet-Council, as have trusted such a Crew as the Archdeacon has list'd for him. Ludlow, as much as he was in the Wrong, believ'd doubtless he was in the Right; That the King and his Ministers had unjustly stripp'd him of a large Fortune, and condemn'd him to an ignominious Death, and that it was very lawful for him to make Reprisals; but he had too much good Sense and Honour, too much Bravery and Virtue, making Allowances for his mistaken Principles, to do any thing otherwise than by open Hostility, which he look'd upon as fair War. The Laws were against him, and had made him so guilty, that nothing he cou'd act against King Charles the Second, cou'd have added any thing to his Punishment. A Man of Courage and Spirit, in such Circumstances, cannot understand how Tameness is a Duty, when a military Revenge offers; and his entering into the Service of Holland, when the prevailing Power in his own Country had thrown him off, was doing no more than Hannibal and Labienus of old, the Prince of Conde, the Marechal Schomberg, and many other renowned Heroes, have done on the like Occasion. But to think that he wou'd have made such a pitiful Wretch as Oldroyd his Brother Plotter, or have conspir'd with such pitiful Wretches as Tucker, Flint, and Cole, to kill the King's Majesty, his Grace General Monk, and his Worship Sir Richard Browne, is so incredible, that it makes the Fable more modest than History."

About the Time that the Plague was at the Parliam<sup>ent</sup> Heighth, October the 9th, the King met the ment at Parliament at Christ-church in Oxford, and in his Speech told them the Money was almost all gone which they gave him in the last Sessions: A great deal of it to the Popish Bishop of Munster, who he said was in the Bowels of the States General's Country, and he wanted Money not only to carry on the War against them, but also to defend himself against the French King, if he shou'd prefer their Friendship to his, of which he knew more than any one else.

The Lord Chancellor, whose Friends boast of his being against the Dutch War, did in this Speech express as much Malignity against them as cou'd be expected from the most inveterate Enemy, notwithstanding the Indignities his Majesty had receiv'd in Holland, where he had been little less proscrib'd than in England. To say the contrary to this is a known Truth, is too little to express the Falsity and Ingratitude: Turn to what the King said to them before he embark'd for England, "They load us with such Reproaches as the Civility of no other Language will admit the Relation: The Truth is, they have a Dialect of Rudeness so peculiar to their Language and their People, that it is high Time for all Princes to oblige them to some Reformation, if they intend to hold Correspondence and Commerce with them." Then he appeals to the Parliament Men, Whether the Countenances of the Presbyterians and other Dissenters in England have not been more erect. His Words are, our Domestic Foes in all Places since the Beginning of the War. He adds then a Plot, which wanted nothing but a Lucky Day, and upon perusing the Almanack, the 3d of September was pitch'd upon as having a great deal of Luck in it; for on that Day the Presbyterians were beaten at Dunbar, and on that Day Cromwel dy'd; therefore he advises them to provide against their Enemies at Home; and we shall, without Doubt, have some Act for it in a few Days. But before it cou'd pass, Both Houses, and also the Convocation in Oxford, made a Vote to thank the University for their unparellel'd Zeal in refusing the Covenant, tho' the King had so often taken and sworn it. The Archdeacon informs us, these Thanks were in a very solemn Manner presented to the University in full Convocation by four of the House of Commons, Mr. Lawrence Hyde and Sir Heneage Finch, Members for the University, and Sir John Birkenhead and Col. Giles Strangers, who all were created Do-

Sham Plot.

A. D. 1665. Stories of the Civil Law, November the 7th, as was also Sir Cyril Wyche, tho' he had taken his Master's Degree there before, when the Covenant was in full Force and Virtue.

Five Mile Act.

Being heartily tired with Sir Edward Turner the Speaker's Speeches, we shall repeat no more of them, only remember, that when he presented the King with the Five Mile Act, he call'd it Shibboleth. Echard will have it that it pass'd with equal Vigour, Unanimity and Dispatch; and he adds, It does not appear by any substantial Proof, that the Members had ever been yet led or induc'd to act contrary to their natural Inclination. There is something after this so very false, that we cannot stay to reflect upon this Passage. We have mention'd how the Ministers, at the Hazard of their Lives, ventur'd to preach and visit the Sick in the Plague-time; let us see what Bishop Burnet says, "This was represented very odiously at Oxford; so a severe Bill was brought in, requiring all the silenc'd Ministers to take an Oath, "declaring it was not lawful, on any Pretence whatsoever, to take Arms against the King, or any commission'd by him; and that they wou'd not at any Time endeavour an Alteration in the Government of Church or State. Such as refus'd this were not admitted to come within five Miles of any City or Parliament Borough, or of the Church where they had serv'd. This was much oppos'd in both Houses! (Mr. Echard's Unanimity) The Earl of Southampton spoke vehemently against it in the House of Lords; he said, He cou'd take no such Oath himself; for how firm soever he had always been to the Church, yet, as Things were manag'd, he did not know but he himself might see Cause to endeavour an Alteration. Dr. Earl, Bishop of Salisbury, declar'd himself much against this Act. Sheldon and Ward were the Bishops that acted and argu'd most for it. All that were the secret Favourers of Popery promoted it; which is also observ'd by that learned Lawyer Mr. Acherly; tho' Echard is positive that this Parliament was under no Influence but the Rectitude of their Understandings and Wills. Acherly says, The Protestants Dissenters shewing a manifest Disinclination to the Dutch War, were by the Instigation of the Popish Cabal, punish'd by an Act call'd the Five Mile Act. Bishop Burnet proceeds, while the Act was before the House of Commons, Vaughan, afterwards made Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, mov'd that the Word legally might be added to the Words commission'd by the King. But Finch the Attorney-General said, that was needless, since, unless the Commission was legal, it was no Commission; and to make it legal it must be issued out for a lawful Occasion, and to Persons capable of it, and must pass in due Form of Law. The other insisted, that the Addition wou'd clear all Scruples, and procure them universal Compliance; but that cou'd not be obtain'd, for it was intended to lay Difficulties in the Way of those against whom the Act was levell'd. When the Bill came to the House of Lords, the Earl of Southampton mov'd for the same Addition, but was answer'd by the Earl of Anglesey, who had been a Covenant-taking Presbyterian. It was strongly oppos'd by the Lord Wharton and Lord Ashley, as well as the Earl of Southampton. The Penalty of the Act was forty Pounds, or six Months Imprisonment, for every Offence, unless in passing upon the Road. Mr. Locke, whom Echard calls the Anonymous Author, terms the Oath most Unlawful and Unjustifiable.

Maiz Coll. p. 64. a wicked Oath impos'd on Ministers.

We have shewn what Preparations were made for this Act, that it was promoted by Papists, that the Oath it enjoin'd was Unjustifiable and Unlawful; and let us now shew what base or false Arguments are made use of to justify it, and prove it lawful; they are in the Archdeacon's History, and some of those Passages that have sunk it so low in the Opinion of honest and judicious Men. "It has been generally an Objection, that whatever Hardships the Dissenting Party met, or felt from the Laws, they arose more from the Seditions of some of them than the religious Exercises of any of them." This is so scandalously false, that when the cruel Bartholomew Act pass'd, the Dissenters were in the Height of their Merit for RESTORING the King. "And that every Act of Parliament made to their Detriment was founded upon the Reality of some Plot or Conspiracy against the Nation's Peace." The Man who says it, knows that there was scarce a Person of common Sense and common Honesty all over England, who did not take them to be what Mr. Locke and other great Men call'd them, SHAM PLOTS. Which Plots and Conspiracies they had promoted and encourag'd; so that what the Parliament did, look'd more like Self-Preservation than Persecution." The Presbyterians, according to him, were about to turn the Parliament out of Doors, and the Rectors, Vicars, &c. out of their Churches, and so they were jayl'd, and plunder'd, and beggar'd, and starv'd, purely to preserve the Bishops and Clergy from being so treated. He then wou'd glue together the Design of some Malecontents in Holland with the before-mention'd Sham Plots: For that the Malecontents did really intend to deliver the oppress'd, persecuted Protestants in England from Persecution and Oppression, if they cou'd by the Assistance of Foreign Protestants, is not deny'd. The Vileness of the Insinuation is, That because some English, disaffected Persons, intended to serve in the Dutch War against King Charles, therefore Col. Sidney, Col. Ludlow, and others, had an Intention to have join'd with Ash-nith and Flint, two sorry, hair-brain'd Fellows, in two Conspiracies against the English Nation. Another Act pass'd, enjoining Thomas Doleman, Joseph Bamfield, Thomas Scott, Son to Mr. Thomas Scott, whom they had hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, and others in the Dutch Service, to return by a Day, under Penalty of High-Treason, Accordingly Major General Desborough, Colonel Thomas Kelsey, Col. John White, Major John Grove, Sir Robert Honeywood, Capt. Nicholas, and others, were summon'd to return to England before the 23d of July next ensuing, on Pain of being proceeded against as Traitors. Echard wou'd not tell us what Ludlow adds to this, "But not being contented with this, they employ'd a Jesuit to procure the Pensioner John de Wit to be murder'd, who not only undertook that De Wit's Employment, but promis'd to get me to be assassinated also. Mynheer Nieuwport, who had formerly been Ambassador for the States in England, sent his Son to Mr. Say to acquaint him with this Matter, assuring him, that the Jesuit was already come to Holland, and that they hop'd to seize him; but lest other Persons might be engag'd with him in the Design against me, of whom they had no Information, he desir'd that I might be forthwith advis'd of what they had discover'd, which Mr. Say punctually perform'd."

Not only the Dutch Republicans gave the English Refugees Encouragement to enter into that State's Service, but the most Monarchical Man that ever was in the World since the Monarchy of Nimrod, Lewis XIV. the French King, not only promis'd

A.D. 1665; promis'd them his Protection and Support, but actually sent Orders to the Count D'Estrades his Ambassador at the Hague, to send Lieutenant General Ludlow a Pass for his safe coming to Holland. The French Ambassador at Mentz met Col. Sidney at Frankfort, and shew'd him a Letter from Monsieur de Lionne Secretary of State, written in Cyphers by Order of the French King, in which he was commanded to give all the English Refugees all the Security the Government of France could give, or they could desire, for the Safety of their Persons. But General Ludlow would have nothing to do with France, being well assur'd of the Treachery of that Court; and as to Holland, the Terms on which he propos'd to engage in the Dutch Service, were such as a wise and gallant Man might own without blushing, considering the Circumstances he was in. In the first Place he demanded Satisfaction of the States for the delivering up of Col. Okey, Col. Barkstead and Mr. Corbett to that Foresworn Covenantner Downing, Okey's Chaplain, who deliver'd him and them up to the Hangman. He demanded that the States shou'd publish a Declaration of their Error; that they shou'd promise to use their Endeavours to restore the Common-wealth to the Exercise of their Authority; that they shou'd furnish such a Number of Troops of the Reform'd Religion as might probably be sufficient to protect the English, who shou'd come in to them, and oblige themselves not to leave him and his Friends in a worse Condition than he found them. For notwithstanding what the Chancellor wrongfully says of General Ludlow in his florid Speeches, he was too wise and too wary to engage in any Design which had not a probable Prospect of Success, and was incapable of engaging in such mad Conspiracies as he charges him with, among a Rabble of obscure Plotters.

Mr. Baxter's Account of the Five Mile Act.

Baxter's Life, Part iii. P. 3.

Mr. Baxter's Account of the Five Mile Act, which the reverend Historian is so in Love with, is thus; "While God was consuming the People by these terrible Judgments, and the Nonconformists were labouring to save Mens Souls, the Parliament which sat at Oxford, whither the King remov'd from the Danger of the Plague, was busy in making an Act of Confinement, to make the silent Ministers Case incomparably harder than it was before, by putting upon them a certain Oath, &c. So little did the Sense of God's terrible Judgments of the Necessities of many Hundred Thousand ignorant Souls, or the Groans of the poor People, or the Fear of the great and final Reckoning, affect the Hearts of the Prelatists, or stop them in their Way. The chief Promoters of this among the Clergy were said to be the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Dr. Seth Ward, Bishop of Salisbury." The latter had not only taken the Covenant, but the Engagement; by both which he had renounc'd and abjur'd both the Church and the King. The Earl of Southampton said in the House of Lords, No honest Man would take that Oath. As to Echar'd's Pretences for the Necessity of that Act on account of Sedition among the Protestant Dissenting Preachers, Mr. Baxter observes, "The Act which imposes this Oath openly accuses the Nonconforming Ministers of Sedition Doctrines, and such heinous Crimes; wherefore, when it first came out, I thought that at such an Accusation no innocent Persons should be silent, especially when Papists, Strangers, and Posterity may think that a recorded Statute is a sufficient History to prove us to be guilty." This is all the Compleat Historian and Echar'd have to say for the late Acts, however procur'd; They are the Law of the Land, the Laws of the Land, but Laws which future Parliaments have rejected with Indignation; nay, this very Parliament will, we find, bring in and pass a Bill directly contrary to the Conventicle Act and the Uniformity Act, which was perfidiously lost before it had the Royal Assent. Mr. Baxter drew up a Vindication of the Nonconformists against the Charge of Sedition. But Dr. Seaman and others persuaded him against publishing it, giving for Reason, That the Malice of the Prelatists would make an ill Use of it, and turn it all against themselves. Mr. Baxter adds, Wise Statesmen laugh'd at me for thinking that Reason would be regarded by such Men as we had to do with, as Sheldon, Ward, Gunning, Hyde, Keeling, and Turner, and would not exasperate them the more.

The Ministers finding the Pressures of this Act so great, and so great the Loss like to be to Cities and Corporations, some of them study'd how to take this unlawful Oath lawfully. Dr. Bates being much in seeming Favour with the Lord Chief Baron Bridgman, afterwards Lord Keeper, consulted with him about it, and he promis'd to be at the next Session, and to declare on the Bench of Justices openly, that by Endeavour to change the Church Government was meant only Unlawful Endeavour, which satisfying him, he thereby satisfy'd others, and so several Ministers came in at the Sessions of Peace and took the Oaths; as Dr. Bates, Dr. Jacomb, Mr. Samuel Clark, Mr. Sheffield, Mr. Hall, Mr. Church, Mr. Matthew Pool, Mr. Lood, Mr. Stanchiffe, Mr. Rolls, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Smith, Mr. Arthur, Mr. Bastwick, Mr. Brooks, Mr. Overton, Mr. Cary, Mr. Wildbore, Mr. Hooker, Mr. Mayo, Mr. Butler, Mr. Newton of Taunton in Somersetshire, Mr. William Thomas of the same County, Mr. Cooper of Southwark.

Ministers who took the Oath.

Dr. Conant in Northamptonshire took the Oath, and conform'd fully sometime after. Not only the Lord Bridgman but Judge Twisden, Judge Browne, Judge Archer, Judge Windham, Judge Atkins, all the Judges then in London, declar'd, that only Tumultuous and Seditious Endeavours were meant, as did even Judge Keeling, who drew up the Act of Uniformity, and deserves some Statue for it, which is not yet erected. Be it as it will, the Explanation did not satisfy many, and the poor Ministers were forc'd to get Lodgings in Cottages, Barns, Stables, and wherever they could have a Covering from the Inclemency of the Sky.

The Sedition before-mention'd is spoken of in Vol. II. the State Tracts; "Nothing is more notoriously known than that in the Reigns of the House of Stuart many Church Arts and Court Practices were us'd to break in upon this happy Constitution, by raising the Power of the King above what it ought to be, and by reducing the Commons to a narrower Compass of Power than that of Right belongs to them. And 'tis also very well known, that whosoever have shewn their Resentments hereupon, have been represented as Common-wealths Men and Anarchicall, &c.

Upon the whole, as such an Unlawful, Unjustifiable Oath was never impos'd upon a Christian free People, so most certainly there was never such a Thoughtless, Worthless Set of Men as those, who promoted and procur'd it. They were for imposing it on the whole Nation, and making the People of England a Nation of Knaves; for as Lord Southampton declar'd, No honest Man would take it. That this National Knavery was not made the Law of the Land, as far as the Commons could make it, was owing only to Accident, or rather to Providence, as the great Mr. Locke words it; "And the Providence

A.D. 1665 " by which this second Bill was thrown out was very remarkable, for Mr. Peregrine Bertie was that Morning introduc'd into the House by his Brother the now Earl of Lindsey, and Sir Thomas Osborn now Lord Treasurer, who all three gave their Votes against that Bill, and the Numbers were so even upon the Division, that their three Votes carry'd the Question against it. But we owe that Right to the Earl of Lindsey and the Lord Treasurer, as to acknowledge that they have since made ample Satisfaction for whatever Offence they gave either the Church or Court in that Vote.

His Majesty being so very hearty a Protestant, it wou'd be ungrateful not to take Notice, as the Archdeacon does, of his Civility to the Hugonots, who came to England, for which the French Church in the Savoy return'd him humble Thanks.

Michaelmas Term was kept at Oxford on Account of the Plague at London, and Keeling was there made Lord Chief Justice, to receive his Honour in the Place where the Bill he drew was so acceptable and praise-worthy.

His Majesty declar'd in Council, and then wrote to the Lord Mayor, that both himself and his Royal Confort wou'd wear neither Inside nor Outside of their Cloaths any thing but what was manufactur'd within his Kingdom of England, which his Majesty did, says Eckard, to restrain Extravagancy and promote good Husbandry by his Example, tho' at the very same Time the Prodigality of one of his Mistresses only cost him above 20,000 Pounds a Year.

Great-rakes the Stroker.

Mr. Valentine Greatrakes, the Irish Justice of Peace, came now to England, and the same Historian assures us, he cur'd the Kings-Evil with a Touch, which was an Invasion of the Prerogative in this Reign. By a second Impulse, cries he, he cur'd Agues and Head-ack; by a third, Wounds and Ulcers; by other Impulses Convulsions, Dropsies, &c. His Stand was in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, where other Counterfeits had also their Stands as well as he. The Lord Arlington introduc'd him to the King as a Rarity, and to use Eckard's wife Words, many wise and eminent Men believ'd he cou'd with a Stroke cure all these Distempers, from whence he was call'd the Stroker, tho' in Truth he was a notorious Cheat, and sneak'd off as soon as his Credit began to sink. The Oxford Parliament gave the King 1,250,000 Pounds for carrying on the War against the Hollanders, and a Fleet was got ready early the next Year, great enough to have been a Glory to this Nation, and a Terror to others, had the Management been in the Hands of Men who were dispos'd to make the best Use of their Power. It is objected to such as call this War with Holland Unjust, that the Common-wealth of England made War with the Common-wealth of Holland; but that War was to humble, not to destroy them. The Parliament were able and willing to give a Check to the Ambition of France, if she offer'd to take any Advantage of the Weakness of the Dutch, which King Charles was neither willing nor able to do, and cou'd not destroy the Dutch, without exposing the English to Destruction. Van Goeb the States Ambassador was still in England when the King was at Oxford, but finding his Stay was in vain, he took his Audience of Leave, and the King sent a Letter by him to his Masters, wherein, after having charg'd them with being Authors of the War, he express'd himself ready to come to such a Treaty of Peace as he shou'd approve of. The Oxford Parliament was prorogu'd October the 31st, to meet again February the 20th, but they did not then sit, continuing under several Prorogations almost a whole Year, which was one of the early Blessings produc'd by the Repeal of the Triennial Bill. A.D. 1665

If I remember the Visit his Majesty made to the College of Physicians after his Return to London, it is only to copy some of the quaintest History that ever I met with; after the quaintest Historian, Mr. Archdeacon. " Here he saw the Marble Statue of the famous Harvey, the great Discoverer of the Blood Circulation, and heard the President Dr. George Ent with Eloquence and Art, reading upon the Mytteries of Anatomy, whom he there honour'd with Knight-hood. There he saw the chief Physician Bates, renown'd both in the Medical Skill and his Knowledge in the Latin Tongue, and Frasier his chief Physician, and Giffson excellent in Medicine, and successful Micklethwayte, and much esteem'd Cox and Scarborough, famous among the Muses, and Wharton Secretary of the Glandules, &c." To these I might have added several other fine Panegyricks of his in the next Page, as that of the Excellent and Exor-bitant Sir Kenelm Digby a Papist, Son of Sir Edward Digby, who was hang'd for the Gunpowder-Plot; but I leave him the Glory of handling such sublime Subjects, and go on with the History.

Doctors of Physick.

The French King finding the Dutch wou'd be oblig'd to make Peace with the King of England, if he did not dissemble so far as to join with them in the War, 'till both English and Dutch had wasted their Treasure and Strength, he in January publish'd a mock Declaration of War against England, which he intended to carry on no farther than wou'd encourage the Dutch to carry it on to their Ruin. The Lord Hollis, King Charles's Ambassador in France, who was not in the Secret, labour'd as heartily to prevent the French King's Assisting the Dutch, as if it had been his real Intention to assist them. 'Tis true, he sent a Parcel of sickly Soldiers, which rather infected than assisted the Dutch Troops, and the Men of War which were to be his Quota, were so long a coming, and when come, did so little Service, that the Hollanders soon saw they had made Choice of the wrong Man to build their Hopes upon. Mr. Archdeacon inserts a Passage out of a Letter from Chancellor Hyde to Sir William Temple, which he calls remarkable. " There is nothing now ought to be labour'd with so much Industry and Dexterity as the uniting England, Spain and Flanders, which wou'd give, and which only can give Peace to Christendom; I am sure our Master is passionately inclin'd to it; " that Master of theirs who five or six Years after, made another War with the Dutch, purely to give the French King an Opportunity to over-run, not only Flanders, but Holland. This is the Prince of whom Chancellor Hyde says, he is sure that he is passionately inclin'd to unite England and Spain, for the Preservation of the Netherlands. His Words are indeed remarkable.

1666. French King's Mock-War with England.

In the mean Time, the King of Denmark concluded a Treaty with the Dutch, which the Penetration of the English Ministers cou'd not get a Hint of, 'till it was perfected. He was to lend the States Thirty Men of War, and some Land Forces, in Consideration of 1,500,000 Livres a Year, as long as the War lasted. The Bishop of Munster, who had receiv'd a round Sum of English Money, to make an Irruption into Friesland the last Summer, not being supply'd as plentiful as he expected from England, fell off, and concluded a Peace, by the Mediation of Brandenburg. The latter, and the House of Luxemburg, were in Alliance with the States, and wou'd probably have been better Allies, had they not waited

A.D. 1666 waited to see what France would do, and like the Dutch, made too much Dependence upon her. After the Bishop of Munster had abandon'd King Charles, the Bills of Exchange came from England to Sir William Temple at Brussels; but the best Service Sir William could do, was to send them back again. Thus the King of England, says Mr. Archdeacon, was left destitute of his chief Friends. However, when he return'd to his Palace at Whitehall, it was to the infinite Joy of the Citizens. And have they not had good Reason for it in the unspeakable Felicities of his Reign! They presented him with an Address upon it, and his Majesty presented the two Sheriffs, Robert Hanson and William Hooker, with Knight-hood. After he was well settled at Whitehall, he publish'd his Declaration of War against France; the most remarkable Words of which are, The relying upon the Help of God Almighty in the Justice of our Cause, which Bishop Burnet calls Unjust, No declare, &c. The French King was more in earnest in the War against the English than in that for the Dutch, and he had no sooner resolv'd upon his Declaration, than he sent a stout Squadron of Ships to the West-Indies. The Troops that were on Board, dispossest the English of St. Christopher's and other Places, and the Dutch drove them out of Surinam. The Compleat Historian informs us, that the French King did his Endeavours to engage Major General Lambert in his Interest, but he tells his Story so confusedly, one can make nothing of it. "The French King, to do secret Mischief, sends the Governor of Choufey over from France, in a small Boat, to carry a Letter to Major General Lambert there in Prison, and to offer him good Terms, for contriving to deliver up that Island to the French." He does not tell us where he was in Prison, nor what Island it was he was to deliver up. The last Place he mentions was St. Christopher's, one of the Leeward Islands in America; I suppose he means St. Nicholas's Island, near Plymouth, General Lambert having been long confin'd there. He proceeds, "But this perfidious Governor being apprehended, did at last confess the whole Matter, and he and his Pilot were executed on the common Gallows, for Spies."

King Charles's mock War against France.

We have glorious Accounts in his History, and Mr. Echard's, of a mighty Victory over the Dutch, obtain'd by the Duke of Albemarle, but I have better Authorities, and I shall copy Bishop Burnet; "It was resolv'd on, the Duke of York should not go to Sea, but that Monk should command the great Fleet of between Fifty and Sixty Ships of the Line, and that Prince Rupert should be sent with a Squadron of about Twenty-five Ships to meet the French Fleet, and to hinder their Conjunction with the Dutch; for the French had promis'd a Fleet to join the Dutch, but never sent it." Monk went out so certain of Victory, that he seem'd only concern'd for fear the Dutch should not come out. "The Court flatter'd themselves with the Hopes of a very happy Year, but it prov'd a fatal one." King Charles did not think so, he told his Parliament when he met them, I need not tell you the Success of this Year, in which God hath given us great Success. My Lord of Sarum proceeds, "The Dutch Fleet came out, De Wit and some of the States being on Board, they engag'd the English Fleet for two Days, in which they had a manifest Superiority, but it cost them dear, for the English fought well. The Dutch were superior in Number, and were so well furnish'd with Chain Shot (a peculiar Contrivance of which De Wit had the Honour to be thought the Inventor) that the English Fleet was quite unrigg'd, and Monk was in no Condition to have work'd himself off, but his Ships must have been all taken, sunk or burnt, if Prince Rupert, being yet in the Channel, and hearing that they were engag'd, by the continual Roaring of Guns, had not made all possible haste to get to them. He came in good Time, and the Dutch, who had suffer'd so much, seeing so great Force come up, steer'd off. He was in no Condition to pursue them, but brought off our Fleet, which sav'd us a great Loss, that seem'd otherwise unavoidable." Monk's Fleet having been so miserably shatter'd by De Wit's (the Bishop again) the Court gave out that it was a Victory. Echard and the Compleat Historian give out the same; however, 'tis certain his Conduct was blam'd even by Chancellor Hyde himself, tho' for so many Years he had been his good Lord General; and publick Thanksgivings were order'd, which, says Bishop Burnet, was a horrid Mocking of God, and a Lying to the World. I have avoided making use of that strong Phrase, tho' I have been provok'd to it, in almost every Page of their Histories, either in Whole or in Part, by Mis-representation, Prevarication or downright Falshood. Bishop Burnet adds, We had in one Respect, Reason to thank God, that we had not lost our whole Fleet; a new Felicity which Monk was like to bring upon us. We lost Sir William Berkley, and Sir Christopher Minnis, two gallant Officers, in this unhappy Engagement; Sir George Ayscue's large Ship the Prince ran ashore, was stranded, burnt, and Sir George taken Prisoner. Sir John Harman behav'd with great Bravery, and the brave English Officers and Seamen deserv'd a better Cause, and better Success: The dividing the Fleet before the Battle, is much censur'd. Coke reflects upon it, 'Tis left a Problem, whether it were a greater Treachery to divide the Fleet, or Madness to fight the Dutch with the rest, when they cou'd not use their lower Tire of Guns. One might be very ready to believe Monk to be Treacherous, if he had any Interest to promote by it, for he has prov'd himself to be guilty of the basest Treachery and Ingratitude, but he had no Market to make by it, and besides, the Fleet was not entirely at his Disposal. The Dutch made great Rejoicings for this dear bought Victory, and demanded of the French King, their hopeful Ally, that Te Deum might be sung for it at Paris, but he refus'd it.

Monk in Distress, reliev'd by Prince Rupert.

The Loss and Damage which the English Second sustain'd in the last Fight, gave the Dutch Fight this an Opportunity to put out to Sea, and ride bravely upon the English Coasts three Weeks or a Month before the Duke of York, Lord Admiral, could get the Fleet repair'd and refitted. But upon the 17th of July the English also put to Sea, and the Dutch retir'd to their own Coasts, where the English engag'd them again on the 25th, beat the Dutch, and forc'd them into their Harbours. In this Fight, Evertz (Brother to that Evertz, kill'd by Sir John Harman) Admiral of the Zealand Squadron, Tirich Hiddes of the Friesland Squadron, Vice-Admiral Conder, and six Captains were kill'd, and Vice-Admiral Bancker's Ship, and the best Ship of Harlem, were taken and burnt. Echard tells us of a Farce which was play'd amidst this Trajedy, and is as serious as if it was worth telling; "The Enemy met with a ridiculous kind of Mortification. The Fanfan, a Sort of a Pleasure-Boat made for Prince Rupert, made up with her Oars to De Ruyter himself, and bringing her two little Guns on one Side, continu'd for near an Hour, plying Broad-sides, to the great Laughter of the English and Indignation of the Dutch, to see their chief Admiral at rack'd

A.D. 1666 "tack'd by a single Sloop." He then delights himself with the Story of Sir Robert Holmes's Landing in the Isle of Schelling, and burning Brandaris, an open defenceless Town, making a Bonfire of Ships and Houses. Holmes had a Piratical Genius, and was the fittest Man in the Fleet for making such sort of Bonfires and destroying, when Fighting was over. He sent in five Fire-Ships among a Fleet of 150 Dutch Merchant Men at the Vlie, near the Mouth of the Texel, and destroy'd most of them; in which the Compleat Historians take infinite Pleasure, but sober Writers speak otherwise, particularly Mr. Baxter. "Many mutter'd that it was not wisely done, to provoke the Dutch, by burning their Houses, when it was easy for them to do the like by us on our Sea Coasts. It was no good Sign of future Prosperity, when those that believ'd not that there was a God, wou'd give him solemn Thanks for the unprofitable Burning of the Houses of innocent Protestants; but our Height was quickly taken down by our great Losses, &c."

Upon the 16th of August the Dutch put to Sea again, and now the English had ten or twelve Men of War more than the Dutch, which was the only Time in this, and the other Dutch War, the English had so many Men of War as the Dutch, and to the Amazement of all People, the Dutch forsook their own Coast, and sail'd towards that of France: For which, says Coke, "No other Reason can be given, but that the French King, who equally lov'd the Dutch and English, had decoy'd the Dutch to join that invincible Fleet, which we divided ours to fight with. The English pursu'd the Dutch thro' the Streights, between Dover and Calais, and were ready to engage them, when by a terrible Storm, the Wind drove the English to an Anchor at St. Hellen's Point, where in the Passage, the St. Andrew, a second Rate, broke her Back upon a Sand." The Dutch came to an Anchor in the Bay of Bulloigne, and the Wind about the 8th of September turning, brought the Dutch home before the English cou'd engage them.

The very great Wickedness of introducing the Fire of London, with a Tale of a Plot carry'd on by Dissenters, is fit for no History but the compleat One, and its Copy the Archdeacon's. It is done to throw off any Suspicion of Guilt from the Papists. I have set the Negotiation with General Ludlow in a fair Light. Eckard has his Memoirs before him, in which he had read, that Ludlow wou'd not engage with the Dutch, but on certain Conditions, which they did not think fit to comply with, and he blesses God, that he had not engag'd with them; since, by the Treaty of Peace soon after concluded, they oblig'd themselves to deliver up the very Man whom they so much courted to serve them. Yet does Eckard with unparallel'd Assurance affirm that Rathbone's Plot was a Concatenation with Ludlow's, and to honour Rathbone, and make some body of him, gives him the Command of a Regiment. His fellow Plotters were, Thomas Flint, William Saunders, Henry Tucker, Thomas Evans, John Myles, William Westcot, who besides killing the King, were to kill also General George Monk, Alderman Sir John Robinson, and Alderman Sir Richard Browne, and when they had knock'd them on the Head, they were to declare for an equal Division of Lands. Mr. Ludlow was to put himself in Arms, and come over to fight for some Land. He had enough of his own, if they wou'd have let him enjoy it; he had Maiden-Bradley in Wiltshire, but Sir Edward Seymour kept it from him, and several other Mannors in Wiltshire and Somersetshire, a fairer Inheritance than his Country Man Hyde was born to; and if he fought for any Lands, they must have been for less than his own, since upon an equal Division, so much wou'd not have come to his Share; and because he was a half-witted credulous Creature, he will do nothing but on some lucky Day. Rathbone and he will have a Planet on their Side, and therefore they have the Nativity of their Plot cast in April, and found by Lilly's Almanack also, that the third of September was a Day of Luck. As to these Plotters intending to join the Dutch if they had landed, I doubt it not, and that a great many Thousands wou'd have done the same, for one can't think that the late Acts of Parliament and Government had made the People in love with it. The French King said of King Charles at this Time, The King of England has no Friend nor Ally, and is oblig'd to carry on the War, with the Forces of a Kingdom only, divided into several Sects, all disaffected to his Government. These Plotters doubtless wou'd have join'd Ludlow, or Doleman, or the first Commander that offer'd to lead them; they might intend it, they might talk of it, and say enough to be hang'd for't; but that Mr. Sidney, and Lieutenant General Ludlow wou'd engage with such Fellows is incredible and monstrous in Imagination.

I have mention'd the Wickedness of joining Mr. Ludlow's Negotiations with the Dutch with Rathbone's Plot, and Rathbone's Plot with the Fire of London; and to prove it, I need only repeat the Archdeacon's Words: The third of September was a Day auspicious, and full of Expectation from one Party, but at this Time ominous and direful to the Nation; and though the Hand of Justice laid hold of these last Criminals, yet the City was burnt at the very Time thus projected and prognosticated; which gave a strong Suspicion, though not a full Proof of the Authors and Promoters; and that by Concatenation, Colonel Atney, Lieutenant General Ludlow, Col. Doleman, Mr. Say, &c. were concern'd with Flint, Tucker, &c. who were hang'd six Months before, for a Plot to set London on Fire on the third of September. I might here make use of the strong Phrase us'd by Bishop Burnet before-mention'd; but though such Histories little deserve it, I will observe more Decorum, and to shew I might make use of it, read what Eckard says of the Duke of York's Diligence to put out the Fire: He was as diligent as possible; he commended and encouraged the Forward; he assisted the miserable Sufferers, and gave a most generous Example to all, by the vigorous Opposition he made against the devouring Flames. Contrary to all which, it is known that the Gaiety of his Look and Air discover'd the Pleasure he took in that dreadful Spectacle. Bishop Burnet tells us, The Citizens were not well satisfy'd with the Duke's Behaviour; they thought he look'd too gay, and too little concern'd.

On September the 2d, after Midnight, London was set on Fire. On September the 3d the Exchange was burnt, and in three Days almost all the City within the Walls. The Season before had been exceeding dry, and the Wind in the East, where the Fire began. The People having none to conduct them right, cou'd do nothing to resist it, but stand and see their Houses burn without Remedy, the Engines being presently out of order and useless. The Streets were crowded with People and Carts to carry away what Goods they cou'd get out. They who were most active, and had also most Money to pay Cartage at exorbitant Prices, as five, ten, twenty, and thirty Pounds for a Cart, sav'd much, and the rest lost almost all. The Loss in Houses and Goods is scarcely

A.D. 1666 to be valu'd; and among the rest, the Loss of Books was an exceeding great Detriment not to the Owners only, but to Learning. Almost all the Bookfellers in St. Paul's Church-Yard, brought their Books into Vaults under St. Paul's Church, where it was thought almost impossible that Fire shou'd come. But the Church itself being on Fire, the prodigious Weight of Stones falling down, broke into the Vaults, let in the Fire, and the Bookfellers cou'd not come near to save their Books. The Library at Sion College, and most private Libraries in London were burnt; inso-much that the one Article of Books only lost in the Fire, amounted to 150,000 Pounds.

Where it began and stopp'd. The Fire broke out in Pudding-lane, at the House of one Fariner a Baker, and spread itself, besides Breadth, from almost Tower-Hill to St. Dunstan's Church in Fleet-street. After it had burnt almost three Days and Nights, some Sea-men taught the People to blow up some of the next Houses with Gunpowder, which stopp'd the Fire; so that contrary to the Inscription on the Monument, there were humane Counsels in the stopping of the Fire, though those Counsels must be acknowledg'd as the Will of Heaven. It stopp'd at Holborn Bridge, and near St. Dunstan's Church in Fleet-street, and at Sepulchre's Church, when the Church was burnt; and at Christ-Church, when the Church was burnt; and near Aldersgate and Cripplegate, and other Places at the Wall; and in Austin-Friars, the Dutch Church stopp'd it, and escap'd. It stopp'd in Bishopsgate-street, and Leadenhall-street, and Fenchurch-street, in the midst of the Streets, and short of the Tower. All beyond the River, and Southwark escap'd. There perish'd in the Flames 13,200 Houses, valu'd one with another at no more than twenty-five Pounds yearly Rent, amount at twelve Years Purchase to 3,900,000 Pounds. The eighty-seven Churches, the spacious Cathedral of St. Paul's, the six Chapels, the Exchange, Custom-house, Guildhall, the magnificent Halls of Companies, the several principal City Gates, with other publick Edifices and Colleges, may be well valued at 2,000,000 Pounds. The Wares, Household-Goods, Money lost and spoilt by the Fire, or pilfer'd away by those wicked Wretches that made their Gains of the common Calamity, may modestly be computed at above 2,000,000 Pounds. The Money spent in general removing of Goods into the Fields, during the Fire, and bringing them back afterwards, in the Hire of Boats, Carts, and Porters, may be reckon'd at least 2,000,000 Pounds; the Total of which is 10,050,000 Pounds, of which general Loss, Alderman Jefferies had a particular Loss in the one Commodity of Tobacco, to the Value of 20,000 Pounds.

The great Loss. I have not made use of the Account given by publick Authority, printed in the Compleat History, because I think my Historian's Authority, Mr. Baxter's, much better. He informs us, "The great Talk at that Time was, Who were the Burners of the City? And there came in so many Testimonies to prove it was the plotted Weapon of the Papists as caus'd the Parliament themselves to appoint a Committee to enquire after it, and receive Information; upon which Hubert, a French Papist. "one Hubert, a French Papist, confess'd openly and constantly, to the last, that he began the Fire." The Compleat Historian and Archdeacon Echard are positive that he was a French Presbyterian, they say, Hugonot; for which we must in Charity say, The Lord forgive them! Bishop Burnet assures us he was a French Papist. Let us repeat what he says: "The Papists were generally charg'd with it. One Hubert, a French Papist was seiz'd on in Essex, as he was going out of the Way in great Confusion. He con-feß'd he had begun the Fire, and persisted in his Confession to his Death, for he was hang'd upon no other Evidence but that of his own Confession. It is true, he gave so broken an Account of the whole Matter, that he was thought mad: Yet he was blindfolded, and carry'd to several Places of the City, and then his Eyes being open'd, he was ask'd if that was the Place; and he being carry'd to wrong Places, after he look'd round about for some time, he said, that was not the Place: But when he was brought to the Place where the Fire broke out, he affirm'd that was the true Place. And Tillotson told me, that Howel, then the Recorder of London, was with him, and had much Discourse with him, and that he concluded it was impossible it cou'd be a melancholy Dream. The Horror of the Fact, and the Terror of Death, and perhaps some Engagements in Confession (Remember Echard and the Compleat Historian call him a Hugonot or French Presbyterian) might put him into such Disorder, that it was not possible to draw a clear Account from him; but of what related to himself, Tillotson, who believ'd the City was burnt on Design, told me a Circumstance that made the Papists employing such a craz'd Man the more credible, &c." I omit several other Circumstances in Burnet and Baxter, which corroborate the Evidence against the Papists, and shall only add the Inscription about the Plinth of the lower Pedestal of the Monument, which is designedly omitted by Echard, who has printed the large Inscription on the Pedestal itself.

This Pillar was set up in perpetual Remembrance of the most dreadful Burning this Protestant City, begun and carry'd on by the Treachery and Malice of the Popish Faction, in the Beginning of September, in the Year of our Lord 1666, in order to the carrying on their horrid Plot for the extirpating the Protestant Religion, and Old English Liberty, and introducing Popery and Slavery.

This Inscription was eraz'd by King James, upon his Accession to the Crown, but re-inscrib'd presently after the happy Revolution, in such deep Characters as are not easily to be blotted out again.

In direct Opposition to these Authorities, publick and private, the Archdeacon closes his wild Account of the Fire thus: That he will judge on the charitable, and perhaps probable Side, that neither the Beginning nor the End of this dreadful Fire, were the Effects of Humane Means or Counsels. While the Terrors occasion'd by this Conflagration remain'd on the Minds of Men, the persecuting Bishops and Magistrates suspended their Rage against the Protestants who had not conform'd, and many of their Ministers preach'd in the midst of the burning Ruins, to a willing attentive People; as Dr. Manton, Mr. Thomas Vincent, Mr. Wadsworth, Mr. Janeway, Mr. Thomas Doolittle, Dr. Annesley, Mr. Chester, Mr. Church Franklin, Mr. Grimes, Mr. Watson, Dr. Jacob, Mr. Nathaniel Vincent, Mr. Turner, Mr. Griffiths, Mr. Brooks, Dr. Owen, Mr. Nye, Mr. Caryl, Dr. Goodwin, Mr. Barker. Many pious, learned, and eminent Divines of the Church of England, were more than ordinarily diligent in the Discharge of their Holy Function in this calamitous Time; as Dr. Tillotson, Dr. Stillingfleet, Dr. Whitchoke, Dr. Horton, Dr. Parrick, Mr. White, Dr. Outram, Dr. Horton, Mr. Gifford, Mr. Nest, Dr. Meriton, &c. Divines of equal Merit and Moderation, Ornaments of their Sacred Profession and the Established Church. When I am to speak of such Men as these, I begin with Pleasure and end with Pain.

A.D. 1666 On the 21st of September the Parliament met at Westminster. They were, says Eckard, the Life and Expectation of the Nation; and to shew it in their Actions, they gave the King 1,800,000 Pounds, and thank'd him for his great Care in the Management of the War, which they did in return for his Majesty's most acceptable Speech, wherein he told them, I wish with all my Heart that I cou'd bear the whole Charge of the War myself, and that my Subjects shou'd reap the Benefit of it to themselves; by which they wou'd not be much oblig'd to him.

The Clamours rais'd against the Papists after the Fire of London, produc'd an Address from the Parliament, and a Proclamation from the King, For suppressing the Insolencies of the Papists. The House of Commons impeach'd the Lord Viscount Mordaunt, Constable of Windsor-Castle, for imprisoning Mr. Taleur, who intended to stand for one of the Burgesses for Windsor; which I mention, because the said Taleur was a Prisoner for Debt in the Town Prison, when he intended to stand for a Member of this Parliament, and was taken thence by the Lord Mordaunt's Soldiers, to be put in Hold in the Castle; which lets us a little into the Truth of the Arch-deacon's Rich and Wise Men before spoken of. The Impeachment of the Lord Mordaunt, who was the King's Servant, disgusted the King, according to Eckard, though Taleur was his Servant also. The greatest Importance of it was, that it caus'd a Misunderstanding between the two Houses, which lasted to the End of the Sessions, when the Speaker, Turner, made a Speech of unconscionable Length, February the 8th, at which Time the King also spoke almost as long; and then the Lord Roberts, Lord Privy-Seal, prorogu'd the Parliament to the 10th Day of October.

Lord Mordaunt impeach'd.

Parliament prorogu'd.

King never broke his Word.

Grievances under him. 1. The Secret League with France. 2. His abandoning himself to Pleasures, and delegating his Government into the Hands of his Brother. 3. His Contrivance to make himself absolute Master of his Parliaments by means of the said French League. 4. His concerting with Lewis XIV. all his Treaties with the Dutch, under a secret Assurance that the same shou'd never hurt, but promote the French Interest. To this may be added his repealing the Triennial Bill; his modelling of Corporations by the Act so call'd; his Five Mile Act; his Profusion, and the Inundation of Lewdness and Impiety with which the Nation was overwhelmed by his Example.

Committee for the Fire. Before the House of Commons broke up, Sir Robert Brook, Chairman of the Committee, appointed to enquire into the Firing of London, reported to the House, that the Committee had some Information concerning the Matter, which might probably be enlightened by Examination of Hubert, which the House resolv'd to do: But Hubert was hang'd up the next Day, before the House sat. Several Evidences had been given in to the Committee, that Men were seen in many Parts of the City casting Fire-Balls into the Houses; and some that were taken firing Houses were brought to the Guard of Soldiers, and to the Duke of York, but never heard of afterwards. Some Weeks after Sir Robert Brook went to France, and as he was ferry'd over a River was drown'd, with a Kinsman of his, and that Business drown'd with him.

The King of England having declar'd War against Denmark for that King's joining with the Dutch, the Dane did the same by the King of England, with better Advantage; for the English cou'd seize but little Effects of the Danes in England, whereas the latter not only seiz'd all the English Effects, which were very great in Denmark, but his Danish Majesty stopp'd the Payment of vast Sums which he ow'd to the English Company at Hamburg.

It must not be forgot that in the last Session of Parliament the Act pass'd for preventing the Importation of Irish Cattle (the Inconveniencies of which are well set forth by Mr. Coke) another Act for Burying in Woollen, to which also Objections have been made: But the two Acts For Re-building the City of London, and for Erecting a Court of Judicature for determining of Differences touching Houses burnt and demolish'd, were very useful; which cannot be said of many Acts of this Parliament, from their Commencement to this time.

Eckard opens the next Year with an Account of the King's Coat, Waistcoat and Breeches, which were establish'd by a Solemn and Peremptory Declaration, Straight Spanish Breeches, a Long Vest down to the Middle instead of a Waistcoat, and above that a Loose Coat after the Muscovite or Polish Fashion, the Sword girt over the Vest, and instead of Shoes and Stockings a Pair of Buskins or Brodekins, which I repeat, that my History may have an Ornament that is no where to be met with in ancient Histories, such as those of Tibucydides, Livy, &c. He then tells us, that Dr. Barbon, Son of Praise God Barbon, set up an Insurance-Office against Fire, and that Sir Jonas Moor had a great Hand in the City's Resurrection. As the War with the Dutch began unjustly, so it ended dishonourably. The Parliament had given Money enough for carrying it on this Year; but their growing inquisitive about the Expence of what they had given, caus'd Suspicion in the King and his Courtiers, that they wou'd hold their Hand, and therefore it was Time to put an End to a War, which tho' begun with no Reason, there was very good Reason to put an End to it; so Ambassadors were appointed on Treaty at all Sides, and Breda, the Prince of Orange's Breda Town, was agreed upon to be the Place of Treaty. The King of England's Ambassadors were Denzil Lord Hollis, Henry Coventry, Esq; The French King's, the Count D'Estrades, Monsieur Courtin. The States Ambassadors, Mr. Beverning, Mr. Hubert. For the King of Sweden, the Mediator, Mr. Jongstall, Lord George Fleming, Monsieur Julius Coyer.

Audlow tells us, "The Dutch shew'd themselves ready to treat with England upon the Foot of the Treaty concluded between them in the Year 1662. The English Plenipotentiaries, notwithstanding the ill Condition of Affairs at Home, spent a whole Month at Breda without entring into Conference with those of Holland, which, with the Quarrels "that

A.D. 1667 "that happen'd between these two Ministers, gave the States farther Occasion to improve the present Conjunction to the best Advantage." The King had given his Word, that all the Monies granted for carrying on this War, shou'd be expended on that Service: He has had near six Millions for it. But Acherly informs us, 'Twas all so dissipated that he cou'd set out no Fleet this Summer, when the Dutch had a very good one at Sea very early, as the English found to their Cost. Echard assures us, he had dissipated the Money, but was advis'd, after his several Victories, to fit out a light Fleet only, which by dividing it self might make great Spoil on the Dutch Merchant Ships.

Ludlow, Vol. III. p. 300, & seq.

The States had order'd 4000 Land Forces under Col. Doleman, who was to have resign'd the Command to General Ludlow, if he wou'd have accepted of it; and this is all the Grounds that the Compleat Historians have for raving as they do against the English Common-wealth's Men, that were inclin'd to join the Dutch Common-wealth's Men. The Holland Fleet under Admiral De Ruyter sail'd directly to the River Thames. The Court of England having made no Preparations for Defence, was alarm'd to the last Degree with the News of their Approach, and at the first Meeting of the Council a Proposition was made to assemble the Parliament with all possible Expedition, tho' they were under Adjournment, that by their Advice either a Peace might be made to the Satisfaction of the Nation, or the War be carry'd on to the best Advantage. On the other Side Chancellor Hyde knowing himself to be in Danger from the Parliament, did all he cou'd to oppose that Motion, and conceiving an Army more useful to promote the arbitrary Designs of the Court, took this Occasion to propose the raising of 12,000 Men. And tho' the major Part of the Council carry'd it for assembling the Parliament on the 25th of the next ensuing July, and that a Proclamation shou'd be forthwith issued to that End, yet the Design of raising an Army was not laid aside.

Early in the Spring the Dutch sent Van Ghendt with a good Fleet and Land-Forces on board to the Frith in Scotland, with Orders to burn the Coast, and land his Troops, if he found Encouragement from the Malecontents. He enter'd the Frith on the first of May. If he had at first hung out English Colours, and attack'd Leith Harbour immediately, which was then full of Ships, Bishop Burnet thinks he might have done what Mischief he pleas'd, for all were in Security looking for Sir Jeremy Smith with some Frigates for the Defence of the Coasts, since the King had set out no Fleet this Year. There had been such a Dissipation of Treasure, that for all the Money that was given, there was not enough left to set out a Fleet. The Bishop adds, "The Court cover'd this by saying the Peace was as good as concluded at Breda, where the Lord Hollis and Mr. Coventry were treating about it as Plenipotentiaries; and tho' no Cessation was agreed on, yet they reckon'd on it as sure. Upon this a Saying of the Earl of Northumberland was much repeated, when it was said the King's Mistresses were like to ruin the Nation; No, says he, they save the Nation, while we have a House of Commons, who give all the Money that is ask'd; it is better to have the Money squander'd away in Luxury, than to have it sav'd for worse Purposes." This is the King, and this the Parliament, who pretended to have such a Regard to the Souls of Men, as to oblige them by Fines and Force to worship God in what they call'd the Orthodox Way! Witness the Bartholomew Act, the Five Mile Act, Earl of Northumberland's Saying of the King's Extravagance.

Sc. This is the King, and this the Parliament, who pretended to have such a Regard for the Security of the Subject! Witness the Corporation Act, the Triennial Parliament Act, &c. Good God! into what Hands are the poor People of England fallen! Instead of Glory and Liberty, of Religion and Trade, they are become the Contempt of the Contemtable, and a Prey to Luxury and Persecution.

Calamities in England.

Van Ghendt sailing to the Frith was only a Dutch Paimt to divert the King from that which was chiefly intended, for he sail'd out and join'd de Fleet as Ruyter, who enter'd the River Thames the 9th of June. The first Ships he saw were eight or nine Outward-bound Merchant-men with their Convoy, which, upon Discovery of the Holland Fleet, tack'd, and were chac'd by the Dutch up to the Hope; but the Hollanders being suddenly becalm'd, were oblig'd to come to an Anchor. Here the Dutch met with a Storm, which ending in a favourable North-East Wind, de Ruyter stood towards the Isle of Shepey, where he landed about 800 Men, took the Fort of Skeerness, which Sir Edward Sprague a Papist deserted, having not fortify'd it as he ought to have done, being the Governor; Echard extols his Bravery on this Occasion. A Man of War that lay for the Guard of that Fort was taken by the Dutch Ships at the same Time. The Dutch having possess'd themselves of this Fort, Van Ghendt, with 18 of their smaller Ships, sail'd up Chatham River the next Day; and notwithstanding Ships had been sunk to hinder their Passage, they came up to the Iron Chain which travers'd the River, and had been made on that Occasion, fought the Matthias and Charles V. which were order'd to defend it, kill'd most of their Men, burnt those Ships, broke the Bomb, and passing by Upnor Castle (ruin'd for want of Repair) burnt the Mary, took the Unity and Royal Charles, and, says Ludlow, plac'd their Colours on the latter, in View of her Master, who stood on the Shoar observing the Effects of his prudent and vigilant Government. They cou'd conquer Venner in London, and Oldroyd in Yorkshire: They cou'd hang up Ratbone and Flint as stoutly as Oliver or the Rump cou'd have done: They cou'd make Acts and Plots, and destroy the Disarm'd and the Defenceless: Let them now come and shew their Valour; let them now come out and defend their Country, or weep Blood for the Shame they have brought upon her. Monk stands on the Shoar with his Cane in his Hand, sees the Royal Navy of England in Flames, a foreign Enemy roaring their Cannon within the hearing of London; and has neither a Hand to help, nor a Heart to lament the Misery and Infamy he has brought upon a betray'd and abus'd People.

The Figure Monk makes.

On the Third Day the Dutch burnt the Royal Oak, the Royal James, and the Royal London. Were the Naseby, the Victory, the Speaker, the Fairfax burnt in a River of England! Cou'd Blake live after such a killing Sight as Monk is beholding! What is the good Lord General now doing! Ludlow tells us, Van Ghendt having burnt several smaller Ships, Monk had no other Way to save the rest but by sinking them in the River, and sending five Fireships among the Dutch Fleet, which had not the expected Success. In the mean time the Train'd-Bands from all the adjacent Parts were marching towards Chatham, to endeavour to prevent farther Mischief by Land. Nine Ships were sunk at Woolwich, and four at Blackwall. Platforms were rais'd and furnish'd with Artillery, and Works to defend them, and hinder the Enemy from coming up to London. But the Dutch, who had in a Fight, another

A.D. 1667 another Game to play, having exacted a Sum of Money from the Inhabitants of the Isle of Sheppey, they did not make Bonfires of their Houses as Holmes did at Brandaris, and carry'd off the Guns and Ammunition they found at Skeerness; they fell down with their Fleet to the Buoy in the Nore, landed some Troops below Tilbury, and swept the Country of Sheep and Cattle in Sight of 2 or 3,000 Militia within 20 Miles of London.

What says a Modern Author on this? There is nothing like it in all History: A foreign Fleet to throw the City of London into Consternation! I will not say since the Death of Queen Elizabeth, but since the Death of King Edgar. Blake's Albes are dug out of his Grave. Did he ever suffer an Enemy to appear within the four Seas, but at his Peril? The Enemy is now triumphant in our very Rivers, and the Citizens of London tremble in their very Houses.

Let us now see how the Monarch behav'd on this Occasion: The Monarch who is so greedy of Power, and exercises it so notably against his Protestant Dissenting Subjects. Coke writes thus, "The next Morning after the Dutch had enter'd the River, I was walking in St. James's Park, when a Gentleman whisper'd to me, The Dutch are in the River. The King had then fed his Ducks, and was walking on the West-side of the Park. Prince Rupert overtook us, and met the King at the further End of the Pall-Mall. He told the Prince he had shot a Duck, and such a Dog fetch'd it; so they walk'd on till the King came to St. James's House, and there said to the Prince, Let's go see Cambridge and Kendall, the Duke's two Sons, who then lay a dying. But upon his Return to Whitehall he found all in an Uprore, the Lady Castlemain bewailing above all others, that she shou'd be first torn to Pieces. If the Dutch had come up to London, they wou'd have found all open to them, not one Gun mounted at Tilbury-Fort." The Artillery made use of in those Days were Warrants, Excommunications, Capiendo's, and the like; and the Enemy was the Presbyterians. Tho' Monk cou'd do nothing at Chatham, the Earl of Macklesfield and Capt. Elliot, who were sent to Portsmouth, us'd such Diligence in fortifying it, that when the Dutch came before the Harbour, they thought not fit to attempt to do what they had done at Chatham. Bishop Burnet's Account of this execrable Business is as follows; "The Affair of Chatham was a terrible Blow; and tho' the Loss was great, the Infamy was greater. The Parliament had given above five Millions toward the War, but thro' the Luxury and Waste of the Court, the Money was so squander'd away, that the King cou'd neither set out a Fleet, nor defend his Coasts. Upon the News of the Dutch Fleet's being in the River, the King did not ride down himself, nor appear at the Head of his People, who were then in such imminent Danger; he only sent the Duke of Albemarle down, and was intending to retire to Windsor. But that look'd so like a flying from Danger, that he was prevail'd on to stay. And it was given out, that he was chearful that Night at Supper with his Mistresses, which drew many Libels upon him, writ with much Wit, and brought him under a general Contempt," where we will leave him, and desire to know by what Action of his future Reign he got out of it. The Bishop again; "He was compar'd to Nero, who sung while Rome was burning." The Bishop refers to some Lines in Sir John Denham's Advice to a Painter, where this King's Government, especially with respect to this War, is very naturally describ'd, and much more agreeable to Truth than the Compleat History, or Echard's. The Verses indeed are not so harmonious as those of Cooper's Hill. But the following are some of them:

Denham's Verses upon the Infamy at Chatham.

*So passing Chatham, make Whitehall appear,
If not in Danger, yet at least in Fear;
Make our Dejection, if thou canst, seem more Than our Pride, Sloth, and Ignorance before;
The King of Danger now shews far more Fear,
Than he did ever to prevent it care:
Yet to the City doth himself convey,
Bravely to shew he was not run away;
Whilst the Black Prince, and our fifth Harry's
Are only acted on our Theatres: [Wars,
As Nero once with Harp in Hand survey'd,
His flaming Rome, and as that burnt, he play'd;
So our great Charles, when the Dutch Fleet Saw his Ships burn, &c. [arriv'd,*

Mr. Baxter speaks of the King's conveying himself into the City; "He came in Person among the Citizens to perswade them not to desert him, and made a Speech to them on Tower-Hill. He had great Experience of their Loyalty, who after such Sufferings, and under such Pressures in Matters of Conscience, and of worldly Interest, even in such Extremity, were neither prov'd to do, or say any thing that was contrary to their Fidelity to him." Bishop Burnet mentions this, and adds, "But the Matter went heavily; the City was yet in Ashes, and the Jealousy of burning it on Design, had got so among the Citizens, that the King himself was not free from Suspicion. The Court was at a stand what to do, for the French had assur'd them, the Treaty was as good as finish'd. Whether the French set this on, as that which wou'd weaken the Fleet of England, and alienate the King so entirely from the Dutch, that he wou'd be easily engag'd in new Alliances to revenge this Affront, as many believ'd, I cannot pretend to determine.

This and other Disasters created a Suspicion, and rais'd Clamours at the King's secret Measures with France, inasmuch, says Acherly, that he lost all Confidence with the People, which as he never in Truth deserv'd, so he never recover'd.

A Peace was immediately clapp'd up with the Dutch, and sign'd on the 9th of July, at Breda. Coke speaks thus of it, "However the Dishonour which the Nation sustain'd at Chatham may be forgotten, yet the sudden and dishonourable Peace concluded at Breda never will be. By the third Article, the Business of Amboyna is bury'd, and never to be call'd in Question, which Oliver, tho' he made Peace with the Dutch, wou'd not do. The Hollanders had Polegone, out of which they had expell'd our East-India Company during this War, confirm'd to them, whereby they became sole Proprietors of the Spice Trade, as well in Europe as other Parts of the Indies, Arabia and Persia." Nay, so little Care was taken for Reparation of Damages, that the Agents under the Letters of Reprisal for Sir Paul Pindar, and Sir William Courteen's Ships, valued at 151,612 Pounds, were try'd as Pirates, by Sir Lionel Jenkins, who had the Silver Oar carry'd before him; and, says Mr. Coke, was very zealous to have hang'd them. A Work that went forward from the Beginning to the End of this Reign.

Whilst these Things were in Agitation, the Parliament met on the 25th of July, according to the late Proclamation, and entering immediately upon the Debate of the Army, which they resolv'd

A.D. 1667 solv'd to break, spoke so clearly and freely touching this Matter, that the Court resolv'd to give them a little Interruption, hoping in that Time to take off some of those who had appear'd with the greatest Warmth, by such Means as they had in their Hands; or if that Design shou'd not succeed, to think upon taking new Measures. To this End they were acquainted by the Chancellor Hyde, that it was the King's Pleasure they shou'd adjourn 'till the 29th of the same Month. But before this Message came to them, they had pass'd a Resolution, that the King shou'd be desir'd forthwith to disband the Army he had lately rais'd. The Day to which they had adjourn'd being come, their Speaker, Turner, appear'd not 'till the King came to the House of Peers, where, having sent for the House of Commons, he made a short Speech touching the late Peace, and then directed the Chancellor to do as he commanded; who without any Preamble, told them, It was his Majesty's Pleasure they shou'd be adjourn'd to the 10th of October next. But for all this, some of the Council had the Courage to oppose the violent Courses, and to advise, that the Army might be disbanded, according to the Desire of the House of Commons; that the Seal shou'd be taken from Hyde, and that the Parliament shou'd meet at the Time appointed, and be left to the Liberty of providing for the publick Safety in their own Way. Pursuant to this Advice, Monk was employ'd to demand the Seal of the Chancellor; and Ludlow tells us, he embrac'd this Occasion of Revenge with Joy, for the Chancellor had openly blam'd his Conduct, in presuming to attack the whole Dutch Fleet the last Year, whilst Prince Rupert, with Part of the English Fleet, was seperated from him. The Chancellor refus'd to deliver the Seal to Monk, under Pretence that some Men had suffer'd for parting with it too easily; saying, He wou'd bring it to the King in Council the next Day, being not without Hopes by his Interest and Presence to prevail with them to change their Resolution; but his Master finding himself oblig'd to give way to the present Torrent, persisted in his Demand, and having receiv'd the Seal from his Hand, entrusted it with Sir Orlando Bridgeman with the Title of Lord Keeper.

Among the various Reasons that were given to justify the King in abandoning the Chancellor to the Resentment of the People, one was, that he had countermin'd the King in the Design he had to be divorc'd from the Queen, under Pretence that she had been engag'd to another Person, that she had made a Vow of Chastity before her Marriage, and that she was incapable of having Children. The Person design'd to fill her Place, was one Mrs. Stuart, a young and beautiful Lady, who had some Office under the Queen. The Chancellor, who, some say, procur'd his Daughter to be marry'd to the Duke of York, and was therefore suspected of having made the Match with the Infanta of Portugal, that he might make way for the Succession of the Collateral Line, sent for the Duke of Richmond, and pretending to be sorry that a Person of his Worth, and near Relation to the King, shou'd receive no Marks of his Favour, advis'd him to marry Mrs. Stuart, as the most certain Way he cou'd take to advance himself. The young Gentleman unwarily took in the Bait, and, says Ludlow, credulously relying on what the old VOLFONE had said, made immediate Application to the young Lady, who was ignorant of the King's Intention, and in a few Days marry'd her. The King being thus disappointed, and soon after inform'd by what Means this Match had been brought about, banish'd the Duke and his new Dutchess from the Court, and kept his Resentment against the Chancellor to a more convenient Opportunity. A.D. 1667

The Duke of York had at the same time a Design to be divorc'd from the Chancellor's Daughter, under Pretence of Incontinence, and had promis'd the King to engage his whole Interest in the House of Commons, to pass the King's Divorce, if the King wou'd do the same for him. Several great Lords were prevail'd with to promote the double Divorce in Parliament; and the Chancellor to prevent it, told those Lords, and others in Confidence, that the Duke was a Papist, and design'd to marry a Papist, and disinherit his Protestant Children; which being whisper'd about, rais'd such a Jealousy in and out of Parliament, that the Duke's Creatures durst not make any such Motion.

The Duke of York intends a Divorce from his Daughter.

Some Time before this, the Duke of Buckingham was committed to Custody of the Black-Bucks Rod, and the Earl of Ossory, the Duke of Ormonde's Son, to the Tower, for a Challenge that had pass'd between them, on Account of Words spoken in the House of Lords; and not long after there happen'd another Disturbance between the same Duke and the Marquis of Dorchester, for Room at a Free Conference in the Painted-Chamber. Here the Duke pressing very hard upon the Marquis, the latter told him, He ought not to crowd him so much, for he was as good a Man as he. The Duke made some very smart Reply, to which the Marquis return'd him the Lye, upon which the Duke either gave him a Blow, or pull'd him by the Perriwig, and the House of Lords committed them both to the Tower. As the Duke pass'd thro' the City to the Tower, the People made Acclamations, not as he was a Prisoner, but to shew their Respect to him, for he was become popular by his Aversion to Hyde. Shortly after the Duke having gotten his Liberty, without begging the King's Pardon, appear'd at Court on Christmas Day, for which he was immediately forbidden the King's Presence. The Duke was a Man of Spirit and Wit, and the Court gave daily Occasion for Raillery. Buckingham knew them, and spar'd them not, by which he so provok'd the King, that he order'd a Serjeant at Arms to apprehend him. The Serjeant having been a little roughly us'd in the Attempt, the Duke withdrew himself, and the King issu'd a Proclamation against him, but his Displeasure lasted not long, and upon his asking Pardon, he was recall'd and restor'd to Favour.

Quarrels with the Marquis of Dorchester.

If the Earl of Clarendon had not loaded himself with the Guilt of the Misery and Ruin which were the Consequences of the Bartolomew Act, the Five Mile Act, and the other Stinging Acts, as Echard terms them with much Delectation; had he contented himself with the Discharge of his Office in the Chancery, he wou'd have been a Praise-worthy Magistrate. But his meddling with Politicks, of which he was no great Master, and his suffering himself to be inspir'd with the Spirit of the persecuting Bishops, lost him the Respect of Foreigners, and the Love of his Countrymen. 'Tis certain, he secretly oppos'd the Measures of the Court for two or three Years before his Disgrace; but it is certain also, that his Resentment for the Sights he daily met with, contributed as much to that laudable Opposition, as his Zeal for the publick Good; nor is it easy to think, that a Man who had promoted those miserable Bills, did any thing out of Affection to the Common-wealth.

Earl of Clarendon changes his Conduct.

He was the Courtiers Jest some time before they accomplish'd his Fall, which his Conduct towards the King himself much facilitated; for he did frequently censure his Majesty's lewd Course of Life, and was more free with the Male and

A.D. 1667 Female Favourites, who seem'd to outvie each other in Lewdness and Debauchery. They wou'd often say to the King, when the Chancellor pass'd in the Court, There goes your Schoolmaster. And Buckingham wou'd often act and mimic him in the King's Presence, walking stately with a pair of Bellows before him for the Purse, and Col. Tirus carrying a Fire-shovel on his Shoulder for the Mace; which sort of Mimickry the King was much captivated with. Hyde's laying out 50,000 Pounds in a magnificent Palace by the Park, which the People call'd Dunkirk-House, referring to the ignominious Sale of that Town, was a very impolitic Act in a time of Plague, Conflagration, and War; and the Death of the Earl of Southampton, his fast Friend, and a fast Friend to the Publick, was an irreparable Loss to him. The Treasury, on the Lord Southampton's Death, was put into Commission; and to shew what excellent Politicians now flourish'd, the First Commissioner was General Monk, who understood Fluxions as well as Accompts; the other Lords of the Treasury were Lord Ashley Cooper, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Sir Thomas Clifford, Comptroller of the Household; Sir William Coventry, Sir John Duncomb, Privy-Counsellors.

King's

Accompts.

And the Parliament having last Sessions talk'd of a Bill for Taking and Stating the Publick Accompts, the King, to support his Authority Royal, issu'd a Commission for that Purpose. The Commissioners were John Earl of Bridgewater, Oliver Earl of Bolinbroke, Robert Earl of Ailesbury, Edward Viscount Conway, John Lord Lucas, John Lord Crew, Edward Boscarwen, Esq; Giles Strangersways, Esq; William Garraway, Esq; Sir William Lowther, Sir Thomas Mears, Sir Humphry Winch, Sir Thomas Littleton, Sir William Thompson, Sir Thomas Osborn, Sir Thomas Gower, Colonel Samuel Sandys, John Jones, Esq. But what they did is not told us; on the contrary, we are inform'd that the Parliament, when they met, did not like this Commission, and that they appointed a Committee to examine the Publick Accompts; of which William Pierpoint, Esq; Lord Brereton, Col. Thompson, Sir James Langham, and Sir William Turner were chief; they were call'd the Committee of Brook-House, and were so diligent, and made such Discoveries in the Accompts, particularly those of the Treasurer of the Navy, that they were summon'd before the King and Council, and severely rebuk'd, as endeavouring to make Differences between the King and Parliament. His Majesty also undertook the Decision of the Business, and acquitted the Treasurer; at which the Parliament were as much disgusted as Men could be who were so well paid.

French
King's poor Pretence to the Netherlands.

About this time the French King set up a Title to the Spanish Netherlands, under this gross Pretence, That by the Laws of Brabant, a Daughter by the first Wife shou'd inherit before the Son of a second Wife; and that his Queen, being the Daughter of the late King of Spain by his first Wife, ought to inherit the Spanish Netherlands, preferable to the King of Spain, who was Son by the second Wife; under which Pretence he pour'd into Flanders a great Army, took ten or twelve strong Towns by Surprise, march'd another Army into Franche-Comte, and took possession of it and Burgundy, which made the Parliament of England still more uneasy.

The Lord Mobun, a young Nobleman, gave out some Words which caus'd a common Scandal in Court and City against Dolben Bishop of Rochester, as guilty of most obscure Actions with the said Lord; and they must be monstrous, as well as obscure, to cause Scandal in such a Court. The Reproach of it was long the Talk of the Town, but it hinder'd not his Promotion to the Archbishoprick of York. Echard tells us, he was an Officer in the Cavalier Army, and a particular Support of the Church.

On the 10th of October the Parliament met, and we are not now troubled with such long tedious Harangues as when the Earl of Clarendon and Speaker Turner infected one another with the Itch of Speech-making. The King's Speech was very short, and the Lord Keeper Bridgman's not very long, but to the Purpose. The House of Commons Voted the King Thanks for disbanding the Army, which he could not maintain; for turning Papists out of his Guards, and other Military Employments; tho' Sir Edward Sprague, a Flag-Officer, and many other Sea and Land Officers were continu'd, notwithstanding they were Papists. They also thank'd him for quickning the Execution of the Law against Importation of Irish Cattle, and for displacing the late Lord Chancellor. His Majesty thank'd them for their Thanks, and promis'd never more to employ the Earl of Clarendon: Who, on the 26th of October, was charg'd with by Mr. Edward Seymour, Earl of afterwards Sir Edward, with variety of great Crimes; and several Debates arose about the Reason and Manner of Impeaching him; in which Debates will be found some of the greatest Names at that Time flourishing. The Members who spoke for him were Lawrence Hyde, Esq; Sir He- neage Finch, Sir Francis Goodrich, Mr. Swinfen, Mr. Coleman, Sir Robert Ackland, Sir John Goodrich, Sir Edward Thurland, Sir John Shaw, Sir John Bramston, Sir Thomas Mears, Mr. Coventry, Sir Thomas Clifford, Sir John Talbot. Members who spoke against him, were Mr. Edward Seymour, Sir Thomas Littleton, Mr. Vaughan, Sir Richard Temple, Sir John Holland, Sir Robert Howard, Mr. John Trevor, Lord St. John, Sir Thomas Osborn, Sir Charles Wheeler, Richard Hampden, Esq; Mr. Street, Mr. Thomas, Andrew Marvel, Esq; Sir John Denham, William Pryune, Esq; Sir Robert Carr, Mr. Steward, Mr. Waller, Colonel Bowels, Sir Job Charlton, Lord Vaughan, Sir William Coventry, Mr. Garraway, the Solicitor General, Sir Robert Atkins, Sir Walter Young, Sir Thomas Thompkins, Sir Thomas Lee, Mr. Secretary Morrice, Sir Humphry Winckcomb, Hugh Boscarwen, Esq; Sir Thomas Gower, Lord Torrington, afterwards Duke of Albemarle.

Here are Monk's Son, Torrington, and Monk's Cousin, Morrice, in the List of the Prosecutors of Clarendon, whose worst Name for Monk was that of the good Lord General; but the General had lost all his Goodness since he came to fetch the Seal from the Chancellor. After a short Debate about the Nature of the Evidence against the Lord Clarendon, and the Manner of Impeaching him, Sir Thomas Littleton, who was Chairman of the Committee appointed to draw up Heads for an Accusation, presented them to the House; and when they were Debated, Proof of them being requir'd, it was Resolv'd that the Members shou'd speak to each Article what they could

A.D. 1667 cou'd say for it; and if none offer'd any thing sufficient to induce the House to pass it, that it shou'd be laid aside.

He is charg'd with being for a Standing Army. The First Article related to his designing a Standing Army; which being read, the Lord Vaughan and Sir Robert Howard said, they had heard from Persons of Quality, that it wou'd be prov'd.

Calls the King Papist. The Second Article, with having said, The King was a Papist in his Heart. To this the Lord Sir John spoke; Persons of great Quality have assur'd me they will make it good; if they do not, I will acquaint the House who they are.

Grants illegal Patents. The Third Article related to his receiving Money for Patents, and granting illegal Injunctions. To this Mr. Edward Seymour spoke thus; Sufficient Persons will make it good; and that he said, with Respect to one of the Patents, So long as the King is King, and I Lord Chancellor, the Patent will stand.

Under-farms the Customs. The Fourth and Fifth Articles charg'd him with having procur'd People to be Imprison'd in remote Islands against Law, and Farming the Customs at Under-rates. To which Sir Richard Temple said, Divers have undertaken to make it good, if they do not, I will name them: I am inform'd he had a Share for under-selling them, and 90,000 Pounds Bribe.

The same. Sir Thomas Littleton. "It appears by the Farmers Confession, that they had it 50,000 Pounds under, besides Time of Payment, which was 30,000 Pounds more." Mr. Seymour said, The others had more; they were told they shou'd not have it, and had about 1000 Pounds each given them to bid no more. Sir Thomas Osborn declar'd, that the Earl of Clarendon said, Bid who wou'd for the Customs, none shou'd have them but the old Farmers.

Takes Money for Penalties. The Sixth Article was touching his receiving Money of Vintners to free them from Penalties. To this Sir Robert Car said, I know who will prove it.

Gets exorbitant Grants. The Seventh Article related to his having rais'd a vast Estate, and got exorbitant Grants from the King. To which several Members spoke, as Mr. Edward Seymour, I suppose you need no Proof, the Sun shines at Noon-day. Sir Thomas Littleton. The Matter of Fact in this Article is easily made out, for his Place, as Chancellor, cou'd not be worth above 4 or 5000 Pounds a Year.

Illegally imprisons Men. The Eighth Article charg'd him with introducing an Arbitrary Government in the Plantations. To this Sir Thomas Littleton, and Sir Thomas Osborn spoke, acquainting the House, that Col. John Farmer, a Barbados Planter, came from that Island to complain of it; and that he, with several other Planters, Sir John Bawdon, a Barbados Merchant, and others, complain'd of it by a Petition in Parliament; but Farmer was thrown into Prison, and Bawdon, and the other Barbados Merchants threaten'd, which so discourag'd them, that they dropp'd their Petition.

The loss of the Leeward Islands. The Ninth Article related to his frustrating Proposals for preserving the Leeward Islands. To this Sir Charles Wheeler said, My Lord Chancellor was the only Person oppos'd it.

Corresponds with Cromwel. The Tenth Article was touching his corresponding with Cromwel, and his Accomplices when he was with the King in Exile. Sir Charles Wheeler answer'd the House he cou'd prove it clearly; but it was agreed that he was indemnify'd by the Act of Grace, and the Article was expung'd.

Sells Dunkirk. The Eleventh Article related to the Sale of Dunkirk. And Sir Thomas Osborn, afterwards Duke of Leeds, said to it, A great Lord told me the Earl of Clarendon had made a Bargain for Dunkirk three quarters of a Year before it was known. Several Members spoke to this Article, for and against him, and it was Debated whether it was Treason or not: Prynne said, It cannot be Treason, because sold by the King's Consent. Mr. Vaughan, afterwards Lord Chief Justice, reply'd, If the King agree to it, doth it follow that he who adviseth the King to a Thing destructive to his Kingdom is not a Traitor?

The Twelfth Article was concerning his altering a Patent for Enrolment. Mr. Street inform'd the House how the Case stood. The King gives a Thing to Dr. Crowther. In the Grant was a Mistake of a County. Crowther finds the Mistake, and petitions the King to amend it. The King calls for the Chancellor and Seal, and in the King's Presence it was amended and seal'd. Sir Thomas Littleton. The Crime seems as great as the Chancellor cou'd commit. The King was to present by such a Day, or not at all. The Error was found after that Day; so that the King by Act of Parliament had lost his Right. The Chancellor did alter the Patent, and the Record was fetch'd away by one of the Chancellor's Servants, and brought back read and alter'd; which might be done, and in other Cases is done, where a Word only has been mistaken; but that is something precisely in the King's Power, and to save new Sealing: But here cou'd be no new Sealing, the Time being elaps'd; it was to throw another Man into his Freehold, and is a great Crime.

The Thirteenth Article was touching his drawing Men's Lands into Question, and determining Cases of Law at the Council-Board. To this Mr. Thomas said, I shall be able to make it out.

The Fourteenth Article was touching Quo Warranto's to Corporations. To which Sir Thomas Littleton said, This is so publick a Thing, that it needs not to be prov'd.

The Fifteenth Article related to his procuring of Bills for the Settlement of Ireland. To this Sir Robert Howard said, I doubt not but it will be made out.

The Sixteenth Article was concerning his betraying the Nation in foreign Treaties, and discovering his Majesty's secret Counsels to his Enemies. Foreign Sir Thomas Littleton. This will appear by the Treaties themselves putting us in Hopes of Peace, and so hindering the Fleet's going out. Lord Vaughan. I brought in the Article of betraying the King's Council to the French King during the War, and that in the Secrecy of State, which was the Occasion of the late Mischiefs. Sir Thomas Osborn. That is direct adhering to the King's Enemies; and if so, it is Treason. Mr. Solicitor General. This must be Treason, if you have any Inducement to believe it. Sir Robert Howard. I have heard it from an Eye-Witness, who told it me, and added, That we were neither to be trusted nor dealt with who were so betray'd. Several others spoke to this Matter; and the Question at last was, Whether he had so far discover'd the King's Council as to be guilty of Treason, which was carry'd in the Affirmative, Yeas 186, Noes 89.

The Seventeenth Article was about the Mis-carriages of the War by his Means. To which Mr. Thomas said, I want not Persons to bring to make it good. Sir Thomas Littleton. Sir Edward Sprague desires Money to give an Intelligencer, and has it. Sprague brings the Intelligencer to the King, the King commands him to meet at the Chancellor's: There he met the King, and then Order was given to divide the Fleet. These Articles being read, Mr. Marvel charg'd Mr. Seymour with saying, when he mov'd the Matter against the Earl of Clarendon, that the Earl shou'd have said, The King was insufficient for Government, which is left out of these Articles. To this Mr. Seymour reply'd, The Party that told me at first, differ'd something afterwards; therefore

A.D. 1667 therefore I rather withdraw it than to trouble you with Uncertainties; but a Gentleman in the House can give you further Satisfaction. Sir John Denham, A Peer of the Land heard the Earl of Clarendon say in a Coach, That the King was an unactive Person, and indispos'd for Government. This will be made good. But the Words having been spoken before the Act of Oblivion, it was pass'd over. Upon the whole, an Impeachment of Treason, and other Crimes and Misdemeanors was resolv'd on, and Mr. Edward Seymour order'd to carry it to the Lords, which he did the 12th of November.

But the Lords did not think fit to secure the Earl's Person, because the Charge was general and without Proof, which gave great Offence to the House of Commons, and occasion'd a warm Debate about their Privileges in this Case and Precedents. They had several Conferences with the Lords, who insisted upon it to have their Reasons for the Impeachment before they could secure the Earl of Clarendon, to whom the persecuting Bishops stuck close. In the mean time the Earl provided for himself, and made his Escape to France, where he resided at and near Rouen as long as he liv'd. The House hearing he was gone, order'd Sir Thomas Clifford, Comptroller of the Household, to desire his Majesty that the Ports might be stopp'd, which was done, but the Bird was flown first. The Earl left a kind of Petition behind him address'd to the House, justifying or extenuating his Offences in a Stile and Air no ways becoming a Person under an Impeachment of High-Treason. This Petition was deliver'd at a Conference to the Commons by the Duke of Buckingham, who said, when he deliver'd it,

The Lords have commanded me to deliver to you this scandalous and seditious Paper sent from the Earl of Clarendon, desiring the Committee of Peers to present it to you, and to desire you, in a convenient Time, to send it to their Lordships again, for it has a Stile which they are in Love with, and desire to keep it.

His Petition gives Offence.

The Petition, or rather Remonstrance, is very long, and I refer for it to the Historiographers. After it was read, Mr. Vaughan spoke to it, and said among other Things, " 'Tis the first Time that I ever heard an innocent Man run away under the greatest Charge with Hopes to return again and vindicate himself. Mark one Expression, he says, He is as far from Corruption as from Disloyalty. If he had said he was guilty of neither, he had said something; but by that Expression he may be guilty of both. So insolent a Paper I never met with in this Kingdom, nor have I ever heard the like in any other. So inconsiderable a Part of the Nation as he is to lay it upon the Nation, who, if innocent, might defend himself! If guilty, why doth he charge the Nation with Persecuting? Therefore, without troubling your selves with it, do as the Lords have done, who deliver'd it to you as a scandalous and seditious Paper; it hath Malice in it, and is the greatest Reproach upon the King and the whole Nation that ever was given by Man." Therefore put the Question whether this Paper shall not have the Character, That it is a scandalous and malicious Paper, and a Reproach to the Justice of the Nation, which was carry'd in the Affirmative. Sir Robert Howard mov'd that it shou'd be burnt by the Hands of the Common Hangman; but that was oppos'd, because the Lords desir'd the Paper might be return'd: However, it was carry'd in the Affirmative, tho' I am fully convinc'd that some of his Speeches when he was Chancellor, especially those vile ones about Sham Plots, and some of his Characters in the Grand Rebellion History, especially that of the great Hampden, deserve that Usage much more than his Petition, and had he not been the Instrument of so much Mischief to humour the persecuting Prelates in the Stinging Acts, a generous Mind cou'd not now have deny'd him Compassion. "It was a notable Providence of God, says Mr. Baxter, that this Man, who had been the grand Instrument of State, and done almost all, and had dealt so cruelly with the Nonconformists, shou'd thus by his own Friends be cast out and banish'd, while those that he had persecuted were the most moderate in his Cause, and many for him. And it was a great Ease that befel good People throughout the Land by his Dejection; for his Way was to decoy Men into Conspiracies, or to pretend Plots." He made the Sham Plots. Echar'd and the Compleat Historian insist upon it strenuously that they were true Plots. "And then, upon the Rumour of a Plot, the innocent People of many Countries were laid in Prison, so that no Man knew when he was safe. And it is notable, that he who did so much to make the Oxford Law for banishing Ministers from Corporations who took not that Oath, does in his Letter from France, since his Banishment, say, that he never was in Favour since the Parliament sat at Oxford.

The Parliament resolv'd on an Address for a Proclamation to summon the said Earl to appear by a Day, and to apprehend him, in order to his Trial. But the Lords wou'd not give their Concurrence to this Vote, they having pass'd a Bill for Banishing the Earl of Clarendon, which many of the House of Commons did not think a sufficient Punishment. Mr. Trevor said, What if he hath Life in other Parts, his Family untainted, and his Children alive, and enjoy his Estate.

Sir Robert Howard. There is no Attainder; but if there had been such a Bill, the Thing which shou'd sway me, shou'd be the Duke of York's Marriage, &c. This Bill occasion'd great Debate between those who thought Banishment was not Punishment enough, and those who thought it was. At last it was put to the Vote, and carry'd in the Affirmative. Yeas 109 Noes 55.

After his Fall the Duke of Buckingham came into Play, and was look'd upon as Prime Minister. He shew'd himself openly for Toleration of Liberty for all Parties in Matters of God's Worship; and others also seem'd to look that Way, as thinking the King was for it. One Reason was, his being an Enemy to every thing that disturb'd him in his Pleasures: Another was, his being a Friend to Popery, which was to be understood in a general Toleration. This Disposition of the King's so disquieted Dr. Sheldon, Archbishop of Canterbury, that he cou'd not help shewing it. His Heart seems to have been incapable of any tender Emotion: Piety the most tender of all, vanish'd in Ceremonies and Forms, and carry'd away Charity with it. The King discours'd with Sheldon about removing Lord Clarendon from the Ministry, and thought it was the Archbishop's Opinion that it ought to be done by what he then said. But when he was don, remov'd the King sent for the Archbishop to tell him of it. Sheldon made him no Answer. The King requiring him to declare himself, Sir, says the Bishop, I wish you wou'd put away this Woman that you keep. The King reply'd smartly, Why did not you talk to me of it sooner, but take this Occasion to do it? Other warm Words pass'd between them, and Sheldon cou'd never recover the King's Confidence. 'Tis evident, that his reproving proving the King for keeping a Harlot at that Time, and not doing it in seven Years before, proceeded not so much from a pious Indignation at Lewdness, as from Resentment for the Disgrace of the Chancellor, who had procur'd the Persecuting Acts at the Instigation of this proud Prelate. Morley, Bishop of Winchester, was soon after displac'd as Dean of the Chapel, and was succeeded by Dr. Crofts, Bishop of Hereford, who not liking a Court Life resign'd his Office, and had for Successor Blandford, Bishop of Oxford, at which Time Dr. Crew, Son to the Lord Crew, afterwards Bishop of Durham, was made Clerk of the Closet.

Echard, in taking Leave of the Earl of Clarendon, has this Reflection. "Thus was this Great Man, who had so often triumph'd in his Eloquence almost from the Throne (He means his Speeches recommending the Bartholomew Act, the Five Mile Act, the Corporation Act, &c.)" "reduc'd to employ his Parts to plead, in Effect, "at the Bar of the same House. Again, Thus "after he had spent the Vigour of his Life in "the most difficult Services of two GREAT "KINGS, Charles I, and Charles II, &c."

Great Historical Curiosities.

On the 19th of December, the Day after the Commons had pass'd the Bill against the Earl, the King, by Commission, pass'd it, and some other Bills; which being of no great moment, I leave in Mr. Archdeacon's List, as I shou'd this other Passage in the Chronicle, was it not for its abundant Curiosities; That his Majesty went into the City, laid the first Stone of the Foundation of the Royal Exchange, was treated by the Lord Mayor, Sir William Boulton, and Knighted the two Sheriffs, Sir Dennis Gauden, and Sir Thomas Davis: That the Duke of York went thither a Week after, and laid the first Stone for a second Pillar, was treated as his Brother had been; and the Laying these Stones gave so great Encouragement to the Workmen, that so large a Structure was never carry'd on with greater Expedition.

The King, who was himself as good a Catholic as his Libertinisms wou'd let him be, publish'd a Proclamation to hinder the Concourse of Catholics to the Popish Chapels at St. James's and Somerset-House. In which sort of Acts, Echard is so weak as to say, the King took great Delight; though a Page or two afterwards he owns, That Popery, as well as Pleasures, became more open in the English Court; which he wou'd not have been so careful to remember, if the Ministers had not shewn a Disposition to Moderation towards Protestant Dissenters.

The Scene of the little Action there is, varies so often, that without interrupting the Course of the History with the Affairs of Scotland and Ireland, we are forc'd to break in upon Chronological Order. To do it as little as possible, we have postpon'd the Affairs of those Kingdoms till the End of the first Dutch War in this Reign, which is the first Remarkable Period in it.

We have seen what dangerous Designs have been carrying on in England against the Constitution, as it is Protestant and Free; and the Administration in Ireland and Scotland has not been better.

Ireland.

I touch the Affairs of Ireland first, because least has been said of them. We have mention'd the Government of that Kingdom to have been put into the Hands of the Earl of Orrery, the Earl of Montrath, and Sir Maurice Eustace, as Lords Justices; of whom, the two Earls had signaliz'd their Zeal to the Good Old Cause, as they call'd it, under the Rump and Cromwel.

We have hinted something of the Debate before the King and Council concerning the Irish forfeited Lands. Sir Nicholas Plunket, then mention'd, was a Knight of the Pope's making. His Reasons against the Settlement of these Lands on the Purchasers, Officers, and Soldiers, were answer'd with great Solidity at the Council-Table in Ireland by the Lord Santry, Lord Chief Justice of Ireland; who, when the Parliament met at Dublin, was confin'd for a Day or two in the Castle of Dublin, at the Motion of the Earl of Orrery, for insisting on his Right to be Speaker of the House of Lords, in Opposition to the Primate, the Archbishop of Armagh, nominated by the Lords Justices. Had the Lord Santry's Advice been taken, 'twas thought few of the Irish Rebels wou'd have got their Estates. But the Duke of Ormond and Earl of Anglesea, great Proprietors in Ireland, falling in with the Court-Party, the Lord Santry's Advice to leave the Popish Claimants to be try'd at Common-Law, was set aside, and a Court of Claims erected, compos'd of Members entirely devoted to the Pleasure of the King and his Ministers.

The Lords Justices having receiv'd a Commission for calling a Parliament, just when it was about to be read, and the two Houses were got together in order to obey it, 'twas found to have no Date; so the Lords Justices were forc'd to send an Express to England for a New Commission, and some Pretence was contriv'd to put off the Opening of the Session till that Commission arriv'd, which was within six Days.

But the great Disputes in this Assembly about the Variety of Interests, made it necessary to send over a Lord Lieutenant, who was a Person of Character sufficient to have Weight of his own in the Balance of those Disputes; and the Privy-Council in England were for the Lord Roberts, a Person whose Indifferency, as to the various and opposite Interests of that Kingdom, might produce an impartial Settlement, he being an English-man, and no Proprietor in Ireland: But the Duke of York so work'd the Matter with his Brother, that the Duke of Ormond was sent thither as Lord Lieutenant; in whom however the Papists, contrary to the Expectation of the Court, were disappointed. For though he was plac'd at the Helm, in Kindness to the Irish, yet he so signally espous'd the Interest of the English Protestants in all their just and legal Demands, that he lost the Favour of the Duke of York.

The Irish found Means to get several Commissioners of the Court of Claims set aside, and others put in, exactly calculated for their present Design. The Chief of them was one Rainsford, who drove so furiously, that Complaints were made to the King. Talbot, afterwards Earl of Tyrconnel, was the Irish Agent at Court, the Duke's Favourite, and not much less the King's. He often procur'd Letters of Recommendation of Causes in the Court of Claims, by which, and other unwar-

Irish Rerantable Artifices, many of the Irish Rebels had their Estates restor'd to them, and many pass'd their Claims for twice as much Land as they had lost, states, and more than they had.

It was believ'd, that upon the King's Restoration, there cou'd not have been the twentieth Part of Ireland gain'd from the English, yet what with the Thirds taken from them at one Blow, and by Nominees, and other State Stratagems, there was almost half of the Kingdom in Value lost, notwithstanding at the same Time, the most Innocent of the Irish were depriv'd of their Estates, of the and the greatest Rebels got more than their own. Court of This, says my Author, was the first Step advanc'd Claims. for the Introduction of Popery into that Kingdom, and notwithstanding the small Progress it had then seemingly made, it so far encourag'd, even in this Time of its Infancy, the most considera-

A.D. 1668 ble of the Irish, as often to intimate to the English, that in a short Time the Protestants and they must be of one Religion.

Papery promoted.

The Earl of Orrery, upon the coming over of the Duke of Ormond, as Lord Lieutenant, retir'd to Charleville, where he kept his Court, as President of Munster, and among other good Acts of Government, he took due Care of the Church, not in Echara's, or the Compleat Historian's Way, by providing profusely for the Avarice or Extravagance of Ecclesiasticks, but by being careful that the Ecclesiasticks shou'd do their Duty. He particularly sent for Sing, Bishop of Cork, and admonish'd him to send Clergy-men into the Western Parts of his Diocese, where were a great Number of Protestants but no Ministers, the Bishop keeping the Revenues of those Livings in his own Hands, as fine Cures. Bishop Sing told my Lord, he was very willing to do as he commanded, but he wanted Clergy-men. Then, says the Earl, you will do well to employ the Revenues of the fine Cures, in the Education and Maintenance of young Men in the College for that Purpose; and if you do not, I will sequester those Livings for the Maintenance and Education of such young Men as may be fit for the Ministry. The Bishop promis'd to obey the Lord President's Injunctions, and some Time after, six young Ministers were sent into those Parts. The Duke of Ormond had not been long in Ireland before there was a Rumour of a Plot. The Author of the Earl of Orrery's Memoirs will have it, that his Lordship discover'd it by his Spies in his Province of Munster, and that the Chief of the Conspiracy was Col. Jephson, a considerable Officer in the same Service with himself, and Coote, Earl of Montrath. He was to have surpriz'd the Castle and Government of Dublin, by the Help of the Soldiers who were disaffected on account of the Wrongs done them in the forfeited Estates. Indeed, so many Men who had deserv'd well of the Protestant Cause, were in danger of being ruin'd by the unjust Proceedings of the Court of Claims; that it is more than probable, they did express much Resentment, and in Times of Plot making, 'twas easy to work up a Conspiracy out of a very small Ferment. Several Members of Parliament in Ireland, as Mr. Staples, Mr. Shapcot, being accus'd of Intelligence with the Conspirators, were call'd to the Bar of the House of Commons, and expell'd for ever; which 'tis likely wou'd not have been thought sufficient Punishment, if the Government had really had sufficient Proof against them. Some under Plotters were however hang'd: A quick Way of determining Matters since the Year 1660.

Scotland.

We left the Affairs of Scotland immediately after Mr. Guthrie the Minister was executed, and shall take them up there again out of our Author, who seems to be well acquainted with the Scottish History.

Scot.

Having now tasted Blood, says he, their Fury seem'd to encrease, and in consequence of the Act for restoring Prelacy, they advanc'd such Principles as they knew were directly contrary to the Presbyterian Doctrine, and such as they knew no Bonds, no Affliction, no not Death it self wou'd ever bring the Kirk to comply with. These were,

1. "A Declaration in the Preamble to the Act for establishing Episcopacy, signifying, that the Disposal of the Government of the Church is
2. "in the King, as an inherent Right of the Crown, Depriving the Church of the Freedom of calling and choosing their own Pastors. This was
3. "included in the Act for restoring Patronages, dispossessing the Ministers who wou'd not conform to Episcopacy, and this without legal Prosecution, by a meer Act of Council. A.D. 1662

These tyrannical Proceedings were owing to the Measures concerted by the Earl of Middleton and Archbishop Sharp. Lauderdale, who liv'd at Court, declar'd at first against them, and gave a Charge in Writing against Middleton, when he came to Court, for several Articles of Male-Administration; but Skeldon, and even Monk supported Middleton, yet the Earl of Lauderdale got the King's Ear, and Sharp coming to London to vindicate Middleton's Conduct, finding the King was alienated from Middleton, he made great Submission to Lauderdale, who reproaching Bishop Burnet for his Engagements with Middleton, Sharp denied all, particularly that he had written to the King in Middleton's Favour; but the King Sharp's had given the original Letter to Lauderdale, who upon Sharp's solemn Denial of it, shew'd it him; with which Bishop Burnet tells us, he was so struck, that he fell a crying in a most abject Manner. This was not very long after he was consecrated; and this Man, who made no Scruple of telling, and even swearing Things which he knew to be false, is Echara's Champion for the Church. His Morals were a Scandal to the Name of Religion; but such Scandals are no thing to some Men if they are varnish'd over with a glaring Zeal for Forms, Dignities, Revenues and Power. Lauderdale promising to be a better Friend to the Church than Middleton had been, Sharp forsook his Patron at once, and deliver'd himself up to the Earl of Lauderdale, the King's Buffoon, and the Caterer of his libidinous Pleasures, infomuch that 'tis said, he shou'd say to the King in his Jollity, Wounot your most sacred Majesty please to have a Wbear to Nit? And his Ministry was so acceptable to his Majesty, that Secretary Morrice was, at his Instigation, sent with an Order to Middleton to deliver his Commission, and he was turn'd out of all. The Earl of Rorbes was declar'd the King's Commissioner, but Lauderdale would not trust him, so he went with him to Scotland, where the Parliament met again, and condemn'd the Lord Waristoun, Uncle to Bishop Burnet, for siding with Cromwel. He had escap'd beyond Sea after the Restoration, but was deliver'd up by those he confided in, and put to Death without Mercy, notwithstanding his great Age, Warlike and great Interest among the Presbyterians, who almost idoliz'd him. He well deserv'd their utmost Esteem and Respect, being a Gentleman of great Parts and Piety, and of an unalterable Affection to the Common-wealth. He spoke long before the Parliament, but his Speech was broken and disorder'd, occasion'd by his Age and Infirmities, and not affected, to raise Pity, as his Enemies fancied. When the Day of his Execution came, he was very serene, cheerful, and fully satisfy'd with his Death. He read a Speech twice over on the Scaffold, all which he compos'd himself. In it he justify'd all the Proceedings in the Covenant, and asserted his own Sincerity, but condemn'd his joining with Cromwel, tho' even in that, his Intentions had been sincere. The King was particularly set against him, and his Virtue, Constancy, Capacity and Popularity, are Things which cou'd not but render him criminal beyond Pardon to such a Prince as we write of. What adds to the Merit of this good Man's Memory, is, that he was Father of the excellent and worthy Mr. Secretary Johnston, whose Services to the Publick, in and after the Revolution, will be a considerable Part of the History of those Times, if he shall think fit to make them known under their proper Name. This Parliament pass'd an Act, something like the

Five

A.D. 1668 Five Mile Act in England; and another, offering an Army of 20,000 Foot, and 2000 Horse to the King, to be ready upon Summons, with Forty Days Provision. When the Session broke up, the two Earls, Rothes and Lauderdale, return'd to London, the Government in Scotland being left to the Earl of Glencairne, Lord Chancellor, who oppos'd Sharp's driving so furiously as he did, not out of Love to the Presbyterians, but out of Pique against Rothes, who supported Sharp, and was recommended by that imperious Priest to the Bishops in England. Sharp follow'd to London, to complain of Glencairne, and the Privy-Council, who giving a little Check only to his Rage, he said, There was such a Remissness, that unless some more Spirit was put in the Administration, it wou'd be impossible to preserve the Church. That was the Word, says the Bishop of Salisbury, always us'd, as if there had been a Charm in it, and as such Echard uses it, so does the Complete Historian, and so has it been us'd in and out of Convocation by all those that claim the Merit of being the only good Church Men. Sharp's chief Business was to get a High Commission Court set up in Scotland, and an Order that he shou'd sit above the Lord Chancellor: Lauderdale gave into it, Bishop Burnet tells us, much against his own Mind; and that tho' then very young, he expostulated with him upon it, and adds he, I thought he was acting the Earl of Traquair's Part, giving way to all the Follies of the Bishops, on Design to ruin them. The Modesty of Sharp was equal to his Honesty, for the Earl of Glencairne dying about this Time, he wrote to Skeldon, his Brother Archbishop, that upon the Disposal of the Seals, the very Being of the Church did so absolutely depend, that he begg'd he wou'd press the King very earnestly in the Matter, and procure his being sent for to Court, before that Post shou'd be fill'd up. Skeldon fail'd not to speak to the King, who had a very ill Opinion of Sharp, and bid him tell him, he wou'd take Care about it, and that he need not come up to London. Notwithstanding this Check, away comes the Archbishop, and was receiv'd very coldly by his Majesty, who ask'd him, If he had not receiv'd the Archbishop of Canterbury's Letter; Yes, reply'd Sharp; but I chose rather to venture on your Majesty's Displeasure, than to see the Church ruin'd. The Charm again! What follows, shews this Prelate to be one of the most deceitful Wretches that ever was a Disgrace to History. He told the King, "He cou'd not answer it to God and the Church, if he did not bestir himself. He knew many thought of himself for that Post, but he was so far from that Thought, that if his Majesty had any such Intention, he would rather choose to be sent to a Plantation; he only desir'd it might be a Church Man. From the King he went to Skeldon, and press'd him to move the King for himself, and furnish'd him with many Reasons to support his Motion. Skeldon doing it with more than ordinary Earnestness, the King ask'd him whether Sharp had not set him on; Skeldon own'd it, tho' not without some Uneasiness, and then the King told him what Sharp had said to himself of his choosing rather to be sent to a Plantation; and then it may be easily imagin'd, continues Bishop Burnet, in what a Stile they both spoke of him." The Earl of Rothes had the Seals given to him, till some other Chancellor cou'd be pitch'd upon; and it being a Proposal of Sharp's, after his own Disappointment, when he return'd to Scotland, a dreadful Scene of illegal Violence was open'd. Sharp govern'd Lord Rothes, who abandon'd himself to Pleasure; and when some censur'd him for it, all the Answer he made was a severe Piece of Raillery, That he who was the King's Commissioner, ought to represent his Person. Sharp's Creatures made work for the new High Commission Court, and brought daily Offenders before it, to be punish'd by Fines, Whippings, Jails, and other inhumane Severities, for not coming to Church to hear Curates, whose Morals they abhorr'd, and whose Ignorance they despis'd. This Cruelty and Injustice rag'd towards the West of Scotland, where the Country was ever now and then swept of Conventiclers, to fill the Prisons. The Lawyers standing too much on Forms of Law in these Prosecutions, Sharp often complain'd that Favour was shewn to the Enemies of the Church, and often did he cry, must the Church be ruin'd for Punctilio's of Law? The Earls of Argyle, Tweeddale and Kincardin were cold in these Matters, upon which Sharp said, they were Friends to the Church's Enemies.

Sir James Turner was order'd to quarter the Guards thro' the Country, where the Ministers had forsaken their Pulpits, and the People flock'd to hear them pray and preach in other Places: He was commanded to take Orders from the Archbishop of Glasgow, and being mad when he was drunk, which was very often, he liv'd as if he had been upon Military Executions. He confest to Bishop Burnet, it went sometimes against the Grain with him to serve such a debauch'd and worthless Company, as the Clergy generally were; and that he often did not act up to the Rigour of his Orders, for which he was always chid by Sharp, but never for his illegal and violent Proceedings. And tho' the Complaints of him were very high, so that when he was afterwards seiz'd on at Dumfries, it was intended to make a Sacrifice of him; yet when the Covenanters look'd into his Orders, and found that his Proceedings, how fierce soever, fell short of these, they spar'd him, as a Man who had merited by being so gentle among them. Some time after Sharp went to London again, and accus'd Lord Lauderdale as a Favourer of Fanaticks; so did this wicked Renegade call the Party, for which he had formerly been a zealous Agent. Lauderdale desir'd that Sharp might put his Charge in Writing; the King consented to it, and that he shou'd demand it of Sharp, which he did in so severe a Tone, that Sharp fell a trembling, and retracted what he had said to the King, who presently accus'd the Earl of Lauderdale of ill Nature, to press it so heavily on Archbishop Sharp, and force him upon giving himself the Lye in such coarse Terms. This Sharp is Skeldon's Fellow Labourer.

In October, after the Fire of London, Turner was commanded to renew his Hostilities in the West of Scotland. The People were alarm'd, and saw they were to be undone: Upon which they met together, and some Ministers came among them. Two Gentlemen who had serv'd in the Wars, Lieutenant Colonel Wallace, and Major Lairmonth, were the best Officers they had. The chief Gentlemen of that Country had been thrown into Prison, under Pretence of a Dutch Invasion; so the Multitude had no body to head them of more Note than Wallace and Lairmonth. They were told that all things were in such Confusion after London was burnt, that a vigorous Attempt might be their Deliverance; and truly the Provocations they had met with were intolerable; for besides the Laws before-mention'd, these impious and barbarous Edicts had pass'd by Procurement chiefly of Middleton and Sharp, two wicked Renegades.

" 2. An Act prohibiting any Ministers to preach in Churches publickly, or privately in Families, without Licence first had from the Episcopal Ministers call'd Curates, and forbidding all House-Meetings for religious Exercises.

Tyrannical Government.

" 3. An Act declaring that all Nonconforming Ministers that shall presume to exercise Ministry in any Manner whatsoever, shall be punished as seditious Persons, and ordaining Penalties to all that shou'd withdraw from the publick Worship; every Nobleman, Gentleman or Heritor one Fourth of his yearly Revenue; every Teoman one Fourth of his moveable Goods; every Burgeſs the Loſs of his Freedom, leaving it also to the Council to inflict further Punishment, and to provide for the most effectual Execution, which they did by Proclamations of the most Arbitrary, Illegal and Tyrannical Nature. The High Commission Court determin'd Causes without Appeal, where that Perjur'd Apostate Sharp, or his Creatures presided. They suspended, depriv'd, excommunicated, imprisoned, condemn'd and tortur'd at Pleasure. A Minister was sentenc'd to Banishment for calling that Lordly Prelate Sir, and not My Lord. One Mr. Porterfield, a Gentleman of a Loyal Family, was banish'd for scrupling the Oath of Supremacy. Mr. John Levinſton, an eminent Reverend Minister, being banish'd the Kingdom for the same Scruple, Scot, a lewd Curate, at that Time under Excommunication, had his Benefice given him, and the Parishioners hating him, as an immoral, scandalous Person, four of them were brought before the High Commission for being present when some others of the Parish had express'd their Dissatisfaction at Scot's coming to their Kirk, for which this detestable Sentence was pronounc'd against them, That they shou'd be scourg'd thro' the Town, stigmatiz'd on the Forehead with the Letter T at Edinburgh Croſs, and sent Slaves to Barbados.

Cruelty.

I cou'd fill Volumes with Instances of the like Injustice and Cruelty exercis'd against the Protestants in Scotland; and is it a Wonder that People, who every Day lay expos'd to the Rage and Barbarity of bloody-minded Mercenaries, worse if possible than French Dragoons, had rather die with Arms in their Hands, than be starv'd or tortur'd to Death, as was the Fate of those that stay'd and those that fled?

1666.

" If the poor People, says my Scotch Author, were by those insupportable Violences made desperate, and driven to all the Extremities of a wild Despair, who can justly reflect upon them? when they read in the Word of God, That Oppression makes a wise Man mad: And therefore, were there no other Original of the Insurrection, known by the Name of the Rising of Pentland, it was nothing but what the intolerable Oppressions of those Times might have justify'd to all the World; Nature having dictated to all People a Right of Self-Defence, when illegally and arbitrarily attack'd in a Manner not justifiable either by the Laws of God, or the Laws of the Country.

" But besides all this it is evident, that this Insurrection was no premeditated Design, but began in the Violence of Military Execution, committed by four Soldiers commanded by Sir James Turner, who falling into some Houses in Galloway without Commission, or without " Orders from their own Officers, as Sir James Turner A.D. 1668 afterwards alledg'd, were oppos'd and driven out of their Doors by four or five honest Men of the Inhabitants, in the just Defence of their Wives, Children and Goods, unjustly insulted, and offer'd to be plunder'd by those Soldiers.

We have seen that the Rising of Pentland was a rash Action on a sudden, without Concert even with the Scots at fifty Miles Distance; yet Eckhard, I desire the Reader to measure the Man's Conscience and Capacity by this Instance, asserts with a surprizing Confidence, that this Insurrection was not on a sudden, but fram'd and rais'd by the Presbyterians in Scotland, in Concert with the Presbyterians in England, who, says he, were thought to have held too near a Correspondence with them. The Compleat Historian is no fairer in his Account of this Rising than Mr Archdeacon. They by Degrees form'd an Army, and then with an Insolence which they were taught by the Stinging Acts, the Ministers are put at the Head of them. Most of the Leaders of these Troops were cashier'd Preachers. Let us now read the true History of this Presbyterian Army. Mem. Ch. Scot. 160.

Sir James Turner was an Officer of Dragoons, who by Order of the Council was sent with his Troops to quarter at Discretion upon the poor Western People of Scotland, because there they found the chief Body of the constant Sufferers for, and Adherers to the true Religion. Turner was a Tool to their Minds, a Stranger to the Country, being an Englishman, bred to Plunder and Rapine in the Service of the French, perfectly void of the Fear of God or Man, and unacquainted either with Religion or Humanity. He had made three Invasions into the West of Scotland, where his Exactions and Cruelty had been such as had almost stripp'd the Country, not of its Substance only, but of its Inhabitants, who were oblig'd to quit their Habitations to avoid the Fury and Brutality of the Soldiers. 'Tis impossible to give the Detail of the Cruelties and inhumane Usage the miserable People met with from this Butcher, sent among them by Sharp. They had patiently suffer'd the merciless Treatment this Man shew'd them many Months, and thereby testify'd more Passive Obedience than most of those who have since upbraided them with Resistance can pretend to, when Sir James Turner put an End to their Patience by the following Occasion. Sir James Turner's Character.

On the 13th of November, 1666, he sent four Soldiers from Dumfries, where he quarter'd, to a Town call'd Dalray, in the Shire of Galloway, with Orders to seize upon a poor Man's Goods, who, he pretended, had broken the Laws by not coming to his Parish-Church; and if he had no Goods, to take the Man, and bring him Prisoner to Dumfries. The Soldiers, as Turner alledg'd afterwards, went beyond their Instructions, in seizing not only his Goods, but his Person, and binding the old Man Hand and Foot, brought him out like a Beast, and laid him on the Ground while they rifled the House. The Neighbours mov'd with Compassion at the Indignity of this Treatment, and at seeing a poor antient Man lying on the Ground, bound like a Sheep to be carry'd away to the Slaughter, came to the Soldiers, and calmly entreated them to unbind him, and let him go like a Prisoner, and like a Man, not like a Beast. The Soldiers pretended to be affronted at this Motion, fell immediately upon the People with their Swords, and wounded two or three of them; which so enrag'd the rest, that they attack'd the Soldiers, wounded one, and the rest throwing down their Arms, begg'd Quarter.

A.D. 1668 This Breach, tho' purely accidental, and by an unforeseen Provocation, being begun, the Compleat Historian affirms 'twas a fram'd Design; Eckard, that it was in Correspondence with the English Presbyterians. The Soldiers vow'd Revenge, and preparing to fall upon the whole neighbouring Country, drove the innocent People to the Necessity of gathering together, and standing upon their own Defence; so that when ten or twelve Soldiers return'd with their bloody Resolution of Plunder and Desolation, they were disarm'd and made Prisoners. Upon which some Troops were sent on the same Errand, who found the People too strong to be attack'd; upon which the Cry was presently, A REBELLION, and they sent for more Forces to destroy them. This naturally excited others to run in to the Aid of their Brethren; all which was purely casual; till finding themselves reduc'd by this last Gathering to a Circumstance, that Stay or Go would be fatal to them; if they fell into the Hands of a cruel Government, they saw no Remedy but to stand to it; and inviting all the injur'd and oppress'd People to join with them, they declar'd For Liberty and the Kirk of Scotland. They then enter'd Dumfries and seiz'd Sir James Turner their Persecutor. Thence they march'd to Kirkenbright, Ayr, and so to Lanerick, where they solemnly renew'd the Covenant, and resolv'd to seal it with their Blood. From Lanerick they advanc'd towards Edinburgh, where they arriv'd to the Number of about 2000 on the 17th of November; but being not strong enough to attack the City, they posted themselves on the South-West, at the Foot of Pentland Hills, waiting for the Conjunction of other Friends. They carry'd Sir James Turner Prisoner along with them, intending to make an Exchange of him for others of the Covenanters that might fall into the Enemies Hands, and they us'd him very civilly, as he himself confess'd.

The Governor of Carlisle sent the first Express of this Commotion to Court, and another from Sharp follow'd it two Days after. It is not easily to be imagin'd into what Consternation it threw that insolent Prelate and his Instruments; nor were the Court of England without those Fears, which are soon mov'd in the Minds of those who have done wrong. Bishop Burnet informs us, Sharp was in a terrible Fright, and his Observation confirms it, That Cruelty and Cowardice go together: He mov'd that the Privy-Council might shut themselves up in Edinburgh Castle; but the rest of the Board were alarm'd of his cowardly Council, saying, it was to abandon the Town, and betray an unbecoming Fear. Dalzeel, who had learnt his good Manners and good Nature among the Russians, whom he had serv'd, was sent against the Covenanters with all the Forces that cou'd be got together. He publish'd a Proclamation of Pardon to all who shou'd return Home in 24 Hours, which reduc'd the Covenanters from 2000 to 800; the major Part of them losing Heart when they saw no body of Note come to them out of Edinburgh, and but very few Citizens or People from any other Parts of the Kingdom. The chief Noblemen, as Duke Hamilton, the Earls of Arbol and Airly, pursu'd the Inspirations of Sharp, and put themselves and their Vassals in Arms against the Covenanters. The Earl of Argyle, who had been restor'd in Blood and Estate, rais'd 1500 Men, but Sharp was afraid to trust them, and acting as chief Conductor of the War, sent him no Orders to march; so he was at a vast Charge to levy and maintain his Men to no Purpose. But this Charge, vast as it was, bore no Comparison with the Expence that noble Lord and his Father had been at for the Service of King Charles II. in whose Reign they were both condemn'd to die, after they had expended 40,000 Pounds Sterling to serve him, which he promis'd to repay, but never did, and made no other Acknowledgments for it than the Tragical Ones just mention'd. On the 28th of November, during a Cessation proclaim'd for 24 Hours, to give the Whigs (so the Covenanters were at this Time first stil'd) Opportunity to retire, Dalzeel surpriz'd and attack'd them, and after a very bold Resistance they were at length over-power'd and broken. About 50 were kill'd in the Place, 80 were taken Prisoners, and the rest sav'd themselves by Flight. The King's Forces did not pursue them very vigorously; besides, being weary with long Marches, they had no great Affection to the Service; for, says the Bishop of Salisbury, the Covenanters were a poor harmless Company of Men become mad by Oppression. Not above five of the King's Soldiers were slain; and now had the persecuting Scots Prelates a Triumph, which cou'd not but be inexpressibly grateful to them, as giving them an Opportunity to have their Fill of Blood. Bishop Burnet tells us, the Archbishops of St. Andrew's and Glasgow inflam'd the Lord Rothes, who came down from London full of Rage, and provok'd him to proceed against the Prisoners with the utmost Severity. Glasgow, not Leighton, advis'd him to hang up all who wou'd not renounce the Covenant. The best of the Episcopal Clergy set upon the Bishops to lay hold upon this Opportunity to recover the Affections of the People by interceding for the Prisoners: But Sharp wou'd not be mollify'd. It was a moving Sight, continues his Lordship, to see ten of them hang'd upon one Gibbet at Edinburgh. Thirty-five more were sent to their Countries, and hang'd up before their own Doors, the Episcopal Clergy all the while using them hardly, and declaring them Damn'd for their Rebellion. They might have all sav'd their Lives, if they wou'd have renounc'd the Covenant. So they were really a sort of Martyrs for it. They did all at their Death give their Testimony, according to their Phrase, to it, and they express'd great Joy in their Sufferings. Sharp publish'd a Proclamation prohibiting the Concealing any of those who fled, under Penalty of High Treason, naming the following Ministers in particular; Mr. John Welch, Mr. James Smith, Mr. John Cunningham, Mr. Gabriel Semple, Mr. Alexander Peddin, Mr. William Veach, Mr. John Crookshanks, Mr. Gabriel Maxwell, Mr. John Carstairs, Mr. John Guthrie. The latter was conceal'd in the House of Bishop Burnet's Mother, a zealous Covenanter, Sister to the Lord Warriston. Mr. Maccail, a young Minister, who had been with the Covenanters at Pentland Hill, was put to the Torture of the Boot, and for all the Pains of the Rack dy'd in this Rapture of Joy, Farewel Sun, Moon, and Stars; Farewel Kindred and Friends; Farewel World and Time; Farewel weak and frail Body. Welcome Eternity; Welcome Angels and Saints; Welcome Saviour of the World; and Welcome God the Judge of all; which, says Bishop Burnet, he spoke with "a Voice and Manner that struck all who heard it."

Were the Compleat Historians sensible of the Pathetick and Sublime in Eloquence, they wou'd own there is nothing like it in whatever they have seen of Antiquity; and it being a suffering Minister's dying Words, adds a Truth to the Beauty, which cannot be met with in prophane Learning. This is one of the Covenant Martyrs, which the Scots Curates gave over to Damnation. Tho' I doubt not every good Christian, after reading the Divine Exultation of Mr. Maccail, will be

A.D. 1668 ready to say to them, Be my Portion with this good Man, and take ye your Lot with one another.

We must now return to the Affairs of England, which are our Principal Subject; and we treat of Scotland and Ireland only as they have Relation to them.

Triple-League.

The Archdeacon, and most of our Historiographers, speak of the King's entering into a League with Holland and Sweden for the Preservation of the Netherlands, as one of the most Politick Acts of this Politick Reign; and it was certainly grounded on the best Reason that right Judgment could lead Ministers into. England, Holland, and Sweden, being the only Powers who were willing or able to have put a Stop to the French King's Conquests, if the King and his Chief Ministers had been as much in earnest as were the People. But King Charles had no Pretence left him to ask Money of Parliament, to whom a very slight Pretence would have been sufficient. He had made an inglorious War and Peace, after an Expence of many Millions of Money. He knew the English Nation was very jealous of the French Acquisitions in Flanders, which they justly look'd on as a Barrier to England; and any Measures taken to preserve it from falling into French Hands, would be very popular, and extremely acceptable to the States-General; so he order'd Sir William Temple, his Envoy at Brussels, to repair to the Hague in the Beginning of January, and conclude a Treaty with the United Provinces; which was perfected and sign'd a few Days after his Arrival, to the great Joy of the two Nations. The Purport of it was, to oblige France by Mediation or Force to stop the further Progress of her Army in the Spanish Netherlands; and Sweden entering into this Alliance soon after the Conclusion of it, 'twas call'd the Triple-League. But the Dutch only were sincere in it; and Lewis XIV. knew the King of England's Inclination and Religion too well to be alarm'd at it. All the Ministers of the three Allies, who had the Conduct of this Treaty, were in the French Interest, as well in Holland, as in England and Sweden, Sir William Temple only excepted, who was as hearty in it as he was diligent. The French King knowing that whatever Publick Alliances the English and Dutch Ministers might conclude, they were still at his Devotion, seem'd to take little Notice of the Conclusion of this; the League being all Grimace in those that were to execute it. For tho' the Pensionary De Wit told the Count D'Estrades, his Ambassador at the Hague, The States are of Necessity to endeavour for such Securities and Alliances as may shelter them from his Majesty's great Power; yet he remain'd as much attach'd to the French King's Interest as ever, out of Fear of the Prince of Orange's Party, who, with the Prince, had been extremely ill us'd by him; and he thought he cou'd not have a better Support against both than the French King. Before the Triple-League was perfected, the Count de Lionne, Secretary of State in France, wrote thus to D'Estrades, which shews sufficiently that his Master was in no manner of Pain about an Alliance concluded by Potentates whose Ministers he had made sure of. Live merrily whatever you see happen, be under no Concern about the Triple-League. He knows what he says, and on what Foundation; and D'Estrades cou'd not help saying, It will all vanish in Smoke, and the King my Master will but laugh at it. The French Faction in England talk'd after the same Rate. Sir Thomas Clifford whisper'd a Gentleman in some Company where this League was highly extoll'd, Well, for all this Noise, we must yet have another War with the Dutch before it be long. This Treaty being little less than Felonious on the Part of England and Sweden, it is not worth dwelling upon, or one might very much enlarge on it out of Sir William Temple's Memoirs and Letters. A.D. 1668

The Irruption of Lewis XIV. into the Spanish Netherlands, very much facilitated the Peace, which was now concluded between Spain and Portugal; the Earl of Sandwich, the King of England's Ambassador, acting as a Mediator; which proves that it was no very difficult Negotiation.

On the 10th of February the Parliament met, Parliament and his Majesty made a Speech to them, wherein he mention'd the Triple-League, and wish'd them to think seriously of some Course to beget a better Understanding and Composure in the Minds of his Protestant Subjects, in Matters of Religion; whereby they may be induc'd not only to submit quietly to the Government, but also cheerfully give their Assistance for the Support of it. These Sentiments put in Exercise in the beginning of his Reign, would have prevented the mischievous Consequences of the Lord Clarendon's Stringing Acts. The House of Commons order'd a Committee to enquire into the late Miscarriages at Sea, and at Chatham, and expell'd Mr. Brouncker, before-mention'd, for giving the Orders for slackening Sail. They impeach'd Sir Peter Pett, and Sir William Penn, Commissioners in his Majesty's Yards, for Irregularities and Embezzlements. These Impeachments serving only to retard Business, says Eckhard, by which he means giving of Money, were never compleated so as to answer the Ends of them: For as yet this Assembly is too full of Pensioners to compleat any thing that the Court does not relish. He then tells us, they had some other Business besides giving Money, and notwithstanding it is but a Year or two before this Parliament will, by a Publick Act, declare that they are sensible of the Growth of Popery, from the Disunion among Protestants, yet does this ingenious Historian assure us now, That the House of Commons were still of the Earl of Clarendon's Judgment; that Popery had its Growth under Cover of indulging Protestant Dissenters; tho', in truth, while those Dissenters were most cruelly persecuted, the Papists were most tenderly indulg'd. But this Assembly had still a Majority of the same Judgment with Sir John Duncomb, Sir John Robinson, Sir Courtney Pool, Sir Job Charlton, &c. which Four only had among them 5500 Pounds yearly in Pensions, as will be further made appear in the Sequel. As yet Sheldon, Morley, and the persecuting Prelates, had an Influence upon them; and they must undergo still more Calamities before their Eyes will be open to see the Beauty of Charity and Moderation. They shew'd their Wisdoms in taking this Way to compose the Minds of the King's Protestant Subjects, the presenting an Address against the Meetings of Nonconformists; they cou'd not well help joining the Papists too, and a Proclamation was issu'd accordingly.

In this Session of Parliament a Difference hap-
pen'd between the Two Houses, in the Case of Two Houses differ in Skinner's Case. Mr. Thomas Skinner, a Merchant of London; who having receiv'd great Damages from the East-India Company, had brought the Matter by Petition into the House of Lords originally, and was reliev'd in 5000 Pounds Costs. This the Commons Voted to be not agreeable to the Laws of the Land, and that Thomas Skinner, in procuring Judgment, with Directions, to be serv'd upon the Governor of the East-India Company, being a Member of the House, is guilty of a Breach of Privilege, and they order'd him to be taken into Custody of their Serjeant at Arms. This occasion'd

A.D. 1668 sion'd several Conferences. The Lords Voted the Petition of the East-India Company to the Commons to be Scandalous; the Commons Voted it to be not Scandalous, and sent a Message to the Peers, that for promoting a fair Union between the Two Houses, all further Proceedings be forborn upon the Sentence in the Case of Skinner; and that Sir Andrew Riccard, Sir Samuel Barnardiston, Mr. Rowland Gwynne, and Mr. Christopher Boone be set at Liberty; and Resolv'd, that whoever shall be aiding and assisting in putting in Execution the Sentence of the Lords, in the Case of Skinner, against the East-India Company, shall be deem'd a Betrayer of the Rights and Liberties of the Commons, &c. On the same Day that they pass'd this Vote, May the 8th, the King sent for them to the House of Peers, and pass'd an Act for raising 301,000 Pounds by an Impost on Wines, and three or four Acts more. Coke tells us, the Parliament gave an additional Duty of eight Pounds a Ton on French Wines, and Twelve Pounds a Ton on Spanish Wines, for eight Years, which amounted to 560,000 Pounds; also an Act for Sale of the Fee-Farm Rents, to the Value of 1,300,000 Pounds, which enabled him to stay almost a Year and half without a Session. The Parliament was then adjourn'd to the 11th of August, but it was then prorog'd, and again after that; so they met not again till the 19th of October in the following Year.

When the Contest was on foot between the Lords and Commons in the Case of Skinner, the Lord Hollis wrote a Pamphlet on the Side of the House of Peers, in which he seem'd to outdo the highest who had ever written for the Privileges of the House of Lords; which was the more taken Notice of, because it was the Reverse of his Opinion when he was a Member of the House of Commons. For Ludlow says, "He so far despis'd the Privileges of the Lords, that at a Conference between the Two Houses, in which the Peers shew'd themselves unwilling to comply with the Commons, he said openly, If they persist to refuse their Concurrence, the Commons will do the Thing without them. One of the Members of the House of Commons answer'd Lord Hollis's Pamphlet with such Force and Sharpness, that upon Debate, the Commons came to three Resolutions to this Effect: That divers Things affirm'd in his Book are false and scandalous: That from this Time the Lords shall never originally intermeddle with the Cause of any Commoner; and that what the Lords have done in the Business of Skinner, shall be raz'd out of their Books. Which Votes being carry'd to the Lords for their Approbation, they return'd for Answer, they would shortly send them a Bill touching that Matter.

A Tumult. The History is very thin of Business all this Reign, unless in Prosecution of Protestant Dissenters, and making Plots, and hanging Plotters. But the chief Plot-maker, the Earl of Clarendon, being in Exile again, other Work is found out for the Executioner. A Rabble of lewd Fellows, not lewder however than their Betters, assembled the 25th of March in a tumultuous Manner, it being in Easter Holidays. They broke open several Prisons, and demolish'd the Houses of some Persons who had given them Offence; but the Guards coming, dispers'd them. Several of the Rioters were taken, and this Government knew well what to do with their Prisoners: Four of them were hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd at Tyburn.

The French King having not yet prepar'd Matters for carrying on a War in the Netherlands, himself march'd another Way at the Head of an Army of 40,000 Men, and over-ran the Franche

Compte and Burgundy, for two excellent Reasons, to forward the Peace with Spain, and to secure himself against any Army the Emperor might raise and send into Burgundy. England and Holland were very active in procuring a Peace between France and Spain; Aix la Chapelle was appointed for the Place of Treaty. Sir William Temple was the English Minister; and the Necessity of the Affairs of Spain was such, that she was forc'd to part with Charleroy, Binch, Aeth, Doway, Fort de Scarpe, Tournay, Oudenarde, Liste, Armentiers, Courtray, Bergues, and Furnes, with their Dependencies, to France. This was the first good Effect of the Triple-Alliance; instead of making War, to recover those Cities and Territories in the Netherlands, the League joins in giving them up. Spain indeed was not very punctual in payment of the Subsidies promis'd to Sweden. The King of England never intended to make War against France, though not only the Spanish, but the Dutch Netherlands were in Danger; nay, he was so far from any such Intention, that he seem'd more inclin'd to make War against England, by the Assistance of the French King, as appears by D'Estrades's Letter to that King of the 21st of July, 1667, when the Breda Treaty was just concluded. If the King of England will take the same Counsel he did when I was Ambassador there, not to pretend to any thing in Flanders, but to assist your Majesty with all his Power to conquer it, provided you would assist him with 10,000 Foot, and some Horse, one need not mind the States. Echard, after Coke, tells us, that whatever the Spaniards lost, the English got something by the French Ravages; for they drove one Brewer out of Flanders into England, where he taught the English Diers a new Way of dying fine Cloths forty per Cent. cheaper than they could die before; which these two notable Historians tell us only as a Proof of an old Saying, 'Tis a bad Wind, &c. The Archdeacon then informs us, that Sir William Temple thought the Spirit and Vigour of the great Men in England were enervated; as if they had ever been nerved since this King came to the Crown! Then out of his great Zeal to the Earl of Clarendon's Church, he falls foul upon his Successor in the Ministry, the Duke of Buckingham, and his Associate the Earl of Rocheſter, who seem'd capable of corrupting any Court in the World but the Court of England, which was incapable of Corruption, the Measure of whose Vices were as full as the Vial of Vengeance that threaten'd them. He owns, That the Court, following the King's Example, was over-run with Luxury and Extravagance. The Light of Natural Reason led those two Lords into an Opinion that the Cruelty towards Protestant Dissenters was unchristian like, and inhumane, and contrary to the natural Right of Free-born Men. Allow that they did not act from a Principle of Christian Charity, but from meer Humanity and good Nature, those are amiable and laudable Qualities, infinitely preferable to blind Zeal and frantick Bigotry.

The King had express'd his Willingness to have the Minds of the Dissenters compos'd, in his late Speech, and the Duke of Buckingham declaring himself for Liberty, they were conniv'd at in London; which occasion'd the Country Ministers to hold their Meetings as openly as the London Ministers held theirs.

The Compleat Historian, among a thousand weak and malicious Reflections, has this: "It cou'd be no great Credit to the Dissenting Party to have had the Earl of Clarendon their Opposer, and the Duke of Buckingham their Promoter. The first opposing them upon no worse Principle than a Zeal to the establish'd Church,

A.D. 1668 " as the most effectual Bulwark against Popery ;
 " and the other appearing in their Interest upon
 " no better Account than a strong Affection to the " universal Liberty of Opinion and Practice." If this had been the only foolish Reflection in that History, we wou'd have had Pity on it for its Folly, and have left it undisturb'd where we found it ;
 but it is so much against common Sense, that one cou'd not well pass it by. Do People under Oppression refuse Relief, unless it comes from a Principle of Conscience ? Do People in Want enquire if the Hands are clean that relieve them ? But which still is most eligible as a Patron, a Man of wicked Principles, or a Man of no Principles ?
 There is no greater Wickedness than Oppression and Cruelty, and without Principles, a Person may be so well natur'd as to wish well to his Neighbour, and incline to do good for the meer Pleasure of doing it. Read the learned and judicious Dr. Calamy upon this : *I shou'd think, if such Considerations as these are here brought in, the Church will have no great Cause to boast, who was help'd to her strongest Laws against the poor Nonconformists by those who, it appear'd plainly afterwards, were carrying on a Popish Interest :
 And yet, when they suffer'd under those Laws,
 they were willing to accept Relief from any Hand, as knowing that whatever Principle they might be of who appear'd for them, there was too much of an implacable Spirit in such as were against them.*

Compleat History wrong.

Eckard takes much Delight in repeating Sir William Temple's Description of Presbyterian Virtue, 'Tis peaking and formal ; as for peaking, it is no more English in Language than in Sentiment ;
 and as to formal, one may have a very good Conception of it in Sir William's Memoirs, which have as much Form and Affectation as the Memoirs of the most errant Frenchman. Presbyterian Virtue includes Piety, which with these Men renders every thing peaking in Morals.

Comprehension for Dissenters.

About this time Mr. Baxter receiv'd a Letter from Dr. Manton, intimating he had been told by Sir John Baber, that the Lord Keeper Bridgman desir'd to confer with them Two about a Comprehension and Toleration. When those two Divines waited on the Lord Keeper, he told them, he had sent for them to think of a Way for their Restoration ; to which End he had some Proposals to offer them, which were a Comprehension for Presbyterians, and an Indulgence for Independents, and the rest. Mr. Baxter propos'd, that not only the Presbyterians, but the Independents, and all sound Christians, might be taken into the Establishment. The Lord Keeper said, That was a Thing he wou'd not have ; but a Comprehension for the Presbyterians, and an Indulgence for the rest.
 The Lord Keeper's Proposals were much the same as King Charles's Healing Declaration a few Months before the bitter Bartholomew Act, and were drawn up by Bishop Wilkins ; with whom, and Dr. Burton, the Lord Keeper's Chaplain, Mr. Baxter and Dr. Manton had Conference about the Proposals, and some Additions to be made to them, as against Re-ordination, in Case of Comprehension : For Subscription only to the Scriptures, and the Doctrinal Articles of the Church ; for limiting the Power of Bishops, Chancellors, &c. in Suspending and Silencing ; that Meetings for Religious Exercises might not be taken for Conventicles. But these Things wou'd not pass, for which Bishop Wilkins express'd himself sorry. Sir Matthew Hale drew up a Bill to be brought into the House of Commons when the Parliament met, to the Purport of the above-mention'd Proposals. And Bishop Wilkins, a candid, ingenious, open-hearted Man, acquainted Ward, Bishop of Salisbury, the old Republican and Covenanter, with the whole Matter, hoping to have prevail'd for his Concurrence in it ; instead of which, he so bestirr'd himself and all his Friends, and made such a Party against it, as that upon putting it to the Vote, it was carry'd, That no Man shou'd bring an Act of that Nature into the House ; which prevented all farther Motion of it.

A.D. 1668
Hinder'd
by Ward
Bp. of Salisbury.

Dr. Tillotson and Dr. Stillingfleet join'd heartily in this Comprehension Project. All the Earl of Clarendon's Party cry'd out against it, as an Undermining and Betraying of the Church (the Charm again ! ) The Cause of the Church is given up ; 'tis unworthy the Church to treat with Enemies. Bishop Burnet proceeds, The Fears of Popery, and the Progress that Atheism was making, alarm'd good and wise Men (What was this Orthodox Parliament then ? ) And they thought every thing that cou'd be done without Sin, ought to be done towards the Healing our Divisions.

Eckard, who takes care to bring some Falsity into almost every Fact which concerns Protestant Dissenters, assures us, that Dr. Manton, Dr.
 Bates, &c. were a parcel of whistling Fellows.
 If he has taken such Liberty with Divines so infinitely superior to him in all good Qualities, why am I so much upon my guard towards him, on account of his being an Ecclesiastick ? There was nothing of Conscience in all their Pretences.
 Here he usurps the Prerogative of the Omniscient, who can only know the Heart of Man. They had nothing but Tergiversation and Cavils, false to a Prodigy. I have repeated what they had to say, the whole Matter was agreed upon, and the Act for it had been brought into Parliament, if Ward, and other such Ecclesiasticks, had not stir'd up a Party in the House of Commons, who pass'd a Vote against bringing of it in ; A very extraordinary Vote ! says my Lord of Sarum ; and most of the Votes of this Parliament have hitherto been indeed very extraordinary.

However, the King, under the Influence of Ministers who were for Moderation, shew'd an Inclination to favour the Nonconformists, and express'd himself, that an Address from them wou'd be accepted ; which Address met with some Opposition from those Ministers who cou'd not have Confidence in the Court. The Substance of it was to thank his Majesty for his Clemency and Forbearance, which seem'd like a Banter to Persons who knew both the King and the Addressers.
 However, Dr. Bates, Dr. Manton, Dr. Jacob Dissenters comb, and Mr. Ennis, presented an Address of address the Thanks, and were very graciously receiv'd. His King with Majesty told them, He wou'd do his Utmost to get them comprehended in the Establishment, and wou'd remove all Bars ; for he cou'd wish that there had been no Bounds or Bars at all, but all had been Sea. He added, " They might have had Liberty enough, but something must be He confers with the
 done for publick Peace. However, they cou'd Ministers.
 not be ignorant that this was a Work of Difficulty and Time to get it fully effected for their Assurance. In the mean Time he wish'd they wou'd use their Liberty temperately. He said, their Meetings were too numerous, and so, besides that they were against Law, gave Occasion to many clamorous People to come with Complaints to him, as if their Design was wholly to undermine the Church, and to say, Sir, These are they that you protest against the Laws. The King then spoke of Farrington's
 " Preaching in the Play-house." The Ministers told his Majesty they all dislike'd the Action. He instantly Mr. Baxter's drawing in all the Country round about him at Aston. Dr. Manton said,
 " Mr. Baxter goes to the Publick, and preaches in the Interval between Morning and Evening Service,"

A.D. 1668 " Service, beginning at Twelve. That the first Intendment was for the Benefit of his own Family, and the great Company was not invited by him, but intruded upon him; that it was hard to exclude those, who in Charity might be suppos'd to come with a Thirst after the Means of Edification. He alledg'd the general Necessity, and that Nonconformists were not all of a Piece; and if People of unsober Principles in Religion were permitted to preach, a Necessity lay upon them to take the like Liberty; that those who had invincible Scruples against the Publick Way, may not be left as a Prey to those who might leave bad Impressions upon them, which wou'd neither be so safe for Religion nor the publick Peace." The King reply'd, That the Raffle of the People were not of such Consideration, they being apt to run after every new Teacher; but People of Quality might be entreated to forbear to meet, or at least act in such Multitudes, lest the publick Scandal taken thereby, might obstruct his Intention and Designs for their Good. His Majesty seem'd well pleas'd when Dr. Manton suggestt, " That their Sobriety of Doctrine, and meddling only with weighty Things, and remembrance of him in their Prayers with Respect, preserv'd an Esteem of his Person and Government in the Hearts of his People; and that probably People of another Humour might season them with worse Infusions." Here the Earl of Arlington, in whose Lodgings the King receiv'd the Divines, pluck'd him by the Coat, as desiring him to note it. The Address was consider'd, and approv'd by the Cabinet Council; but the Ministers did not make it publick, that they might not be thought to open the Door to a Toleration of Papists; and their Care not to give the least shadow of Countenance to such an Indulgence, was probably the main Reason that they had so little Benefit of one.

His Majesty this Year took a Progress, accompany'd by the Duke of York, Prince Rupert, &c. from Newmarket, cross the Country by Bagshot, to Portsmouth; and thence again to Newmarket, Audley-End, Ipswich, Harwich, and the Downs, where he view'd a Squadron of Ships bound for the Straights, commanded by Sir Thomas Allen, who in the Treaty he renew'd with the Algerines, added two or three Articles concerning Tangier, without which the Marine in this Reign wou'd have been seldom mention'd. Ambassadors were sent to several Courts, as Sir William Godolphin to Spain, Sir Edward Sprague to Brussels, both Papists; the Earl of Carlisle to Stockholm, Mr. Ralph Montagu to Paris, Sir Daniel Harvey to Constantinople, Sir William Temple to the Hague. The Kingdom was now so infested with Robbers, that a Proclamation was publish'd the 23d of December, for apprehending Swissnix, Madox, Daval, and twenty more, promising a Reward of twenty Pounds for each Man, to be paid by the Sheriffs of the Counties where they were taken. Monsieur Colberr, Ambassador of France at the Treaty of Aix, came to England in the same Quality, and negotiated a Treaty here of a quite contrary Tenor to those of Breda and Aix la Chapelle. Sir John Vaughan, the great Mover in the Lord Clarendon's Impeachment, was made Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas; the Lord Viscount Fitzharding dying, Sir Thomas Clifford was made Treasurer of the Household; the Duke of Monmouth Captain of the Horse Guards, on the Resignation of the Lord Brandon Gerrard; and Sir John Trevor Secretary of State, on the Resignation of Sir William Morrice, who had 10,000 Pounds given him in lieu of it.

From the Treaty of Aix above-mention'd, to the second Dutch War in this Reign, the French King and his Ministers, us'd all their Arts to break the Triple League, which the three Powers, England, Sweden and Holland, were oblig'd in Honour and Interest to maintain; yet at the same Time France seem'd to have little Regard to the Friendship of England, not that she was afraid of Enmity, but being sure of the King, she valu'd not the People.

The Island of St. Christophers, one of the Caribbees in America, was to be restor'd to the English, yet the French kept it two or three Years, and when they left it, destroy'd all the Plantations, plunder'd and carry'd away all that was portable, leaving it in a much worse Condition than if it had never been planted. They interrupted the Trade of the English in those Parts, assuming to themselves the Sovereignty of the Seas there, not suffering any Ships but their own to sail by or about those Islands. Upon no other ground did they take Prizes, and confiscate several Vessels. Add to all this the great Duties they laid now upon our Merchandise in France, which was as bad as a Prohibition, while we continu'd to trade with them for ready Money, to the Value of a Million yearly loss. And what was more mischievous than all the rest, were their continual Intrigues to poison the Counsels of England, and draw off the Court from the true Interests of the Nation; however, nor Court, nor Country were in such high Esteem with King Charles, and his Brother the Duke of York. The late War between England and Holland, gave the French King an Opportunity to encrease his Shipping and naval Stores as he did, in a scandalous Manner in Holland, by Means of De Wit, and in England, by Means of the French Faction here. In Holland he purchas'd twelve stout Men of War, and as many more great Merchant Men, which he converted to Men of War. Besides this there was exported thence to France, within the Compass of two Years, 400,000 Pounds Weight of Powder, 500,000 Pounds Weight of Match, 200 Casks of Pitch and Tar, 40,000 Weight of Iron for Bullets, 6000 Hand-Granades, 2 Gallions, 13 Fly-Boats, 5 Pinks laden with Plank, Cordage, Masts, Sails, &c. And that he was as well supply'd from England, is to be seen by our Exports to France, in this and the following Years.

Dr. Welwood gives us a very good Account of King Charles's contributing to the Greatness of the French at Sea. " Within these few Weeks," says he, there has something relating to that Subject accidentally come to my Knowledge, which, perhaps, a great Part of the World has not been yet acquainted with. No body doubts but King Charles II. understood Sea Affairs, and the Art of Building Ships, as well almost as any of his Subjects: And I have seen under his own Hand several extraordinary Discoveries and Experiments in that Matter, which speaks him to have been a Prince of great Abilities, as in all other Things that might aggrandize France and level England; so in this Art of building Ships, King Charles was willing to assist his intimate Ally, Lewis XIV. to the utmost of his Power: In order thereto, he not only faithfully communicated to the French King, from Time to Time, all his own Observations and Experiments, but likewise those of the most skilful Persons about him in the Art. Nay such was that King's Zeal for France, and his Care to acquaint the French King with Sea Affairs, that I have lately seen the Doubles of several Letters from King Charles to the French King, about Implements, and new Discoveries in building Ships of War, and at the Foot

A.D. 1669 " of some of the Doubles of considerable Lengths, written by King Charles himself to this Purpose, The Original with my own Hand, sent him such a Day. Strange! That a Prince so much in love with Ease, and who writes so ill a Hand, cou'd be brought to write near a Sheet of Paper at a Time; meerly to teach an inveterate Enemy of the English Nation, a Way to contend with him the Dominion of the Seas, the brightest Jewel of his Crown. But this is not all, King Charles's Love to the People of England, went farther yet, for there is to be seen the Double of a Letter from him to the French King, full of Instructions about this same Subject, dated at a Time when he pretended to concur with other Princes, in obliging that King to make a Peace, &c.

Instead of such Truths as these, the Archdeacon informs us, that Sir William Temple took daily Pains to strengthen the Triple Alliance, which Monsieur Colbert, in England, took daily Pains to break in Pieces, and had much more Success in his Endeavours, which was suspected by all Ministers who had the least Insight into Business; and the French Court did not stick to say, That England wou'd certainly fail the Dutch, and was already chang'd in the Course of those Counsels they had taken with Sweden and Holland. Monsieur Pufendorf, the Swedish Envoy at Paris, was told there, and he told De Wit as much, as he pass'd thro' Holland, in his Way home. The Swede added, that Monsieur Turenne shew'd him a Letter from Monsieur Colbert, at the Court of England, wherein he gave an Account of the happy Successes he had met with in his Negotiation there, of the good Disposition of the Courtiers, and especially those of some of the chief Ministers, with the Addition of these Words, And I have at last made them sensible of the whole Extent of his Majesty's Liberality.

Prince of Tuscany in England.

About the End of March, arriv'd in England Cosmo de Medicis, Prince of Tuscany, in his Travels over Europe. The Earl of Pembroke entertain'd him magnificently at his Seat in Wiltshire. At Brentford he was met and complemented in the King's Name, by the Lord Viscount Mandeville. On his Arrival at London, he receiv'd Complements from the King, Queen, Duke and Dutchess, by Sir William Killegrew, the Earl of Peterborough, and Sir William Powel.

At the End of the Month, the King, the Duke, and Prince Rupert, accompany'd him to Newmarket, whence he went to Cambridge, and was complemented by the two Divinity Professors, Dr. Gunning, and Dr. Pearson, the young Noblemen and Magistrates attending them. Dr. Widdrington, the University Orator, entertain'd him with a publick Speech at the Gate, which no doubt had in it the usual Spirit of Academical Orations, and as little Fustian and Affectation as is consistent with the Nature of such Harangues. The Prince of Tuscany being conducted to the Regent House, there was a Congregation held, Degrees in all Faculties created by the King's particular Command, and a Philosophy Act was perform'd, to the singular Satisfaction of his Tuscan Highness.

On the 3d of May, the Prince arriv'd at Oxford, and was waited on by Dr. Fell, the Vice-Chancellor, at his Lodgings in the Angel-Inn, which he prefer'd for Privacy, to the Lodgings offer'd him by the Doctor. Dr. South, the publick Orator, made a Speech to him in the Convocation-House, where his Highness sat in a Chair of State, on the right Hand of the Vice-Chancellor, but it is to be question'd, whether South complemented his Highness the Prince of Tuscany so well as he did his Highness Oliver Cromwel.

Tho' Dr. South's Latin Poetry is not much better than the English, it shews his good Will to Cromwel. To satisfy his Tuscan Highness how Academical Affairs were dispatch'd, his Physician John Bapt. Gornia, Doctor of Physick of Bononia, was incorporated and admitted to the same Degree. The Prince was then shewn the New Theatre, not quite finish'd, and the publick Library, where he had a View of those Manuscripts, &c. which it is so difficult for any one that wou'd make use of them, to obtain an useful View of. He heard a Lecture in Geometry read by Dr. Wallis, and what must be surprizingly edifying, some Disputations in the School of Tongues. In the Musick-School he was entertain'd with Vocal and Instrumental Musick, and had an Opportunity to make a Comparison between Ben. Rogers and Corelli. Echard enlarges on these Matters, as if there was something in them, and sure I cannot follow a better Example.

The Prince staid in England about nine Weeks, and it is certain he was so well pleas'd with his Reception here, that when afterwards he became great Duke of Tuscany, he receiv'd the English in his Court, after a more free and distinguishing Manner than any other Nation; and did as long as he liv'd, send Presents of the finest Florence Wine, every Year to the Court, the chief Courtiers, and many other Persons of Distinction in England.

About July, Prince George of Denmark, after Prince a short Tour in France, made a short Tour in Eng- George land. In the same Month, Sheldon's Theatre at of Den-Oxford was open'd, with a Speech by the publick mark in Orator Dr. South; and several Panegyricks were England.

tions had liv'd till now, they wou'd doubtless have Theatre been distinguish'd by fineness of Wit, and delicacy of Thought and Expression, which distinguish the Panegyricks of that Theatre from all others. There was then a Dialogue in Poetry, which continu'd some Time, to the great awakening of the Audience. This was follow'd by another Oration, two Speeches in Poetry, a Discourse in Favour of Learning, a short Speech from the Musick Gallery, ushering in two Odes; after which was another Speech, and so a Conclusion. The History of it is an Entertainment which nothing cou'd equal, but the Hearing of so many set Speeches in Prose and Verse, for they have generally so much Nature, Truth, Simplicity, Sense, Spirit and Elegance in them, that they must needs be transporting.

A.D. 1669 Consideration, enquired into Points of Privileges between the two Houses, and the Disposal of the publick Monies, and found one of their Members, who kept some of the publick Accounts, so blameable, that they expell'd him their House. But then, to the great Comfort of Mr. Archdeacon, they thank'd his Majesty for putting in Execution the Laws against Nonconformists, and pass'd a Vote, That they will adhere to his Majesty in the Maintenance of the Church, as it is religiously establish'd by the Bartholomew Act, Five Mile Act, Conventicle Act, and all the other Stinging Acts. This is extremely foolish, considering that the persecuting Protestant Dissenters was persecuting their own Religion, if they were Protestants, and that the Protestant Interest is one in general, under whatever particular Denomination, of which this very Parliament was so sensible, that a Year or two after they, Nemine contradicente, voted a Bill to deliver Protestant Dissenters from the Oppression of those very Laws, yet so long as the Spirit of Persecution is so prevalent among them, so long does the Archdeacon never leave off his Encomiums on their Wisdom and Piety. They flatten as that Spirit wears off, as what is false always will. There is something still more foolish to come; Information was given to the House from General Monk, that old rank Republican and Independent, "Of the great Resort of dangerous and disaffected Persons to London, and of the Meetings and Endeavours to disturb the publick Peace, and that he had, and would take Care, what he cou'd, to prevent their Attempts to hear the Word of God, and pray in private Assemblies." This Folly, which, false as it is, is next to Stupidity, was given into by the Majority of the Commons, who resolv'd, That the Thanks of this House be return'd to the Lord General, for his Care, &c. as aforesaid. Why was he not thank'd for his Care in preserving the Fleet by dividing it, and the Ships at Chatham, by sinking them, after he had stood on the Shoar and seen eight or ten First and Second Rate Men of War burnt and taken? This old Man has almost both Feet in the Grave, and yet he wants to be some body in the laudable Business of Persecution.

The House then resum'd the Debates of the Difference between the two Houses in Skinner's Case, and Sir Samuel Barnardiston, Deputy-Governor of the East-India Company, having been fin'd 300 Pounds, and order'd into Custody of Sir John Eyton, Usher of the Black Rod, till 'twas paid, they voted the Proceedings against him to be contrary to, and a Subversion of their Rights and Privileges, and that the Lords be desir'd to vacate their Judgments against both him and the East-India Company. But while these Heats were encreasing, the King by Commission, December the 11th, prorogu'd the Parliament to the 14th of February.

It is worth Remark, that in the Biography of this Year, Echard, speaking of Dr. George Bates, among other Eulogy, tells us he was Physician to Charles I. and to Oliver Cromwel, whom, as he insinuates, he poison'd, which is, however false, as much as he intended it in the Doctor's Praise, he gave him a sure Dose. Thus he commends him for an Act, which, had it been true, he ought to have been hang'd for, Bates having no Commission that warrant'd him to murder the Protector. He tells us also of the Death of the Queen-Mother Henrietta Maria in France, and that her Heart was put in a Vessel of Silver, and that her Body was carry'd by Friars and Priests with Tapers, and that the Lord Montague, who by the way was only Montague the Priest, her Almoner, attended the Corpse with a noble Retinue, and that she was a great Queen. General Ludlow speaks of it thus; "About this Time Henrietta Maria, Queen-Mother of England, and Aunt to the present King of France, having been formerly an active Instrument in contriving and fomenting the long and bloody Civil War in England, and encouraging the barbarous Massacre of the Protestants in Ireland, and more lately from a Spirit of Revenge and Malice, a principal Adviser of the Cruelties acted in England upon the Alteration of the Government, dy'd at Paris. Her Dissemper at first seem'd not to be dangerous; but upon taking something prescrib'd by the Physicians to procure Sleep, the Potion operated in such a Manner that she wak'd no more. She receiv'd 60,000 Pounds a Year from England, so she had had about 600,000 Pounds since her Son was call'd in, and yet left many and great Debts unpaid: She constantly favour'd the Designs for assassinating the English Refugees in Switzerland and elsewhere." It is as well worth remembering as the rest that Cassimir, the abdicated King of Poland, the French King, and a great Number of Princes and Princesses, attended at her Funeral.

On the 3d of January dy'd George Monk, 1670. whom the King had made a Duke, giving him the Title of Albemarle, which had been held by several Princes of the Blood. Echard tells us, he was a Person distinguish'd by the Blessing of Heaven, tho' he knew that the sudden Incident of the Restoration was accomplish'd by repeated Perjury, and the Breach of the most solemn and sacred Promises and Engagements. He was a wonderful Instrument in restoring Happiness to a Nation over-run with Misery. You have seen what a Restorer he was, and what was the Happiness. He preserv'd himself in the Esteem of the Court, and the Affections of the People, which is as great a Falshood as ever Monk himself was guilty of; for neither the King esteem'd, nor the People lov'd him long before his Death. Bishop Burnet assures us, He became so useless, that little personal Regard cou'd be paid him. Directly contrary to which, not only Echard, but the Compleat Historian asserts, that He all along preserv'd himself in the Esteem of the Court. My Lord of Sarum adds, The King despis'd him. The Compleat Writer applauds his Sincerity and Judgment, which were in Truth well match'd. And both these Compleat Writers must certainly flatter his Character so enormously, on account of his giving such Proofs of his Sincerity, as Swearing and Forswearing the Covenant, his joining with and persecuting the Presbyterians, his renouncing King Charles II. and his bringing of him in. His Character appears sufficiently in his Actions; so I shall say no more of him, only that King Charles was at a great Expence in his Burial, and gave his Son most of his Places, together with his Garter. He was a Man of less Merit than his Father, and dying without Issue, all those dear-bought Honours, together with the Name of Monk, in this Line at least, perish'd in 30 Years Time.

We must not forget, that by the Beginning of this Year the City of London was rebuilt with more Space and Splendor than has been before seen in England. The Act of Parliament before-mention'd for rebuilding it was drawn by Sir Matthew Hale, with so true Judgment and Foresight, that the whole City was rais'd out of its Ashes without any Suits of Law, which, if that Bill had not prevented them, wou'd have brought a second Charge on the City, not much less than the Fire it self had been. And upon that, to the Amazement of all Europe, London was in four Years Time rebuilt with so much Beauty and Magnificence, that those who saw it in both States, before and after the Fire, cou'd not reflect on it without wondring where the Wealth cou'd be found to bear so vast a Loss, as was made by the Fire, and so prodigious an Expence as was laid out in the Re-building. This good and great Work was very much forwarded by Sir William Turner in his Mayoralty, 1669. He never disturb'd the Nonconformists during all that Time; He so little regarded his own Gain, and fought the Common-good, and punish'd Vice, that no Lord Mayor was ever more honour'd and belov'd, infomuch that at the End of his Year they chose him again, and wou'd have heard of no other, but that he absolutely refus'd, partly as being an unusual Thing, and partly because of a Message from his Superiors, who were displeas'd with his moderate and peaceable Temper.

Sir William Turner a good Magistrate.

Lord Roos's Divorce.

About this Time an Accident happen'd, which made the Discourse of the Divorce the common Subject of Conversation. The Lord Roos, afterwards Earl of Rutland, brought Proofs of Adultery against his Wife, and obtain'd a Sentence of Divorce in the Spiritual Court, which amounting only to a Separation from Bed and Board, he mov'd for a Bill to dissolve the Bond, and enable him to marry another Wife. The Duke and all his Party apprehended the Consequences of a Parliamentary Divorce; so they oppos'd this with great Heat, and almost all the Bishops were of that Side, only Dr. Cosens, Bishop of Durham, and Dr. Wilkins, Bishop of Chester, were for it. The King was as earnest in setting it on, as the Duke was in opposing it. The Zeal which the two Brothers express'd on that Occasion, mov'd all People to conclude, that they had a particular Concern in the Matter. The Bill pass'd, and upon that Precedent some mov'd the King to order a Bill to be brought in to divorce him from the Queen. But the Duke of Buckingham propos'd another Way to rid the King of her. He said he wou'd steal her, and send her to a Plantation, where she shou'd be well and carefully look'd to, but never heard of any more; so it shou'd be given out she had deserted, and upon that it wou'd fall in with some Principles to carry an Act of Divorce. The King wou'd not hear of it, saying, 'Twas wicked to make a poor Lady miserable only because she was his Wife, and had had no Children by him, which was not her Fault. As if indeed he did not make her miserable enough by living in a constant Course of Adultery with a Company of Concubines, who were no more constant to him than he was to his Queen. But this Year Care was taken to procure him a new Mistress, whose Head shou'd be as full of Politicks as her Heart was of Pleasure, and being a French Woman, and consequently devoted to the French Interest, she was to draw him into it by the Witchery of her Person and Passion.

Dutchess of Portsmouth.

Pension Parliament.

I have more than once spoken very meanly of this Parliament, and I refer to the Reader, whether they cou'd have been guided by any thing but an irregular mercenary Spirit. Bishop Burnet informs us, The House of Commons lost all Respect in the Nation: And again, It was thought the King cou'd never have been prevail'd on to part with a Parliament so much practis'd upon, and where every Man's Price was known; for as a Man rose in his Credit in the House, he rais'd his Price, and expected to be treated accordingly. Such was the Assembly, who pass'd the Bartholomew Act, the Five Mile Act, the Conventicle Act, and another Act, of which mere presently.

Notwithstanding the Committee of Brook-house A.D. 1670 had been brow-beaten by the Council, they still went on with their Enquiries, and of the prodigious Sums that had been given since the Dutch War, they cou'd find but 800,000 Pounds brought to Account, and that, says Bishop Burnet, in most shameful Terms; but, as has been hinted, a good Part of it was distributed among the Members who made the Majority, which carry'd Mr. Echar's Bills for the Safety and Honour of the Church. The Bishop proceeds, The chief Men who promoted the Brook-house Enquiries were taken off, as the Word then was for corrupting Members. But by those Enquiries the Carelessness and Luxury of the Court came to be so much expos'd, that the King's Temper was much sharpen'd upon it. All the Flatterers about him magnify'd Foreign Governments, where the Princes were absolute, particularly that in France. Many to please him said, it was a very easy thing to shake off the Restraints of Law, if the King wou'd but set about it. The Crown of Denmark was elective and subject to a Senate, and yet was in one Day, without any visible Force, chang'd to both Hereditary and Absolute. The King lov'd the Project, but according to my Lord of Sarum, resolv'd to keep all things within himself, till it grew clearer, and his Affairs were made easier; so he went balancing one Party with another, to get Money of the Parliament, under the Pretence of the Triple League, which was the wooden Leg he us'd to beg with, till he broke it. Money Bills pass'd easily in the House of Commons, but met with Opposition in the House of Lords, who began to complain that Money Bills came on so thick, that it was said, There was no End of their giving: End signifying Purpose Att. as well as Measure. This pass'd as a severe Jest. At that Time Sir John Coventry, a leading Member of the Country Party in the House of Commons, made a gross Reflection on the King's Amours. He was one of those who struggled much against giving Money. The common Method is, after those who oppose such Bills fail in the main Vote, the next Thing they endeavour is to lay the Money on Funds that will be unacceptable, and will prove deficient. So these Men propos'd the Laying a Tax on the Play-Houses, which according to the Bishop, were in so difficult a Time, become Nests of Prostitution. The Stage was defil'd beyond all Example, Dryden, the greater Master of Dramatick Poesy, which Saying shews his Lordship to be no great Judge of it, was a Monster of Immodesty and Impurity of all Sorts. This was oppos'd by the Court; it was said, the Players were the King's Servants, and a Part of his Pleasure. Coventry ask'd, Whether the King's Pleasure lay among the Men, or the Women that acted? This was carry'd with great Indignation to the Court. 'Twas said, this was the first Time that the King was personally reflected on; if it was pass'd over, more of the same Kind would follow, and it would grow a Fashion to talk so? What then? Was it not known that the King had two Stage Harlots, Nell Gwin, and Moll Davis in keeping, besides all the other Female Fry, and must not the People, as the only Losers, have leave to speak? The Bishop proceeds, It was therefore thought fit to take such severe Notice of this, that no body shou'd dare to talk at that rate for the future. The Duke of York told one, he said all he cou'd to the King, to divert him from the Resolution he had taken, which was to send some of the Guards, and watch in the Streets where Sir John lodg'd, and leave a Mark upon him. A.D. 1670 "Reeves, Simon Parry, and some others, went thither, and as Coventry was going home, they drew about him, he stood up to a Wall, snatch'd the Flambeau out of his Servant William Wilkes's Hands, and with that in one Hand, and his Sword in the other, he defended himself so well, that he got more Credit by it than by all the Actions of his Life. He wounded some of them, but was soon disarm'd, and then the Russians cut his Nose to the Bone, to teach him to remember what Respect he ow'd to the King, as the Villains said in doing their Villainy." Let the Reader judge what Respect could be due to a King, who was capable of such an unkingly Action! Sir John Coventry's Wound was so well sew'd up, that the Scar was scarce discernible; but the vile Attempt put even this House of Commons in a furious Uproar. The Russians fled, and a Bill of Banishment pass'd against them, with a Clause in it, that it should not be in the King's Power to pardon them, as also to make it Death to maim any Person maliciously.

Parliament.

Notwithstanding the Dialogue between the King and Dr. Manton, when the before-mention'd Address was presented, the King has upon his Hands another sort of Business, which is to get another Act of Parliament pass'd against his Protestant Subjects, who worshipp'd God in any other Manner, than he and the persecuting Bishops thought fit. The Parliament began their Meeting on the 14th of February, to which Day they had been prorogu'd, and the King, as usual, made them a Speech concerning the securing the Well-being of the Church, and after what has been said of the Committee of Brook-house, and their Enquiries from the Authority of the Bishop of Salisbury, it wou'd be surprizing to the Reader to see what follows, if he had not met with so much of this King's Character before; That no Misrepresentation or Mistakes touching the Expences of the last War may remain with you, I think fit to let you know, that I have fully inform'd my self in that Matter, and do affirm to you, that no Part of those Monies that you gave to me has been diverted to other Uses. Which, if it had not been said by a King, wou'd have been too gross for Remark. He put them in Mind of Supplies and of the Union with Scotland, pursuant to a Declaration of the Parliament of that Kingdom, empowering Commissioners to conclude it. The Lord Keeper Bridgeman spoke to the same Purpose. But the House beginning with a Debate of the contested Case of Skinner, and the King doubting it wou'd hinder the Supplies, interpos'd in the Affair, and made up the Matter between the two Houses, by advising the vacating of all that had pass'd concerning it, which both Houses agreed to; and then with new Delight Eckhard informs us, That Information had been given of the Dangers of unlawful Meetings, and the House of Commons were rous'd by new Complaints, and had receiv'd Information of a dangerous Conventicle in the West. It wou'd be very ridiculous, if it was not very wicked. He adds, It was observable, that all the Laws against the Dissenters were made more upon Civil and Political than upon Moral or Religious Accounts: Wherein he speaks a very great Truth, when he intended a very great Falshood.

The Persecution of Protestant Dissenters, and all the Acts made for it, were, it is true, irreligious and immoral, but that the Plots and Rebellions of the Presbyterians made those Acts necessary for the publick Peace, is as false as ever any thing was that came from the Father of Falshood, better known by the Name of the Father of Lies. The Preamble to this sinful Act

A.D. 1670 does not justify him, nor his Brother Historian in their Account of it. See the Substance of it, which they repeat as a Treasure in their Histories; "If any Person upwards of sixteen should be present at any Assembly, Conventicle, or Meeting, under Colour or Pretence of any Exercise of Religion, Mind the Mocking, and, as Bishop Burnet says, the Lying to God and Man. Under Colour or Pretence, These Men knew, and were fully convinc'd, that those Assemblies were for the true Exercises of religious Worship," in any other Manner than according to the Liturgy and Practice of the Church of England, where there was five Persons or more, besides those of the said Household; in such Case the Offenders were to pay five Shillings for the first Offence, and ten Shillings for the second; and the Preachers and Teachers in any such Meetings were to forfeit twenty Pounds for the first Offence, and forty for the second Offence. And those who knowingly suffer'd any such Conventicle in their Houses, Barns, Yards, &c. were to forfeit twenty Pounds." I must own, I was very glad to meet with this Act, for having conceiv'd a just Indignation against the former Cruelties of this Assembly, I was glad the Majority that pass'd them into a Law had so expos'd themselves by such a bare-fac'd Defiance of all Christian Virtues, that within a Year or two they were reduc'd to a Necessity of owning the Shame of it, of blushing at what they had been doing, and of endeavouring to atone for it by undoing it, and passing an Act for the Ease of those Dissenters whom they had made thus uneasy. The King solicited the passing of this Bill in the House of Lords. Bishop Wilkins, well satisfy'd that all the pretended Danger from the religious Assemblies of Protestants, were forg'd, argu'd long against the Bill in the House of Lords. Eckhard argues long for it in his Chronicle. Bishop Burnet tells us, "The King was much for having of it pass, and spoke to Wilkins not to oppose it." The pious Bishop answer'd, I think it an ill thing both in Conscience and Policy. If ill in Conscience it was a Sin: And therefore, both as I am an Englishman and a Bishop, I am bound to oppose it. The King then desir'd him not to come to the House of Lords while it depended. The Bishop answer'd, By the Law and Constitution of England, and by your Majesty's Favour, I have a Right to debate and vote, and I am neither afraid nor ashamed to own my Opinion in this Matter, and to act pursuant to it. Neither is the Archdeacon afraid or ashamed to own his Opinion directly opposite to this reverend and learned Father of the Church, whose Judgment in this, or any other Affair, will weigh more with sober Persons than that of all the persecuting Bishops put together. Not long after this notable Bill was made the Law of the Land, the House of Commons dropp'd the Committee of Brook-house, and all Enquiries into the publick Accounts vanish'd and came to nothing; for having taken the King's Hint to provide thus for the Well-being of the Church, they left it to his Majesty to provide for their own Well-being, and to Chance, to dispose of the publick Affairs.

The King solicits that Act.

Oppos'd by Bp. Wilkins.

We must not omit, that in this Year the Prince of Orange made his two Uncles, the King, and Duke of York, a Visit. His chief Business was to see how the King intended to pay the great Debt, which had been contracted by his Father, on his Account, and also to try what Offices the King wou'd do, in order to his Advancement to the Stadtholdership. The King treated him very civilly; he assur'd him he wou'd pay the Debt, but did not lay down any Method of doing it. He gave him good Words only, and try'd the Prince

A.D. 1679 in Point of Religion. He spoke of all the Protestants, as of a FACTIOUS Body broken among themselves, ever since they had broken off from the main Body, and wish'd he wou'd take more Pains and look into those Things better, and not to be led by his DUTCH Block-heads. His Highness told all this to Monsieur Zuytlestein, his natural Uncle. They were both amaz'd at it, and wonder'd how the King cou'd trust so great a Secret to so young a Person, the Prince not being twenty. His Highness told Bishop Burnet, he never spoke of this to any other Person, till after the King's Death, but he carry'd it always in his own Mind, and cou'd not hinder himself from judging of all the King's Intentions after that, from the Discovery he had then made of his Sentiments: Nor did he upon his not complying with that Proposition, expect any real Assistance from the King, but general Intercession, which signify'd nothing, and that was all he obtain'd, tho' otherwise he was civilly treated, considering the King had just concluded a Treaty with France, in the Prosecution of which, nothing but the miraculous Providence of God preserv'd him from perishing.

The Cabal. I cou'd very easily prove that the French Jesuit Orlean's Revolutions, is as false a History as the Archdeacon's, who tells us, the Jesuit's short Account of the Cabal is more material than most of the English Pamphlets and Secret Histories. He refers to my Secret History of Europe, which I shall never be asham'd to own, and, if it were worth while, cou'd prove it to be more authentick than the best Authorities he has made use of. The Introduction to his Account out of Orleans is the Reverse of the Truth. The Republican Spirit was insensibly creeping into Parliament again, was the last Act against Protestant Dissenters, just pass'd by them, a Proof of their creeping into Commonwealth Principles? The Cabal was so term'd from the Initial Letters of the Names of the five Lords who compos'd it, Clifford, Ashley-Cooper, Buckingham, Arlington, Lauderdale, who were Men of great Capacity, but little Virtue, and having got the King into their Hands, they resolv'd to keep him, by giving into all Measures that pleas'd any of his Passions, of which the most flagrant Instance was their humouring him in the second Dutch War, which was now beginning to be projected.

The ingenious Mr. Archdeacon attack'd my Secret History again, for suggesting that the Dutchess of Orleans came to visit her Brother, King Charles, at Dover, on very ill Errands. His Accounts are some scandalous, some uncertain, &c. The Reader will see presently what a fine Judge he is of Scandal and Truth. The History of Cornelius and John de Wit, is not a secret One, and yet we there read, "If the King of Sweden was not dazzled with French Gold, it gain'd more on the King of England, by the Perswasions of the Dutchess of Orleans, his Sister, supported by Monsieur Colbert, the French Ambassador, who made the King believe what he wou'd. A hundred thousand Pistols were remitted to that Minister, which he laid out to Advantage to engage those who had the greatest Interest in the King. The Lords of the Cabal had most of the Money; they were known to be the most mortal Enemies of the united Provinces, and Charles II. King of Great-Britain contented with the Name of King, left the Government to them, and seem'd to have no other Inclination but what those base Ministers inspir'd him with. His most Christian Majesty's Bounty had all the Effect that cou'd be expected. This wicked Ministry, who betray'd their Country, and wou'd have betray'd their Master, if they cou'd have got by it, pretended

A.D. 1670 "to give Credit to what the Minister of France told them of the Instances the States, both by Letters, and their Ambassadors had made to the French King, to treat of an Alliance with them, that they might jointly attack England: Accordingly the Cabal were perpetually representing to King Charles, that he ought no more to have any thing to do with a Republick that had vow'd his Destruction." It is not to be doubted but this imaginary Proceeding of the States made a very strong Impression on the King's Mind: Thus far the French Author, who seems not to know King Charles so well as he did his Ministers; for there was no need of animating him much to a Rapture, which none of them was so desirous of as himself. The Author of L'Histoire de Corneille, and Jean De Wit, before-mention'd, puts the following Speech into the Mouth of the Cabal, "Your Majesty runs no Risk: These Republicans have made themselves odious to all the Princes of Europe; there's not one who will oppose you in this Undertaking; the most Powerful will be satisfied with being Spectators of the War, and with Pleasure see the Pride of that Commonwealth that has brav'd so many Crown'd Heads, humbled. Spain will be so far from assisting them, she will rejoice in the Misfortune of a Nation whom she still looks upon as her rebellious Subjects. Tho' the Emperor should be willing to defend the United Provinces, he dares not undertake it in this difficult Posture of Affairs, the Ottoman Empire arming so mightily as it does, and the Revolt of his Subjects in Hungary, will cut him out Work enough of his own, and hinder his thinking of others. The Court of France by their Money, and the Jealousy they'll take Care to maintain between the two Northern Crowns, will engage them to stand neuter. The War between the Turks and the Poles, will prevent the Elector of Brandenburg assisting them; nay, who does not know but he might be glad of this Opportunity to recover the Towns in the Dutchy of Cleves, which the States have so long kept from him? The Elector of Cologne, and the Bishop of Munster, desire nothing more than to enter those Provinces with their Armies; will they be in a Condition to resist so many Enemies, attacking them on all Sides, especially at a Time when Faction reigns so much among them? The King of England suffer'd himself to be seduc'd by these and the like Considerations; however, he would not sign the private Treaties with France 'till he had receiv'd the Money which was promis'd him, amounting to Six Millions, besides 300,000 Crowns, a Month to be paid him during the War." Abbot Primi, whose Master Monsieur Colbert was more in the Secret than the English Secretary himself, gives a good Account of this Matter. As for the King of England he was exceedingly perplex'd; there was need of Money to carry on the Design, and that secretly too, he cou'd raise none at home without calling a Parliament, and that cou'd not be done without acquainting all Europe with his Intentions. There was also great Fear of Opposition, both from the Misunderstandings which in that tumultuous Assembly do for the most Part arise between the two Houses, and from the Intrigues of the Hollanders; for which Reason, the King of France furnish'd him with such Sums of Money as were sufficient to equip a considerable Fleet, and he advis'd the King of England, the better to conceal their Agreements, to keep a fair Correspondence outwardly with the Dutch, to appear firm to the Triple League, and to declare that he set out a Fleet

A.D. 1670 Fleet for no other Reason but because his Neighbours, and especially the French, who made great Preparations in all their Ports upon the Ocean, strengthen'd themselves so very considerably by Sea. P. 579. The Judicious Acherley lets us farther into those base Intrigues: "The Scheme which King Charles propos'd, and sent to the French King, was, That France shou'd assist him first to subdue England, and introduce Popery, and after that the Protestant States of Holland: But France sent the Dutchess of Orleans in May, 1670, to meet her Brother, King Charles, with a Counter Scheme, viz. First to conquer Holland by invading it with joint Forces by Sea and Land, and to make a Partition, allotting Zealand, and the Sea Coasts to King Charles, and the Inland Countries to France; insinuating, that after Success in that, the rest wou'd be an easy Work, and France wou'd pay King Charles 350,000 Pounds per Annum during the War; and she did pay 700,000 Pounds for the two first Years.

This is the Account which the sincere Echard calls uncertain. He adds, there are no real Proofs; and in the next Page owns, that Abbot Primi tells us, "Henrietta Maria, Dutchess of Orleans, a Princess whose Wit and Capacity was equal to her Beauty, concluded the Treaty at Dover, when she made that mysterious Voyage." I suppose he was in Pain for fear any saucy Reader shou'd mistake what is said in the Secret History to reflect on the Virtue of this Lady. All that I have to say is, that she must needs be a Lady of more than ordinary Virtue, who took so much Care of her Brother, as to supply him with a new Mistress out of her Train, Madam Queroualle, an enchanting Lady, says the Reverend Historian; and her Business became a Princess who lov'd the Country she ow'd her Nativity to, by making use of her Charms and Intrigues to enslave it to the King of Slaves, Lewis XIV. For after Holland was conquer'd, How long cou'd England have preserv'd her Liberty? Bishop Parker, that Renegado Independent and Cromwellian, who afterwards was the most celebrated Champion for Sheldon's Church of England, till he was driven out of the Field by Mr. Marvel, acknowledges, That the Triple-League was basely broken; that King Charles II. united the Knor, and that the Breach was a deadly Sin against the Laws of Nature and Nations. That was the doing of that most Virtuous Princess the Dutchess of Orleans; yet to say she cou'd be guilty of a deadly Sin, is not only very indecorous, but, says Mr. Archdeacon, severe and scandalous. As to other Things, in which Gallantry is concern'd; I will touch upon them as little as may be, that I may not offend the Archdeacon: But Bishop Burnet assures us, The King of France made Love to her, and if she resented it, 'twas when she saw it was only a Pretence to cover his Addresse to Mademoiselle De la Valiere, one of her Maids; that King Charles was so much charm'd with his Sister at Dover, that every Thing she propos'd, and every Favour she ask'd, was granted, the King cou'd deny her nothing; she propos'd an Alliance for the Conquest of Holland. The King had a Mind to have begun at Home. The Conquest of England, to use Mr. Acherley's Words, was look'd upon as secure, easy, and speedy; and the Constitution and Form of Government in England was in Imagination subverted, and the Parliament master'd. Good God! What a Conspiracy was here against the Religion and Liberties of the poor innocent People of England. This is no Sham Plot, and never was a more ruinous one hatch'd in the Infernal Divan. The Dutchess of Orleans diverted his Beginning with the Conquest of his own Subjects, not out of Compassion to them, but because such a Design wou'd alarm all his People, and perhaps send them with their Wealth and Trade to Holland; which by such an Accession wou'd grow stronger, as he wou'd grow weaker: So she propos'd that he shou'd begin with Holland. A Prince capable of such Counsels to destroy his own Subjects, and in order to it, to destroy his Neighbours who had highly oblig'd him, is a proper Subject for the Eulogy of those Historians only, who were perpetually flattering him while he was passing the Acts for Persecution. Abbot Primi's Book, wherein the Secret of this accurs'd Treaty is laid open, was read by Bishop Burnet at Paris. The Lord Preston, who some Years after was condemn'd for High Treason, was then the King's Ambassador in France, and knowing how great a Prejudice the publishing this wou'd be to his Master's Affairs, he complain'd of it. The Book was upon that suppress'd, and the Writer put in the Bastile for a few Days; but he had drawn it out of the Papers of Monsieur Le Tellier's Office; so, says my Lord of Sarum, There is little Reason to doubt of the Truth of the Thing. But Echard very dogmatically says, 'Tis very uncertain; though he informs us, that Monsieur Colbert paid Primi a Pension for collecting these Memoirs. I have many other Proofs of this See History Felonious Treaty with France, but I think here of Europe. are enough, and shall not enlarge upon it farther, but refer to my other Account of it.

Madam's Journey was very fatal to her, and I know not how it comes about, Echard himself does not deny but that her Husband, the Duke of Orleans, conceiv'd an unaccountable Jealousy of her Conduct at Dover; whereas the Reverend Historian had told us, Joy, Mirth and Pleasure Echard, reign'd without Abatement or Intermision; Love and Gallantry were intermix'd with Comedies, Masks, Musick, Banquerings, and all kind of Diversions. The Duke of Orleans, says Bishop Burnet, had heard such things of her Behaviour, that it was said he order'd a great Dose of Sublimate to be given her in a Glass of Succowry Water; and he then informs us of some of her amorous Intrigues, as with the Marquis des Vardes, wherein she went so far as to tell Madam de Soissons, whom des Vardes had an Amour with, She was her Rival; nay, her Favour to the Count de Treville was so great, that in the Agony she cry'd out, Adieu Treville! These are some of the severe scandalous Things. That she was poison'd, Dutchess appears plainly by the late Duke of Montagu's of Orleans Letters, who was then Ambassador in France, as poison'd. in that of the 30th of June. Madam, on Sunday the 29th Instant, being at St. Clou with a great deal of Company, about Five of the Clock in the Afternoon call'd for a Glass of Chicory Water, it that was prescrib'd her to drink, she having for two or three Days after Bathing found herself indispos'd; she had no sooner drank this, but she cry'd out, I am dead, fell into Madam Mascbourg's Arms, and desir'd to be put to Bed, and have a Confessor: She continu'd in the greatest Tortures imaginable till Three o'Clock in the Morning, when she dy'd. In that of the 6th of July the Ambassador writes, I suppose by this time you may have with you the Marechal de Bellefonds, who, besides his Condolance, will endeavour, I believe, to disabuse our Court of Madam's being poison'd; which having so good an Authority as her own saying it several times, makes the Report much more credited; But to me in particular, when I ask'd her several times whether she thought herself poison'd, she wou'd answer nothing; I believe, being willing to spare the Addition of so great a Trouble to the King our Master, which was the Reason why in my first Letter I made no mention of it. The King and the Ministers here seem extremely King Charles conspir'd against the Constitution of England.

A.D. 1670 treachly afflicted with the Loss of Madam, and I do not doubt but they are, for they hop'd, upon her Consideration, to bring the King our Master to condescend to Things, and enter into a Friendship with this Crown stricter, perhaps, than they think he will now be's no more. But the Ambassador was at that time none of the Court Confidants. He knew not how many Millions in Hand was to be paid his Master, enough to comfort him for more than the Loss of a Sister, that of his Honour, and the Love of his People. What was begun, continues he, or what was intended, I will not presume to search into, since your Lordship does not think fit to communicate the least Part of it to me, but I cannot help knowing the Town-Talk: All I desire to know, my Lord, is, that whilst I am here, I may know what Language to hold in Conversation with the other Ministers, that I may not be ridiculous with the Character I have upon me. P. S. Monsieur complains extremely of the King our Master, for having a Confidence with Madam, and treating Things with her without his knowledge. Whoever has a Mind to see more of this poisoning Affair, will find enough of it in the Memoirs of Mademoiselle de Fayette, and the Secret History of Europe.

King's Secret League with France.

Monsieur De Wit, Pensionary of Holland, was one of the first who discover'd the Secret League between France and England; but he could hardly be brought to believe the King of England would venture to break the Triple-Alliance, of which the English were so fond. He did not then know what Resource the King had, and as far as his Politicks could direct him, he thought the Parliament would never give him Money to act against a League, which they offer'd to supply him to maintain; and having it always in his Head, that the King of England would one time or other insist upon restoring the Prince of Orange to the Stadtholdership, he seem'd resolv'd to put every thing to venture, rather than submit to what he thought would ruin his Credit and Interest in his Republick: For Sir William Temple was beginning to prepare the Way for the Breach of the Triple-League, by making Demands of new Satisfaction for Damages in the East-Indies, and at Suriman, though he knew not what was intended by our Court's being so impetuous in those Demands.

But the Dutchess of Orleans's Arrival at Dover alarm'd De Wit, and made him hasten away Van Beuningen to England, who had declar'd for the Prince of Orange's Advancement. He found immediately that the Court thought no more of the Triple-League; the Ministry, through Corruption or Ignorance, was gain'd to the French Side: Clifford and Arlington had not Complacency enough for the Dutch to dissemble it. Sir Orlando Bridgeman, then Lord Keeper, was of another Opinion, so were Prince Rupert, the Duke of Ormond, and Sir John Trevor, Secretary of State, who were all remov'd from the Committee of Foreign Affairs, to make room for such as would give themselves entirely up to the Management of France.

Cabinet-Council chang'd.

The Cabal.

As to the Characters of the Cabal, they are as well known as if they had liv'd in our own Time. We may see what was to be expected from Arlington, by one of the Articles in the Earl of Bristol's Charge against the Earl of Clarendon, whom he accuses, for saying on the Removal of Secretary Nicholas, to make room for Bennet, now Earl of Arlington, That his Majesty had given 10,000 Pounds to remove a zealous Protestant, that he might bring into that Place a conceal'd Papist. Every one has heard of Clifford's abandoning his Post to own himself a Papist, and of the scandalous Life and Morals of Lauderdale;

A.D. 1670 Buckingham's various Character is well describ'd by Dryden in his Abjolom and Achitophel; and Ashley's troublesome and unsettled Humour, will add no great Reputation to that Ministry, who were Men of more Parts than Principles, and of more Ability than Virtue; However, the two latter atton'd for their evil Counsels, by their steady Adherence to the Cause of Liberty afterwards.

There was all the Reason in the World for our Court to have kept firm to the Triple-League, which would not only have preserv'd the Netherlands, but have hinder'd the future Power of Lewis XIV. and made King Charles Arbitrer of the Affairs of Europe. But the King and his Courtiers were insensible of every good Sentiment; neither Interest nor Resentment could touch them, or else, after so much Expression of brotherly Love and Tenderness to the Dutchess of Orleans, at the Interview of Dover, her sudden Death would have had other Effects in England.

Notwithstanding, the Duke of Buckingham Duke of was dispatch'd to France, to return Monsieur de Bellefond's Complement, and pursue his Negotiations; yet so well did the Court of England dissemble, that they dissipated all Monsieur Van Beuningen's Fears, and made him look on the Voyages of the Marechal and Duke as pure Ceremonies only. The Ambassador writing to Holland it was his Opinion, "That as far as common Appearance would go, he had all the Reason that could be to believe that nothing had been treated by the Marechal or the Duke, nor was ever intended to the Prejudice of King Charles's Alliance with the Dutch."

However, Monsieur De Witt's Jealousies were not cur'd, he declar'd to Sir William Temple, jealous of "He had observ'd a Coldness in all our Negotiations ever since Madam's Journey into England, and upon the late Journey of the Duke of Buckingham to Paris, which he could not think was pour voir le Pais, ou apprendre la Langue, to see the Country, or learn the Language. He desir'd Sir William to tell him what he could make of all this laid together; for on the one Side there were Circumstances enough to awaken a suspicious Man, and on the other Side he could never think it possible for any Nation or Court itself to quit so certain a Point of Interest, and so great a Point of Honour, as must be forfeited by our breaking our Alliance with them. He added, His Majesty had engag'd the States in those common Measures, and even prevail'd with them to make a Sacrifice of the antient Kindness and Alliance the States had always before with France, to the Considerations of the present Danger, from the Greatness of that Crown to the rest of Christendom; though they might have had what Terms they pleas'd from her for the dividing of Flanders." True it was, King Charles, put upon it by the Clamours of his Subjects, had engag'd the Dutch in the Triple-League, and drawn on them the Displeasure of France, to which he was now about to join himself for the Destruction of their Republick. Sir William Temple was not let into the Secret, and could only answer the Pensionary, "He confess'd he was apt to make many of those Reflections himself had done, but could not believe it possible for any Crown ever to enter into Councils so destructive to their Honour and Safety. But if such Things should happen, he desir'd Monsieur De Witt to remember what he told him upon the Scruple he had made in trusting our Court in the Negotiations of the Triple-Alliance, of his Majesty's and the Ministers good Resolutions. He continu'd,

A.D. 1670
Sir Will.
Temple's Saying to De Wit.

“I cannot believe it possible for them to change in a Point of so evident Interest, and which will be so understood by the whole Nation. However, I can answer for no body besides myself; but this I will assure you, that if ever such a thing shou'd happen, I will never have any Part in it; which, he said, he had told the King as well as him, and would make it good.” The Ambassador needed not to have taken that Precaution: The Ministry knew he was not a Man to be sent on their wicked Errands, and it was one of their first Steps towards the War, to re-call him. In the mean Time, that upright Minister Arlington, was doing his best to deceive Van Beuningen, and the other Foreign Ambassadors concern'd in the Support of the Triple-League: What a Face he put upon our Court's close Correspondence with France, will appear by a Passage in a Letter of his to Sir William Godolphin in Spain.

Arlington's Deceit.

“Monfieur Van Beuningen was with me Yesterday, being full of these Apprehensions, and inferring positively from them, that the Peace wou'd be immediately broken. I told him I cou'd not believe it, because the King our Master had all the moral Assurances that can be receiv'd from his most Christian Majesty, that he will inviolably keep the Peace of Aix la Chapelle.” The Reader is desir'd to observe that this was written two Months after Madam had been at Dover, where, as she herself told Mr. Montague, afterwards Duke, She had persuaded her Brother, King Charles, to join with France against Holland; and long after Colbert's Treaty was concluded. Wou'd one think it was possible for Gentlemen to be guilty of such double Dealing and Perfidy? Arlington proceeds, In the Confidence of which (of keeping the Treaty of Aix, which they had agreed to break) we live in a perfect good Understanding with that Court, with France, whose Ambition we have agreed to serve at the risk of the Religion and Liberties of England. Again, “Such Civilities pass between the two Kings, as give great Uneasiness to Monfieur Van Beuningen, particularly by his Majesty's sending the Duke of Buckingham to requite the Complement brought hither by the Mareschal de Bellefonds.”

Perfidy of the English Court.

Lauderdale Prime Minister for the Ladies.

Arlington and Clifford were in the Depth of this ruinous Intrigue, Buckingham and Asbley not admitted so far into it, and Lauderdale was a Tool to be us'd or laid by at Pleasure, being easily contented with the Share he had of the Gallant Ministry, in which he was Prime, while Clifford was at the Head of the Political. The latter being a stanch Papist, cou'd not but bear mortal Hatred to the Dutch, as may be seen by what pass'd between him and Sir William Temple, upon Sir William's Return from Holland. He made him stay an Hour and half for his first Audience, and when he enter'd into Discourse with him, after much Anger express'd against the Hollanders, and the Ambassador's strenuous Vindication of his Negotiations, Sir William gives this Account of it himself, in a Letter to his Father, “Being, I confess, a little heated, after so long and unpleasant a Conversation, as well as he, I ask'd him, in the Name of God, What he thought a Man cou'd do more?” Upon this, in a great Rage he answer'd me, I will tell you what a Man may do more, and what you ought to do more, which is, to let the King and all the World know, how basely and unworthily the States have us'd him, and to declare publicly how their Ministers are a Company of Rogues and Rascals, and not fit for his Majesty, or any other Prince, to have any thing to do with. Pray mind! This Rogue and Rascal is the Language of a Prime Minister, and spoken of another Prime Minister; but that this Language is not so uncourtly, as is generally conceiv'd, let us have recourse to the Example of Kings and Princes: Sir Thomas Armstrong came Post from Paris as soon as Madam was poison'd, to acquaint King Charles with it. The King wept, and express'd himself very passionately against Monfieur, saying, He is a Rascal: But Prithee, Tom, don't speak of it. These Indecorums are more outrageous than any the Treachery and Villainy of the Enemies of the Reform'd Religion and English Liberties have been able to extort from me, tho' Resentment and Indignation may have suffer'd some warm Expressions to have escap'd me.

When the Peace was actually broken, and the French King had invaded the United Provinces, the Governor of the Spanish Netherlands having assisted the Dutch, Clifford undertook to have the Governor check'd, and to get a stop put to the Succours for the future, by a Letter to Sir William Godolphin at Madrid. “There are now at least 10 or 12,000 Men, Horse and Foot, of theirs, in the Holland Service and Garrisons, which is contrary to their Treaty made with us; and tho' they may send Auxiliaries notwithstanding any Treaties they have made with France, yet to send such Numbers is so provoking, that it will be a Wonder if the most Christian King doth not march with his Army to Brussels, and the World will justify him in it.

These Proceedings of France and England cou'd not probably have had the desir'd Effect, had Sweden continu'd firm in her Alliances with Holland. To debase that Court, Mr. Coventry was dispatch'd away Ambassador to Stockholm; and he did not find it a very difficult Work to take off the Edge of their Zeal for the Preservation of the Liberties of Europe. 'Twas not likely indeed that the Swedes wou'd be anxious for others Liberties, who had made their Monarch a Present of their own. Ever since the Irruption of Gustavus Adolphus into Germany, and the great Subsidies France paid to Sweden, the Ministers there have been so us'd to touch French Gold, that their Party in Sweden was far from being inconsiderable.

The Duke of Buckingham's Reception at the Court of France was calculated to the Vanity and Profusion of his Temper; all was Shew and Pleasure, and he behav'd as one who understood Gallantry as well as the most Gallant of that splendid Court. Having once open'd a Ball with a Lady of the first Rank, which was perform'd by him with wonderful Gaiety and Address, the Ladies were very curious in viewing a Diamond Hatband he wore, and some of 'em, out of Envy, cry'd, They were counterfeit. When he had done Dancing, he twist'd the Hatband round his Finger, and flung the Diamonds among the Ladies, saying, See, Ladies, if they are true or no. The Secret League between the two Kings of England and France was thus confirm'd, and the French Army was order'd to break up, and march toward the new Conquests. The Dutch Ambassador at Paris demanded of Mr. de Lionne, Secretary of State, Whether that Army was to be employ'd against his Masters? Lionne assur'd him, If those Troops were employ'd at all, the Storm wou'd fall far enough from their Territories. The French Fraud is uppermost still in all their Words and Actions. This Army, under Crequi, enter'd Lorraine, seiz'd that Dutchy, and was within half an Hour of surprizing the Duke, for no other Reason, but his offering to be a Party in the Triple-League; and when that Duke's Minister complain'd of it at our Court, he was told, The present

Parliament.

However, on the 24th of October the Parliament met, and the King having made a very short Speech, refer'd them to the Lord Keeper Bridge-man, who was directed to say, among other Things, Since the Close of the late War, his Majesty hath made several Leagues to his own Honour, and of infinite Advantage to the Nation. One known by the Name of the Triple-League; wherein his Majesty, the Crown of Sweden, and the States of the United Provinces, are engag'd to preserve the Treaty of Aix la Chapelle, concerning a Peace between the two warring Princes; which Peace produc'd that Effect, that it quench'd the Fire that was ready to have set all Christendom in a Flame; and besides other great Benefits by it, which she still enjoys, gave Opportunity to transmit those Forces against the Infidels, which would otherwise have been embroil'd in Christian Blood. Another between his Majesty and the said States, for a mutual Assistance, with a certain Number of Men and Ships, in case of Invasion by any others. Prodigious! All these Treaties, upon which the King values himself so much by his Keeper, are not only every one of them broken, but a new one fraudulently and clandestinely made to destroy those very States, and set Christendom in a Flame. The Keeper told them, that since France and Holland were fitting out Fleets, 'twas necessary the King of England shou'd do so too, and demanded 800,000 Pounds for that Expence, which this giving Parliament readily gave his Majesty; and with that Money he put himself in a Condition to break those Treaties for the Maintenance of which it was given him.

Duke of Monmouth.

In the beginning of the Summer, James Duke of Monmouth, the King's eldest Son, by Mrs. Lucy Walters, or Barlow, of Pembrokeshire, was admitted into the Privy-Council. He was born at Rotterdam, April 9, 1649, at the Time when Eckard says, the King was as eminent for Continence, as he was for Incontinence afterwards. The Queen Mother, it seems, lik'd him not the worse for his being the Bastard Son of her Son, but took particular Care of his Education, under Thomas Ross, Esq; at Paris. At twelve Years old he was brought to England, and was created Duke of Orkney in Scotland, and Duke of Monmouth some time after. His Beauty and fine Mien gain'd the Love of the whole Court; his Father was so fond of him, that it created Jealousy in the Duke of York. In 1665, he was marry'd to the Lady Anne, Daughter and Heir to Francis Earl of Buccleugh, generally esteem'd the greatest Beauty and Fortune in the three Kingdoms. He was made Captain of the Horse Guards, Lord Lieutenant of the East Riding of Yorkshire, Governor of Hull, and afterwards General of all the Land Forces.

Blood's Plot to steal the Duke of Ormond.

In December this Year, there was discover'd a horrid and bloody Plot, no sham one, contriv'd by Captain Blood of Ireland, who, says Eckard, had been in a Plot there to make himself Lord Lieutenant of that Kingdom; and the Compleat Historian says, Blood's Design was to force the Duke to sign some Writings to surrender an Estate he had forfeited by Rebellion in Ireland, and that he was a desperate Villain. Mr. Baxter tells us, He had been a Soldier in the old King's Army against the Parliament. The other Plotters were Richard Hallowell of Frying-pan Alley in Petrick-lane without Bishopsgate (I am so particular, because it shews how well the Compleat Historian, from whom I take it, understands the Dignity and Majesty of History) Thomas Allen, Thomas Hunt, and Ralph Alexander. The Plot was to steal the Duke of Ormond, and hang him at Tyburn, in Revenge of some Plotters whom the Duke had hung in Ireland. They way-laid him as he was going to Dunkirk-House, in Piccadilly, in the Night, and Blood taking him out of his Coach, by the Help of Alexander, mounted him on Horseback behind his eldest Son, afterwards Lieutenant General Blood. The Duke was carry'd as far as Devonshire-House before Help got to him; and then he flung himself off the Horse, the Person to whom he was ty'd falling with him. By which time the Duke's Porter, and other Assistance coming up, the Fellow disengag'd himself, mounted, and rode off with the rest of the Plotters. The Compleat Historian adds to this Piece of History two Consecrations, that of Dr. Creighton, Bishop of Bath and Wells, a virulent Preacher, and that of Shadwell Church; as you may see there more at large.

There was a stupid worthless Mechanick, one Starling, who had got himself into the Chair in the City of London; he was Mayor the Year before, and join'd with the Archbishop's Nephew, Sir Joseph Sheldon, and one Sir Andrew King, an obscure Knight, in sending two eminent and worthy Citizens, Mr. Jekyl, and Mr. Hayes, to Goal, for endeavouring to save some poor Citizens from Prison, who were in danger of it, by being found worshipping God according to Scripture and their own Consciences. Eckard calls their offering a Crown or two to the Constables, for letting the Protestant Dissenters go about their Business, an Attempt to bribe the Magistrates. The Parliament, who, says Bishop Burnet, had lost the Respect of the People, stood by Starling and Sheldon, against whom Mr. Hayes and Mr. Jekyl had brought their Action for false Imprisonment, and Voted the Commitment of those Gentlemen, to be for the Preservation of the King; which is as much Nonsense as a Majority of Wrong-heads cou'd be guilty of. Both the Compleat Historians take Notice of the great Favour done Seth Ward, Bishop of Sarum, by making him Chancellor of the Garter, as some Bishops of that See had been formerly; but I must remember that Covenanting Presbyterian, Independent Republican, and Cromwellian, for something else, which I find in Baxter's Life, "This Year Salisbury Diocese was more fiercely driven on to Conformity by Dr. Seth Ward, their Bishop, than any Place else, or than all the Bishops in England besides did in theirs. Many Hundreds were persecuted by him with great Industry, and among others, that learned, humble, holy Gentleman, Thomas Grove, Esq; an antient Parliament Man, of as great Sincerity and Integrity as almost any Man I ever knew. He stood it out a while in a Law Suit, but was overthrown, and fain to forsake his Country, as many Hundreds more are quickly like to do." Mr. Grove's Nephew, Dr. Robert Grove, was afterwards the learned and pious Bishop of Chichester.

About the same time Dr. Manton was sent to the common Goal for preaching the Gospel in his own House, and was kept in the Gate-house six Months.

Such was the State of Religion, and such the sad State of the Publick Affairs: The most Honourable and Safe Leagues were breaking, the most Sober and Religious Protestants in the Nation persecuting, and Popery and Slavery make very quick Approaches; but the Wicked will not always prosper.

Before we proceed farther in the Preparations of a new War, we must look into the Affairs of Scotland and Ireland.

The Papists in Ireland had conceiv'd such Hopes of the Establishment of their Religion, that they cou'd not conceal them from the Protestants.

A.D. 1667 testants. 'Twas very remarkable, that in the Year 1668, Peter Talbot, Brother to Tyrconnel, and Titular Archbishop of Dublin, landing from England at a Place call'd the Skerish, within 12 Miles of that City, and being very hospitably entertain'd by one Captain Coddington, with whom he lodg'd one Night, Talbot the next Morning took him aside, and after the most affectionate Expression of Kindness, ask'd him what Title he had to that Estate? For he observ'd he had expended considerably upon its Improvement. Coddington answer'd, 'Twas an old Estate belonging to the Earl of Thomond. Talbot reply'd, That's nothing; it belongs to the Church, and will all be taken away; therefore I advise you, lay out no more Money upon it, but get what you can and desert it. All which was offer'd upon strong Injunctions of the most inviolable Secrecy.

Ireland.

The Duke of Ormond was then Lord Lieutenant, and nothing advantageous to their Interests cou'd be manag'd while he continu'd in that Post, which occasion'd several Consultations at Court about his Removal. It had been too palpable for the Popish Party to have appear'd in it; wherefore an Intrigue was then form'd of renewing the antient Animosities between him and the Duke of Buckingham. This was reduc'd to Act, and the Effect was proportionable to the Design. Being recall'd, he left his Son, the Earl of Ossory, to command in his Absence; and no sooner was it known at Dublin that he was remov'd, than the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of Dublin, the Provost of the College, the Dean of Christ Church, and many of the principal Citizens and Clergy, waited on the Earl of Ossory, to acknowledge the Benefits they enjoy'd under the good Government of his Father. The next thing to be consider'd was, who shou'd succeed him, which was a Matter that requir'd a very nice and critical Management. They pitch'd upon the Lord Roberts, A.D. 1669, as a Person who had formerly been disappointed of that Station, which begetting a Prejudice in him, and meeting with a vindictive Spirit, whose Temper they knew to be such, wou'd procure him invidiously to inspect into, or else to create Faults in the Government of the Duke of Ormond, which was the End of the Contrivance, and of his Advancement, as knowing that his Uneasiness to those of that Kingdom wou'd serve to prepare a fair Reception for the Lord Berkley, a Man of whose Inclinations to their Interest the Popish Party had the most convincing Assurances.

Antrim
an Irish Rebel,

Some Years before the Lord Roberts was made Lord Lieutenant, the Marquis of Antrim was accus'd of being Actor in the Irish Massacre, and as such, his Estate was to be forfeited. These Articles being prov'd against him: 1. He was in the Conspiracy to surprize the Castle of Dublin with Macguire, Macmahon, who were hang'd, &c. 2. He afterwards join'd the Rebels, particularly Renny O-Moor. 3. He enter'd into the Popish Conspiracy before the Year 1643. 4. He constantly adher'd to the Nuntio's Party. 5. He sat from Time to Time in the Council of Kilkenny. 6. He sign'd the execrable Oath of Association. 7. He acted as Lieutenant General by Commission from that Council. 8. He declar'd he had join'd with Owen Roe, and Neal in opposing the Peace made by the Lord Ormond. These Proofs taken in Ireland were transmitted to King Charles II. who sent back a Letter to the Lord Lieutenant, then the Duke of Ormond, to clear Antrim; in which Letter 'tis alledg'd, That the Marquis of Antrim was innocent from any Malice or Rebellious Purpose against the Crown, and that his Transactions with the Irish Rebels were by the Instruction of the King his Father, and for his Service; that his Royal Father was well pleas'd with what the Marquis had done, and approv'd the same; and that he, Charles II. cou'd not in Justice deny him this Testimony; that what he did by way of corresponding with the Irish, was in order to the Service of his Royal Father, and warrant'd by his Instructions. This Letter was dated from White-hall July the 10th, 1663, and enter'd at the Signet Office July the 13th following. "Upon this, says Mr. Baxter, the Parliament's Commission."

had King Charles I.

"Adherents grew more confident than ever of the Righteousness of their Wars. And the very Destroyers of the King, whom the first Parliamentarians call'd Rebels, did presume also to justify their Cause, and said, That the Law of Nature did warrant them." It stopp'd not here. The Lord Viscount Massareen, a zealous Protestant, still prosecuted Antrim's Cause, and carry'd it so far, that the Marquis was forc'd to produce in the House of Commons of England a Letter of King Charles I. by which he gave him Order for his taking up Arms against the English Protestants in Ireland; which being read even in this Giving and Taking House, put all the Members into a Silence.

Dr. Calamy very justly complains of the foul Mouths that broke out against him for mentioning this Passage of the Marquis of Antrim after Mr. Baxter, tho' it had been told by several Writers long before Mr. Baxter's Life came out, as by the Author of Murther will out, by Lieutenant General Ludlow, &c. Indeed it bears hard on the Memory of Charles the First, and proves, beyond Contradiction, that his Martyrdom cou'd not be for the Protestant Religion, against which he commission'd an Irish Massacrer to take Arms. I never thought that King gave a formal Commission to the Irish Papists to cut the Throats of the English Protestants: But I always thought, and always shall think, that if a Commission to take Arms is given, or even countenanc'd, and the Consequence of that Commission is a Massacre, that the Power who gave it, or countenanc'd it, is as much accessary to the Massacre as ever Person was accessary to a Murder, in which there's no Difference in Guilt and Punishment between the Accessary and the Principal.

Vol. III.
P. 115.

Soon after the Lord Roberts's Arrival at Dublin a very unfortunate Accident happen'd there. Most of the Nobility and Gentry being at the Theatre in Dublin to see Ben. Johnson's Bartholomew Fair acted, the upper Galleries on a sudden fell all down, and the People out of them into the Pit and lower Boxes. The Lord Lieutenant and his Lady were in the King's Box, or what serves instead of it, in that Play-house, but they both escap'd the Danger, part of the Box where they were remaining firm, and so resisting the Fall from above, only his two Sons were found quite bury'd under the Timber. The younger had receiv'd but little Hurt, but the eldest was taken up dead to all Appearance; he was presently let Blood and recover'd. Many of the Audience were dangerously hurt, and seven or eight kill'd out-right. If, like the Compleat Historian, we cou'd suffer our Passion to cry out a Judgment on every extraordinary Incident, one might ask why shou'd not this be imputed such, when the Buffoonry of the Stage was play'd against the Purity of Divine Worship; for the sober religious Puritan was the Jest of the Farce, and a proper Cant put into his Mouth to adapt it to the Times, the lowdest that ever were known in a Country where Profession was made of any Religion at all. Lord Roberts remain'd Lord Lieutenant but about six Months, and then the Lord

A sad Accident.

A.D. 1671 Lord Berkley was sent over in the same Station. He arriv'd April the 2d, 1670. Richard Talbot, Brother to Peter, and the Duke of York's Favourite, went from Court to Ireland soon after, where, pretending to retire and live private, he was still engag'd in all the secret Counsels with Sir Ellis Leighton, as great a Sinner as his holy Brother, the Archbishop of Glasgow, was a Saint, Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant Berkley.

It was now pretended, that when the King was in Exile, he had oblig'd himself to the French King to restore the Irish to their Religion and Estates; and lest a Neglect of this shou'd occasion a Breach with France, which the King under his new Engagement durst not admit a Thought of, something therefore must be done to satisfy his most Christian Majesty; so it was order'd, notwithstanding the Law, to prefer Irish Papists to the Commission of the Peace, in this Year 1671. But they behav'd so partially and insolently, that they became odious to sober Men of their own Party.

The next Year an Attempt was made to regulate Corporations. The Lord Berkley acting, as he was directed, by the Duke of York, or his Agents the Talbots, the Lord Lieutenant was empower'd to do it by an Act of the last Parliament there. This was manag'd with such Secrecy, that none were made acquainted with it till a Draft of it was drawn and brought ready to the Council Board. The next Day an Order was sent to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of Dublin to call a Common-Council, to turn them out and make a new Government in the City. This Berkley and the Privy-Council well understood wou'd make a Disturbance, which they were desirous so to improve among the Citizens, as to render the Protestants disaffected. To this End they labour'd industriously to irritate and provoke them, as the Lord Berkley had done the Year before, when a Number of Boys got up in a Tumult to pull down a Bridge, which was erecting contrary to the Desire of the City. The Lord Mayor and Constables having suppress'd them, the Lord Lieutenant order'd Soldiers, as they were carrying them to Prison, to discharge several Shots among the Boys, by which several of them were kill'd.

The Aldermen of Dublin gave ready Obedience to the Order, tho' they fear'd the Bottom of the Design; and this Compliance put the Lord Lieutenant on new Measures; for the most considerable Aldermen had been noted for keeping Papists from the Freedom of the City, and while they were in Power no Popish Design cou'd succeed; wherefore the next Work was to prepossess the Populace with a Prejudice against the Aldermen, representing them as the Authors and Contrivers of this new Model, tho' as it was afterwards prov'd upon an Hearing before the Earl of Essex and Council, when he was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, they never heard one Word of that Model till the Order was brought to them upon Tolsey, with a Command to put it in Execution. About the same Time, 1672, came over to Dublin a Person who assum'd several Names, sometimes Payne, sometimes Nevill, the same Man who was committed to Newgate a few Years after for some High Misdemeanor relating to Coleman and the Popish Plot. This Nevill was sent to Ireland by Coleman, Secretary to the Duke of York, to act as he shou'd receive Instructions from himself and the chief Papists of England. He kept himself close at first, but at last was receiv'd into the Castle, and appear'd as Under-Secretary to Sir Ellis Leighton. His Business was to infuse into the Citizens of Dublin an Opinion of the Treachery of their Recorder Sir William Davis; and to make the Pretext the more plausible, he had Instructions to add, that the Recorder and the Lord Primate, then Lord Chancellor, counsell'd the Lord Berkley to enact those Laws for abolishing the antient Government of the City, and further insinuating, that this was done at the Desire, Instigation, and Contrivance of the chief Aldermen. The impious Suggestion being not only artfully spread, but also too easily credited by the Citizens, they were induc'd to pitch upon Nevill as their most proper Agent, and in order to this advanc'd Money, which they presented to Sir Ellis Leighton, who, together with Nevill, brought the then Lord Mayor Totty, with the Sheriffs, to the Lord Lieutenant, who publicly declar'd the Relation above, and promis'd to recal his Order. Upon which he summon'd a Council, but the unravelling of the Business discover'd a Popish Intrigue, which occasion'd their not agreeing with the Lord Berkley.

However, a Consultation was held by the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs with Colonel Talbot his Brother, the Titular Archbishop of Dublin, as also with Sir Nicholas Plunket, the Pope's Knight, at Talbot's House, three Miles from Dublin, where it was resolv'd, that the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs shou'd call a general Assembly of the City, and by an Act of that Assembly turn out the Recorder, and all the Aldermen and Common-Council-Men, who oppos'd the Popish Party. But when the Assembly met, all the four and twenty Aldermen were unanimous, and without them no Act cou'd pass; upon which they sent to the Lord Lieutenant for further Instructions, keeping the Assembly shut up till the Answer came from him, which was, that one of the Sheriffs, and several of the Commons, shou'd deliver a Petition to the Aldermens Court to turn out Sir William Davis and seven of the chief Aldermen. One of the Sheriffs, asham'd of these treacherous Proceedings, discover'd the secret Contrivance: Popery promoted. And thus the Aldermen had some Time to be on their Guard against it; and they defended themselves so well when the Matter came to be debated, that the adverse Party obtain'd only the Suffrages of two indigent Aldermen; but then the Lord Mayor, who was corrupted by Leighton and Payne, call'd a private Assembly, at which not one of the seven Aldermen were present. The Commons were call'd into the Aldermen's Court, and there, in a tumultuous and irregular Manner, the seven chief Aldermen were turn'd out, and seven of the Rabble put in their Places; Leighton was also made Recorder, several Papists were brought into the Common-Council. Talbot, the Titular Archbishop of Dublin, borrowed rich Hangings, Silver Candlesticks, Plate, and other Utensils of the Lord Lieutenant to use at High Mass, which Leighton got to be sent with this Complement, That he hop'd to have High Mass at Christ Church at Christmas.

In Berkley's Time the Papists in Ireland became so insolent, that Richard and Peter Talbot were look'd upon as a kind of Favourites at the Castle, and a horrid Conspiracy was on Foot to massacre the Protestants, which was discover'd by the Babling of a Priest, who was come from abroad to forward that blessed Work, as they were pleas'd to call it. Suspicion was taken by Crosses of Straw, which the Priests had order'd the Papists to fix over their Doors, as a Token of Distinction to save them when the Protestants were destroy'd. The Priest was sought after, but he was convey'd away, and the Government gave no Encouragement to any Enquiry into the Plot, or after the Plotters. The Men who were outed, sent

A.D. 1671 sent Sir William Davis, the outed Recorder, to London, to lay the State of their Case before the Ministry, which when the Earl of Shafsbury had heard, he swore the Lord Lieutenant was mad, and about a Month after the Earl of Essex was appointed to succeed Berkley in that Station. The latter went Ambassador to France, where he behav'd so poorly, that he was said to have lost his Wits, if ever he had any. The Earl of Essex, some Time before this, being at Paris, in his Way to England from the Waters of Bourbon, the Queen-Mother, then living, sent for him, and told him there were Agents from Ireland, who desir'd Money and Arms of the French King as also some Officers, and they wou'd put that Kingdom into his Hand. But, says Bishop Burnet, the French King had greater Things in View. However, this is no small Proof of the traitorous Designs of the Irish Papists against their King and Country, for they were not as yet let into the Secret of King Charles's Religion.

We must in the next Place cast an Eye upon Scotland. Scotland, which we left after the Tumult at Pentland-Hill. The Executions which follow'd it are too bloody and barbarous for a Christian History. Archbishop Sharp was the most deeply concern'd in them, insomuch that after he had receiv'd a Letter from the King to stop his Hand, he suffer'd ten Men to be put to Death before he paid Obedience to it. His Majesty having receiv'd Information of the ill State of Affairs in Scotland by the Earls of Tweeddale and Kincardin, who went to London on Purpose, was displeas'd at Sharp's Tyranny and Cruelty, and order'd the Lord Rothes to write to that proud and hated Prelate to stay within his Diocese, and come no more to Edinburgh. Upon this he was struck with so deep a Melancholy, that, to use the Lord of Sarum's Words, he shew'd as much Abjection under the slight Disgrace, as he had shewn Insolence before, when he had more Favour. He presid'd in the last Convention, but Duke Hamilton was appointed to preside in the next, A.D. 1667. Sharp had been order'd to look after the Education of the young Marquis of Huntly, and see that he was not bred a Papist; for the Strength of Popery in Scotland lay in his Family. Sharp car'd not for that; the Earl of Rothes's Mistress was related to Huntly, and a good Catholic herself, so he let Huntly's Mother breed him as she pleas'd; and Bishop Burnet adds, The Interest which Popery had in Scotland was believ'd to be chiefly owing to Sharp's Compliance with the Earl of Rothes's Amours, which cou'd not but be very much for the Credit of the Cause he had espous'd at the Expence of his Oaths and his Conscience. That eminent Prelate, his Grace, says Echard of him; and the Bishop of Sarum does not scruple to stile the very same Man Infamous. The Lord Rothes, Sharp's Patron, sent Colonel Drummond with a Message to the King, representing the Necessity of putting to Death all those who wou'd not renounce the Covenant. Such an Order was sent, but with it a Letter, commanding the Execution of it to be forbore, unless there was express Command for it from Court; so it serv'd only to make Rothes, Sharp, and their Party still more odious. Burnet, Archbishop of Glasgow, got into the Management upon Sharp's leaving it; but he drov so furiously, that even Sharp was thought a more moderate Counsellor, and accordingly recall'd to the Council-Board, and Burnet also grew somewhat tamer. The Bishops, says my Lord of Salisbury, seem only concern'd for their Authority and Revenues, and took no Care of regulating Worship and Discipline, which I never did, nor ever shall wonder at. Authority and Revenues are of the Kingdom of the World in which we live; Religion and Piety are of the Kingdom of Christ, which is too remote to have any Attraction on worldly Minds.

All this while Lord Lauderdale kept himself pretty much in the good Opinion of the Presbyterians; but about eight Years after the Restoration he suffer'd himself to be govern'd by the Countess of Dysart, Wife of Sir Lionel Talmaish of Suffolk, with whom he had so familiar Commerce in her Husband's Time, that it gave Occasion to Censure. This Woman had Beauty, Wit, and some Learning; but, as Bishop Burnet tells us, wou'd stick at nothing to compass her Ends. When Lauderdale was a Prisoner after Worcester Fight, she sav'd his Life by her Intrigues with Cromwel, which was not a little taken Notice of. The Bishop adds, He was certainly fond of her, and she took Care to entertain him in it, till he, finding what was said upon it, broke it off. She liv'd after the Restoration so much with Lauderdale, that his Wife left the Kingdom, went to Paris, and dy'd there. After which he marry'd Lady Dysart, and deliver'd himself up to all her Humours and Passions; by which Means he fell out with all his best Friends, and among others with the Presbyterians, who paid him more than ordinary Respect in Hopes to keep him, if not theirs, at least their Friends. Lord Tweeddale had the Commission for Scotland after Lord Rothes; and to expose the latter, Turner the Dragoon was question'd for his Cruelties, which provok'd the People to rise about Dumfries. It was expected Turner wou'd produce his Warrants, and that then Rothes wou'd appear to have been chiefly concern'd in it; but he sunk them, and his Commission being taken from him, wou'd not produce any Vouchers to please his Enemies. The wise and virtuous Sir Robert Murray was Assistant to the Earl of Tweeddale in the Government, and passing through the West of Scotland to endeavour to compose Matters a little, he found out the Source of all the Evils which had there happen'd. The Episcopal Clergy in that Country were, as he told the Bishop of Salisbury, a Set of Men so ignorant and so scandalous, that it was not possible to support them, unless the greatest Part of them cou'd be turn'd out, and better Men put in their Places. The Archbishop of Glasgow, Burnet, had put them all in, and they were so link'd together, that none of them cou'd be got to concur in getting Proofs of Crimes brought against their Brethren. How do the Compleat Historians rejoyce at the obtruding of Episcopacy in Scotland; and these are, you see, the sweet Effects of it. Sir Robert Murray propos'd a Method to purge the Church of such Scandals to it, by erecting a Court, consisting of Clergy and Laity, to examine into the Complaints of the People against their Curates. Burnet of Glasgow roar'd against this as an Encroachment on his Authority; and his Clergy cry'd out, They were undone. Indeed Sir Robert Murray's Project was too pious to succeed in such impious Times. The Lord Tweeddale prevail'd on the holy Leighton to go to London, where he represented to the King the Madness of the Administration of Church Affairs in Scotland under Sharp, and the Archdeacon's other Scotch Bishops. A Treaty of an Accommodation was propos'd with the Presbyterians, but came to nothing. Oppression had wrought the rigid Presbyterians into Phrenzy, and they were not soon to be brought into a treating Temper. The more sober Part of them were not averse to it; but so many Difficulties were started, that this Proposal, like all other good Proposals in these bad Times, had no Effect. In the Year 1668,

A.D. 1671 Sharp the Archbishop, who was as much hated as it is possible for a Man to be, was shot at in a Coach in Edinburgh Street; but the Bullet was intercepted by the Arm of the Bishop of Orkney, who was then getting into Sharp's Coach. Echard asserts, That the Man who shot off the Pistol was a Conventicle Preacher. Bishop Burnet says, he was shot at by a Man, but does not say he was a Preacher, or a Presbyterian, tho'tis very likely he was a Conventicle, as that modest, ingenious Historian terms the Protestant Dissenters, and for the Sake of this Billinggate, does he affirm a Falshood, for my Lord of Sarum intimates, that the Man, Mitchel, whom Echard names, was a Shop-keeper. Sharp was as much frightened as a wicked Man and a Coward cou'd be. Mitchel made off, and was not discover'd 'till six Years after, and how that happen'd is worth knowing, there being a Series of Villainies in the Beginning and End of this Business, which is not easily to be met with in any other History. I take it from the Bishop of Salisbury.

Falshood.

"Sharp had observ'd a Man that kept a Shop at his Door, who look'd very narrowly on him always as he pass'd by, and he fancy'd he was the Man that had shot at him six Years before; so he order'd him to be taken up and examin'd. It was found he had two Pistols by him, that were deeply charg'd, which encreas'd the Suspicion, yet the Man deny'd all. But Sharp got a Friend of his to go to him, and deal with him to make a full Confession, and Sharp made solemn Promises that he wou'd procure his Pardon. Mitchel's Friend answer'd, he hop'd he did not intend to make use of him to trapan a Man to his Ruin." Now, Reader, fix thy Eyes upon this Sharp, and see him in the highest Act of Devotion, telling the most execrable Falshy that ever came from Man's Lips. "Sharp, with lifted up Hands, promis'd by the Living God, that no Hurt should come to the Man. The Person went to the Prisoner, who offer'd to tell all, if a Promise was made in the King's Name; upon which Lauderdale, then the King's Commissioner, empower'd the Lord Halton his Brother, the Lord Rothes and Primrose to promise him his Life, which was done, and the Prisoner Mitchel, kneeling immediately down, confess'd the Fact. There was but one Person privy to it, and he was then dead. Echard insinuates that all the Presbyterians were privy to it." Sharp was troubled to see so small a Discovery, and the Man was sent Prisoner to the Bast, to be kept there for Life; however, he was sometime after brought into the Justiciary Court, upon an Indictment for this Crime, to which it was expected he wou'd plead Guilty, "But the Judge, as he went up the Stairs, passing by the Prisoner, said to him, Confess nothing, unless you are sure of your Limbs as well as your Life. Upon this Hint, he refus'd to confess, which being reported to the Council, an Act was pass'd, that since he had retracted his Confession, they likewise recall'd the Promise of Pardon. Sharp would have his Life, Lauderdale gave Way to it, and he was brought to Edinburgh, in order to his Trial. All were amaz'd at the Proceeding, Primrose took a Copy of the Act of Council for Mitchel's Pardon, and then going to Lauderdale, told him, many thought there had been a Promise of Life given: Lauderdale deny'd it stiffly; Primrose desir'd the Council Register might be look'd into, to see if there was any Act for it." Lauderdale said, he was sure it was not possible. Lockhart, Uncle of Carnworth, pleaded for Mitchel with such Force and Eloquence, as amaz'd the Audience, but it was over-ru'd. Then the Promise of Pardon was insisted on; the Person who went to Mitchel, gave Evidence of that Promise from Sharp, which Sharp for Sharp, who had sworn his Promise by the Living sworn God, flatly deny'd. The Duke of Lauderdale, the Earl of Rothes, and the Lord Halton, deny'd also that there was any Promise of Pardon; at which, all present, were struck with Astonishment. Lockhart demanded a Copy of the Council Act, which was register'd. Duke of Lauderdale, who was in the Court, only as a Witness, and so had no Right to speak, stood up and said, I and these other noble Persons, are not brought hither to be accus'd of Perjury, the Books of Scot's Council are the King's Secrets, and no Court shall have the Perusing of them. So Mitchel was cast Counsellor and condemn'd.

As soon as the Court broke up, the Lords of the Council search'd the Register, and to their Shame, found the Act for Pardon enter'd there, and sign'd by Lord Rothes, as President of the Council, whose poor Excuse was, that he sign'd any thing the Clerk put in the Book, upon whom it was then intended to throw it; but he, to clear himself, searches among his Papers, and found the Draught of the Act in Nisbit, the King's Advocate's Hand. Nisbit being rich, a severe Fine was determin'd to be laid upon him; but he examin'd the Minutes of the Council Book, and spoke to all who were then at the Board, of whom nine happen'd to be in Edinburgh, who were ready to depose upon Oath, that when the Council order'd this Act to be drawn, the Clerk of the Council desir'd the Help of the King's Advocate, which he gave him, and his Draught was approv'd by the Council, yet Lauderdale still stood to it. Lord Kincardin sent a Bishop to him before the Trial, desiring him to consider better of the Matter, and not deny a Thing upon Oath, which he, Kincardin, had under both his own, and his Brother Halton's Hand, nay the very Letters wherein he desir'd that a Pardon might be ask'd of the King for Mitchel, pursuant to the Promise that had been given him. This made some Impression on him, and he was willing to grant a Reprieve, but Sharp said, That was to expose him to any Man who wou'd attempt to murder him. Then said Duke Lauderdale in an *Lauder-*impious jesting Way, Let Mitchel glorify God in the Grass Market, where he was hang'd; which sur'd and Action, and all that were concern'd in it, were impious. look'd at by all People with Horror. Bishop Burnet adds, It was such a Complication of Treachery, Perjury and Cruelty, as the like had not perhaps been known, and I cannot think that all the Conciergeries and Chatelets in the World, cou'd furnish such a Set of Men as dipp'd their Hands, and their very Souls in the Blood of this Man. Remember Echard's Lord Primate, his Grace is at the Head of them. Lauderdale's Chaplain, Hicks, a Conventicle Preacher, after he was turn'd out of the Deanery of Worcester, publish'd a false and partial Account of this Matter, says my Lord Sarum, to justify his Master, but his Lordship's Account was sent him by Primrose, and every Page sign'd by the Clerk of the Court. To return to the Scot's History where we left off. Sharp, after this Attempt against him, was sent for to Court, and well receiv'd by the King, whose moderate Measures then taken up, he seem'd to approve, and when he return'd to Scotland, he mov'd in Council, that an Indulgence might be granted to some of the Kirk Ministers, who wou'd oblige themselves not to speak or preach against Episcopacy, &c. but it had no great, or rather a very ill Effect; for the strict Covenanters objected, that if they bound themselves against the Covenant, by which they renounc'd Episcopacy,

A.D. 1671 pacy, the Sin was their own; if the King bound them, they had still Liberty left to refuse Obedience, and undergo the Punishment.

The Militia of Scotland, consisting of 2000 Horse, and 16,000 Foot, were arm'd, train'd and Illegal Government: cast into Independent Regiments, under such Orders as they receiv'd from the Council Board; all which was against Law.

Mention has been made of the Scheme for a Union of the two Kingdoms, for which Scots Commissioners were appointed, but it went no farther. About Forty Ministers receiv'd Licenses to preach, on the Conditions therein mention'd, but those Ministers who cou'd not comply, look'd on them, as in a Schism which divided the Presbyterian Interest. The indulg'd Presbyterians, and the Cameronians, who wou'd not be indulg'd on the Terms of Suspending the Covenant, carrying their Prejudices as far as Excommunication. Tyranny enabled. The Scots Parliament, in the Year 1669, pass'd an Act to assert the King's Supremacy in so high a Strain, that it might have been stretch'd to every thing. Bishop Leighton was against it, so were many of the best Episcopal Clergy, as Nairn, Charteris, &c. By another Act, they settled the Militia, declaring they shou'd march into any of the King's Dominions, as his Majesty should think necessary, and now having enslav'd both Church and State, Lauderdale brag'd of his Merit in it, and told the King in a Letter, All Scotland is now in your Power. Notwithstanding the Talk ever now and then of Moderation, Indulgence, Comprehension and Union, in the very next Session of the Scots Parliament, the Severities against the Kirk were increas'd. Lauderdale, with his own Hand, put in a Word in the new Act that cover'd Papists, the Fines being to be laid only on such of the Reform'd Religion as went not to the Church. All Field Meetings made Treason. Field Meetings were declar'd Treasonable and Capital in the Preacher. The Landlords on whose Grounds they were held, were to be severely fin'd, and all who were at them, to be be punish'd Arbitrarily. Half of the Parliament abhorr'd this Act, and the King himself said, He wou'd never have pass'd it, had he known it before-hand. In this miserable State we must leave Scotland, but shall hardly find any other Part of the British Dominions in a better.

At last the Parliament of England cou'd see what every one else had seen long before them, and in March, presented an Address to the King, setting forth the Causes of the Growth of Popery, the great Number of Priests and Jesuits frequenting the Cities of London and Westminster, their Chapels and Convents in other Cities and Towns in England, their Schools, Books and Catechisms, their enjoying beneficial Places, other Persons acting in Trust for them, &c. They then propos'd Remedies against these growing Mischiefs, a Proclamation to banish all Popish Priests and Jesuits, a vigorous Execution of the Laws against Recusants, a Check to be given to the great Resort of the English to the Popish Chapels of Foreign Ministers, not to admit them to any Employment, Civil and Military; an Order to apprehend one Plunket, who goes under the Name of Primate of Ireland, and one Peter Talbot, who takes on him the Name of Archbishop of Dublin. The Lords boggled a little at this Address, when it was first sent up to them, but came into it afterwards, and join'd with the Commons in presenting it. His Majesty after a gracious Answer, told them, he wou'd make a Difference between those who had newly chang'd their Religion, and those who had serv'd his Father and himself in the late Wars. It goes against the Grain to do any thing that gives good Catholicks Offence. However, a Proclamation did come out against Papists, and I wonder the Parliament should so gravely mention such a Thing, when not one Proclamation against them had been effectually executed, since this Royal House reign'd in England. Dearly did they buy what was so little worth, the gracious Answer to the Address against Papists, by a Subsidy Bill, an Excise Bill, a Law Bill, a Bill for Imposition on foreign Commodities. Against the Subsidy Bill, the old Lord Lucas stood up, and made an honest old English Speech on the 22d of February, which being printed and publish'd, was order'd by the Ministry to be burnt by the Hands of the common Hang-man. This Speech being at large in the State Tracts, and Echard, I shall refer to it, only take what was said upon it, at the Time it was burnt, out of another Author, "All true English Men were griev'd and astonish'd at the " Burning of it, but I dare affirm this barbarous Usage did so little discourage my Lord " Lucas from doing his Duty, that he wou'd " have submitted himself to the same Fate, if " his Death might have prevented these approaching Calamities, which have since been " so fatally destructive to this poor Kingdom; " but God has taken him from an ungrateful " Generation, and from the Evil to come, and " left us to lament the Loss of so worthy a " Patriot. Who shall shew his Majesty those " dreadful Precipices, whereon French Fraud and " Popish Malice have plac'd us, from whence they " daily expect not only to see him fall, but to " dash himself in Pieces? Who shall tell the House " of Peers by what generous Steps their Ancestors " ascended to those immortal Titles of Honour and " Renown? Who shall tell the House of Commons of their profuse and lavish Squandering " the Wealth and Liberties of this now weak " and perishing, but once mighty, and invincible People?" He intends the Felicities of this felicitous Reign, which the Compleat Historian so dwells upon. The Excise Bill, the Law Bill, and the Subsidy Bill, only were computed at two Millions and an half. The standing Revenue of the Crown was two Millions yearly; yet all this, and more, wou'd not pay for the Fleet one Summer, and answer the numberless prodigal Calls of the Court. The Duke of Tork too had 24,000 Pounds a Year given him this Session, instead of the Wine Licenses. The Bill for laying Imposts on certain Foreign Commodities, pass'd the House of Commons, notwithstanding the Opposition that was made to it by the London Merchants, who follow'd it to the Lords, and petition'd them against it, shewing the Inequality and Disproportion of the Rates, and that it wou'd be an irreparable Prejudice to the English Plantations; upon which the Lords thought it absolutely necessary to make some Alterations in the Bill, and sent it back to the Commons, with their Reasons for those Alterations, which the Commons wou'd by no Means admit of, and it occasion'd a long Controversy, about the Right or no Right of the Lords to alter Money Bills; in which the Commons had so far the better of the Argument, that the King was forc'd to put an End to the Session, as the surest Way to cut the Knot which the Lords had ty'd; and on the 22d of April his Majesty prorogu'd the Parliament to the 16th of the next April, almost a whole Year; after which it was prorogu'd again, and made a Recess of twenty-one Months. In this Session the noble Earl of Clare made a notable Speech on the King's coming so frequently to the House of Peers, and sitting without his Robes, to influence the most honourable Members of that House, which was done sometimes with so much Indecency, Lord Lucas's Speech burnt.

The King a Parliament Solitor.

A.D. 1671 Indecency, that his Majesty wou'd not stick to solicit for or against Bills, as one Lord does another.

On the 31st of March dy'd the Dutches of York, after a long Indisposition, in the 34th Year of her Age. She was interr'd in the Vault of Mary Queen of Scots, in Henry the VIIIth's Chapel, in Westminster-Abbey. It was observ'd that she had not receiv'd the Sacrament in fourteen Months before the Time of her Decease, and that she was upon all Occasions for excusing the Errors which the Church of Rome was charg'd with, giving them the best Colours they were capable of. An unmarried Clergy was a common Topick with her. Bishop Morley was her Father Confessor, she having practis'd secret Confession from the Time she was twelve Years of Age. When Bishop Morley press'd her to receive the Sacrament, she pretended ill Health or Business, protesting she had no Scruples with relation to her Religion. Blandford, then Bishop of Worcester, was her Confessor after Morley was sent from Court: She solemnly engag'd to Morley, that if ever she had any Scruples, she wou'd let him know them; and he protested to Bishop Burnet, that to her Death she never own'd to him she had any Scruples, though she was for some Days entertain'd by him at Farnham, after the Date of the Paper which was publish'd in her Name.

Bishop Burnet writes, "All this pass'd between Morley and me, upon the Duke's shewing me that Paper, all writ in her own Hand, which was afterwards publish'd by Maimbourg. He wou'd not let me take a Copy of it, but gave me Leave to read it, of which I gave Morley an Account immediately; and he concluded that that unhappy Princess had been prevail'd on to give Falshoods under her Hand, and to pretend that what was contain'd in that Paper, were the Grounds of her Conversion. When she was in the Agony of Death, Blandford was sent for, but before he came, the Queen was come, and sat by her. Blandford was so modest and humble, that he had not Presence of Mind enough to begin Prayers, which probably wou'd have driven the Queen out of the Room: But that not being done, she pretended Kindness, and wou'd not leave her. He happen'd to say, I hope you continue still in the Truth: Upon which she ask'd, What is Truth? And then her Agony encreasing, she repeated the Word Truth, Truth, Truth, often; and, continues the Right Reverend Historian, in a few Minutes after she dy'd, very little believ'd or lamented." The long Letter her Father, the Earl of Clarendon, wrote her, when he heard of her waverings in her Religion, came not till after her Death. The Duke of York abjur'd the Protestant Religion about the same Time, and in that shew'd he had a little more Conscience than his Brother, and was asham'd, or afraid, of mocking God any longer.

Dutcheſs of York dies, very little believ'd or lamented.

Blood steals the Crown.

On the 9th of May, Major Blood, with two more, his Son, and one Perrot, attempted to steal the Crown, and Crown Jewels, in the Tower. Blood pretended Friendship to the Keeper, suddenly Gag'd the old Man, and when he cry'd out, struck him on the Head, but wou'd not kill him, and so went off with the Crown. As soon as he and the two others were gone, the Keeper's Son comes in, ungags his Father, runs out after them, crying, Treason! Murder! Which giving the Alarm to the Warders and Centinels, Blood, his Son, and Perrot, were taken, and the Crown recover'd. It was a little batter'd, and some Stones missing, but they also were found, and brought back to the Tower. Blood disguis'd himself in a Parson's Gown, which gave occasion to a Rhime which is too well known to be repeated here, tho' one may be provok'd to it, by the Ecclesiasticks representing Blood and his Company as so many Murtherers; for if they wou'd have knock'd the Keeper, Edwards, on the Head, they had infallibly carry'd the Crown away. 'Tis a long History in Echard, from a notable Manuscript of Sir Gilbert Talbot's, which being a Treasure among so much Poverty, I will rob his Work of no more, but say what is not there. Blood was brought to the King, and expected Death; but he spoke so boldly, that, as my Author has it, all admir'd him. He told the King, Many of his Subjects were disoblig'd, and that he himself was one, who took himself to be in a State of Hostility, and had not taken the Crown as a Thief, but as an Enemy, thinking that lawless which was lawful in a War; and that he cou'd many a time have had the King in his Power, but that he thought his Life was better for them than his Death, left a worse succeed him; and that the Number of resolute Men disoblig'd was so great, that if his own Life was taken away, it wou'd be reveng'd. What a Mystery does Echard make of the King's pardoning Blood, and his Accomplices? Why 'tis plain they were all frighted at Court, and thought it safer to bribe him than hang him: So, according to Echard, he had 500 Pounds a Year settled upon him in Ireland; but he wou'd not tell us 'twas in Consideration of an Estate which had before been taken from him by the Duke of Ormond. For Blood told the King farther, "That he intended no Harm to the Person of the Duke of Ormond, but because he had taken his Estate from him, he wou'd have forc'd him to restore the Value in Money; and that he never robb'd nor shed Blood, which if he wou'd have done, he cou'd easily have kill'd Ormond, and easily have carry'd away the Crown. My Author concludes thus, "In a Word, he so behav'd himself, that the King did not only release and pardon him, but admitted him frequently to his Presence: Some say, because his Gallantry took much with him, having been a Soldier of his Fathers." The Archdeacon, as honestly and ingeniously as one might expect from him, calls this Blood the Arch-Villain, and tells us, he pretended great Interest and Sway among the Dissenters; and that the Cause of his engaging in a Plot to murder the King, was for his Majesty's Severity over the Consciences of the GODLY, in suppressing the Freedom of their Religious Assemblies. Though such Wickedness as this meets not its Reward in this World, it will not fail of it in the next; and 'tis Pity such a Thought as that had not restrain'd the Author. For to insinuate that the Presbyterians were in Conspiracy with Blood, not only to steal the Duke of Ormond, and the Crown, but to assassinate the King, adds Malignity to Uncharitableness, and is what I am really asham'd to meet with in English History. There is however some excellent Memoirs in his Annals of this Year, as these.

Baxter's Life, Fol. 88. Blood's Speech terrifies the King.

p. 89.

Before the King undertook the War, he thought solemnities fit to celebrate some great Solemnities relating to the Garter, at his Palace of Windsor, where noble Preparations were made; and on the 23d of April, being the Feast of St. George, the King of Sweden was install'd Knight of the Order by his Proxy the Earl of Carlisle, and the Elector of Saxony, by his Proxy the Earl of Winchelsea; and the Arms of the following defunct Knights were hung up, William Earl of Salisbury, Thomas Earl of Berkshire, Algernon Earl of Northumberland, Thomas Earl of Southampton, Montagu Earl

A.D. 1671

Earl of Lindsey, Edward Earl of Manchester, George Duke of Albemarle. Monk's Garter was given to Christopher his Son, though Objections were made to the Genealogy in Westminster-Hall about twenty Years after. The Feast being over, the King went to Portsmouth and the Isle of Wight; from thence by Sea to Plymouth; thence back by Exeter and Wilton to Windsor and Whitehall; from thence again to Newmarket, Euston-Hall, Yarmouth, and the City of Norwich, where he Knighted the Author of Religio Medici, Dr. Thomas Brown; thence to Sir John Hobart's at Blecking, Sir Robert Paston's at Oxney; to Newmarket and Cambridge, where he Knighted Charles Caesar, Son to Sir Henry Caesar; thence back to Newmarket and London, where, on the Lord Mayor's Day, he and the Court were feasted in the City; and he conferr'd the Honour of Knighthood on Jonathan Dawes and Robert Clayton, Esquires, then Sheriffs: One of them, Sir Robert Clayton, treated the same Company in his Shrivalty; when the Duke of Buckingham, to whom Clayton was Scrivener, and who understood Gallantry as well as any Courtier in Christendom, mistaking his Majesty, made such a Discovery as is fit for no History but what is intended to be Secret.

Echard enlarges on these Solemnities, Journies, and Feastings, which are unworthy Historical Remembrance. If any thing of that Hand is met with in good Historians, it refers to great Princes and Conquerors, of whose Actions the curious Reader wou'd let not the least escape him; but the Curiosity ceases when one finds nothing else of more Importance; and if a Prince does not appear concern'd for the Welfare of his People, none of them can have much Concern for his Pleasures and Pastimes. I can't help remembering what the Compleat Historian calls the State of Religion this Year.

Walter, Lord Bishop of Oxford, was, on the 10th of June, at St. Mary Savoy, in the Presence of all the Bishops in Town, translated to the See of Worcester, and did Homage to his Majesty in the usual Forms, on June the 18th.

On June the 27th, for the Historian is extremely exact in the Dates of these Religious Matters, Dr. Nathaniel Crew, Son to the Lord Crew, and Clerk of the Closet to his Majesty, Bishop elect of Oxford, and Dr. Thomas Wood, late Dean of Litchfield, Bishop elect of Coventry and Litchfield, receiv'd their Confirmation at St. Mary Savoy; and on Sunday, July the 2d, were solemnly Consecrated in the Chapel at Lambeth, by his Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Bishops of London, Ely, Lincoln, Worcester, and Rochester.

On Sunday, October the 1st, Dr. Henry Bridgeman, Dean of Chester, was in the Choir of that Cathedral Church consecrated Bishop of Sodor and Man, by the Lord Bishop of Chester, as Substitute of his Grace the Archbishop of York, assisted by the Bishops of Bangor, St. Asaph, and Clougher, in the Presence of many Persons of great Quality, who were afterwards very nobly entertain'd by the new Bishop.

On February the 12th, upon the Vacancy of the Bishoprick of Durham, upon the Death of Dr. John Cosens, Lord Bishop and Count Palatine (this is what the Compleat Historian terms the State of Religion) his Majesty was pleas'd to constitute Sir Gilbert Gerard, Knight and Baronet, to be High Sheriff of the same; as likewise to appoint Sir Francis Goodrick to be Temporal Chancellor, &c. There is more of this Ecclesiastical History in the same Paragraph, but I am not much edify'd by this; and fearing the Reader shou'd make the like Complaint, I have done with it. This will serve to shew what these Men understand by the State of Religion. The same Historian speaking of the persecuted Dissenters, says, "They shou'd not have complain'd of Persecution, without confessing the true Reasons of it;" and then he continues eight or ten Lines with true Reasons, which has in them as much Falstiy in Fact and Argument, as they cou'd well contain. I will quote him at large, that I may not be thought to have done him Injustice; and here let me observe, that when I animadverted on Echard's History of England, my Design was at first to have taken in also the Compleat History, with which I was well acquainted, having had a considerable Hand in the Publication of both of them, and having made my Objections to both with some Warmth before they were publish'd, as is well known to the Proprietors; but the Compleat History was so incomplete, so immethodical, so mean in Matter and Stile, that I cou'd not think it worth Animadversion, and I am drawn into so much of it now, by this Church History: That concerning the Dissenters follows immediately that concerning the State of Religion, and is thus; "The Laws had impos'd moderate Penalties upon the Dissenters: "The two Houses were express for the Execution of those Laws; the Bishops and Clergy "were sincerely zealous in it, but the King and "the Ministry were for stopping the legal Proceedings against them, and were in the Secret "of dispensing with the Laws Ecclesiastical and "Civil, for the sake of indulging the Papists and "the Nonconformists. This encouraged the Dissenters to defy the Laws, to which they wou'd "most of them have submitted, if they had found "a steady and impartial Execution of them; and "this again provok'd the honest Justices and Magistrates to bear the more hard upon them, "when they saw them so bold in despising and "evading the Justice of the Nation." There it is! the Page 286—and one may defy the most Bookish Man in Great Britain to match it. Dr. Calamy preserves a Christian Temper on this Occasion, which it wou'd be happy for me, and all Men, if we cou'd imitate, and be calm amidst such a Tempest of Abuse and Railing. He, says the Doctor, our excellent Historian, affirms the Laws impos'd but moderate Penalties upon Dissenters, and that they defy'd the Justice of the Nation; which speaking of them as a Body, and in general, as this compleat charitable Writer does, is notoriously false. Yet all that the Doctor adds upon it, is, He in effect justifies the Severities against them, and if this yields him Comfort upon a cool Reflection, I am far from envying him his Satisfaction. I begin with the moderate Penalties, and shall make use of an Author who wrote on the same Side with Atterbury, Sacheverel, &c. in Harley's Time, I mean the Review, he must have no other Name in History; and in his Preface to Delaune's Plea, he has this Passage: I am sorry to say Mr. Delaune is one of the 8000 Dissenters that perish'd in Prison in the Days of that merciful Prince King Charles the Second, and that meerly for dissenting from the Church in Points, which they cou'd give such Reasons for, as this Plea assigns; and for no other Cause were sifted (I had almost said murder'd) in Goals, for their Religion, in the Days of these Gentlemens Power who pretend to abhor Persecution. I shall in the next Place produce the Plea itself, where it speaks of these Penalties, and the defying of the Justice of the Nation. "As "for the severe Penalties inflicted on Dissenters, "as Seditious and Riotous, for their assembling "together to worship God, as though they there- "by infring'd the Law, and violated the publick "Peace,

"Intent and Meaning of those Statutes, if the "Maxim of the Law be true, that the Intention
 "makes the legal Trespass, both as to Treason,
 "Felony, Murder, Riot, 23 Years Experience
 "evidences their quiet and peaceable Behaviour,
 "and that they have been as far from Sedition
 "and Riot, as the Law defines, as any in the "Nation." He then gives the Definition of a Riot out of the great Lawyer Lambert. I have a Cloud of Witnesses against the Compleat Historian, which I am ready to produce, when it is thought necessary; but these two Evidences are,
 I think, sufficient. He confesses the Bishops and Clergy were zealous in persecuting Protestant Dissenters; but he shou'd have done Justice to those Bishops and Clergy who abhor'd it; as Bishop Wilkins, Bishop Reynolds, Dr. Tillotson, Dr.
 Whitchoor, Dr. Patrick, Dr. Grove, Dr. Fowler, &c. And it must here be remember'd, that in the Times of Whitgift, Bancroft and Laud, and now in Skeldons Persecution, the most pious, learned, wise and reverend Fathers, the Bishops, and the most pious, wise and learned Divines of the Church of England, declar'd against these Unchristian-like Severities, were always for Moderation, and as exemplary for Prudence, Temper and Charity, as for their Abilities, Learning and Piety; for which they have always been be-lov'd and esteem'd as the Pillars and Glory of the Reformation. The Compleat Historian begs the Question, and asserts, that if the Dissenters had been persecuted more, they wou'd have all come in. Does he mean, If they had perish'd all, there had been none left to dissent? And he commends the Justices of Peace, who had the Reform'd Ministers out of their Pulpits; such as Philips, Skeldon, Steward, Starling, &c. for their Honesty in so doing, tho' it is well known, that the Justices, Informers, Constables, and all Officers, who busy'd themselves in that infamous Business, were the most lewd, debauch'd, insolent, despicable Wretches, pick'd out for doing Work which a truly honest Man wou'd have dy'd before he wou'd have consented to. As to his Bishops and Clergy, we will see an Account of them in Bishop Burnet's Memoirs. "The King
 "himself was highly offended at the Behaviour "of the Bishops: He took Occasion to vent it at "the Council-Board. Upon the Complaints that "were made of some Disorders, and of some "Conventicles," He said, The Clergy were chiefly to blame for them; for if they had liv'd well, we might have read our selves blind before we shou'd have found they liv'd ill in such Histories as the Compleat one and Echard's. If they had gone about their Parishes and taken Pains to convince the Nonconformists, the Nation might by this Time have been well settled; but they thought of nothing but to get good Benefices, and to keep a good Table. Again, His Majesty is still speaking, *If the Clergy had done their Part, it had been an easy Thing to run down the Dissenters; but they will do nothing, and will have me do every thing;
 and most of them do worse than if they did nothing.
 I have a Chaplain who is a very honest Man, but a very great Blockhead, to whom I gave a Living in Suffolk, which was full of that sort of People. He went about among them from House to House, tho' I can't imagine what he cou'd say to them, for he was a very silly Fellow; but I believe his Nonsense suited their Nonsense, for he brought them all to Church, and in Reward of his Diligence, I gave him a Bishoprick in Ireland.* This

Chaplain one may suppose to be a pious, sober A.D. 1671 Man, which explain'd according to this King's Way of living and thinking, must be Nonsense, and that Meeting with the Sobriety and Piety of the Suffolk Protestants, which was their Nonsense also, might produce the Harmony his Majesty speaks of.

The Compleat Historian knew, at least one ought to believe his Knowledge went so far, that the persecuting Acts, the Laws Ecclesiastical and Civil, as he styles them, were the Laws of a Set of Mercenary Pensioners, and so much against natural Justice, that the same Parliament vacated them, one only excepted, which, many think, deserv'd vacating as much as the rest, by their Bill for the Ease of Dissenters. I do not reckon this a Digression, as long as it is, because my Design in this Undertaking was not so much to tell the Facts, as to tell the Causes and Intent of them, and to shew what Measures and what Instruments were made use of in these Reigns to destroy the true reform'd Religion, and the Liberty of the Subject, in these Nations. Among those Instruments we shall find none more active than the persecuting Bishops and Clergy, whose Zeal is so highly recommended to us by the Author of the Compleat History.

We have mention'd Mr. Coventry's Negotiation in Sweden. Sir George Downing was sent to Holland to supply Sir William Temple's Place.
 The Lord Arlington stil'd him his Rough Hand, for his Manners were as rude as those of an Iroquois, in whose Neighbourhood he was bred, and had all the Brutality without the Simplicity of those American Savages. His Arrival at the Hague was the sure Preface of a Storm: He fell a bullying the States immediately about something or nothing, as his thick Scull work'd him.
 He was to demand Satisfaction for Damages sustain'd by the East-India Company since the Treaty of Breda. A Committee of that Company was sent for to Whitehall to warrant that Demand by a Complaint; but they gave it under their Hands, that since the Treaty of Breda they knew none. The next Demand was Satisfaction for detaining the English Planters at Surinam. The Dutch reply'd, that those Planters might go if they wou'd; but they knew not where else to get a Livelihood. A third Demand was Satisfaction for certain Droll Pieces, as the King and Nell weak De-Gwin, Moll Davis and his Majesty, a Pursemand of the Dutch.
 without a Penny in it, and the like; which the States General knew no more of, than Queen Anne did of the Printseller's mounting her on a Dray-Horse in a Half-Penny Picture. But the chief Demand of all was about the Honour of the Flag; for you must know, that the Royal House of Stuart piqu'd themselves in a marvellous Manner on their Standing up for the Honour of the Nation. This however wou'd have been made up in a Minute's Conference, if the King had not been set upon breaking the Treaty of Breda, the Triple League, and the Treaty of Aix; all which the French King had bought of him for 700,000 Pounds, to be paid to Mr. Chis-Finch for his Britanick Majesty's Use. The Particular of the Flag is a very merry Incident, and is told by Sir William Temple in the following Letter to his Father Sir John Temple: "In the Flag. "July the Dutch Fleet was floating in the "Channel, to shew, I suppose, that they were in "Condition to meet any of those Dangers they "began to suspect from the Motion of France,
 "and from our late Conduct. When the Captain "of the Yatch that was order'd to convey my "Wife over, took his Leave at Court, he had
 "publick Orders given him, if he came in Sight "of the Dutch Fleet, he shou'd sail thro' them,
 "and

A.D. 1671 " and shoot at those Ships that were next him, till he made them strike Sail, or till they shot at him again, and then pursue his Course. He pass'd, it seems, into Holland without seeing them; but as he return'd he met the Fleet, and sailing up to them, made several Shot at those near him; upon which they seem'd at least not to know what he meant, and to believe he might be in some Distress: And the Admiral sent a Boat a-board him to enquire. The Captain told them he had been sent to bring back the English Ambassadors with her Family from Holland, and had Orders to make the Dutch Fleet strike wherever he met with them in the Channel. Upon this Message by the Boat, Vice-Admiral Ghent came a-board the Yacht upon a Complement to my Wife, which he perform'd very handsomely, and afterwards desir'd to speak with the Captain, of whom he enquir'd the Reason of his shooting, and receiving the same Answer which had been given to the first Boat, He said it was a Point they had receiv'd no Order in from their Masters, and did not know how that Affair was agreed been his Majesty and the States; but tho' it were settled, yet the Captain cou'd not pretend the Fleet and Admiral shou'd strike to a Yacht, which was but a Pleasure-Boat, or at least serv'd only for Passage, and cou'd not pass for one of the King's Men of War. The Captain reply'd, He had his Orders, and was bound to follow them. After Van Ghent was gone, the Captain, perplex'd enough, came to my Wife, and desir'd to know what she pleas'd he shou'd do in that Case, which she saw he did not like very well, and wou'd be glad to get out of by her Help. She told him he knew his Orders best, and what he was to do upon them, which she left to him to follow as he thought fit, without any Regard to her and her Children. He pursu'd his Course, and landed her safe; after which she went to Court, and was very well receiv'd, and much commended for her Part in what had pass'd; and at Night Sir Lionel Jenkins was sent to take her Information in Form upon the whole Matter of Fact. When I went next to the King's Levee, he began to speak of my Wife's Carriage at Sea, and to commend it as much as he blam'd the Captain's, and said she had shew'd more Courage than he. Which I do not understand. Wherein did the Captain shew want of Courage, in not Fighting his Cockboat against the Dutch Admiral and 100 Sail of Men of War? The King falling upon the Dutch Insolence, Sir William Temple said, That however Matters went, it must be confess'd that there was some Merit in his Family, since he had made the Alliance with Holland, and his Wife was like to have the Honour of making the War. The King smil'd as well as he, and it turn'd off the Discourse to something else. Thus was Christendom to be made a Scene of Slaughter and Blood out of Frolick in one Prince, and Ambition in another. The French King was not at much Trouble to draw up his Declaration of War; he only told the World he was dissatisfy'd with the Dutch, and among other Things about Pictures too, probably that of his beloved Concubine, Madam Montespan, whom I have seen in a Dutch Print straddling the Globe in a very indecent Posture, assisting Lewis to cut his Way through it. But many of the Persons then living liv'd long enough to see his Prime Minister begging a Peace in their Master's Name, in a Corner of one of the Provinces which he had already conquer'd in Imagination.

The Secret League between King Lewis and King Charles is as well attested as any Historical Event in several Authentick Memoirs; but the Obligation of it is best set forth in a Paper found in the Earl of Tyrconnel's Closet; which Paper is mention'd by his Grace Dr. King, Lord Archbishop of Dublin, in a Thanksgiving Sermon before the Lords Justices of Ireland, preach'd in St. Patrick's Church in Dublin upon the Reduction of that Kingdom. It bears Date the 1st of July, this Year 1671, and by it both Kings, Charles and Lewis, oblige themselves to suppress the Insolency of the Dutch, to establish Popery in England, and make the King absolute Master of his Subjects. My Lord Archbishop produces another Proof of it; the Count d'Avaux's Memorial to the States before the Revolution; as also a Letter written by Malony, the Popish Bishop of Kilaloe in Ireland, to a Correspondent of his, wherein he states this to be the Design of the French King, and expresses great Anger, that some Trimmers about the King, then James, did disown any such Treaty with his most Christian Majesty. The learned Acherly writes of it thus: As to the Consequences of the BREACH of the Triple League, " In regard that secret End of that Breach, and of the Alliance with France to subdue Holland, was to make King Charles absolute Master of the Parliament, the pleasing Acquisition was in immediate View, by the sure Conquest of Holland; it was therefore fit for the King to exercise, and he did exercise some Acts of arbitrary Power, in order to inure the People to bear the Form of his intended new Government, which he experimented thus;

He dispens'd with all Penal Laws against Non-conformists. Dispensing Power.

He shut up the Exchequer; and to use Bishop Parker's own Words, He turn'd it into a Place of Robbery. 139. Bp. Parker calls the King Robber.

He caus'd Writs to be sent out for Elections of Members, to fill up vacant Places in the House of Commons in the last Interval of Parliament, &c. shut up. 1672.

On the 2d of January the King declar'd in Council, " That seeing all the neighbouring Powers and States were making great Preparations for War both by Sea and Land, he, for the Safety and Government of his People, look'd upon himself as oblig'd to make such Preparations as might be proportionable for the Protection both of the one and the other, and to that End had given Orders for fitting and preparing a very considerable Fleet against next Spring; and considering the great Charges that must attend such Preparations, and not finding any Possibility to defray such unusual Expences by the usual Ways and Means of borrowing Money, by reason his Revenues were so anticipated and engag'd, he was therefore necessitated, contrary to his own Inclinations, upon these Emergencies, and for the publick Safety, to cause a Stop at present to be made of the Payment of any Monies now being, or to be brought into his Exchequer, for the Space of one Year, ending the last Day of December next, unto any Person whatsoever, excepting only such Payments as shall grow due upon Orders on the Subsidy, according to the Act of Parliament, and Orders and Securities upon the Fee-Farm Rents, but Payment of Interest to be duly made in the mean Time at 6 per Cent. At the same Time the King declar'd, that no Person whatsoever shall be defrauded of any thing that is justly due to him, nor shall this Restraint continue longer than the aforesaid last Day of December.

The Sum stopp'd by this Declaration was 1,400,000 Pounds; the Restraint was never taken off, and the Creditors were defrauded of every Farthing, which is an additional Proof to others given before, of his Majesty's being, as he said, a King of his Word. Mr. Baxter, who had 1000 Pounds in the Exchequer when it was shut up, tells us, The Murmur and Complaint in the City was very great, that their Estates shou'd be, as they call'd it, so surpris'd, and the rather, because they took a Year to be Perpetuity, and the Stop to be a Loss of all, seeing Wars use to encrease Necessities, and not to supply them.

How this Matter came about was not known, till the Publication of the Third Volume of the Secret History. I took that Account out of a Manuscript, written by Sir Joseph Tyley, the same whose Name is in the Proclamation about the pretended Presbyterian Plot at the latter End of this Reign. He went to Holland, came back to England with the Duke of Mommouth, made his Escape after Sedgmore Fight, return'd to Holland, and from thence came back again to England with the Prince of Orange, was chosen Citizen in Parliament for Exeter, in Opposition to Sir Edward Seymour in the Year 1695, and was soon after Knighted by King William. He had great Acquaintance with the leading Men of the Country Party in this and the following Reign, till his Death, which I speak for the Credit of his Memoirs, wherein I found as follows;

His Majesty, in a private Meeting with the Cabal, declar'd, If any one of them cou'd advise a Method how to raise 1,500,000 Pounds without a Parliament, he shou'd have the White Staff. The next Day the Lord Ashley told Sir Thomas Clifford in Confidence, There was a Way to supply the King immediately with such a Sum, but that it was hazardous to be put in Practice, and might draw with it a Train of ill Consequences, by enflaming both the Parliament and People. Sir Thomas was impatient to know the Secret; he was bold and daring, entirely in the French and Popish Interest, pleas'd with every thing that might render the King uneasy with Parliaments, to engage him the closer with France and Rome, which made him eager to know my Lord Ashley's Project. He ply'd my Lord with Visits, and having one Night drank him to a Pitch, he insensibly led him into a Conversation of the King's Necessities; and Lord Ashley being warm, dropp'd the important Secret. Sir Thomas took the Hint immediately, left my Lord as soon as he handsomely cou'd, went directly to Whitehall, and without going to Bed attended till the King rose, fell on his Knees, and demanded the White Staff, according to his Promise. His Majesty reply'd, God's-fish! I'll be as good as my Word, if you can find the Money. Then Sir Thomas told him, If you will shut up the Exchequer, you may be sure of 1,500,000 Pounds. The King, who was as quick as any of his Ministers, and had a Conscience of pretty much the same Turn, gave into it presently, and Sir Thomas Clifford was made Lord High Treasurer, and a Peer. Lord Ashley was sensibly touch'd at being thus circumvented by Lord Clifford; but the Thing was done, and he put the best Face he cou'd on it, saying, Clifford has plough'd with my Heifer.

The Proposal for shutting up the Exchequer was made in Council by Sir Thomas Clifford, who said, The King must have Money to carry on the War against Holland, in which his Honour was engag'd, that he knew no other Means at present than shutting up the Exchequer; and he desir'd none wou'd speak against it, without proposing some Method more certain and expeditious: To which there was no Reply. So the Exchequer was shut up by Force of the Prerogative, to the Surprize of the whole Kingdom, attended with the Tears and Lamentations of the many unfortunate Families concern'd in it, who found themselves ruin'd in a Moment.

The Earl of Arlington writing to the Earl of Sunderland, then Ambassador in Spain, speaks of it thus; His Majesty has resolv'd this Week in Council to resume his Assignations; a Courtly Term for what Bishop Parker calls Robbery, and possess himself with all his current Revenue; which was not his, but the Merchants, Bankers, and other Mens, who had lent their Money to him, postponing their Debts for a Twelve Month, and paying only 6 per Cent. of what thereof was taken up at Interest. This hath made a great Outcry in the City, and meeting with ill Humours, not to submit patiently to the Oppression and Tyranny of an ill Government is an ill Humour with them, hath begot a great deal of angry Discourse; but we hope, when those who have lent the Bankers Money, shall reflect better upon it, and see their Principle and Interest better secur'd. The Effrontery and Insolence! They never had a Penny of the Money from the Stuart Line, and it was better secur'd, was it not, in the King's Word, than the Law of the Land? That they will appease themselves, and have no Cause to apprehend those ill Consequences they have foretold upon it: All which the Man that says it knew very well wou'd happen. He tells his Correspondent, the Money will be all paid in a Twelve Month, which is not all paid to this Day. He adds, His Majesty having Yesterday conven'd the Bankers before him at the Treasury, after many kind and confident Assurances given them, not one of which was ever perform'd, that he wou'd punctually satisfy his Debt to them, either out of what the Parliament shou'd give in the next Session, or out of his own Revenue, which was appropriated to more gallant Uses, he told them, what follows is as merry as Absurdity can make a Thing, he requir'd of them, that without Delay they take off the Stop they had made of paying the Merchants their current Cash, which lay deposited in their Hands, not to be lent to his Occasions, or for Interest, but for the Security of keeping it, because indeed the Stop of this had occasion'd great Clamour. The King keeps their Money from them, and then commands them to pay those to whom they owe it. His Majesty knew better what Goldsmiths receiv'd current Cash for, than to think it was only to lock it up in an Iron Chest, and tell it out again to the Merchants and others as they wanted it.

Echard has made some Use of Sir Joseph Tyley's Memoirs, and particularly where the Shutting up of the Exchequer is spoken of, which he also saw in the Secret History, and also what follows, which is likewise to be seen in the State Tracts. The Treasurer Clifford was the most deeply engag'd of any of the Ministers in the Secret Alliance with France; and tho' the Archdeacon's, and the Compleat Historian's Rage against this Ministry, is very remarkable, yet it is not to be imputed to them as a Disgust for these ruinous Measures; not for shutting up the Exchequer, but for opening Protestant Meeting-Houses; not for stopping Payments, but for stopping Persecution, tho' the Ministry came into that upon different Views, as will be seen in its Course. Lord Clifford's View was well known to every body; he was a Papist, tho' he durst not yet own it, he was zealous for Popery, and one who wou'd not stick at any thing to promote its Interests. It happen'd, while he had the Staff, that the King, the Duke of Tork, and himself, were shut up in a Room

A.D. 1672 by themselves, when Sir William Bucknall, a Commissioner of the Excise, came to speak with the King, to whom he had free Access, he frequently accommodating his Majesty with Money. In Presumption of his usual Liberty, he went directly to the Room where he heard the King was, and hearing a Discourse, had the Curiosity to get up close to the Door, and hearken to it attentively, which he was excited to do by the King's speaking with some Earnestness, but he could only hear broken and imperfect Expressions: The Duke spoke so low, he could not understand what was said, but Clifford spoke loud, as in Publick, answering the King in a very audible and articulate Manner, in these Words,

Clifford Sir, If you are driven off upon Fears, you will never be safe, the Work will do, if you declare your self with Resolution, there is enough to stand by you; the King reply'd, this Name Popery will never be swallow'd by the People; which having said, he started from his Seat, crying, somebody is at the Door. Clifford ran hastily to it, and without speaking a Word, fell furiously upon Sir

Sir William Bucknall beaten by Clifford. William Bucknall, dragging him to a Pair of Stairs, from whence he kick'd him down, and soon after Sir William dy'd, which was not improbably, imputed to that Misfortune.

If we remember what is told us of the Conduct of Lauderdale, Rothes and others in the Murder of Mitchell at Edinburgh, and join it with the Conduct of the Court and Ministry at London, We must sink into the Dregs of Language to find Words to express our Sentiments; a Man is there murder'd, thousands are here robb'd by a Conspiracy of the Government, the Crimes of Malefactors receive a Sort of horrid Sanction by the Crimes of Ministers. — There is nothing in History to compare to it. —

Prodigious Tyranny. Mr. Marvel, in his Growth of Popery, sets these Things in a good Light, which he was well able to do from his Knowledge of Men and Affairs, being an active Member of this House of Commons. Having spoken of the Robbery at the Exchequer, he proceeds to the Attempt to rob the Dutch Smyrna Fleet. There remain'd nothing now but that the Conspirators after this Exploit upon our own Country-men, should manifest their Impartiality to Foreigners, and avoid on both Sides the Reproach of Injustice, by their Equality in the Distribution. They had now started the Dispute about the Flag, upon the Occasion of the Yatch, and begun the Dispute of Surinam, and somewhat of Pictures and Medals, but they handled these Matters so nicely, as Men not less afraid of receiving all Satisfaction therein from the Hollanders, than of giving them any Umbrage of arming against them upon those Pretences. The Dutch therefore not being conscious to themselves of any Provocation given to England, but of their Readiness, if there had been any to repair it, and relying upon that Faith of Treaties and Alliances, which has been thought sufficient Security, not only among Christians, but even with Infidels, pursu'd their Traffick and Navigation thro' our Seas, and accordingly a great and rich Fleet of Merchant Men from Smyrna and Spain, were on there Voyage homeward, near the Isle of Wight, &c. All the Excuse Eckard makes for this felonious Attempt against those Merchant Ships, before a War declar'd, is, that the King was advis'd to it by the French, and brings Sir Holmes into Action as if he had been a Hero, not a Felon, as if he was going to Fight, and not to Steal. The softest Term that can be us'd for that Incendiary, is Sea-Wolf that preys by stealth, and dives in Danger. However, it must be own'd that this Government knew what Tools were fit for their Work, and were never in want of any, to the Scandal of the English Honesty and Reputation. I will again make use of Marvel: "The Dutch were under a small Convoy of five or six of their Men of War; the Smyrna Fleet was that, in Contemplation of which, the Conspirators had so long deferr'd the War to plunder in Peace; the Wealth of this was that, which by its Weight turn'd the Ballance of all publick Justice and Honour. With this Treasure they imagin'd themselves in Stock for all the Wickedness of which they were capable, and that they should never after this Addition stand in need again, or fear of a Parliament; therefore they had with great Stillness and Expedition, equipp'd early in the Year, so many of the King's Ships, as might without Jealousy of the Numbers, yet be of competent Strength for the intended Action;" but if any thing shou'd chance to be wanting, they thought it abundantly supply'd by the Virtue of the Commander, for Sir Robert Holmes had with the like Number of Ships in the Year 1661, the very next Year after the States had squander'd away between two and three hundred thousands Crowns, in entertaining the King and his Brothers, so timely commenc'd the first Hostility against Holland, seizing upon Cape de Verde, and other of the Dutch Ports, on the Coasts of Guinea, in Time of Peace, and the whole new Netherlands, with great Success, in Defence of which Conquests the English undertook in 1665; the first War against Holland. Clarendon, Monk, Nicholas, Turner, &c. were then chief Men in both Houses of Parliament, active in the Persecuting Bills, and because they were so good Church Men, in the Opinion of the Compleat-Holmes's Historians, therefore do they belie all History, and say as the Archdeacon does of De Ruyter; by taking Cape de Verde, and the Ports in Guinea, which the English Buccaneer Holms had before taken from the Dutch, in Time of Alliance and Friendship, He ingloriously began a Pyratick War under the sacred Bands of Friendship and Alliance. And if ever Pyratick War was begun, it was now in the second Pyratikal Enterprize of Holms against the Dutch Streights, and Smyrna Fleets. Marvel proceeds, Holmes in the first War, with a proportionable Squadron, signaliz'd himself by burning the Dutch Ships and Village of Brandaris at Scbelling. Eckard exults upon that Conquest, and in Amplification of Holmes's Glory, as he calls it, turns the Village into a City. But continues Marvel, That was unfortunately reveng'd upon us at Chatham, for these good Reasons, Holmes was pitch'd upon, as the Person for understanding Experience, and Courage fittest for a Design of this Nature, and upon the 14th of March, as the Dutch fail'd on to the Number of 72 Vessels, near our Coast, he fell upon them with his accusom'd Bravery, and cou'd not have fail'd of giving a good Account of them, wou'd he have join'd Fortunes with Sir Edward Sprague, who was in fight at the same Time with his Squadron, and Captain Legg was making all the Sail he cou'd towards him, to acquaint Sprague with the Design of falling upon the Dutch Merchant Men, but Holmes, who was his Admiral, call'd him back by a Gun, which gave Occasion to various Speculations. The most probable is, that he thought himself sure of Victory, and the Spoil. Sprague came then from Algiers, and had kept Company with the Dutch Fleet, till they advanc'd near the Isle of Wight. By this Means Sprague knew nothing of the Secret, and the Dutch Convoy, and their Merchant Men did so bestir themselves, that Holmes, tho' he shifted his Ship, fell foul on his best Friends, and did all that was possible,

A. D. 1672 unless he cou'd have multiply'd himself, was forc'd to give it over, and all the Prize that was gotten, suffic'd not to pay the Surgeons and Carpenters. Holmes was one of the Pensioners in this Parliament, and cou'd very easily prove, that he had never given one Vote in Favour of the Protestant Religion, or English Liberty, but a constant Vote for Archbishop Sheldon's stinging Acts, and therefore the Archdeacon does not let him come off quite so shamefully. He took one Man of War, and four Merchant Ships, one of which from Smyrna, wou'd pay more Carpenters and Surgeons, than his Fleet cou'd find Employment for. Two Days after was publish'd his Majesty's Declaration of Indulgence,

Declaration of Indulgence. An Account of which Declaration, Edward might have taken out of Marvel, Baxter, Calamy, or even out of the Compleat History of England, with good Authority; instead of which, he has Recourse to the most Lying Memoirs that ever were publish'd, those of Orleans, the French Jesuit, and he introduces them with this notable Encomium, He seems to have had from King James a clearer Information of this Affair, than the common English Writers. I am sure to have my Place among those Common Writers in his marshalling of us; but as never History was more prostituted to a Faction, than his own, and never History stuff'd with such pitiful Matter and idle Remarks, we may all comfort ourselves with the Hopes, that the Disgrace he has laid upon us, will last no longer than his Chronicle. It happens, I have by me a clearer Account, than his clearest Account from the French Priest, and mine is taken from one of the common Writers, Mr. Locke, that Gentleman had it from the Earl of Shaftsbury, who knew more of the Matter, even than King James, and is suppos'd to be the

Des Maiz. Pen-man of the Declaration. Thus, Sir, says Mr. Col. p. 67. Locke, You have perhaps a better Account of the Declaration, than you can receive from any other

Declaration, than you can receive from any other Hand, and I cou'd have wish'd the Indulgence a longer Continuance, and a better Reception than it had, for the Bishops Sheldon, Morley, Gunning, Wood, Sparrow, Henchman, Dolben, Ward, Blandford, Stern, Rainbow, I name them in full Belief that their Names ought never to be forgotten, took so great Offence at it, that they gave the Alarm of Popery thro' the whole Nation, and by their Emiffaries the Clergy, who by the Contexture and Subordination of their Government, have the Advantage of a quick Dispensing of their Orders, and a sudden and universal Insinuation of whatever they please, rais'd such a Cry, that those good and sober Men, who had really fear'd the Encrease and Countenance Popery had hitherto receiv'd, began to believe the Bishops were in Earnest, their Eyes open'd and therefore join'd in heartily with them. The Lord Shaftsbury explaining the Advantages of this Declaration to Mr. Locke, has these Expressions; As to the Church, I conceive the Declaration is extreamly for their Interest; for the narrow Bottom they have plac'd themselves upon, and the Measure they have proceeded by, so contrary to the Properties and Liberties of the Nation, must needs in a short Time prove fatal to them, whereas this leads them into another Way to live peaceably with the dissenting and differing Protestants, both at home and abroad. Such Politicks as these never enter'd into the Heads of Laud, Sheldon, Morley, &c. Did they, or does Mr. Archdeacon believe that their Severities to Non-conformists, plac'd them on a Narrow Bottom, or that their Measures were against the Properties and Liberties of the Nation?

The Earl of Shaftsbury was a Promoter of the Toleration, but not the main Mover in it; Lord

Clifford had more Interest at Court, and by means of the Duke of York, cou'd do much more with the King than Shaftsbury, whom neither the King nor the Duke lov'd. Baxter tells us, the Toleration was chiefly for the Papists Sakes, and one may be assur'd, that Clifford had the chief Hand in it. For when the Declaration was publish'd, the Protestant Dissenters were so far from taking hold of it greedily, that it was a Question among them, Whether it was adviseable, either in Conscience or Prudence for the Presbyterians to take Advantage from his Majesty's Declaration? and a reverend Prelate in a Speech about the Occasional Bill 1703, told the Lords, it was the Lord Clifford, who got a Motion to be made in Favour of the Non-conformists, hoping that wou'd have provok'd either the one Side or the other, and that either the Church Party might be offended with the Motion, or the Dissenters with the refusing it. But it was stopp'd by Alderman Love, one of the Citizens in Parliament for the City of London, who was a Dissenter, and desir'd that nothing with Relation to them might intervene to stop the Security the Nation and the Protestant Religion might have by the Test Act; and in this he was seconded by most of his Party, so that the Act was obtain'd in some Measure by their Assistance, and instead of the Earl of Shaftsbury's proposing the Toleration, as the Jesuit Orleans very falsely affirms, the Lord Clifford propos'd it, as Mr. Locke informs us. This Dominion continu'd unto them until the Lord Clifford, a Man of a daring ambitious Spirit, made his Way to the chief Ministry of Affairs by other and far different Measures, and took the Opportunity of a War with Holland, the King was then engag'd in, to propose the Declaration of Indulgence, and the Earl of Shaftsbury presently clos'd with it. Eckhard had an idle Imagination, that because King James told Orleans, what he tells us, therefore we wou'd, as he does, give implicate Faith to it. We have prov'd it to be diametrically opposite to the Truth, and yet this is what he foolishly and pragmatically calls a clear Account, not in the Common Writers.

Two Days after the Publication of the Indulgence came out, the Declaration of the War with Holland, grounded upon the notable Reason before-mention'd; the Flag, which the Dutch offer'd to yield up; the Surinam Planters, who staid there because they cou'd live no where else; the Pictures and Medals, which the States knew no more of than the Man in the Moon.

The most admirable Part of the Declaration was the winding it up. And whereas we are engag'd by a Treaty to support the Peace made at Aix la Chapelle, we do finally declare, that notwithstanding the Prosecution of this War, we will maintain the true Intent and Scope of the said Treaty ; which is as good wild Irish as ever was put into Print. Notwithstanding I am going to cut your Throat, I am your most faithful and loving Friend. Again, and that in all Alliances which we have or shall make in the Progress of this War, we have and will take Care to preserve the Ends thereof inviolable ; which is as brazen a Bull as was that of Phalaris. He has made a Treaty with the French King to destroy the States, and take their Country from them ; and yet according to this Declaration, he has taken care in that very Treaty, to preserve the Peace of Aix la Chapelle inviolable. This Bundle of Nonsense is entire in Mr. Archdeacon's Collections.

The Dutch, who knew that the Bent of the Nation was against this Rupture, fed themselves all along with Hopes that the Ministry durst not take this bold Step; and when De Wit receiv'd a certain Account of it in a Letter from England,

Des Maiz

tion of War,

A.D. 1672 he fell back upon his Chair almost in a Swoon; but presently recovering himself, he encourag'd the States to make all necessary Preparations. It must be own'd, says Echard, the Dutch had been too inflexible in answering the Demands of the English, as to the Flag; which is as false as the rest of his Chronicle. Marvel tells it thus: The pretended Cause was the not having vail'd the Bonnet to the English Yatch; though the Dutch had all along, both at Home and here, as carefully endeavour'd to give, as the English Ministers to avoid, the receiving of all Satisfaction, or letting them understand what wou'd do it; nay, the Council Clock was on purpose set forward, lest their utmost Compliance in the Flag at the Hour appointed, shou'd prevent the Declaration of War by some Minutes. Yet does Echard, with as much Presumption as Gravity assert, It must be own'd the Dutch were too inflexible, &c. Another Pretence was intended, if the Intention had succeeded, Colonel Joyce, he who when Cornet took the King from Holmby, living in Holland, Orders were sent to Downing to demand him; that if the States refus'd it, the Quarrel might be founded upon it, and if they granted it, the Common-wealth Party might be disgusted: But the States were too wise to be caught by our Ministers, they order'd a Warrant for seizing Joyce, and at the same time caus'd it to be intimated to the Officer, that he shou'd let him make his Escape. The States, in this Extremity, apply'd the best Remedy they had to their Disease, and presented the Prince of Orange with the Command of their Armies, and with the Title of Admiral of the United Provinces, out of which he had been kept by the Intrigues of the Louvestein Faction, whose Head was De Wit, from his Majority to the two and twentieth Year of his Age. About the same time, in April this Year, King Charles sent 6000 choice Foot, under the Command of the Duke of Monmouth, into Flanders, to join the French Army, and assist in the intended Conquest of Holland.

Arbitrary Measures. Besides the stretching of the Prerogative in the Exchequer Business, and the Toleration, the King issued two Acts of Parliament, the Act of Navigation, and the Act for Encouragement of Trade, the Cabal affecting those Measures which serv'd to make his Majesty a great King, as their Cant was, as if Power wou'd make a Prince Great, which was not of his own acquiring, and which he had no more Genius to maintain, than he had to acquire in an honourable Way.

The Archdeacon affirms, that to make himself popular, the King took Henry Marquess of Worcester into his Privy-Council; the same Marquess whom the People, by their Representatives, some time after address'd him to remove from his Counsels, and George Viscount Hallifax, against whom was the like Address, and Thomas Viscount Falconbridge, Oliver's Son in Law, and Arthur Earl of Essex, the Lord Capel's Son, and Sir Thomas Osborn, afterwards Earl of Danby and Duke of Leeds, who ran the Gauntlet through two Parliamentary Impeachments. Sir Thomas Clifford was created Baron Clifford of Chudleigh, Henry Lord Arlington, Earl of Arlington, John Earl of Lauderdale, Duke of Lauderdale. The King also made several Knights of the Garter, as John Duke of Lauderdale, Henry Marquess of Worcester, the Earl of St. Albans, the Earl of Bedford, the Earl of Arlington, and the Earl of Offory.

The Duke of York took upon him the agreeable Command of the Fleet: The Count d'Estreet, Vice-Admiral of France, commanded the White Squadron; and Montagu, Earl of Sandwich, the

A.D. 1672 Blue Squadron; the Red being immediately under his Royal Highness. The War being as Inglorious as Unrighteous, I take no Pleasure in the Detail of it, as Echard does, because the Duke has the Command of it. I shall content my self with Bishop Burnet's Account of the Souldbay Fight at Souldbay, between the English and Dutch Fleets.

De Ruyter had the Glory of surprising the English Fleet, when they were thinking less of engaging the Enemy, than of an extravagant Preparation for the usual Disorders of the Twentieth of May; a Festival which has produc'd as much Wickedness, as another Statute Holiday has Mischief. Which Disorders De Ruyter prevented, by engaging them the 28th of May, in one of the most obstinate Sea-Fights that has happen'd in our Age; in which the French took more Care of themselves than became gallant Men, unless they had Orders to look on, and leave the English and Dutch to fight it out, while they preserv'd the Force of France entire. De Ruyter disabled the Ship in which the Duke was, whom some blam'd for leaving his Ship too soon; but Mr. Archdeacon informs us, He left her with great Intrepidity, very much like the French running away at Blenheim like Lions. Then, says Duke of Bishop Burnet, the Duke's Personal Courage began first to be call'd in question. One wou'd think these History Writers affected Falshood out of a meer Spirit of Opposition, or rather, out of meer Hatred to Truth. The Admiral of the Blue Squadron was burnt by a Fire-ship, after a long Engagement with a Dutch Ship, much inferior to her in Strength: In it the Earl of Sandwich perisht, with a great many about him, who wou'd not leave him, as he wou'd not leave his Ship, by a piece of obstinate Courage, to which he was provok'd by an indecent Reflection the Duke made, on an Advice he had offer'd of drawing nearer the Shoar, and avoiding an Engagement; as if in that he took more Care of himself, than of the King's Honour. The Fight continu'd from eight in the Morning till Sun-set; and when it was over, the French, according to Ludlow, set sail for Brest, and the English retir'd into Port, leaving the Dutch Masters at Sea; and according to Echard, The Dutch stood off, and the Duke sailing after, got the Appearance of a Victory. He is never without a Laurel for that dear Popish Duke of his.

Of the Dutch were KILL'D,

The Admiral of Amsterdam, the Vice-Admiral of Zealand, Capt. Brakes, and three of Cornelius de Wit's Halberdiers near his Person. He had the joint Command of the Fleet with De Ruyter, and sat on the Deck in a Chair, dress'd like a Magistrate, with a drawn Sword in his Hand, giving his Commands, with twelve Halberdiers about him for his Guard.

The

A.D. 1672 The States of Holland well knowing that the Alliance between the English Court and the French was not at all pleasing to the People of England, publish'd a Declaration, to shew that they had been constrain'd to make War against the King, and his private Council, who had design'd and endeavour'd to deprive them of their Commerce and Liberty, and to render the Crown of England Absolute and Independent. But that they were ready to consent, that the People of England might trade freely, either with them or others, they discharg'd and set at Liberty such Ships, Men, and Merchandize, belonging to the English Nation, as they had seiz'd in their Ports, in requital of the Attempt made by that Arch-Pirate Holmes, to surprize their Homeward bound Smyrna Fleet, before any Declaration of War had been publish'd against them. These things oblig'd the King to promise Restitution of what had been unjustly taken from the Dutch before the Date of the said Declaration; but whatever Advantages the Dutch might have by Sea, they were infinitely over-balance'd by their Losses at Land.

French Conquests in Holland.

Lewis XIV. having drawn together 120,000 effective Men, divided them into three Bodies; the First consisting of 70,000, he took under his own peculiar Command; at the Head of the Second, which was of 40,000, he plac'd the Prince of Conde; and gave 10,000 more to the Count de Chamilly, to serve as a flying Camp. All these Forces directing their March towards Maestricht, a Council of War was held in the King's Quarters, and a Debate arising about besieging that Place, it was adjudg'd to be an Enterprize so full of Hazard and Difficulty, by reason of the numerous Garrison and good Fortifications about the Town, that they resolv'd to turn their March towards the Rhine, where the Places were not in so good Condition; yet it was thought convenient to leave Chamilly near Tongerren, to prevent the Excursion of the Garrison of Maestricht, which was done. The two Armies, commanded by the King and Prince of Conde, march'd several Days without seeing an Enemy, except only about two hundred Men, who had entrench'd themselves on the Side of the Rhine, and render'd themselves Prisoners after little Resistance: From thence the Prince of Conde was sent to besiege Wesel, whilst the King besieg'd Orsoy, and the Mareschal Turenne, Burich. These three Sieges being undertaken at the same time, caus'd a general Alarm; but when they saw that Orsoy had hardly held out twenty-four Hours, and Burich and Wesel not much longer, the Consternation greatly encreas'd. The Governor of Wesel, which was accounted a strong Place, was sentenc'd to lose his Head; but having Friends in the Government, the Executioner was order'd only to pass the Sword over him. The Count D'Estrades was made Governor of Wesel; Reez, Emerick, Beavize, and Dedekom follow'd the Example; and an Irishman, who commanded in Rhynberg, deliver'd the Town without a Shot, and lost his Head for his Cowardice. The French King resolving to pass the Rhine, was inform'd by a Dutch Traitor of a Place where the Water was low, and the Passage safe; which being try'd, and found to be true, this invincible Conqueror express'd himself to rejoice greatly in that Opportunity to shew his Intrepidity. The Dutch Officer who was posted there abandon'd his Post; but General Wurtz advancing, by command of the Prince of Orange, with a good Force to defend it, the French King rais'd Batteries, which so gall'd Wurtz's Troops, that they were forc'd to shelter themselves in the Woods. Part of a French Regiment of Horse pass'd the River first, but was driven back into

They pass the Rhine.

A.D. 1672 it again by Wurtz. The French being well seconded, they soon became strong enough to make good their Ground, and put the Dutch Cavalry to flight. In this Passage the Duke of Lonqueville, the Prince of Conde's Nephew, was kill'd, and the Prince himself wounded by a Musket Ball. This is the Passage of the Rhine, the Subject of so much French Poetry; wherein the French King makes a Figure equal to Alexander and Cæsar, or rather equal to both of them; as if all, says Bishop Burnet, had been animated by his Presence, though he was viewing it at a very safe Distance. After this the French took the Castle of Yolhuys, and laid a Bridge of Boats over the Rhine; which so terrify'd the Dutch, that they abandon'd all their Entrenchments. The King re-passing the Rhine, resolv'd to pass the Yssel, and was not a little surpriz'd to find the Passage so easy. Having taken Doesbourg, Deputies arriv'd in his Camp from Utrecht, offering to deliver up their Town. The Duke of Orleans took Zutphen and Guelde, and the King himself advanc'd to Utrecht, having sent Rocheport, a Lieutenant-General, with some Troops before him, to take quiet Possession of the Place. Here he receiv'd the Dutch Ambassadors, who were sent to know upon what Terms he wou'd treat. In the mean Time the Mareschal de Turenne possess'd himself of Arnhem, and the Fort of Knojsembourg and Nimwegen; upon this News the Dutch abandon'd Grave, and Turenne seiz'd Bommel, and the Sckinck Seans fell also into the Hands of the French. The Bishop of Munster took Droll and Daventer, and the Marquess de Rocheport made himself Master of Naerden, and other Places. A Hero of any other Make than that of Lewis XIV. wou'd have been asham'd of such easy Victories, and not have assum'd to himself the Title of Conqueror, when a Trumpeter wou'd have done the Business every whit as well with such an Army, and against such Enemies. He paid for it before he dy'd, and let him now have his Fill of Vain-glory and Flattery. The French King's Success, as my Lord of Salisbury observes, "was owing rather to De Wit's Errors, than his own Conduct. There was so little Heart or Judgment shewn in his Management of it, that when that Year is set out, as it may well be, it will appear to be one of the least Glorious of his Life; tho' when seen in a false Light, it appears one of the most Glorious in History. The Conquest of the Netherlands, at that Time, might have been so easily compass'd, that if his Understanding and his Courage had not been equally defective, he cou'd not have miscarry'd in it." The Bishop adds other Instances of his Deficiency in both, which relate too little to the History of the Stuarts to have a Place here.

We have mention'd the Arrival of the Dutch Deputies at Utrecht, who were humbly to implore his Majesty to grant them a Treaty on his own Conditions, which, however, were so rigorous, that it made the Dutch desperate; and Despair recover'd them out of the Distress into which they had been sunk by Deceit and Cowardice. He demanded of them Maestricht, Boisleduc, Breda, and Bergen op Zoom, by the Advice of Mon-sieur Pomponne; which certainly the States wou'd have comply'd with, but Lotwouis advis'd him to insist upon an immense Sum of Money for the Charges of the War, and their giving the chief Church in every Town for the Exercise of the Papish Religion; that they shou'd put themselves under the Protection of France, and every Year send an Ambassador with a Medal acknowledging it; and shou'd enter into no Treaties or Alliances but by the Directions of the French King. One of the Dutch Ambassadors swoon'd when he heard those

His Demands.

A.D. 1671 those extravagant Conditions which were made without any Concert with England, though Lockhart, the English Ambassador, was then in the French Court. The States sent Dykevelt and Halewyn Ambassadors to England, to join with Boreel, who was still at London, and of whom Bishop Burnet tells a pleasant Story, which shews the Simplicity of the Man. Some time before the Arrival of these Ambassadors, Boreel had Audience of the King, and in Discourse about the War, his Majesty took occasion to upbraid the Dutch with their Usage of him and his Brother in the Time of the Common-wealth and Cromwel. Boreel having no Guard on his Expression, reply'd, Ha! Sire, c'est une autre chose Cromwel estoit un grand Homme, & il se faisoit craindre, & par Terre & par Mer. "Ah! Sir, that's quite another thing, Cromwel was a great Man, and made every body afraid of him both by Sea and Land. The King's Answer was, Je me feray craindre aussi a mon tour; "I will also make them afraid of me in my Turn." But as my Lord of Salisbury has it, He was scarce as good as his Word; and there was not a Prince nor Power in Europe, who was ever afraid of any one of the Kings of the Race of the Stuarts before the Revolution. The Dutch Ambassadors were sent to Hampton-Court, and told the King they would not treat separately, without his Ally, the French King. They met secretly with many in England, and inform'd themselves by them of the State of the Nation. They gave Money liberally, and gain'd some in the chief Office to given them Intelligence, which the Court understanding, and that the Nation was much inflam'd, commanded them to go back, and sent the Duke of Buckingham, and the Earl of Arlington to Utrecht, giving it out that they were to put a Stop to the Progress of the French in Holland. They were come as far as Muyden, and had the Keys of the Town deliver'd to them; but they flung them into the Ditch, as an inconsiderable Place, not knowing the Importance of it by the Command of the Water that cou'd drown all to Amsterdam. And when the Consequence of the Place was understood, another Party was sent to secure it. These came too late, for the Prince of Orange had thrown two Battalions into it, and by that Means Amsterdam was preserv'd, where all were trembling, and thought of nothing but Treating and Submitting. And this Check given the French, when the States had almost given over all Things for lost, recover'd their Spirits so far, that they began to look about them, and think of defending themselves to the Utmost. The Lord Hallifax was sent to Holland, after Buckingham and Arlington; but he was not trusted with the whole Secret. The Dutch hearing their Ambassadors were coming from England without a Peace, ran together in great Numbers to Maesland Sluice, and resolv'd to cut them in Pieces at their Landing, for they heard they were at the Brill; but as they were crossing the Maes, a little Boat met them, and told them of their Danger, advising them to land at another Place, where Coaches were staying to carry them to the Hague; so they miss'd the Storm which broke out fatally the next Day against the two De Wits.

The De Wits murdered.

John De Wit going Home one Night from the States, four Persons set on him to murder him: He defended himself so well, that he got out of their Hands with some Wounds. One of them was taken, and condemn'd for it: All De Wit's Friends press'd him to save the Man's Life, but he thought such an Attempt on a Person in his Post, was not to be pardon'd; though as to his own Part in the Matter, he very freely forgave him. The young Man confess'd his Crime, and repented of it, protesting he was led to it by no other Consideration, but that of Zeal for his Country and Religion; and he dy'd as in a Rapture of Devotion, which made great Impressions on the Spectators, and exasperated them still the more against the De Wits, Cornelius and John. At the same Time a Barber accus'd Cornelius, John De Wit's elder Brother, of a Practice on him, in order to his murdering the Prince of Orange: There were so many Improbabilities in his Story, which was supported by no Circumstances, that it seem'd no way credible; yet Cornelius De Wit was put to the Torture on it, but stood firm to his Innocence. The Sentence was accommodated rather to the State of Affairs, than to the strict Rules of Justice. In the mean Time, his Brother had resign'd his Charge of Pensionary, and was made one of the Judges of the High Court. Cornelius De Wit was banish'd, which was intended to send him out of the Way, and not as a Punishment. The Barber went about the Hague, and told the Populace he had convicted the Grand Bailly of Putten, such was Cornelius De Wit's Title, and he was in Prison under Condemnation. Upon which great Numbers ran thither, and John De Wit coming in his Coach to fetch him out, the Populace cry'd out, Now the two Traitors are together, they shall not escape. In the Instant, a false Report was spread among the People, that some thousands of Boors were coming to plunder the Hague, by which Means the two Brothers were depriv'd of all Hopes of Safety; for upon this Report, the Guards that had been plac'd by the Council of State about the Prison, for the Defence of the Prisoner, took Occasion to draw off, and left them to the Mercy of the Rabble; who immediately broke open the Doors, and rush'd into the Chamber where the two Brothers were. John De Wit, who was sitting on the Bed-side with a Book in his Hand, demanded of them, What they would have? And receiving for Answer, You shall see if you will go down. He took his Brother by the Hand, and led him down into the Street, where they were no sooner arriv'd, but the enrag'd Multitude fell upon them, and with a thousand Wounds most barbarously murder'd them: Their Bodies were dragg'd about the Town, and torn to Pieces.

The Dutch judging by the plain Reason of our own Interest in their Preservation, welcom'd the Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Arlington, and the Lord Hallifax, as Persons that were come to deliver them out of the desperate Condition they were then in. "The common Belief in England and Holland, says Sir William Temple, made the Subject of their Embassy to be our Jealousy of the French Conquests going so fast, while ours were so lame, and great Hopes were rais'd in Holland, that it was to stop their Course or Extent; but these were soon dash'd by the return of the Ambassadors, after having renew'd and fasten'd the Measures formerly taken between the two Crowns. And the Ambassadors were indeed content, as they pass'd through Holland, that the First shou'd be thought; which gave Occasion for a good Repartee of the Princess Dowager of Orange to the Duke of Buckingham, who visited her as he pass'd through the Hague; and talking much of their being Hollanders, she told him, That was more than they ask'd, which was only that they shou'd be good Englishmen. He answer'd, We are not only so, but good Dutchmen too: Indeed we do not use Holland like a Mistress, but we love her like a Wife. To which she reply'd, Urayment je croy que vous nous aimez comme vous aimez la vôtre: Truly, I believe you love Us as you love Yours." These Ambassadors had Conferences

Princess of Orange's saying to the Duke of Buckingham.

A.D. 1672 rences with the Deputies of the States, to whom they us'd all Expressions imaginable both of Kindness to Holland, and of Concernment and Trouble to see the French so far advanc'd. They gave the Dutch Ministers to understand, they wou'd engage that the French King shou'd give up all his Conquests for Maestricht; or if he wou'd not, they were empower'd to enter into new Measures with the States, to prevent the Destruction of that Common-wealth. But they did not long keep in this Tone, for they had not been many Hours in the French Camp, which was not far off, before their Judgments were better inform'd by Golden Arguments: The Terror of the French King's Greatness vanish'd, and the first Message they sent the Prince of Orange was, That the States were to give Satisfaction to both Kings jointly, and that neither Crown cou'd or wou'd treat without it. The Satisfaction to the French King was, as we have seen, a Toleration of Popery, without which the English Ambassadors will enter into no Treaty with the Dutch; as also the Admission of Papists into Offices, and Payment of Pensions to the Priests. The French King took little Notice of them at first, saying, The King of England might treat as he pleas'd, what I have got is my own; and what I shall get I will not restore without an Equivalent: At which the Ambassadors conceiv'd so much Indignation, that they talk'd of compromising Matters with the Dutch, till the Extent of the French King's Generosity made them alter their Minds. Mr. Secretary Trevor, who was dismiss'd the Committee for foreign Affairs, because he oppos'd the French Interest, wrote the following Queries, on Occasion of the Plenipotentiaries being sent to the French Camp.

Trevor's Queries.

" I. Whether they were sent only to promote the French Conquests? and if not, how they cou'd think it adviseable by making the Peace impossible to force the Dutch, as far as in them lay, to cast themselves into the Arms of the French King, and submit themselves to his Domination?

" II. Whether they can deny they knew the joint Proposals tender'd to the Dutch shou'd not be granted, since the French Demands alone had been unanimously rejected? And in that Case how agreeable was it to the Interest of England, to make it impossible for the Dutch to give his Majesty any Satisfaction?

" III. Whether they had not receiv'd, as well from the Prince of Orange as from the States Commissioners, all publick Assurances of the infinite Desire they had to see his Majesty return to his former Amity with them, and of their Readiness to purchase it at any Rate that the Condition they were in wou'd bear? If so, how faithfully the Plenipotentiaries discharg'd their Trust in neglecting those Offers, and entering into a new Engagement, which was so prejudicial to England?

" IV. How far those that were join'd in Commission with them did concur with them in their Judgment; and whether all those Considerations, with many others, were not represented to them, and urg'd by some, who had no other End but to serve their Master faithfully?

" V. Whether it was for that Reason they oppos'd so fiercely my Lord Viscount Hallifax, who came a Day or two after them, his appearing and acting jointly with them, tho' commissioned in as full and as ample a Manner as themselves?

" VI. Who were those, after my Lord Hallifax cou'd be kept out no longer, who went privately to the French Camp under several Pretences, A.D. 1672 and had still Negotiations of their own on Foot?

" VII. Whether they had Orders to call the French King the King of France, and to name him still before their Master, as well as to set in the first Place, the French demands before those of his Majesty; as all this was done in the Copies of Agreement they had made, and of both Kings Pretensions, which they sent together to the Prince of Orange by Sir Gabriel Silvius?

" VIII. and Lastly, How far their Instructions will justify their standing in Behalf of the French upon a publick Exercise of the Roman Catholick Religion in the United Provinces, the Churches to be divided, and the Romish Priests maintain'd out of the publick Revenue?

Just before the French King came to Utrecht, which was in the Beginning of July, the Prince of Orange, notwithstanding the obstinate Opposition of the De Wits (for which the Populace made them pay dearly) was restor'd to the Power of Stadtholder, and a design'd Descent upon Holland, near the Hague or Harlem, was prevented by the miraculous Alteration of the Course of the Tide, which flow'd full twelve Hours later than it's natural Order, and giving Time to De Ruyter to come up with the Dutch Fleet, the English and French drew off. The variable Temper of the Duke of Buckingham appear'd on a very remarkable Occasion while he was in Holland: The Prince of Orange arguing with him one Day upon the King's Conduct, as the most unaccountable Thing possible, he contributing so much to the Exaltation of France, which in Conclusion must prove fatal to himself, which he urg'd in several Particulars, the Duke swore he was in the Right, and offer'd to sign a Peace immediately with the Prince. Lord Arlington seem'd amaz'd at his Rashness; yet he persisted in it, and said positively he wou'd do it. Upon which the Prince, not knowing what secret Powers he might have, order'd Articles to be drawn up and engross'd: But before that could be done, Buckingham's Mind was chang'd. The Duke at parting press'd him much to put himself in the King's Hands, and assur'd him he wou'd take Care of his Affairs as of his own. The Prince cut him short, saying, My Country has trusted me, and I will never deceive nor betray them for any base Ends of my own. The Duke answer'd, You are not to think any more of your Country, for it is lost. If it shou'd weather out the Summer by reason of the Waters that have drown'd a great Part of it, the Winter's Frost will lay them open. And he often repeated these Words, Do not you see it is lost? The Prince's Answer has more of the Hero in it than whatever is boasted of in Antiquity. I see it is indeed a fine in great Danger; but there is a sure Way never to saying of see it lost, and that is to die in the last Dyke. The Prince French King having offer'd his Highness the Sovereignty of the Seven Provinces, to tempt him to abandon the Defence of them, he reply'd, I will never betray the Liberty of my Country which my Ancestors have so long defended. And to one of his Servants, who expostulated this Matter with his Master, asking him, How he pretended to live after Holland was lost? The Prince reply'd, I resolve to live upon my Lands in Germany, and had rather pass my Life in Hunting there, than sell my Country or my Liberty to France at any Price. The Reader has the History of the Stuarts before him. Did ever any Saying come from them so Grand, so Heroical as This? The Prince of Orange despis'd Power, unless to defend

In the Beginning of July Henry Coventry, Esq; was made Secretary of State in the Room of Sir John Trevor, lately deceas'd. His Merit is told by Coke; "At the Instance of the French King Coventry was sent to the Court of Sweden to dissolve the Triple League; which he did so effectually, that that King not only stood neuter in the Beginning of the War with the Dutch, but in it join'd with the French against the Confederates; and for this Business, which put all Christendom in a Flame, Coventry was made Principal Secretary of State, and, it may be, was presented with his fine Ranger's Place in Enfield-Chase too, and that perhaps with thrice more from the French King; whereas Sir William Temple, who was the principal Instrument in the Peace at Nimeguen, lost 2200 Pounds by it, and his only Recompence was to be Secretary of State in Coventry's Place, if Sir William would give him 10,000 Pounds for it."

Lord Shaftsbury Lord Chancellor

In November the Earl of Shaftsbury was made Lord Chancellor, upon the Resignation of Sir Orlando Bridgeman, and Thomas Lord Clifford Lord Treasurer; and upon his Entering on that high Office, the Lord Chancellor made a remarkable Speech to him, as full of Flattery as Eloquence. As to other Promotions, there is a long Catalogue of them in the Compleat History, copy'd very exactly out of the Gazette. In December the King, who had declar'd, that the Payments of the Exchequer shou'd be stopp'd only for a Year, did now declare, that they shou'd be stopp'd longer, and, as being a King of his Word, He did not doubt but all his loving Subjects had such Trust and Confidence in his Justice, that it will take away all Apprehensions of their being in the least defrauded of any thing that is justly due to them. They were however defrauded of every Penny of it. We shou'd not forget, that instead of a Medal to distinguish the Glories of this Year from those of another in this glorious Reign, there were Farthings coin'd, having on one Side the King's Head, and about it Carolus à Carolo, and on the Reverse the Figure of a Woman representing Britain, with this Inscription, Quatuor Maria Vindico, The Four Seas are mine. But these Words were soon after alter'd, on some Marine Successes of the Dutch, and only Britannia circumscrib'd in the Room.

1673. Parliament.

King's Speech for them.

On the 4th of February the Parliament, which had been continu'd under several Prorogations to this Day, met, and the Place of Speaker of the House of Commons being void by the Promotion of Sir Edward Turner the Speech-maker to be Chief Baron of the Exchequer, Sir Job Charlton, Serjeant at Law, was chosen Speaker, and approv'd by the King. At the same Time his Majesty made a Speech, in which he told the two Houses, that he had been forc'd to a most important, necessary and expensive War. How he was forc'd to it, how important it was, how necessary, has been shewn already. He then mention'd his Declaration of Indulgence, and telling them he wou'd stick to it, gave another Occasion to shew them how he stuck to his Royal Word: He assur'd them, The Forces he had rais'd were so far from being design'd to controul Law and Property, as was suggested, that he wish'd he had more Forces, and must raise more, for which he desir'd Supplies, and promis'd to preserve the true reform'd Protestant Religion, and the Liberty and Property of every Man in his Kingdom. Having referr'd himself to the Lord Chancellor for other Particulars, the Earl of Shaftsbury enlarg'd with great Bitterness upon the Causes of the War with the Dutch. But no Part of his Speech was more amazing than that where he said Delenda est Carthago. It must be own'd, that the Chancellor gave into the Court Measures against his Sentiments and Principles, and was the first of the Cabal who grew weary of them, and oppos'd them. This Lord, in the Intervals of Parliament, had issued Writs for Elections of Members of the Lower House, which the Commons complain'd of as an Infringement of their Privileges. The King left those Elections to them, and they voted them all irregular, and expell'd the Members so chosen; upon which the Country Party got their Friends elected: The Pensioners cou'd not after that easily carry any thing, and there was a great Clamour against the Chancellor, wherein finding himself ill supported by the Court, he dexterously, tho' secretly, shifted Sides, and secur'd himself an Interest among those that had been his Enemies. One of the most active Members of the House of Commons, Sir Robert Howard, was for pushing Matters to an Impeachment. The Lord Chancellor had good Intelligence of every Step taken against him, and knew well how to improve it. He was inform'd, that there was a great Club to be such a Night at a certain Tavern near Charing-Cross, where 70 or 80 Members of Parliament were to meet, and to come to a Determination on the Affair of the Impeachment. The Lord Chancellor employ'd a Friend of his to go to that Tavern and procure a Room next to that where the Meeting was to be. The Gentleman gave the Drawer a Guinea, and the Room was kept for him. At the Hour appointed the Earl went thither in a Hackney-Chair, and his Friend was there ready to shew him up into the Room he had taken. He then left him, and the Lord Chancellor heard Sir Robert talk to the Members of the intended Impeachment; and having satisfy'd himself of their Resolution, he call'd for the Drawer, and bade him whisper Sir Robert Howard, that a Gentleman wou'd speak with him in the next Room; Sir Robert came immediately, and, to his great Surprise, found the Lord Chancellor, who receiv'd him with a very gay Countenance, and taking no Notice of what was concerting against him, told him, He was so much his Friend that he cou'd not help bringing him good News, which was, That the King had given him the Reversion of the Auditor of the Exchequer's Place by his Recommendation, and if he cou'd serve him in any thing else then, or at any other Time, he shou'd always find him ready. Sir Robert agreeably pleas'd and surpriz'd with this good Office, unfought for, after having paid the Earl his Complements upon it, said, I will very frankly own to you, my Lord, I have by no Means deserv'd this Favour at your Hands; on the contrary, I am now the main Contriver and Actor in an Impeachment against you; but it is not too late to undo all that has been done, and if your Lordship will but have Patience to stay here but a quarter of an Hour, you shall hear how I will put an End to it. The Lord Chancellor thank'd him very graciously, and Sir Robert returning to his Company, renew'd the Discourse against the Lord Chancellor with greater Vehemence than before, entring into the Particulars of the Charge, and aggravating them, to the great Mortification of the Earl: But at last he in the Close made ample Amends for all, telling the Assembly, That truly the Crimes were of a high Nature and dangerous; but he did not see what Effect such a Charge cou'd have without Proof; and he must own he had not heard any tolerable Proof for any one of the Articles; and for some of them not so much as common Fame.

Sir Robert Howard bought off by Lord Shaftsbury.

A.D. 1673 That the Lord Chancellor was a Man of great Abilities and Interest, and as he wou'd soon discover the Weakness of the Charge against him, so he had Friends enough to have it rejected, and he did believe the House of Commons wou'd never be brought to pass it. The Members finding how it was like to go, and that Sir Robert had left them, went away one after another, without saying a Word, and Sir Robert Howard enjoy'd many Years, the Reward of his Management, the Office of Auditor.

The Parliament fell immediately upon the Declaration of Indulgence, and presented two Addresses against it, which very much perplex'd the King and his Ministers. The Compleat Historians are honest enough in observing the illegal Proceedings, in dispensing with the Laws of the Land, by arbitrary Power, and no doubt the Ease it gave the Dissenters, made them the more quick-sighted in it; but that the Address against the Indulgence, had no Regard to them in particular, is plain, from this good Vote, on the 14th of February.

Resolv'd Nemine Contradicente.

A Bill to ease Dissenters. That a Bill be brought in for the Ease of his Majesty's Subjects, who are Dissenters in Matters of Religion, from the Church of England.

The Substance of this Bill was,

1. "That Ease shall be given to his Majesty's Protestant Subjects, dissenting in Matters of Religion, who shall subscribe the Articles of the Doctrine of the Church of England, and shall take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy. 2. That the said Protestant Subjects be eas'd from all Pains and Penalties for not coming to Church. 3. That the Clause in the late ACT OF UNIFORMITY, for declaring the Assent and Consent be taken away by this Bill. 4. That the said Protestant Subjects be eas'd from all Pains and Penalties, for meeting together for Performance of any religious Exercise. 5. That every Teacher shall give Notice of the Place where he intends such his Meeting to the respective Quarter Sessions, where in open Court he shall first make such Subscription, and take such Oaths as aforesaid, and receive from thence a Certificate thereof, where all such Proceedings shall remain upon Record. 6. That any such Teacher may exercise as aforesaid, until the next respective Quarter Session, and no longer, in case he shall not first take the Oaths, and make such Subscriptions before two of the neighbouring Justices of the Peace, and shall first give them Notice of the Place of his intended Meeting, and take Certificate thereof, under the said Justices Hands, a Duplicate whereof they are to return into the next Quarter Sessions. 7. The Doors and Passages of all Houses and Places where the said Dissenters do meet, shall be always open and free during the Time of such Exercise. 8. That if any Dissenter refuse to take Church-Wardens Oaths, that then he shall find another fit Person, who is no Dissenter, to execute that Office, and shall pay for his Pains.

Dr. Calamy very justly observes, The Motion of the lower House in this Affair, was therefore the more remarkable, because it was the same House of Commons, who ten Years before, so warmly voted the Contrary, and who made the Law of the Land, and the Laws of the Land, which the Archdeacon, and the Compleat Historian hang upon so much, and which now unmade them all, as far as they could unmake them. And because I have more than once, said what many think of the Bartholomew Act, I desire the Reader to take Notice, that this very House of Commons which pass'd that Act, did now pass an Act to take away the Assent and Consent of that Act, and that it was the Sense of the Nation, as well as the Uniformity Sense of those that cou'd not comply with it, notwithstanding Echard and others glory in it, as the Strength and Ornament of the Church. What do now signify the Earl of Clarendon's, Turner the Speaker's, and other Harangues on the Church Acts, as they call them? The House of Commons have voted them all down, the same House of Commons who voted them all up, and methinks those who spoke so much for them, should not be able to read their last Vote without blushing.

The Day after this Vote, Sir Job Charlton, the Speaker, was taken very ill, and on the 19th of February, Mr. Edward Seymour was chosen Speaker, by his Majesty's Recommendation. Both Houses of Parliament join'd in a very warm Address, against the encouraging of Papists and Popery, and his Majesty publish'd once more a Proclamation against Romish Priests and Jesuits. We are all satisfy'd that his Majesty was a Papist himself, and yet he says in his Proclamation, His Majesty had seriously consider'd of the said Petition, and with much Contentment and Satisfaction did accept, and approve of the great Care of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in Parliament assembled, for the Preservation of the true Religion establish'd in this Kingdom; to which his Majesty declares, as he hath always adher'd against all Temptations whatsoever, especially when he adjur'd it at Fontenabia, so he will still employ his utmost Care and Zeal in the Maintenance and Defence of it: And therefore strictly charges and commands all Jesuits and Romish Priests to depart the Kingdom, and the Laws to be put in due Execution, against all Popish Recusants, or justly suspected to be so, &c.

The King had said he wou'd stick to his Declaration of Indulgence; but as his Majesty has not distinguish'd himself by keeping his Word, so we expect this will have the Fate of the rest. The Parliament were for giving the Non-conformists a Legal Toleration, in order to the preventing an illegal one for the Future; and the Act for their Ease wou'd have pass'd the House of Lords, had they fate long enough, as Mr. Locke tells us. They were convinc'd that such a Toleration was needful, tho' ten Years before, they wou'd not yield to it on any Terms. Bishop Burnet, in his Speech about the Occasional Bill, freely ascribes the Mildness of the House of Commons towards the Dissenters at this Time, to their Pleas'dness with their Carriage, in giving up the King's Declaration, which wrought so much on the House, that was so zealous for the Church, that they order'd a Bill to be brought in for their Ease; but the Court lik'd their Carriage so little, that 'twas doubtless one Reason of the King's giving up the Declaration also, and breaking the Seal which was affix'd to it, with his own Hand.

The House was not content with this, so a Test Act, Bill was brought in to disable all Papists from holding any Employment or Place at Court, requiring all Persons in publick Trust, to receive the Sacrament in a Parish Church, and to carry an attested Certificate of that, with Witnesses, to prove it, into Chancery, or the County Sessions, and there to make a Declaration, renouncing Transubstantiation in full and positive Words. Great Pains were taken by the Court to divert this: They propos'd that some Regard might be had to Protestant Dissenters, and that their Meetings might be allow'd. Mr. Love, before-mention'd, mov'd that an effectual Security might be found against Popery, and that nothing might interpose till that was done. When that was over, the

A.D. 1673 the Dissenters wou'd try to deserve some Favour; but at present, they were willing to lie under the Severity of the Laws, rather than clog a more necessary Work with their Concerns. Tho' he was himself a Dissenter, yet he wou'd not accept of Indulgence, if it must be in Conjunction with the Papists. Nay, the Earl of Bristol in the House of Lords, spoke for the Test Act, tho' a Papist, saying, I am a Catholick of the Church of Rome, but not a Catholick of the Court of Rome. The Commons who brought in the Bill, are the best Judges of the Temper of the Nation, and being sensible of what dangerous Effects a general Disturbance of Mens Minds, in the Concernment of Religion, may produce, they have apply'd their Care to obviate by this Bill. A Bill in my Opinion, as full of Moderation towards Catholicks, as of Prudence and Security to the Religion of the State. I am none of those Wherry-Men in Religion, who look one Way and row another: And tho' a Catholick, yet as a Member of a Protestant Parliament, my Advice cannot but go along with the Scope of the Bill, the present Circumstances of Time and Affairs consider'd. The House of Commons was resolv'd to give no Money 'till that Bill was pass'd. The King had rais'd an Army of 20,000 Men, for a Descent upon Holland. Marechal Schomberg was the General, but Fitzgerald, an Irish Papist, Major General. The Duke of Buckingham and Lord Berkley advis'd the King to bring the Army to Town, and they wou'd take out of both Houses, the Members that made the Opposition to the Court. Duke Lauderdale talk'd of bringing the Army from Scotland, 20,000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, and seizing upon Newcastle. Clifford told the King, the People saw thro' all his Designs, and therefore he must resolve to make himself Master at once, or be for ever subject to much Jealousy and Contempt. The Earls of Shaftsbury and Arlington on the other Hand, press'd him to give the Parliament full Content, and undertook to procure him Money to carry on the War; which Opinion being supported by the Advice of Colbert, the French Ambassador, the King gave into it, pass'd the Test Act, and the Parliament gave him 1,250,000 Pounds, but did not give it for carrying on the War, only to supply the King's Necessities. On the 29th of March the King pass'd the Money Bill, the Test Act, and other Acts, and then the Parliament was prorogu'd to the 20th of October.

Duke of York After the Session was over, the Duke of York carry'd all his Commissions to the King, and wept as he deliver'd them up, but the King shew'd no Concern at all. Lord Clifford left the Treasury, and was succeeded by Sir Thomas Osborn, at the Recommendation of Buckingham and Clifford. Bishop Burnet writes of him, He was a Gentleman of Yorkshire, whose Estate was much sunk: He was a very plausible Speaker, but too copious, and cou'd not easily make an End of his Discourse. He had been always among the high Cavaliers, and missing Preferment, had oppos'd the Court much. He gave himself great Liberties in Discourse, and did not seem to have any Regard to Truth, or so much as the Appearance of it. He put himself at the Head of the rigid Church-men, and labour'd to stretch the Prerogative beyond Law and Conscience. He was made Earl of Danby, and continu'd in Favour longer than any Favourite of this Reign.

Duke of York About this Time the Duke of York began to think of marrying. He first thought of Lady Bellasis, Widow to the Lord Bellasis's Son, and went so far in it, as to give her a Promise under his Hand to marry her, and she being a Protestant, he sent Coleman to her, to draw her over to Popery, but she was not to be mov'd. Some of her Friends reproaching her for admitting the Duke so freely to see her, she cou'd not bear it, but said, I can shew that his Addresses to me are honourable. When Lord Bellasis, her Father in Law, who was a zealous Papist, heard this, he who knew how intractable the Lady was in those Matters, gave the whole Design of bringing in Popery for loit, if that was not quickly broken off; so he pretending Zeal for the King and the Duke's Honour, went and told the King all that he had heard. The King sent for the Duke, and said to him, It is too much that you have play'd the Fool once, it is not to be born a second Time, and at such an Age. The Lady was also so threaten'd, that she gave up the Promise, but kept an attested Copy of it. Then a Marriage was propos'd between the Duke and an Archduchess of Inspruck, but the Empress happening to die at that Time, the Emperor himself marry'd her. After that a Match was propos'd to the Duke of Modena's Daughter, but the Court of Rome wou'd not at first consent to it, unless she might have a publick Chappel, which the Court of England would not hearken to, and the Duke making, by Lockhart, a Proposal to the Duke de Crequi's Daughter in France; the Pope desirous that he should rather marry an Italian than a French Woman, yielded to the Marriage, without a Chappel, and the Duke was marry'd to Mary d'Este by Proxy. The Earl of Peterborough brought her to England thro' France. Her Portion, about 200,000 Pounds, was paid by the French King, who adopted her a Daughter of France; but when he over-ran Italy, in the Year 1701, he demand'd the Money of her Brother, the Duke of Modena, who was not able to pay him. It is said, she upbraided her Husband at the Instant she heard of the Prince of Orange's Landing, thus; It is well known I had 400,000 Pounds to my Fortune; if it were possible, I were single again, and had my Money, I would not marry any Prince in Christendom. When the House of Commons met next, tho' the Earl of Peterborough had brought the Lady as far as Paris in her Way to England, and tho' she had been marry'd to the Duke by Proxy, they presented an Address to the King, to stop the Princess of Modena's coming to England, 'till she shou'd change her Religion. Upon this the Duke mov'd the King to prorogue the Parliament for a Week, and a Commission was order'd for it. The Duke went to the House that Day, to press the Calling up the Commons, before they cou'd have Time to go on to Business. Some Peers were to be brought in. The Duke press'd the Lord Shaftsbury to put that off, and prorogue the Parliament. He said coldly, There is no haste, but the Commons made more haste, and quickly came to a Vote for stopping the Marriage, which was such an Affront to the Duke, that he never forgave Shaftsbury, who might have prevented it by a Prorogation. The Parliament presented two Addresses against the Marriage, but the King's Answer was, His Honour was engag'd, and a Month after, November the 21st, the Princess of Modena arriv'd at Dover, where the Duke receiv'd her, and consummated the Marriage; and not long before this arriv'd Madam de Querouaille, a French Papist, to be the King's Mistress. Thus were both King and Duke in the Arms of two intriguing Ladies, entirely in the French Interest.

In the mean while the Dutch were reduc'd to the last Extremities by the French Conquests, and it was propos'd in an Assembly of the States, to remove as many as cou'd, with their Families and Effects, to the East-Indies. In this Distress there seem'd to be no Soul in any Breast in Holland, but that that of the Prince of Orange, who got the States to call an extraordinary Assembly, the most numerous that has been in this Age. He spoke to them near three Hours to the Amazement of all that heard him. He had got great Materials put into his Hands, of which he made very good Use. He first went thro' the French Propositions, and shew'd the Consequence and the Effects that wou'd follow on them; that the accepting them wou'd be certain Ruin, and the very treating about them, wou'd distract and dispirit their People: He therefore concluded, that the Entertaining a Thought of these, was the giving up their Country. If any cou'd hearken to such a Motion, the Lovers of Religion and Liberty must go to the Indies, or to any other Country, where they might be free and safe. After he had gone thro' all this near an Hour, he in the next Place shew'd the Possibility of making a Stand, notwithstanding the desperate State to which their Affairs seem'd to be reduc'd. He set forth the Strength of their Allies, and told them England cou'd not hold out long without a Parliament, and they were well assur'd a Parliament wou'd draw the King to other Measures. He shew'd the Impossibility of the French holding out where they were, and that the Germans coming down to the lower Rhine, must make them leave those Provinces as fast as they came into them: In all which he shew'd he had a great Insight into the French Affairs. He came at last to shew how it was possible to raise Taxes to answer such a vast unavoidable Expence, and set before them a great Variety of Projects for raising Money. He concluded, that if they laid down this for a Foundation, That Religion and Liberty cou'd not be purchas'd at too dear a Rate; every Man among them, and every Minister in the Country ought to infuse into all their People, that they must submit to the present Extremity, and to very extraordinary Taxes: By this Means, as their People wou'd again take Heart, so their Enemies wou'd lose theirs, who built their chief Hopes on that universal Dejection among them, which was but too visible to all the World. Every one that was present seem'd amaz'd to hear so young a Man speak to so many Things with so much Knowledge, and so true a Judgment: It rais'd his Character wonderfully, and contributed not a little to put new Life in a People almost dead with Fear, and dispirited with so many Losses. They all resolv'd to maintain their Liberty to the last, and if Things shou'd run to Extremities, then to carry what Wealth they cou'd with them to the East-Indies. The State of the Shipping capable of so long a Voyage was examin'd, and it was reckon'd they cou'd transport above 200,000 People thither.

French
King's ill Conduct.

Yet all their Courage wou'd probably have serv'd them in little stead, if the French King cou'd have been prevail'd on to stay longer at Utrecht: But he made haste to go back to Paris: Some said it was the Effect of his Amours, and was hasten'd by some Quarrels among his Mistresses; others thought he made haste to receive the Flatteries which were preparing for him. He left a Garrison in every Place he took, against Turenne's Advice, who was for dismantling them, and keeping his Army still about him. That General marching with Part of his Army into the Elector of Brandenburgh's Country, the other Part left with the King was so diminish'd, that he cou'd undertake no great Design, and though the Prince of Orange had not above 8000 Men about him, employ'd in keeping a Pass near Woerden, yet no Attempt was made to force him from it. Another probable Reason of his returning back so soon, was a Suggestion of the desperate Temper of the Dutch; and that they were capable of undertaking any Design, how black soever, rather than perish. Some told him of Vaunts under the Streets of Utrecht, where Gunpowder might be laid to blow him up as he went over them; and all these were observ'd to be avoided by him. He wou'd never lodge within the Town, and came but seldom to it. Upon one or other of these Motives he went back, and the Prince of Conde said, I see he has not the Soul of a Conqueror; his Ministers are the best Commis-Clerks, but the poorest Ministers in saying of the World; who have not Souls made for great him and Things, or capable of them. Had he left such a Man as Turenne at Utrecht, it might have had ill Effects on the Resolutions taken by the Dutch.

But he left Luxemburgh, rather fit to command
Banditti than Soldiers. Luxemburgh had no Regard to Articles, but made all People see what was to be expected when they shou'd come under such a Yoke; which was then so intolerable a Burden, even while it ought to have been recommended to those who were yet free, by a gentle Administration. This put the Dutch on those obstinate Resolutions they had taken up: There is this Account of the French Barbarities in a modern Author: "Such were the Burnings and " Murders committed by the French in Holland;
" where, as a Specimen of what the Cities might " expect, the Duke of Luxemburgh march'd to " Bodegrave and Swammerdam, putting Men, " Women, and Children to the Sword, and ma" king a Deluge of Blood in the Streets. In " the midst of the lamentable Shrieks of those " poor Wretches, Luxemburgh gave the Word of " Command, Plunder, Ravish, Massacre, Kill;
" which was executed without relenting. These " Hellish Outrages spread a Terror over the whole " Country, and in this Fright the Lords of Am" sterdam assembling, deliberated whether they " shou'd or shou'd not send their Keys to the " French General." There were in the Assembly some so Cowardly as to argue for the Affer-mative, till Monsieur Tulip, one of the Burgomasters, a Man of an invincible Spirit, ran to the Window, and vow'd, if they did not lay aside all Thoughts of submitting to France, he wou'd call out to the People; who were crowding about the Stadthouse, and have them torn to pieces; which put an End to the Dispute. This Burgomaster afterwards going the Night-round upon the Ramparts, a Centinel commanded him to Stand; he, to try the Vigilance and Fidelity of the Soldier, came forward in the Dark, without answering, upon which the Centinel fir'd, and shot him dead.

The Emperor, Spain, and Brandenburgh, having enter'd into Alliance with the States of the United Provinces, the Prince of Orange got all his Forces together, and form'd the Siege of Naerden; but finding it was like to run to Length, and if he took the Place, it wou'd not clear the Country of the Enemy, so much as a Diversion nearer France, Prince of he march'd away into Germany, join'd a Body of Orange Imperialists, and laid down before Bonne, which the Elector of Cologne had put into the Hands of the French, to preserve their Communication between France and Holland, and it open'd the Communication between Holland and Germany; which threw the French into almost as great a Confer-nation as the Dutch were in before: But they re-cover'd out of it by the taking of Maesbriech, where the Duke of Monmouth behav'd with so much Gallantry, that he was taken notice of, admir'd, and applauded; as was the Prince of Orange, sometime after, for his Behaviour at the Battle of Seneffe, where he disputed the Victory with the renown'd Prince of Conde; and had

Souches,

A.D. 1673 Sotches, the Imperial General, behav'd as well, the French Army had been cut to Pieces, and an End put to the ambitious Projects of Louis le Grand; for so he now affected to be call'd.

Sea Fights. During these Transactions, the Dutch Fleet gave Battle to the English and French, the 28th of May, near the Sands of Schonevelt, on the Borders of Zealand. Prince Rupert commanded the English Fleet, consisting of about 140 Sail, and De Ruyter, the Dutch, of about 120 Sail. The Fight began at 12 o'Clock at Noon, between Van Tromp and Sir Edward Sprague, and lasted till Night. The Dutch had the Advantage, but it was not worth boasting of; they lost Vice-Admiral Schram, and Rear-Admiral Vlugh: And on the English Side were kill'd Captain Fowles, Captain Werden, and Captain Finch. On the 4th of June was another Battle, wherein the Dutch had again the Advantage; and the English lost Captain White, Commander of the Warspight, and Captain Sadlington, Commander of the Crown. On the 11th of August was a third Battle, near the Mouth of the Texel, the Admirals on both Sides still the same, and the same the Success; what little Advantage there was being on the Dutch Side, though they lost two Flag-Officers, De Liefde and Sweers. Of the English there fell Sir Edward Sprague, who was drown'd as he was shifting Ships, Sir William Reeves, and Captain Heywood; as also Captain Le Neve, and Captain Merryweather, two Captains of Foot; for there were 6000 English Soldiers a-board, under Marschal Schomberg, who were to make a Descent upon Holland, if they cou'd; and their not doing it, shew'd they had not been Superior at Sea. In the last Fight the French Squadron, commanded by D'Estrees, made a Tack to the Eastward, under Pretence of getting the Weather-Gage of the Dutch, and D'Estrees remain'd Spectator of it to the End of the Engagement. Monsieur Martel, Captain of a French Man of War, fought bravely, and was thrown into the Bastile for it when he came Home. These three little Successes of the Dutch strangely animated them, and discourag'd the English, who began to clamour loudly against the War with Holland, and the League with France; which dispos'd our Court to hearken to the Mediation offer'd by Sweden, for a Treaty to be holden at Cologne, whither the King sent his Ambassadors, the Earl of Sunderland, Sir Lionel Jenkins, and Sir Joseph Williamson: The two latter very heavy Negotiators; the first, a Minister of as great Abilities as any of that Age. But this Treaty was of short Continuance; for the Emperor having order'd the Prince of Furstenbergh, Dean and Plenipotentiary of Cologne, to be seiz'd on as a Traitor to the Empire, the French wou'd not treat till he was set at Liberty.

The French quit the Towns in Holland. In the mean while the French evacuated all the Places they had on the Rhine and Iffel, Bon cutting off the Supplies that were expected from that Side, and a few Months after all the three Provinces were evacuated by them; which made the Elector of Cologne, and Bishop of Munster, strike up a Peace with the States; and the Prince of Orange having taken Naerden, and made Amsterdam easy, the States General made him Hereditary Stadtholder, which none of his Illustrious Ancestors had ever been. Colbert, the French Ambassador, was recall'd, as being too much led by the Earl of Arlington; and Monsieur de Ruigny, the Lord Galway's Father, was sent Ambassador to London in his Place; but though he was a Master of Intrigue, he cou'd not hinder the King's concluding a Peace with the Dutch, without which he cou'd have no Money.

A.D. 1673 We have observ'd that the Lord Chancellor Shaftsbury stood in a very tottering Condition, and his Zeal for the Test Act was an unpardonable Crime; but what hasten'd his Fall, was a Speech he made in the House of Lords last Sessions of Parliament, on the following Occasion.

Lord Clifford, when he was Treasurer, had entertain'd a Project for a perpetual Fund, to render Parliaments usefess, and had prepar'd a set Speech for introducing it. He read his Speech to the Earl of Shaftsbury, who desir'd to hear it again, and upon the second Reading, charg'd his Memory with the Substance of it. This gave him an Opportunity he had wish'd for, to be reveng'd of Clifford for stealing the White Staff from him by the Exchequer Business, Clifford made the intended Speech, the King and Duke of York being present in the House to countenance the Design. The Country Lords, and those who were not in the Secret, star'd at one another; the whole House at the End of the Speech remain'd in an awful Silence, meditating the Fate of poor England; when my Lord Shaftsbury stood up, and answer'd his Speech from the Beginning to the End, shewing, "That his Propositions were extravagant, that what he aim'd at wou'd end in Confusion and the Ruin of the Government; that it might, perhaps, send the Royal Family abroad again, to spend their Lives in Exile, without Hopes of a Return;" which he spoke with so much Life and Spirit, that he confounded the Court-Counsels. While he was speaking, the Duke, who was very angry with him, whisper'd the King, What a Rogue you have of a Lord Chancellor! The King reply'd, Gods-fish, What a Fool you have of a Lord Treasurer! The Debate ended in a Ruffle; Clifford narrowly escap'd being sent to the Tower, and finding himself thus given up by the King, he declar'd, He wou'd serve no Prince who had not Courage to avow his Principles, and support his Ministers in the Execution of his Demands.

Shaftsbury had made himself a new Enemy in the new Lord Treasurer Osborn, who coming to take the Oaths as usual in Chancery, the Lord Chancellor made a Speech to him, and among other Things said, Kings are like Gods, they can make Choice of whom they please, yet in this they are like Men, they can only make Choice, but not render him they have chosen adequate to the Employment: You ought to remember that Partuere non minor est Virtus, and I wish you may long enjoy the Honour of your Place, and the King the Satisfaction of his Choice. The Lord Treasurer thank'd the Lord Chancellor, but the next Day, when he had consider'd the Terms in the Speech, he sent to revoke his Thanks.

In Michaelmas Term, the Earl of Shaftsbury was sent for on a Sunday Morning to Court, as was also Sir Heneage Finch, Attorney General, to whom the Seal was promis'd. When my Lord came, he went with the King into his Closet, while the Popish Faction waited in Triumph to see him return without the Purse. My Lord Shaftsbury being alone with the King, said, Sir, I know you intend to give the Seals to the Attorney General, but I am sure your Majesty never design'd to dismiss me with Contempt. No, Gods-fish, my Lord, reply'd the King, I will not do it with any such Circumstance as may look like an Affront. Then, Sir, says the Earl, I desire your Majesty will permit me to carry the Seals before you to Chapel, and send them afterwards from my own House: To which his Majesty, who wanted not good Nature on certain Occasions, agreed. The Earl entertain'd the King with News, and other

A.D. 1673 other diverting Stories, till the very Minute he was to go to Church, on purpose to amuse the Courtiers, and his Successor, whom he knew to be on the Rack, for fear the Earl shou'd prevail on the King to change his Mind. His Majesty and my Lord came out of the Closet talking together, and smiling, and went to Church, which extreamly surpriz'd them all, who cou'd have no Opportunity to inform themselves what was to be expected. Some ran immediately to tell the Duke all their Measures were broken, and the Attorney General was inconsolable. After Sermon, my Lord went Home with the Seals, and sending them from his House, that Evening the King gave them to the Attorney, who was hardly yet recover'd out of the Fright the Closet-Conversation had put him into. But before the Earl of Shaftsbury was remov'd, the Court permitted him to open the Session of Parliament on the 20th of October with a Speech, wherein he endeavour'd to explain away the Malignity of the Expression, Delenda est Carthago, which he had us'd in a former Speech, by referring it to the Louvestein Faction, whom he now terms the Carthaginian Party in Holland. But this, says my Lord of Sarum, made him as ridiculous, as the other had made him odious.

Lords advise to send away the Duke of York. About this Time the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Arlington, the Earl of Shaftsbury, and Secretary Coventry, offer'd Advice to the King to send the Duke of York for some time from the Court, as a good Expedient for himself and the Duke. The King hearken'd so far to it, that he sent them to move it to his Brother, who was highly incens'd at it, saying, I will obey all the King's Orders, but will look on those as my Enemies who offer him such Advices. And he never forgave this to any of them, no not to Coventry, for all his good Opinion of him, and the good Services Coventry had done the Popish and French Faction. Colonel Birch reflected on him in the House of Commons, for being zealous, before he was Secretary, to grant the King a Supply to support the Triple League, when at the same Time he knew the two Crowns, England and Sweden, had determin'd to dissolve it. There was just Reason to believe the Charge was true, and Coventry sitting near the Bar, rose up in a Flame, and with great Asseverations deny'd it, saying, If an Angel that came from Heaven shou'd reproach him with it, he wou'd prevent his going back if 'twere in his Power.

This Year Sir Tobias Bridges took the Island of Tobago, in the West-Indies, from the Dutch, and the latter took the Island of St. Helena from the English, but it was re-taken by Capt. Mundy.

On the 31st of October, the House of Commons being in a Grand Committee, RESOLV'D,

Parliament Vote against giving Money. "That considering the present Condition of the Nation, this House will not take into further Debate the Consideration of any Aid or Supply, or Charge upon the Subject, before the Time of Payment of the last Assessment be expir'd, except it shall appear that the Obstinacy of the Dutch shall render it necessary; nor before this Kingdom be effectually secur'd from Popery and Popish Counsellors, and the other present Grievances be redress'd." They also Voted the Standing Army to be a Grievance, and prepar'd an Address to his Majesty, shewing, That the Standing Army was a Grievance and a Burthen to the Nation. They intended to present this Address on the 4th of November, when the King unexpectedly came to the House of Lords, and sent the Usher of the Black Rod to the Commons to command the Attendance of the Speaker, and that House; but it happen'd that the Speaker and the Usher met both at the Door of the House of Commons, and the Speaker being within the House, some of the Members suddenly shut the Door, and cry'd out, To the Chair, to the Chair; others cry'd, The Black Rod is at the Door: The Speaker Seymour was immediately hurry'd to the Chair, and then it was mov'd, 1. That our Alliance with France is a Grievance; 2. That the Evil Counsellors about the King are a Grievance; 3. That the Duke of Lauderdale is a Grievance, and not fit to be trusted or employed in any Office or Place of Trust. Upon which there was a general Cry, To the Question, to the Question; but the Black Rod knocking earnestly at the Door, Seymour, the Speaker, leap'd out of the Chair, and the House rose in great Confusion. Being come to the House of Peers, the King made a Speech to them, which shews that his Ministers were as weak as his Enemies need wish: For the Nation now detested the Dutch War, and the Contrivers of it; yet he mentions it as if he had Hopes that they wou'd pay him for it, A Support against our only Competitor at Sea; and assures them that he (who is himself a Papist) will not be wanting to let all his Subjects see that no Care can be greater than his own, in the effectual suppressing of Popery. Then the Parliament was prorogu'd to the 7th of January.

Some time in this Session, a Wooden Shoe, with some Beads, was laid in the Parliament-House, near the Speaker's Chair; 'twas such as the Peasants wear in France. On one End were drawn the Fleurs de Lis, and on the other the Arms of England; between the two Arms was written, Utrum horum mavis accipe. The House of Commons intended to keep a Day of Humiliation on account of the Growth of Popery, and solemnly to celebrate the 5th of November, the Anniversary of the Powder Plot, Dr. Stillingfleet being desir'd to preach before them; but the King prorogu'd the Parliament the Day before, Nov. 4.

The Cabal being broken, a Junto succeeded, A Junto consisting of Finch, Danby, Lauderdale, Arlington, and Coventry, whose Abilities were by no means equal to those of the Cabal. Bishop Burnet gives this Character of the Lord Keeper Finch: Finch; He had no sort of Knowledge in Foreign Affairs, and yet he lov'd to talk of them perpetually, by which he expos'd himself to those who understood them. He thought he was bound to justify the Court in all Debates in the House of Lords, which he did with the Vehemency of a Pleader, rather than with the Solemnity of a Senator: He was long much admir'd for his Eloquence, but it was labour'd and affected, and he saw it as much despis'd before he dy'd. He was too eloquent on the Bench, in the House of Lords, and in common Conversation, &c. It is Bishop Burnet says it, and it behoves me to produce Authorities for my Characters now I draw so near Home; for no body will bear to hear any thing said of a Person that belongs to them, but what is to his Praise, in which, as well as in a few other Things, we differ from the Spirit and Manners of the old Romans. From this Keeper's Administration one may expect a stricter Hand over the Nonconformists, as far as his Counsel and Authority cou'd go. As to the Chancery, he was a very good Judge, and highly to be commended for his Probity and Resolution.

His Majesty sent for the two Chief Justices, and the Chief Baron, and commanded them to consider of the most effectual Means for putting the Laws in Execution against Papists; and an Order was made that no Roman Catholick shou'd presume to come into his Presence, or to his Palace, or to the Place where his Court shall be; which which extended not however to his Mistresses, who were most of them stanch Papists, and zealous for that Religion; particularly the Dutchesse of Cleveland and Portsmouth. The former, whose Lust was insatiable, to please the King, or some other Gallant, turn'd Papist; and William Penn the Quaker having the first News of it, went to Dr. Stillingfleet with it, to mortify him; as he said to me, with the Loss of so considerable a Member of the Church: But when he had told his News to the Doctor, Stillingfleet retorted, If the Church of Rome has got by her no more than the Church of England has lost, the Matter is not much. This Woman was so infamous in her Amours, that she made no Scruple of owning her Lovers; among whom was Goodman the Player, who so narrowly escap'd the Gallows some Years after; and the Fellow was so insolent upon it, that one Night, when the Queen was at the Theatre, and the Curtain, as usual, was immediately order'd to be drawn up, Goodman cry'd, Is my Dutchesse come? and being answer'd, No, he swore terribly the Curtain shou'd not be drawn till the Dutchesse came, which was at the Instant, and sav'd the Affront to the Queen.

On the 7th of January the Parliament met, and the King and Keeper made Speeches as usual. Echar'd assures us upon his Word and Judgment, that the new Lord Keeper's Speeches were not only long, but eloquent: What sort of Eloquence it was Bishop Burnet knew, and told us. He made some fulsom Complements on the King, upon his being punctual to his Word, which the Reader by this Time is very well apprised of: On his making the Laws the Measure of his Power, as by his dispensing with those Laws: On his strenuous Proceedings against the Papists, and forbidding them to come within his Palace, at the same time that his Lordship and all the World knew they were the most welcome there of any People. The rest being Eloquence so pure and simple, to free from affected Flowers and Graces, ought not to be omitted, as Mr. Archdeacon observes; "These

Lord Keeper's
Eloquence.

"are not single and transient Acts, but such as flow from Habits: These are not Leaves and Blossoms, but true, solid, and lasting Fruits. Long, long, may that Royal Tree live and flourish upon which these Fruits do grow." Habits and Fruits being all one in Logick, we proceed, "And yet his Majesty's Indulgence to you rests not here; he gives you Leave to study and contrive your own Assurance. The very Effence of Parliaments is the Preservation of the Common-wealth; and the King gives them Leave to do what they necessarily must do as long as they are together; extremely Gracious and Tender! Again, "You have free Leave to make any reasonable Proposition, and his gracious Promise that he will receive it: This is a Satisfaction equal to all your Wishes. Now if ever your Joys are full, there wants no more to the Improvement of this Happiness, but the Wisdom of the Parliament to use the Advantage with due Moderation. If therefore, upon Enquiry, you shall think it needful to apply any other Remedies, it is extremely to be wish'd that those Remedies may be few, and withal, that they be gentle and easy too; for the Sick perish as often by too many Remedies, as by none at all." By which Sophistical Argument the Use of all Physick is damn'd, because sometimes too many Remedies are us'd, therefore use none at all. Thus are the Commons treated like a Company of Quacks, who are in danger of prescribing without Judgment, and more likely to Kill than to Cure. Again, "But none fall so fatally and so finally as they who, being enter'd into some Degrees of Convalescence, resolve to recover it in "an Instant; and had rather make some great Effort, or try some bold Experiment upon themselves, than observe the Methods, or attend those gradual Progressions which are necessary to perfect that Health, and compleat that Recovery." If one had been so happy as to have known what is meant by this Metaphorical Doctorship, some Account might have been given of it: The Growth of Popery, and the Progress of the French Arms, were the Things chiefly complain'd of: Both of them had those Progressions which threaten'd Convulsion and Dissolution; but according to this Prescription, the Physick must be gentle, easy, and slow: There must be no new Law against Papists, nor Proceedings against Evil Counsellors, nor Breach of the Alliance with France; they are bold Experiments, &c. I shall meddle with no more of these Speeches, and only hint these Things, to shew what Sincerity, as well as Elegance there are in them. The King told the Parliament, He had no Treaty with France, but what was and shou'd be made known. Madam's Journey to Dover, and Abbot Primi's Memoirs of Colbert's Negotiations, are, we suppose, the Proofs of it. Notwithstanding this eloquent Harangue upon the King's Care of the Protestant Religion, the House of Lords presented an Address, that Papists might be banish'd ten Miles from London, and a Proclamation was issu'd pursuant to it. Both Lords and Commons then join'd in an Address for a General Fast, wherein were very strong Expressions against both the War and Popery. The King comply'd with this Address, and the 4th of February was appointed for the Day of Humiliation. The House of Commons Resolv'd, "That they wou'd in the first Place proceed to have their Grievances effectually redress'd, the Protestant Religion, their Liberties and Properties effectually secur'd, and to suppress Popery, and remove all Persons and Counsellors popishly affected, or otherwise obnoxious or dangerous to the Government. They also order'd another Address to his Majesty, "That the Militia of London and Middlesex may be in Readiness at an Hour's Warning, and the Militia of all other Counties of England at a Day's Warning, for suppressing all tumultuous Insurrections which may be occasion'd by Papists, &c." The King's Answer was, He wou'd take a special Care, as well for the Preservation of their Persons, as of their Liberties and Properties. The King's extream Necessities obliging him to these Compliances with the Parliament, and his being too lukewarm in Matters of Religion, did about this Time very much disgust the Papists; and it is thought that Coleman now enter'd into the most criminal Part of his Popish Plot. Correspondence with the French Court; and from hence some date the Beginnings of the Popish Plot, though it is to be suppos'd that the Papists have not been without Plots ever since the Reformation.

A.D. 1674

A Fast.

The Beginning of the Popish Plot.

The House of Commons pass'd a Vote, That Lauderdale the Princes of the Blood Royal shou'd all marry dale ad- Protestants; they resolv'd to fall on the Ministry, dress'd a- and began with the Duke of Lauderdale, against gainst. whom they voted an Address to remove him from the King's Presence and Council for ever. They went next upon the Duke of Buckingham; and it being mov'd, in his Name, that the House wou'd hear him, he was admitted. The first Day of his being there, he fell into such a Disorder, that he pretended to be taken ill, and desir'd to be admitted again, which was granted; and in Buckingham's Speech next Day, he thank'd the House for ham's the Honour they had twice done him, especially ex- pressing himself so ill Yesterday. He justify'd his the Com- own Designs, laying all the ill Counsels upon mons, others,

A.D. 1674 others, chiefly on Lord Arlington; intimating plainly that the Root of all Errors was in the King and the Duke, and that there was a closer Intelligence between the Court of England and that of France, than King Charles had made known to his Parliament. When we were to consider what to do, we were to advise with the French Ambassador; Who was it that was so often lock'd up with the French Ambassador? My Spirit moves me to tell you, he said, Hunting is a good Diversion, but if a Man will hunt with a Brace of Lobsters, he will have but ill Sport; which he apply'd to Prince Rupert and Lord Arlington, in a Conversation with Bishop Burnet, but it was now understood to mean the King and his Brother. He was examin'd to several Interrogatories after his Speech; but he gave so little Satisfaction to the House, either in his Speech or his Answers, that they voted an Address to remove him from the King's Presence and Councils. Then they attack'd the Lord Arlington, who was also heard in the House, and spoke much better than was expected. He excus'd himself, without blackning the King; which had so good an Effect, that tho' he, as Secretary of State, was more expos'd than any other, by the many Warrants and Orders he sign'd, yet he was acquitted by a very small Majority. He had lately been very complaisant to the Nonconformists, and they in Gratitude did him what Service they cou'd in the Parliament, who were resolv'd to force the King to a Peace with the Dutch. He wou'd have done any thing, and parted with any Persons, if that wou'd have procur'd him Money for carrying on the War, but there was no Hope of it; so the Earl of Arlington press'd the Spanish Ambassador, the Marquis of Fresnoy, to procure an Order from his Court to their Ambassadors at the Hague, to excite the States and the Prince of Orange to get a Proposition of Peace set on Foot. And that it might have some Shew of a Peace both begg'd and bought, he propos'd that the States shou'd offer the King a Sum of Money, which shou'd be made over by him to the Prince for Payment of the Debt the King ow'd him. Ruwigny the French Ambassador press'd the King much to give this Parliament Satisfaction in Point of Religion. The King answer'd him, If it was not for my Brother's Folly, La Sottise de mon Frere, I wou'd get out of all my Difficulties.

Sir William Temple employ'd to conclude a Peace with the Dutch.

Sir William Temple was sent for to Court to negotiate the Peace with the Dutch. Lord Arlington told him, He wou'd not pretend to the Merit of having nam'd him on this Occasion, or whether the King or the Lord Treasurer did it first, but that the whole Committee of Council join'd in it. He concluded, Since a Peace was to be made, no other Person was so fit to make it; therefore the King, with many kind Expressions, gave Order to Sir William to prepare for his Journey to Holland, and the Secretary drew up his Instructions. However, he cou'd not make so much Hastie, but the Dutch made more, and sent over Powers to Fresnoy, the Spanish Minister, to treat and conclude a Peace with the King; which Powers arriv'd three Days after the Junto had sent for Sir William Temple, who advis'd the putting off his Journey to Holland, and to begin the Treaty at London, as much more for his Majesty's Honour; to which the King agreed, adding, tho' Sir William does not treat the Peace at the Hague, he shall at London: And the whole Treaty was concluded at three Meetings between Fresnoy and Temple. The two Points of greatest Difficulty were the Flag, and the recalling the English Troops out of the French Service. The Flag had been given up in former Treaties, and the Dutch hesitating about it now, A.D. 1674 wou'd have had very ill Effects; so it was given up again, and it was stipulated, that the English Troops in the French Service shou'd wear out without any Recruits: Which Stipulation was so far from being observ'd by the King of England, that English Men were press'd to recruit them; and to these Troops does Sir William Temple, and the Germans too, ascribe the Glory of all the French Conquests in the Campaigns in which they serv'd; for those Troops, not only in Turenne's Life, but at his Death too, sav'd the whole French Army. Read Coke on this Article, "If this be as Sir William says, the King hereby, instead of being a Protector, becomes a Murderer of his Subjects, in permitting them to kill one another on both Sides; for it is impossible the War shou'd be just on both Sides; nor do I believe the like Precedent can be shew'd, unless by the King's Grandfather, James I."

This hasty Peace, huddl'd up in less than four Days, between the 5th, 6th and 9th of February, wou'd not admit of the Establishment of a Marine Treaty and Regulation of the East-India Trade between the English and Dutch. By this Treaty that of Breda was confirm'd. The Dutch were to pay 800,000 Patacoons, and had made over to them the Islands of Amboyna and Polle-rone, which they had ravish'd from the English, and by which they not only supply Europe, but India and Persia with Spice. Surinam was also confirm'd to them. The Arrears of 30,000 Pounds a Year for the Fishery were discharg'd, as were the Damages sustain'd by their Pyratrical Capture of Sir Paul Pindar and Sir William Courton's Ships, the Bona Esperanza and Henry Bonaventure, valu'd at 150,000 Pounds. The Peace was sign'd at Lord Arlington's Office, and the King went immediately to the Withdrawing Room, where, seeing Monsieur Ruwigny, he took him aside and told him, He had been doing a Thing which went more to his Heart than the losing his Right-Hand: He had sign'd a Peace with the Dutch upon a Project brought him by the Spanish Ambassador. He saw nothing cou'd content the House of Commons, or draw Money from them: And Lord Arlington had press'd him so hard, that he stood out till he was weary of his Life. Ruwigny told him, "That what was done cou'd not be help'd, but he wou'd let him see how faithfully he wou'd serve him on this Occasion. He doubted not his Master wou'd submit all his Pretensions to him, and make him the Arbitrer and Mediator of the Peace." Which the King receiv'd with great Joy, and said it wou'd be the most acceptable Service that cou'd be done him. Upon all which Bishop Burnet reflects thus, "And so the King got out of the War very little to his Honour, having both engag'd in it upon unjust Grounds, and ill manag'd it all along with ill Conduct and bad Success;" as we read in Acherley, The Time for the French King's making King Charles absolute Master of his Parliament was respited till a more seasonable Opportunity.

The House of Commons continuing their Debates for keeping out Popery, order'd a severe Bill to be brought in with a new Test, renouncing Transubstantiation, &c. but they had not Time to pass it into a Law. The King had laid a Copy of the Project of Peace, brought by the Spanish Ambassador, before the Parliament; and the latter having thank'd him for it, they humbly advis'd him to proceed in it. On the Beginning of February they resolv'd, "That the Continuance of any Standing Force in this Nation, other against the King's Horse-Guards.

They also address'd against the Horse-Guards, and gave several Reasons for breaking them; among others was this, That the Life-Guard is a Place of Refuge and Retreat for Papists, and Men Popishly affected, and a School and Nursery for Men of debauch'd and arbitrary Principles, and Favourers of the French Government, as it did too plainly appear in the Case of Sir John Coventry. On the 11th of February the King came to the House, and made a Speech to both Houses, wherein he acquainted them with his having made a Peace with the Dutch, a Speedy, Honourable, and Lasting Peace, and that he had given Orders for disbanding the Army, which they thank'd him for. But still the Commons gave no Money, tho' the King again and again desir'd some for building great Men of War; instead of which they appointed a Committee to inspect the Laws lately made in Scotland, whereby an Army is authoriz'd to march into England or Ireland, and peruse such other Laws as do tend to the Breach of the Union of the two Nations. They likewise in a Grand Committee shortly after took into Consideration the State and Condition of the Kingdom of Ireland, and Resolv'd,

land.

"That a Committee be appointed to inspect the State and Condition of that Kingdom, and more especially to consider of the State of Religion, and the Militia and the Forces of that Kingdom, and examine the Matters of Fact relating thereunto." Another Committee was appointed, "To inspect the Laws, and to consider how the King may commit any Subject by his immediate Warrant, as the Law now stands, and to report their Opinions. And further, they were order'd to consider how the Law now stands touching the committing of Persons by the Council-Table, and to report the same." Upon which Occasion they brought in a particular Bill concerning Writs of Habeas Corpus; a Bill much for the Liberty of the Subject, which was read three Times, and pass'd the House of Commons. But these vigorous Proceedings allarm'd the Junto, and on the 24th of February the King coming to the House of Peers, made still new Protestations of his Care for the Security of the Protestant Religion, and then the Lord Keeper prorogu'd the Parliament to the 10th of November. Echard closes up these Transactions with a Reflection which lets us into the very Depths of his Politicks: "Here it is observable, that in the last War, when the English contended with all the Power of Holland and France, they had greater Success in their Battles than now, when they had join'd with the Power of France against Holland alone." In the first War the French left the Dutch as they left the English in the second; and both English and Dutch were rather the worse than the better for such false and unnatural Allies. A School-Boy cou'd have made a better Observation.

Sir Willi-

ator.

We have mention'd Ruwigny's Saying to King Charles concerning his Mediation, which soon after was offer'd in Form to the Powers engag'd in the War. Sir William Temple was sent Ambassador to the Hague and Brussels, to make that Offer to the States and the Governor of the Spanish Netherlands. What Opinion Spain and Holland had of King Charles's Sincerity with them, appears by a Passage in a Letter Sir William Temple wrote from Brussels, The Spaniards in- terpret very ill the Offers of his Majesty's Mediation I made at the Hague, and believe it upon Concert with France, and to the End of inducing Holland to a separate Peace from them. I cannot but reflect upon the strange Difference I found in the Consideration I left of his Majesty in those Countries, and what I meet now, which is ground- ed upon a Belief of his being too much in with France, which our Court took no great Pains to conceal; nay, one of the Junto being put to it how to answer some Objections made against their Conduct, with respect to the Partial Mediation for France, as against the Interest of England, was so weak and so impudent as to say, Faut il que tout se fasse par Politique rien par Amitie, Must every thing be done out of Policy, and nothing for Friendship.

The King
not trusted abroad.

I shall not enter into the Detail of Sir William Temple's private Discourse with the King before he went on the Embassy of Mediation; 'tis a Repetition of the ill Steps taken in Favour of Popery, France, and Arbitrary Power, only the latter Part of it will give us another Instance of his Majesty's keeping his Word. "I never knew but one Foreigner, said Sir William, who understood England well, and that was Monsieur Gourville, who, when he was at Brussels the first Dutch War, and heard the Parliament grew weary of it, said, The King has nothing to do but to make Peace; adding, I have been long enough in England, seen enough of the Court, and People, and Parliament, to conclude, That a King of England, who will be the M A N of his People, is the greatest King in the World; but if he will be something more, By - - - he is nothing at all. The King heard Sir William very attentively, but seem'd a little impatient at first; yet at last he declar'd, Sir William had Reason, and so had Gourville; and then laying his Hand upon Sir William's, he added, And I will be the M A N of my People; in which he came off, as when he said, He wou'd also make the World afraid of him in his Turn.

Sir William Temple found but a cold Reception in Holland, and a colder in Flanders. Both the Prince of Orange and the Spaniards look'd on the King's Mediation as an Interruption to the Success they expected by their Arms; and had there been a better Understanding amongst the Confederate Generals, of whom Zouche the Imperial General left the Prince at the Siege of Audenard, that Mediation wou'd not have been so long in Being as it prov'd to be.

In May, this Year, came out a Proclamation of that Kind, which discovers the State of the Government; for when it is so bad that nothing good can be said of it, 'tis convenient that nothing at all shou'd be said. The Proclamation was chiefly to suppress a Report that the King intended to dissolve the Parliament, whereas he only intended that they shou'd not sit in a Twelve Month; then all Writing or Speaking any false News, or intermeddling with the Affairs of State or Government, or with the Persons of any of his Majesty's Counsellors or Ministers, are prohibited in common and ordinary Discourse. A Proclamation, with a Reward of Five Pounds, was publish'd for apprehending and transporting Priests and Jesuits. The King din'd with Sir Robert Vyner, Lord Mayor, at Guild-hall, October the 29th, and accepted of the Freedom of the City out of the Chamberlain's Office, and a Copy of it was presented to him by the Lord Mayor and Sir Thomas Player Chamberlain, on their Kneec in the Banqueting-House; which, according to my Author, was an unparell'd Favour and Ho-

*He ne'er knew, not he, to serve or be free,
Tho' he has pass'd thro' so many Adventures;
And e'er since he was Bound, that is, he was [Crown'd,
He has every Day broke his Indentures.*

Monsieur Ruvigny, the French Ambassador, being a Protestant, the Duke of York and his Party look'd on him with an evil Eye, finding that their Designs were not the forwarder by the Presence of such a Minister: So they dispatch'd Sir William Throgmorton secretly to Paris to have him recall'd; which was done, and Monsieur Courtin sent to succeed him.

The Figure
the King makes abroad.

This Minister was very industrious, and extended his Master's Liberality among the English Courtiers, while our late Confederates, to Day the Dutch, to Morrow the French, are cutting one anothers Throats, without our using any other Endeavours to part them, but crying out, Pray Gentlemen be quiet.

What Ep.
Parker says of breaking the Triple League.

There is an Author which speaks of King Charles's breaking the Triple Alliance in a Manner which sets that fraudulent and fatal Transaction in its true Light. It is Bishop Parker, who was at this time writing against the Presbyterians in England as furiously as the French were fighting against them in Holland. He tells us,

"To that Breach is to be attributed all the Havock which ought at this Day to be lamented. That as soon as it was broken, the French King invaded every Place, attacking those separately whom he durst not attack jointly; so that Europe was suddenly in a Conflagration; and first of all Holland was, as it were in an Instant, over-run as far as Amsterdam with a great Slaughter.

p. 173.

"This Proceeding oblig'd all the People of Europe, from their several Habitations, far and wide, except Britain, to defend themselves against this overgrown Warrior; whence there was so vast a Deluge of Christian Blood, as never before happen'd in so short a Time. The bloody Wars in the North wag'd by Brandenburg and Denmark against Sweden, who being incens'd at the Baseness of the Violation of the Triple League, had enter'd into an Alliance with France, were occasion'd by that Breach. The Incurtion of the Turks and Tartars into Poland, the Rebellion of Messina against the Spaniards, and the Rebellion in Hungary against the Emperor, did all of them arise from the Breach of the Triple Alliance, and swept away prodigious Numbers with dreadful Slaughters. The Invasion of the Turks, their Siege of Vienna, and their subsequent Wars in Hungary, proceeded from the same Fountain, the Breach of the Triple Alliance. The bloody Battles fought on the Rhine between Turenne and the Duke of Lorraine, and Turenne and Lorge against the German General Montecuculi, and in Flanders between the Princes of Orange and Conde at Senefse, besides numerous and bloody Sieges, were Evils which the Breach of the Triple Alliance brought upon the European World.

The Charge is brought against King Charles II. A.D. 1674 by Dr. Samuel Parker, made Bishop of Oxford by his Brother King James II. and it being so true in Fact and Consequence, what can be said to justify this Conduct? Indeed what Marvel adds in the same Poem is not more Satyrical than it is Just;

*Tho' oft bound to the Peace, yet he never wou'd [cease
To vex his poor Neighbours with Quarrels;
And when he was beat, he still made his Re[treat
To his Cleavelands, his Nells, and his Car-[wels.
Beyond Sea he began, where such a Riot he ran,
That every one there did leave him:
And now he's come o'er ten times worse than [before,
When none but such Fools wou'd receive him.*

I know very well that small Criticks agree we shou'd never mingle Satyr with History, and the Criticism is just, if it is against Historical Truth: But if it is preserv'd in it, the best Judges allow one may, and ought to make use of them. Menage, who was a very great Critick, says, Un Recueil des Vaudevilles est un piece de plus necessaire a un Historien qui veut ecrire sincerement. A Collection of Lampoons is very necessary for an Historian, who wou'd write sincerely: But I shall forbear, and only recommend to the Reader the State Poems, particularly Mr. Marvel's, and of his, particularly his Historical Poem, which begins thus;

*Of a tall Stature, and of Sable Hue, P. 97.
Much like the Son of Kith.*

Soon after Peace was made with the Dutch, Sir Anthony Dean the King's chief Ship-BUILDER, thony Dean, was sent to France with the Model of a Man of Ship-wright, sent to France. War, which he carry'd by Water to Roan; from whence it was convey'd by Land to Versailles, and the French King had it launch'd in his great Pond in those Gardens, where he came on Board, and had much Conference with Sir Anthony upon it. Several Carpenters, and vast Quantities of Naval Stores were also sent to his Yards; insomuch that Coke tells us, King Charles emptied his own Magazines to fill the French King's, who in Return, not only exorbitantly enlarg'd his Impositions on the English in their Trade to France, but let loose his Privateers upon them, as if there had been no Peace, who plunder'd and murder'd English Merchants and Mariners, and made Prize of their Effects, block'd up our Harbours, and took our Ships out of their very Ports. If Complaints were made, they were baffled, except some French Ships that were redeem'd by Sir Ellis Leighton, King's Secretary to the Lord Berkley, then Ambassador at Paris, who made a second Prize of them. Indeed the French Court treated that of England, as Men treat those that hang upon them. Sir William Lockhart, when he was Ambassador for King Charles, complain'd that his Business met not with such Dispatch as he was us'd to meet with in Cromwel's Time; but we may say as Boreel did, Ab! c'est une autre Chose, Ab! that's another Thing; for certainly there was as much Difference between the two Genius's, as there is between Glory and Pleasure. We will leave foreign Affairs this Year with Mr. Acherley's Account of them, during the Campaigns of 1674, and 1675. The French King, by his own single Power, carried on the War against Holland, Spain, the Empire, &c. with great Success, and shew'd " he

A.D. 1674 "he was an Over-match for them all. In which the English Forces, which King Charles sent to assist him, perform'd extraordinary Services, and turn'd King Charles's Mediation at Nimwegen for a Peace, into a meer Amusement, whilst the French King, with the under-hand Assistance of King Charles, carried on his Military Undertakings." And whilst the Duke of York, and his Secretary Coleman, carried on a reasonable Correspondence with Ferrier, the French King's Confessor, to bring us under Popery and Tyranny, in which they went a good Way: Whilst also Sheldon and his Brethren of the same Stamp, were labouring to cure the English Court of all Dispositions to Moderation, and exciting them to renew the Persecution against Protestant Dissenters, which they had more at Heart than Religion and Liberty, so jealous were they of every thing that touch'd their Dignities, Powers and Revenues, Edward Coleman, Secretary to the Duke of York, having put himself at the Head of Affairs in England, for the Advancement of Popery, made Application for his Support to the French King, by his Confessor, and the Pope's Inter-nuncio at Paris, to whom he wrote several Letters, particularly one dated the 29th of June this Year, wherein he said, "The Duke of York was very sensible of his most Christian Majesty's Friendship, and has done him all the good Offices he is capable of; that he is of his Majesty's Opinion about recalling the Parliament, and thinks it not to be useful, but very dangerous; that the House of Commons had a Design to lessen the Duke, and root out the Catholick Religion, as much as is in their Power; That the Duke doubts not but it is absolutely necessary for the Interest of his Majesty, and for his own, to hinder the Meeting of the Parliament. He then desires his most Christian Majesty to write freely to his Britannick Majesty, and make him some generous Offers of his Purse, if he will dissolve the Parliament, in which he shall be assisted in England." In another Letter, dated in September, 'tis said, "The Duke will govern himself according to the Advices he receives from France, and will treat of nothing concerning the Catholick Religion, with Monsieur Ruigny, nor with any other but the French King's Confessor. His most Christian Majesty has made a very generous Offer of his Purse to the Duke, and his Assistance is at present necessary to subdue entirely those, who being exasperated against him as much as against the Duke, and are angry with the Duke, only because he is unalterably addicted to the Interest of his most Christian Majesty, will exercise their Malice, and their Rage, with more Brutality than ever." Thus, after pressing for more Money, to give the Duke Credit, with his Brother the King, the Traitor Coleman adds, There will nothing more remain to be fear'd, by his most Christian Majesty, but his Royal Highness will be able to dissolve the Parliament with Ease, and afterwards in recompence of such Assistance, will perform on his Part, all that his most Christian Majesty shall ask of him, and will proceed with Sincerity, upon the Word of a Prince, for the Interest of his most Christian Majesty. The Reader cannot help observing, that here is the presumptive Heir of the Crown in a horrid Conspiracy with the most implacable, powerful and cruel Enemy of our Religion and Liberty, to destroy both; for he has promis'd to do whatever the French King shall bid him; yet when the best and wisest Men of the Nation were for excluding him the Succession four or five Years afterwards, how do the Compleat Historians thunder out their Anathemas against them! In his Letter of the 4th of the same Month, Coleman says, If the Treasure of the Church is ever to be made use of, it ought to be now, for they can demand nothing which the Duke will not be capable to do, for the Pope's Friends, and without their Aid, he will run great Hazard of being lost, both himself and his Associates. In a Letter of the 4th of October, to the Inter-nuncio, Coleman writes, You agree with me, that Money is the only Means of bringing the King into the Duke's Interest, and of disengaging him from the Parliament; yet forsooth, this Traitor must not be hang'd when he is call'd to an Account for this Treason. If it had been prov'd upon his Master, then a Subject, and there had been Justice and Spirit enough in the Nation to have made him accountable, much Argument, much Trouble, much Treasure, and much Blood had been sav'd. The Plot we see plainly was to put an End to this Nation at the Mercy of France. Again, You must also agree with me, that nothing can more promote the Interest of the Catholick Party, which is the principal Object of the Duke's Care and Affection, and of the Hatred of the Parliament, and which must hope or fear, according as the one or the other of them encrease in Power:----- Nothing in the World is more certain, than that the King has a good Inclination towards the Duke and the Catholicks. Pray mind how often his Majesty gave the Parliament Assurances of his Zeal and Care for the Protestant Religion, and wou'd join himself willingly and inseparably to the Interests of his Royal Highness and the Catholicks, if he did not apprehend some Danger from such an Union, which however he would not have Cause to fear, if he found their Interest, and consequently their Power so far advanc'd above that of their Adversaries, that they should neither have the Power, nor the Boldness to contest any thing with them, which the King cou'd see in a very little Time. Here the Mask is taken quite off; if the Pope and the French King will assist the Duke of York as he desires, the Parliament shall neither have the Power, nor the Boldness to contend any longer for their Religion and Liberties. Again, I am certain Money cou'd not fail of persuading the King to it, and then the Traitor speaks but too truly of him, For there is nothing it cannot make him do, tho' it were as much to his Prejudice as this we endeavour to persuade him to, is to his Advantage. These, and other Genuine Letters of Coleman's, are sufficient Proofs of the Popish Plot in general, and the Objection that is made to it, on account of the King's being a Papist, is remov'd, if we consider the Opinion the Duke had of him, that he wou'd do any thing for Money; that he car'd not what became of Religion, if he had Ease and Pleasure; that every Parliament brought them into Peril of utter Ruin; if they wou'd open the Peoples Purse, that the next Successor was their own; and tho' his Morals were not very good, his Principles were Popish and Flaming. It is no wonder therefore that they consented to take off one Popish Brother, from whose Indolence they expected nothing good to them, and to place another Popish Brother on the Throne, from whose Bigotry they expected every thing.

Edward tells us, that John Earl of Mulgrave, late Duke of Buckingham, was this Year made a Knight of the Garter, by the Favour of the Dutchess of Cleveland, the Earls of Sunderland, Peterborough and Strafford, Privy Counsellors, the Earl of Arlington, Lord Chamberlain, Sir Joseph Williamson, Secretary of State, and the Duke of York in League with the French King against England.

The Duke's Plot against the Protestants and English Liberty.

Why the Papists plotted against him.

A.D. 1674 Duke of Monmouth, Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, who some Years after burnt his Picture, as a grateful Acknowledgment of the Honour he had done them.

Proposals of the Dissenters for a Union. During the last Session of Parliament, the Earl of Orrery desir'd Mr. Baxter to draw up short Proposals of the Terms and Means which he thought wou'd satisfy the Non-conformists, so far as to unite all Protestants against Popery, professing he had met with many great Men, who were much for it, particularly Sir Thomas Osborn, the new Lord Treasurer, and Dr. Morley, Bishop of Winchester, who vehemently press'd his Desires of it. Dr. Fulwood and other Divines, had been with Mr. Baxter, to the like Purpose, testifying the Bishop's Resolution about it. Mr. Baxter told them all, that he wish'd they would tell Morley, he had done so much to the Contrary, and never any thing this Way, since his Professions of this Sort; that 'till his real Endeavours convinc'd Men, it wou'd not be believ'd he was serious. However, Baxter drew up Proposals as Lord Orrery desir'd him, and that Lord return'd them with Bishop Morley's Strictures, or Animadversions; by which he made it appear fully, that all his Professions for Abatement and Concord were, according to Mr. Baxter, deceitful Snares, and that no such Thing at all was intended by him. The Reverend Minister last mention'd, answer'd his Animadversions, as may be seen at large in his Life.

Part III. p. 100. seq. He opposes the Union.

The Bishop began to shew how healing his Temper was by his first Stricture; that all Proposals of Abatement was overthrowing or undermining Church Government; by which means he makes the Cross in Baptism, Kneeling at the Sacrament, the Objections to the Office of Burial, &c. to concern Church Government. I do not repeat Mr. Baxter's Answers to the Bishop's Animadversions, for I do not think them worth the Pains he took about them. What the Bishop says about God-Fathers and God-Mothers, must not be omitted, The Church in Favour to Infants appoints others, in case the Parent should die, or neglect their Duty, to have a Paternal Care of them, in order to their Education, for the Performance of their Baptismal Covenant, and how well those the Church appoints for that Duty perform it, is too well known to leave any Doubt of the Use, and even Necessity of such Sureties. In another of his Strictures, he charges Mr. Baxter with aiming to set up Auricular Confession, whereas he wou'd doubtless have as soon set up Bell and the Dragon in his Meeting-House; but the Bishop has no where shewn his Piety and Judgment, more than in his Eulogy on the Church Catechism, What is your Name, &c.

I know no need it hath of Mending, nor who are wise enough to mend it.

Mr. Baxter's Answer to this was short and pithy, I am sorry for it, but cannot help it. It wou'd bear no more. In a Debate about the Five Mile Act Oath next Year, the Lord Shaftsbury speaking of the Catechism said, I really think it may be mended, and durst declare to your Lordships, it is not well that there is not a better made. Whose Judgment will the Reader take, Lord Shaftsbury's, or Bishop Morley's? The Bishop's will not be much recommended to him by his Definition of the Protestant Religion in that Debate. It is comprehended in the XXXIX. Articles, the Common-Prayer, the Catechism, the Homilies, and the Canons. Is it reasonable to expect one shou'd enter into Controversy with such Argumentators?

Des Maiz Col. p. III.

Some time after this, a leading Man in the House of Commons, drew up a Bill for Accommodation between Conformists and Non-conformists, to take off Oaths, Subscriptions and Declarations, except the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and Subscriptions to the Doctrine of the Church of England, according to the 13th of Elizabeth; but shewing it to the Bishop of Winchester, he so manag'd Matters, that he broke Morley the Design, yet that he might not seem to be for breaks nothing of what he so oft pretended towards a peaceable Disposition, he further'd an Act only to take off Assent and Consent, and the Renunciation of the Covenant; but when other Bishops were against, even this shew of Abatement, he told them openly in the House, Had it been but to abate them a Ceremony, I wou'd not have spoken to it; but I knew they were bound to the same Things still, by other Clauses or Obligations, if these were repeal'd. It is to be hop'd he went not out of the World in Impenitence, for such double Dealing with God and Man, wou'd then make one tremble to think of its Reward.

The King found the Dissenters wou'd not play his Cards, and having it in his Power to be even with them, he summon'd the Bishops to Court, to give him Advice what was to be done for securing of Religion, and they after several Consultations with the Lord Keeper, Osborn the Treasurer, Sir Joseph Williamson the Secretary, and Osborn others of the Junto, advis'd him to recal his advise to Licences, and put the Laws against Protestant Dissenters in Execution; which was done by a Declaration and Proclamation, and many infamous Persons were immediately set about the Work, some as Informers, some as Justices, &c. Yet Morley, and even Ward pretended still to be sensible of the Danger of Popery, and very forward for Accommodation with the Non-conformists. They mov'd it to many, and at length Dr. Tillotson and Dr. Stillingfleet desir'd a Meeting with Dr. Bates, Dr. Manton, Mr. Pool, and Mr. Baxter, in order to it, saying, they had Encouragement of several Lords, Spiritual and Temporal. These Divines met, and at last agreed on a Draught to be presented to the Bishops; which was no sooner done, then there was an end of the Treaty, and instead of Accommodation, they were fallen upon by the Pulpit, Press, by Persecution, Violence and Oppression. There was now a new Party struck up, consisting of the persecuting Clergy and the old Cavaliers. The Church was presently said to be in Danger, and the Nation running back to Forty One, for which in Truth, there was not Spirit left in it. Forty One was a Bug-bear, made use of to frighten the Oppress'd; whereas we remember that the Parliament who brought in the King, in a most solemn Manner, justify'd the Proceedings in Forty One, and had not the Hearts of the People been cow'd with Calamities of all Kinds, they might have thunder'd out Forty One with no more Success than Boys sling Squibs to terrify old Women and Children.

Mr. Locke, speaking of the last Session of Parliament, tells us, "The Bishops continu'd their Zeal against the Papists, and seem'd to carry on, in joining with the Country Lords, many excellent Votes in order to a Bill; but the Favour to Dissenting Protestants was gone, and they attempted a Bargain with the Country Lords, with whom they then join'd, not to promote any thing of that Nature. But the whole Clergy were instructed to declare that there was now no more Danger of the Papists, The Fanatick, for so they call the Dissenting Protestant, is again become the only dangerous Enemy, and the Bishops had found a Scotch Lord, Lauderdale, and two new Ministers, or rather great Officers of England, Finch and Osborn, who were desperate and rash."

A.D. 1674

A.D. 1674 "rash enough to put their Master's Business upon so narrow and weak a Bottom: And that old Covenanter Lauderdale is become the Patron of the Church, and has his Coach and Table fill'd with Bishops. The Keeper and the Treasurer are of a just Size to this Affair; for it is a certain Rule with the Churchmen to endure, as seldom as they can, in Business Men abler than themselves. But his Grace of Scotland was least to be excus'd of the three; for having fallen from Presbytery, Protestant Religion, and all Principles of publick Good and private Friendship, he now betakes himself to a Set of Men, who never forgive any Man the having been once in the Right; and such Men who wou'd do the worst of Things by the worst of Means, enslave their Country, and betray them under the Mask of Religion, which they have the publick Pay for, and the Charge of, so seething the Kid in the Mother's Milk. Our Statesmen and Bishops being now as well agreed as in old Laud's Time, on the same Principles, with the same Passion to attain their End; they in the first place give Order to the Judges in all their Circuits, to quicken the Execution of the Laws against Protestant Dissenters." And they had got a Set of Judges fit for the Business they were pick'd out for; as Sir Francis North, made Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas; Sir Richard Rainsford, Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench; William Montague, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer; Sir William Scroggs, Justice of the Common-Pleas; Sir Thomas Jones, Justice of the King's-Bench, &c. for propagating this holy Cause, says Coke.

In what follows from Mr. Locke we shall see the Formation of the Tory Faction from the very Egg, and in what putrid Matter it was generated.

"A Commission comes down, directed to the principal Gentlemen of each County, to seize the Estates of both Papists and Fanaticks, mention'd in a List annex'd, wherein, by great Misfortune or Skill, the Name of Papists, of best Quality and Fortune, and so best known, were mistaken, and the Commission render'd ineffectual as to them. Besides this, the great Ministers of State, Osborn, Lauderdale, &c. did in their common Talk assure the Party, that all the Places of Profit, Command and Trust shou'd only be given to the Old Cavalier. No man that had serv'd or been of the contrary Party, shou'd be left in any of them. And a Direction is issued to the great Ministers before-mention'd, and six or seven of the Bishops, to meet at Lambeth-house, who were, like the Lords of Articles in Scotland, to prepare their compleat Model for the next Session of Parliament." Of which we shall then hear enough; and in Expectation of dividing all the Places of Profit, Command and Trust, the Old Cavalier and the Persecuting Church-men stuck together against the Protestant Religion and English Liberty, till they fell into the Pit they had themselves dug for others. Mr. Marvel, in his Growth of Popery, writes of it thus; The old Cavalier Party were told all was at Stake, Church and State; that the Nation was running again into Forty one; that this was the Time to refresh their antient Merit, and receive the Recompence double of all their Loyalty; and that henceforward the Cavaliers shou'd have the Lottery of all the great or small Places in the Kingdom, and not so much as Sir Joseph Williamson have a Share in it.

The Earl of Arlington finding the Keeper and Treasurer were too many for him, and that he had no longer any Weight in the Junto, thought of supporting himself by a foreign Interest, and by gaining the Prince of Orange to recover the Ground he had lost. He offer'd to go over to Holland with the Earl of Offory, who, as well as himself, had marry'd a Daughter of the Heer Beverwaerd, one of the chief Nobles of the Province, who was in high Favour with the Prince, as these two Lords fancy'd, they shou'd be by Beverwaerd's Means: They both carry'd their Ladies with them. His Highness had always a particular Affection to Lord Offory, who was a very gallant Man, and no Slave to the Court. The Earl of Arlington said he wou'd go to the Bottom of every thing with the Prince, and did not doubt but he wou'd bring him into an entire Dependance on the King, and particularly dispose him to a general Peace, upon which his Majesty was much set; but not so much for the Security of the Netherlands and the United Provinces, as to oblige France, whose Pride had involv'd her in a War of prodigious Expence; and tho' she was herself successful, yet her Ally Sweden was like to lose all the Dominions she had in Germany, and the French King had no Way to prevent it but by a Peace. It was believ'd the Earl of Arlington had Leave to give the Prince Hope of marrying that Princess whom he afterwards marry'd, tho' the Duke of York declar'd he knew nothing of the Matter, but had heard that the Lord Arlington talk'd as if the managing that Affair was his chief Errand. Upon which the Duke ask'd the King if there was any thing in it, and his Majesty assur'd him he had a positive Order not so much as to speak of it. Contrary to this we read in Echard, That it was the Bent of the Lord Arlington to draw the Prince into Hopes, or Designs of a Match with the Duke of York's eldest Daughter, which his Highness took no more Notice of than to say, His Fortunes were not in a Condition for him to think of a Wife. Echard adds, That only the Lord Offory mention'd the Duke's Daughter, whereas Bishop Burnet assures us, That whether he had a secret Order, or did it without Order, the Earl of Arlington certainly talk'd a great deal of it to the Prince as a Thing he might depend on, if he wou'd in all other Things be govern'd by the King.

We have spoken of Sir William Temple's being sent Ambassador to Holland and the Netherlands upon Conclusion of the Dutch Peace, and of his being coldly receiv'd on Account of his Errand, which tended to a dishonourable Peace with France on the Side of the Confederates, and if he cou'd not procure a general Peace, to bring the Dutch to a separate one. The Prince wou'd not see him till the End of the Campaign, and he was not a little mortify'd at Arlington's coming over; for that Lord had thrown him off, when himself went into the French Interest: And, says my Lord of Sarum, Temple was too proud to bear Contempt, or forget such an Injury. He was a vain Man, much blown up in his own Conceit, which he shew'd too indecently on all Occasions. But the ingenious Archdeacon cou'd not perceive any thing of that Kind, and has therefore copy'd him Word for Word; tho' it is very plain, that when Sir William Temple brings Lord Arlington into the Scene, 'tis to make him act an Under-Part, and be a Foil to his own Figure. The Prince certainly preferr'd Temple's Judgment and Honesty to Arlington's Dissimulation and Inconstancy, and had a very mean Opinion of the Earl's Negotiations; which being treated

A.D. 1675 of at large in Sir William Temple's Letters, I refer to them, where it appears, that the Prince of Orange, even while so young and so little practis'd in Affairs, had so clear and so just a View of them, that nothing cou'd misguide him, and that the bad Prospect he had from the ill Condition he was in, did not frighten him to accept of any mean Terms of Peace. His Fidelity to his Country and the publick Interest was so firm, that no private Considerations of his own cou'd bias him, or indeed be much consider'd by him. Holland was in great Expectation, when they saw two such Men as the Earls of Ossory and Arlington come over together with Lord Laimier, the Treasurer's eldest Son, who only made the Shew a little greater: But the Shew was all. When Arlington attempted to justify the Part the King had in the late War, his Highness answer'd him, as one who knew that Matter as well as himself, in a dry, sullen, and uneasy Manner. And as to the War he was then engag'd in, he said all at once, The King may bring me out of it with Honour, if he pleases, and with Safety to Europe; if not, it must go on till the Fortunes of the Parties changing make Way for other Thoughts. Lord Arlington for some Days insisted vehemently on the Prince's dismissing Du Moulin, who had discover'd the Secrets of his Office to him. The Prince at last comply'd in that, and sent Du Moulin to the Plantations. As to all other Things, Arlington talk'd to his Highness in the Strain of a Governor, and seem'd to presume too much on his Youth, and on his Want of Experience. But instead of gaining over the Prince, he lost him so entirely, that all his Endeavours afterwards cou'd never beget any Confidence in him: So he came back, and reckoning this his last Essay, which succeeded so ill, he ever after that withdrew from all Business; but made himself easy to the King, who marry'd one of his natural Sons to his Daughter, and continu'd to be still very kind to him. Echard tells us, That Talbot, afterwards Duke of Tyrconnel, interceded with the King for him, which, if it was true, wou'd shew us at once what Arlington was, and what the King, Tyrconnel being the most bigoted and hated of all Irish Papists.

The Way being pav'd by a new Proclamation against Popish Priests, Father Huddleston excepted, who gave the Consecrated Wafer and Extream Unction to his Majesty a little before he dy'd, both Houses of Parliament met the 13th of April. They shou'd have met the 10th of November; but, as Coke tells us, The Instructions from France were not then sufficiently ripen'd. His Majesty made a Speech, wherein he reflected on those who had reported that this Parliament shou'd meet no more. He told them He had done as much on his Part as was possible, to extinguish the Fears and Jealousies of Popery. He is all the while himself a Papist, and will leave nothing undone, that may shew the World his Zeal to the Protestant Religion as it is establish'd in the Church of England, from which he will never depart, tho', as his Brother publish'd after his Death, he was so zealous a Papist, that he wrote a Pamphlet in Defence of Popery, wherein he endeavour'd to prove the Necessity of a visible Church and Guide, which cou'd be no other than the Church of Rome. Do these Men think there is Death, and after Death Judgment? That they must account at the great Day before a God that will not, that cannot be mock'd? And that the Word Church will there signify nothing, if the Society of the Pious, Virtuous, Charitable, and Faithful is not meant by it? Such Thoughts as these wou'd surely strike them dead with Confusion and Shame! The King recommended the Fleet to them, the old Wooden Leg made use of to beg with in those Days, and left the rest to the Lord Keeper, who has an admirable Expression in his Speech, if it had not been plac'd just after others, which made it a Contradiction. Having spoken of his Majesty's transcendent Zeal to the Protestant Religion, and at the same time of his reviving all the cruel Laws against Protestants dissenting from the National Church, he tells the Parliament as true a Thing as ever was told them: When we consider Religion in Parliament, we are suppos'd to consider it as a Parliament shou'd do, and as a Parliament in all Ages have done. For as it works upon the Conscience, as it is an inward Principle of the Divine Life, by which good Men do govern all their Actions, the State has nothing to do with it. 'Tis a Thing which belongs to another kind of Commission than that by which we sit here. He had just told them what the State had to do with the Consciences of Protestant Dissenters; and he has a Bill by him ready drawn, which made the State have to do with the Consciences of Men of all Denominations in Religion. Besides the Fleet, I do not find any thing else very remarkable in this Speech, unless this Quibble may be so reckon'd, You serve a Prince, in whose Style Dei Gratia seems not to be written by a vulgar Pen, but by the Arms of Omnipotence it self. To write with an Arm is not very much in Propriety of Speech; yet this is what Mr. Archdeacon calls Eloquence, tho' Dei Gratia is on the Rim of the French King Louis's, as well as on King Charles's Guinea's, and was, doubtless, written alike by a mortal Penman. The Parliament having thank'd the King for what he said concerning his extraordinary Zeal to the Protestant Religion, as in the Church of England, proceeded to several vigorous Resolves against Romish Priests; and then they fell again upon Duke Lauderdale, who had been acting the Tyrant with so much Infamy in Scotland, that many wonder'd at his getting into England again. Some of his Tyrannical Doings will be mention'd hereafter.

Dr. Gilbert Burnet, then Preacher at the Rolls, and Lecturer of St. Clements, was examin'd by the House of Commons in Lauderdale's Case. The Doctor, afterwards Lord Bishop of Salisbury, tells it thus in his Memoirs: "The House of Commons fell upon Duke Lauderdale, and those who knew what had pass'd between him and me, mov'd that I shou'd be examin'd before a Committee. I was brought before them; I told them how I had been commanded out of Town: But though that was Illegal, yet since it had been let fall, it was not insisted upon. I was next examin'd concerning the Design of Arming the Irish Papists. I said, I, as well as others, had heard him say, He wish'd the Presbyterians in Scotland wou'd rebel, that he might bring over the Irish Papists to cut their Throats." The Man who said this dy'd in his Bed, and one can't well say a worse Thing of this Reign: A Gibbet had been too good for him, and yet he's continu'd at the Council-Board. Dr. Burnet proceeds, "I was next examin'd concerning the Designs of bringing the Scottish Army into England. I desir'd to be excus'd as to what had pass'd in private Conversation, to which I thought I was not bound to answer, unless it were High Treason. They press'd me long, and I wou'd give them no Answer, so they all concluded that I knew great Matters, and reported this specially to the House. Upon that I was sent for, and brought before the House."

A.D. 1675 "House. I stood upon it, as I had done at the Committee, That nothing had pass'd that was Treason, and as to all other Things, I did not think my self bound to discover them. I said farther, I knew Duke Lauderdale was apt to say Things in a Heat, which he did not intend to do; and since he had us'd myself so ill, I thought myself the more oblig'd not to say any thing which look'd like Revenge, for what I had met with from him. I was brought four times to the Bar; at last I was told the House thought they had a Right to examine into every thing that concern'd the Safety of the Nation, as well as into Matters of Treason, and they look'd on me as bound to satisfy them; otherwise they wou'd make me feel the Weight of their heavy Displeasure, as one that conceal'd what they thought was necessary to be known: Upon this I yielded, and gave an Account of the Discourse between Duke Lauderdale and me." That coming into England the first Saturday in September, 1673, I went to visit the Duke of Lauderdale at his Lodgings in Whitehall, where the Duke and I discours'd of the Affairs of England and Scotland, and particularly of the Proceedings of Parliament, concerning the Declaration for suspending Penal Laws in Matters Ecclesiastical. And being afterwards ask'd, Whether, if Scotland being call'd to assist the King, they wou'd assist him or not? I answer'd, I think they will not; but the Duke reply'd, I believe they will. Then asking me of the Affairs of Scotland, I answer'd, The People in Scotland, that are at such a Distance, cannot imagine what to think of the King's Speech and Declaration. Whereunto the Duke reply'd, Hinc illæ Lachrymæ, and all have forsaken the King, but Lord Clifford and my self. Upon this, and other Informations, the Parliament drew up a very warm Address against Lauderdale; the King in his Answer pleaded the General Pardon for him: Upon which they resolv'd upon another Address against him, which prov'd abortive, as did their Proceedings against the Lord Treasurer Danby, who coming into the Treasury poor and insolvent, cou'd not well avoid the Displeasure of the Commons. They accus'd him for putting the Revenue into Confusion, and a wasteful Way of Expence: For laying aside the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whereby all Comptrolls are avoided: For Arresting a Gentleman by a Secretary's Warrant, to prevent his being an Evidence in a Law-Suit, and procuring the said Gentleman to be examin'd before the King, which induc'd him to speak Things contrary to his Knowledge and Conscience, that the Treasurer's Son might be marry'd to an Heiress: For receiving far greater Sums than had ever been issu'd out for secret Service, without Account, the King's Debts remaining unpaid, the Stores unfurnish'd, and the Navy unrepair'd: For assuming the Management of the Irish Affairs, which shou'd pass in Council, thereby to enable himself to convert great Sums of Money out of Ireland to his own Use: For procuring Gifts and Grants from the Crown, &c. The Corruption of this Treasurer appear'd so fully afterwards, as leaves no room to doubt of this, though he had a Majority in the House to clear him of these Articles when it was put to the Vote.

Address to recall the English in the French Service.

Then the Parliament address'd the King to recall his Subjects out of the French King's Service; but he answer'd, that he thought he cou'd not do it in Honour; however, he wou'd hinder any more going over to recruit the English Forces in the French Army. The Parliament not satisfy'd, prepar'd a second Address, with this Addition, That the Officers of the several Ports do take Care for binding any more going over for that Service for the future. A.D. 1675

We have mention'd a Conclave to be held at Lambeth, of six or seven Bishops, and the Chief Ministers of State, who were to prepare fit Bills about the to pass, for the strengthening the new Party, to Test. whom the King was resolv'd to give himself, consisting of the High Episcopal Men, and the Cavaliers. And as the Fruit of their sage and Christian-like Counsels, an Act was presented to the House of Peers by the Earl of Lindsey, Lord Great Chamberlain, entitled, An Act to prevent the Damages which may arise from Persons disaffected to the present Government. People that do ill are always afraid of every thing, and a bad Government can no more help Disaffection, than Fire can help Heat. Thence it is that ill Powers, and ill Ministers, are for chaining up Peoples Consciences with Oaths, at the same time that they bind their Hands and Feet with Iron: Thence it is that Edicts fly about against Writing or Speaking of State Affairs, and the like. By this monstrous Bill, all Persons enjoying any beneficial Office or Employment, Ecclesiastical, Civil, or Military, to which were added Privy Counsellors and Members of Parliament, were under a Penalty to take this following Oath: I Gilbert Sheldon do declare, that it is not lawful upon any Pretence whatsoever to take up Arms against the King, and that I do abhor that Traiterous Position of taking Arms by his Authority, against his Person, or against those that are commission'd by him, in pursuance of such Commission: And I do swear, that I will not at any Time endeavour the Alteration of the Government, either in Church or State. So help me God. This execrable Oath had been in Part introduc'd in the Corporation Act, then in the Militia Act, and afterwards in full in the Five Mile Act against Dissenting Teachers, says Echard, he will not call them Ministers: But as his good Word is no Praise, his bad one is no Scandal. His Account of this Debate is taken from a Tract, entitled, A Letter from a Person of Quality. He did not know the Author of it, who was Mr. Locke, and therefore has treated it as a Pamphlet, which was at his Discretion. Let us see what the ingenious Monsieur Des Maiseaux says upon this: Mr. Echard, in his History of England, hath transcrib'd several Paragraphs out of this Letter, though he never cites it, and ends by his Account of the Debate thus: "The Debates lasted sixteen or seventeen Days, the House, of ten sitting till Nine at Night, and sometimes till Midnight, in the Conclusion of which the Duke of Buckingham, as General of the Party, and last in the Field, made a famous Speech, consisting of eloquent, regular, and well plac'd Nonsense, hoping that that might prevail when nothing else would, and so brought Confusion into the House; where, besides the Unaccuracy of bringing into his Narrative, and making his own the Expression which the Author of the Letter has us'd by way of Compliment or Encomium, and thereby misrepresenting the Matter, he affirms, that the Debate was put to an End by the Confusion which the Duke of Buckingham's Speech brought into the House; whereas it appears by the Letter itself, that no Confusion was brought into the House; but on the contrary, that after a short Reply of the Earl of Winchelsea, the Question was put regularly to the Vote, and carry'd as the Court and Bishops wou'd have it.

I shall now make use of Mr. Locke's admirable Letter, and be the larger upon it, because the Argument between Liberty and Slavery is there fully stated; and all the Efforts of good English-men to defend their dear Liberties, both Spiritual and Temporal,

A.D. 1675 Temporal, against Persecution and Tyranny, are justify'd and recommended. Mr. Locke begins with telling us what Preparations were made for introducing this wicked Bill; and now comes this memorable Session of April 13, 1675, than which never any came with more Expectation of the Court, or Dread and Apprehension of the Country. The Officers, Court Lords, and Bishops were clearly the major Vote in the House of Lords; and they assur'd themselves to have the House of Commons as much at their Disposal, when they reckon'd the Number of the Courtiers, Officers, Pensioners, encreas'd by the Addition of the Church and Cavalier Party; besides the Address they had made to Men of the best Quality there, by hopes of Honour, great Employment, and such Things as wou'd take. In a Word, the French King's Ministers, who are the great Chapmen of the World, did not outdo ours at this Time; and yet the over-ruling Hand of God has blown upon their Politicks, and the Nation is escap'd this Session, like a Bird out of the Snare of the Fowler.

Court-Bishops for Tyranny, Mr. Locke proceeds: In this Session the Bishops wholly laid aside their Zeal against Popery; the Committee of the whole House for Religion, which the Country Lords had caus'd to be set up again, by the Example of the former Sessions, cou'd hardly get, at any Time, a Day appointed for their sitting: And the main Thing design'd for a Bill voted in the former Session, the marrying our Princes to none but Protestants, was rejected, and carry'd in the Negative, by the unanimous Votes of the Bishops Bench. For, continues Mr. Locke, I must acquaint you that our great Prelates were so near an Infallibility, that they were always found in the Session of one Mind in the Lords House: Yet the Lay-Lords not understanding from how excellent a Principle this proceeded, commonly call'd them, for that Reason, the DEAD WEIGHT; and they really prov'd so in the following Business, the Test, we are about to treat of. It is but Justice to the Memory of that Dead Weight, to see and remember who they were that compos'd it.

call'd the Dead Weight. Dr. Gilbert Skeldon, Archbishop of Canterbury; Dr. Isaac Barrow, Bishop of St. Asaph; Dr. Humphry Lloyd, Bishop of Bangor; Dr. Peter Mew, Bishop of Bath and Wells; Dr. Guy Carlton, Bishop of Bristol; Dr. Peter Gunning, Bishop of Chichester; Dr. Thomas Wood, Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield; Dr. Benjamin Lany, Bishop of Ely; Dr. Anthony Sparrow, Bishop of Exeter; Dr. John Prichard, Bishop of Gloucester; Dr. Herbert Crofts, Bishop of Hereford; Dr. Francis Davies, Bishop of Llandaff; Dr. William Fuller, Bishop of Lincoln; Dr. Humphry Henckman, Bishop of London; Dr. Henry Compton, Bishop of Oxford; Dr. John Dolben, Bishop of Peterborough; Dr. Seth Ward, Bishop of Salisbury; Dr. George Morley, Bishop of Winchester; Dr. Walter Blanford, Bishop of Worcester; Dr. Richard Sterne, Archbishop of York; Dr. Edward Rainbow, Bishop of Carlisle; Dr. Nebemiah Crew, Bishop of Durham. I mention no more of the then Reigning Prelates, for the rest were truly Right Reverend Fathers of the Protestant Church of England; Bishop Lucy, Bishop Reynolds, Bishop Pearson, Prelates equally celebrated for Piety and Learning, whose Names are too precious to be enroll'd in the List of the Dead Weight, of which they were not deem'd a Part.

The Test Act receiv'd its first Reading, and was appointed for the Second without much Opposition: At the second Reading, the Lord Keeper Finch, and the Court Lords, recommended the Bill to the House in set elaborate Speeches, the Keeper calling it, A moderate Security to the Church and State, and that no honest Man cou'd refuse it; and whosoever did, gave great Suspicion of dangerous and Anti-monarchical Principles. The other Lords declaim'd very much upon the Rebellion of the late Times, the great Number of Fanatics, the dangerous Principles of Rebellion still remaining. The Earl of Shaftesbury, and some other Country Lords, earnestly press'd that the Bill might be laid aside, and that they might not be engag'd in the Debate of it; or else, that that Freedom they shou'd be forc'd to use in the necessary Defence of their Opinion, and the preserving of their Laws, Rights, and Liberties, might not be misconstru'd. What they spoke, had so much Reason in it, that all the Lords who were at Liberty from Court Engagements, resolv'd to oppose to the uttermost a Bill of so dangerous Consequence. When it was carry'd by Numbers to go upon it, the following Lords enter'd their Protests against it, with their Reasons for it.

"We whose Names are under-written, being Lords Pro-"Peers of this Realm, do, according to our Rights, test against
"and the antient Usage of Parliaments, declare,"
"that the Question having been put, Whether
"the Bill, entitl'd, An Act to prevent, &c. doth
"so far intrench upon the Privileges of this House,
"that it ought therefore to be cast out, it being
"resolv'd in the Negative. We do humbly con"ceive that any Bill which imposeth an Oath
"upon the Peers, with a Penalty, as this doth,
"that upon Refusal of that Oath, they shall be "made incapable of Sitting and Voting in this "House. As it is a Thing unprecedented in for"mer Times, so it is in our humble Opinion the "highest Invasion of the Liberties and Privileges "of the Peers that possibly may be, and most "destructive of the Freedom which they ought "to enjoy as Members of Parliament; because "the Privileges of Sitting and Voting in a Par"liament, is an Honour they have by Birth, and "a Right so inherent in them, and inseparable
"from them, as that nothing can take it away,
"but what the Laws of the Land must withal
"take away their Lives, and corrupt their Blood;
"upon which Ground, we do here enter our Dis"sent from that Vote, and our Protestation a"gainst it.

Notwithstanding this, the great Officers and Bishops call'd out for the Question, of referring the Bill to a Committee, which the Country Lords oppos'd, in a Debate that lasted five Days, and then it was committed: Against which the following Protestation was enter'd.

Another. The Question being put, Whether the Bill, entitl'd, An Act to prevent the Dangers, &c. shou'd be committed, it being carry'd in the Affirmative; and though after several Day's Debates, we are in no manner satisfy'd, but still apprehending that this Bill doth not only subvert the Privilege and Birth-right of the Peers, by imposing an Oath upon them, with the Penalty of losing their Places in Parliament; but also, as we humbly conceive, strike at the very Root of Government, it being necessary to Governments to have Freedom of Votes and Debates, in those who have Power to alter and make Laws; and besides, the express Words of the Bill obliging every Man to abjure all Endeavours to alter the Government in the Church, without Regard to any thing that Rules of Prudence in the Government,

A.D. 1675 Government, or Christian Compassion to Protestant Dissenters, as the Necessity of Affairs at any Time shall or may require; upon these Considerations, we humbly think it to be of dangerous Consequence to have any Bill of this Nature so much as committed, and do enter our Dissent to that Vote, and Protestation against it.

Buckingham, Winton, Salisbury, Denbigh, Howard of Berks, Bristol, Clarendon, Stamford, Shaftsbury, Wharton, Mohun, De la Mer.

The Court Lords and Bishops fell furiously on the Protesters, endeavouring not only to get severe Proceedings against their Persons, but to take away the Liberty of Protesting, with Reasons, which Denzil Lord Holles defended with so great Ability and Learning, that all the opposite Party cou'd obtain by a Debate of several Hours, was a Vote, That the Reasons given in the said Protestation, did reflect upon the Honour of the House, and were of dangerous Consequence. There happen'd something in this Debate, so very much to the Honour of the Lord Holles, that I cannot pass it by: For when it was at the Height, and the Protesting Lords in danger of the Tower, he begg'd Leave of the House to put his Name to that Protest, and take his Fortune with those Lords; because his Sickness had forc'd him out of the House the Day before, and not being at the Question, he cou'd not by the Rules of the House sign it. You see what Affection the Promoters of this Test had to their own and their Fellow-Subjects Liberties; what Spirit the Sticklers for the divine, indefeasible, and unalienable Right of Princes, have always been animated by; how naturally such Doctrines lead Men to every thing that is Slavish and Arbitrary: And had not the Fate of King James made it a Jest for Church-men to preach as they do, the same Sanction wou'd have been still fix'd on them. One of the Bishops then living, liv'd long enough not only to unswear what was to be sworn by this impious Oath, but actually to take Arms, not only against those commission'd by the King, but against the King himself. The Treasurer Danby did not only unswear what was by this impious Oath to be sworn, but did actually take Arms against the King, against those commission'd by him, and give his Vote for Abdicating one King, and Crowning another, twelve or thirteen Years after he labour'd so much to have this Test impos'd upon the Nation. The Country Lords resenting the Vote pass'd against their Protestation, enter'd another in these Words:

Danby's Inconsistency.

"Whereas it is the undoubted Privilege of each Peer in Parliament, when a Question is pass'd contrary to his Vote and Judgment, to enter his Protestation against it; and that in pursuance thereof, the Bill, entitled, An Act to prevent the Dangers, &c. being conceiv'd by some Lords to be of so dangerous Nature, as that it was not fit to receive the Countenance of a Commitment, those Lords did protest against the Commitment of the said Bill; and the House having taken Exception at some Expressions in their Protestation, those Lords who were present at the Debate, did all of them severally and voluntarily declare, that they had no Intention to reflect upon any Member, much less upon the whole House, which is humbly conceiv'd was more than in Strictness did consist with that absolute Freedom of protesting, which is inseparable from every Member of this House, and was done by them meerly out of their great Respect to the House, and their earnest Desire to give all Satisfaction concerning themselves, and the Clearness of their Intentions: Yet the House not satisfy'd with this their Declaration, but proceeding to a Vote, That the Reasons given in the said Protestation do reflect upon the Honour of the House, and are of dangerous Consequence. We whose Names are under-written, conceiving our selves, and the whole House of Peers extremely concern'd, that this great Wound shou'd be given (as we humbly apprehend, to so essential a Privilege of the whole Peerage of this Realm, as that of protesting) do now, according to our unquestionable Right, make use of the same Liberty to enter this our Dissent from, and Protestation against the said Vote.

It is with Pleasure we meet with so many illustrious Names vigorously withstanding a Bill contriv'd by the Bishops against the Liberty of a Free People. It must give one a Horror of those mad Proceedings in the Days of Anarchy, when an Assembly, full of so many noble Patriots in the House of Peers, was voted Useless and dangerous. The Use and Safety of them have eminently appear'd in later Times; and there is not a good English-man, who does not reflect with the deepest Sense of Gratitude on the gallant Stand they have made, when more than once the Designs of ill Men had taken Effect without it, as in the Time of the last Treasurer, the Utrecht Peace, &c. It cannot be said, that these protesting Lords were Schismatics and Fanatics, were the Lords Dorset, Berks, Clarendon, Ailsbury, Halifax, Bristol, &c. charg'd with Schismatical or Antimonarchical Principles? Did they not carry the Prerogatives of the Church and Crown as high as the Highest? and only refus'd to sacrifice their Understandings, and their Birth-rights to the Advancement of them. There seems to be no greater Complement to the Crown, than an unlimited Obedience; but that Complement is paid by those who attack it in Essentials, and wou'd deprive it of its Ecclesiastical Supremacy, which shews us for what Reason it was, that an absolute Dominion was so furiously preach'd up in King Charles's, King James, and the latter Part of Queen Anne's Reign, when the Ministers were as bad as in the Reigns of those Kings. That Dominion was not to center in the Prince only, but to be divided by the Priesthood. If the Power of the Crown was allow'd to be boundless, the Church was at the same time declar'd to be Independant, and the Obedience of these Men is consequently of no more Extent than they think fit, they being themselves their own Judges, and, as they pretend, the State having no Right to bring them to Judgment.

The Lords against the Bill, after it was committed to a Committee of the whole House, obtain'd two previous Votes which much enervated it, "That no Oath should be impos'd by any Bill upon the Peers, with the Penalty, in Case of Refusal, to lose their Places or Votes in Parliament, or Liberty to debate therein." In this Debate it was urg'd, that the Penalty shou'd be a Premunire, and the Duke of Buckingham laugh'd that out of the House, by a Speech, to this Effect: He desir'd their Lordships to consider what a Premunire was, which they were to be under, if they did not take the Oaths, tho' they were to keep their Seats in Parliament. By a Premunire we are to be stripp'd of all we have, and as we go along the Streets, any body may take our Bill.

our Cloaths from us, saying, You are in a Præmunire. If any one in Compassion should give a Lord a new Coat to cover his Nakedness, the next Man he meets, may take it away again, saying, You are in a Præmunire, and have right to nothing: However, the stiff Peer has his Seat in Parliament still, and may sit here without Wastecost or Breeches; which set the House a laughing, and was the Occasion of dropping that Penalty.

The other previous Vote was, "That there should be nothing in this Bill which should extend to deprive either of the Houses of Parliament, or any of their Members, of their just and antient Freedom and Privileges, of Debating any Matter or Business, which shall be propos'd or debated in either of the said Houses, or at any Conference or Committee of both, or either of the said Houses of Parliament, touching the Repeal or Alteration of any old, or preparing any new Laws, or the Redressing any publick Grievance; but that the said Members of either of the said Houses, and the Assistants of the House of Peers, and every of them shall have the said Freedom of Speech, and all other Privileges whatsoever they had before the making of this Act."—However, upon the Report from the Committee, a Vote pass'd, That all Persons who have, or shall have Right to sit and vote, in either House of Parliament, shall have the Oath impos'd upon them; against which the following Lords protested.

Bucks, Bedford, Winton, Salisbury, Berks, Bridgewater, Stamford, Clarendon, Denbigh, Dorset, Shaftsbury, Wharton, Eure, De la Mer, Paget, Mobun.

It was observ'd by the Earl of Bolingbroke, a Man of great Abilities, and learned in the Laws, that tho' there was a Proviso to preserve the Freedom of Debates, yet the Oath remain'd notwithstanding that Proviso upon all Men that shall take it as a Prohibition, either by Speech or Writing; to endeavour any Alteration in Religion, Church or State, even upon the Members of both Houses, otherwise than as they Speak and Vote in open Parliaments or Committees. This was seconded by my Lord De la Mer, and the Earl of Shaftsbury presently drew up some Words for preserving the same Rights, Privileges and Freedoms which Men then enjoy'd by Law. It was now that the Court Lords and Bishops shew'd with the greatest Plainness what they aim'd at; insomuch that the Duke of Lauderdale, tho' under the Load of two Addresses, told the Committee, as did also the Lord Keeper Finch, and Lord Treasurer Danby, they intended to prevent Caballing against the Government. A good Government fears no Caballing; nothing can be said of it but what is good; and a bad one, such as this was, cannot prevent it. He that's oppress'd will speak, as he that's in Pain will moan. Several strong Reasons were urg'd against depriving People of their natural Right, the Use of their Tongue; the Laws had sufficiently bound them already, they cou'd not speak disrespectfully of the Government without Punishment, and now they cannot speak it without Perjury. It is monstrous to think that this Bill was carry'd thro' every Question by Bishops, without whom the Country Lords wou'd have been the Majority.

To prevent any more Protestations, the House for the Future, reported not the Votes of the Committee, and Parts of the Bill as they pass'd them, but took the same Order as is observ'd in other Bills, not to report to the House, till they had gone thro' with it, and then to report all the Amendments together. The Bill being read, the Lord Halifax spoke admirably against Oaths of any Kind. "That as there really was no Security to any State by Oaths, so also no private Persons, much less States-Men, wou'd ever order his Affairs, as relying on it. No Man wou'd ever sleep with open Doors, or unlock'd up Treasure, shou'd all the Town be sworn not to rob: So that the Use of Multiplying Oaths had been most commonly to exclude or disturb some honest conscientious Men, who would not have prejudic'd the Government." Lord Halifax's Speech against Oaths. A.D. 1675 Cou'd not the Bishops think of this, those whose Function it was to direct Mens Consciences right, cou'd they not forbear misguiding or disturbing them? His Lordship insist'd, "That the Oath impos'd by the Bill, contain'd three Clauses, the two former Assertory, and the last Promissary, and that it was worthy the Consideration of the Bishops, whether Assertory Oaths, which were properly appointed to give Testimony of Matter of Fact, of which a Man is capable of being assur'd by the Evidence of his Sense, be lawfully to be made use of, to confirm or invalidate Doctrinal Propositions; and whether that Legislative Power which imposes such an Oath, doth not necessarily assume to itself Infallibility? And as for Promissary Oaths, it was desir'd that those learned Prelates wou'd consider the Opinion of Grotius, de Jure Belli & Pacis, who seems to make it plain that those kind of Oaths are forbidden by our Saviour; and whether it wou'd not become the Fathers of our Church, when they have well weigh'd the Place he notes out of the New Testament, to be more tender in multiplying Oaths, than hitherto the great Men of the Church have been." But whatever this Lord, and others, cou'd say to the contrary, the Bishops, says Mr. Locke, carry'd the Point, and an Oath was order'd by the major Vote.

The next Part of the Debate was about Members of Parliament, &c. and the previous Votes were urg'd in their Behalf; but the Lord Keeper, who mov'd to have them inserted, said, with equal Resolution and Eloquence, the House was Master of their own Orders, and the Interpretation of them.

When these Words, I A. B. do declare, that it Debate of is not lawful upon any Pretence whatsoever to take up Arms against the King, came to be consider'd, the Lords against the Bill urg'd, that it might introduce a great Change of Government, to oblige all Men in great Trust in England, to declare the exact Boundary and Extent of the Oath of Allegiance, and enforce some Things to be stated, that are much better involv'd in Generals. There is a Law of 25 Edward III. That Arms shall not be taken up against the King, and that it is Treason to do so, and it is a just and reasonable Law, but it is an idle Question at best, to ask whether Arms in any Case, can be taken up against a lawful Prince? because it unnecessarily brings in the Debate in every Man's Mind, how there can be a Distinction then left, between absolute and bounded Monarchies, if Monarchs have only the Fear of God, and no Fear of Humane Resistance to restrain them? The Arguments are of that Length, that I can only give the Reader a Hint of them; the Strength of them was such, that the Court, and Court Lords took Care to have them burnt as soon as made publick.

The next Thing in the Debate was, that Part of the Test, from whence it took the Name of the Oath of Abhorrence. I do abhor that traitorous Position of taking Arms by his Authority, against his Person: To which it was objected, that the

A.D. 1675

Position, as here laid down, is Universal, and yet in most Cases, it is not to be abhorr'd by honest and wise Men. For there is but one Case, and that never likely to happen again, where this Position is like to be traiterous, and that is the Case of the Long Parliament, made Perpetual by the King's own Act, by which the Government was perfectly alter'd, and made inconsistent with it's self. Then Instances were given, wherein this Position was so far from being Traiterous, that it was both necessary and a Duty: As in the two Cases of Henry VI. of England and Charles VI. of France, who were both in the Hands of their Enemies, and not to have taken Arms against those who assum'd their Authority, and had their Persons for their Warrant, wou'd certainly have been a Breach of their Allegiance. In these and the like Cases it was not pretended but that the strict Letter of the Law might be otherwise construed, and the old Bishop of Winchester said, That to take up Arms in such Cases is not against, but for the Person of the King. In which his Lordship did not seem to be entirely of the same Mind with the Lord Keeper, who, to testify his own Abhorrency, had this Expression in a Speech of his, Away with that ill meant Distinction between Natural and Political Capacities. To which Mr. Marvel thus replies, "He is too well read to be ignorant that without that Distinction there wou'd be no Law, nor Reason of Law left in England. To which End it was, and to put all out of Doubt that this Test requires to declare Men's Abhorrency as of a Traiterous Position, to take Arms against those that are commission'd by him in Pursuance of such Commission, and yet neither the Tenor nor Rule of any such Commission specify'd, nor the Qualifications of those that shall be arm'd with such Commission express'd or limited. Never was so much Sense contain'd in so few Words. No Conveyancer cou'd in more compendious or binding Terms have drawn a Dissettlement of the whole Birth-right of England." This naturally brings me to the third Part of the Test, or against those that are commission'd by them. Upon this it was observ'd, That if any King hereafter should, contrary to the Petition of Right, demand or levy Money by Privy-Seal or otherwise, and cause Soldiers to enter and distrain for such illegal Taxes; in such a Case any Man might defend his House against them, and yet this is contrary to the Words of the Declaration made in this Test. The Lord Keeper said, these were remote Instances. But a Man of as much Sense, and much more Wit than the Lord Keeper, says the quite contrary. These things, to use Marvel's Words, are no Niceties or remote Considerations: And he was still better told by the Earl of Shaftsbury, They will not hereafter prove so, when this Declaration has made the Practice of them justifiable. Here, according to Mr. Locke, the Mask was plainly pluck'd off, Arbitrary Government appear'd bare-fac'd, and a Standing Army was to be establish'd by Act of Parliament. For it was said by several of the Lords, That if whatever is by the King's Commission be not oppos'd by the King's Authority, then a Standing Army is Law, whenever the King pleases; and yet the King's Commission was never thought sufficient to protect or justify any Man, where it is against his Authority, which is the Law. This allow'd, alters the whole Law of England in the most Essential and Fundamental Parts of it, and makes the whole Law of Property become Arbitrary and without Effect whenever the King pleases.

Against those commission'd by the King.

It is to be wish'd, that all good English-men wou'd seriously consider who were the Men, and what their Principles, that wou'd have reduc'd us to the Condition of the Swedes and Danes, to have depended on the Will of the Prince; and the worst Princes are ever fond of such Dependence upon them. One cannot have a better Notion of the fatal Consequences which must have attended this Test, if it prevail'd, than by what Andrew Marvel writes of it; For as to the Commission, if it be to take away any Man's Estate or his Life by Force, yet it is the King's Commission. Or if the Person commission'd be under never so many Disabilities by Act of Parliament, yet his taking this Oath removes all those Incapacities, or his Commission makes it not disputable. But if a Man stood upon his Defence, a good Judge for the Purpose, and good Judges, as we have seen, were provided, finding that the Position was Traiterous, will declare that, by this Law he is to be executed for Treason. As strong as the Court Party and Bishops were in the House, such was the Power of Truth, that they cou'd not carry this abominable Declaration, without adding against those that are commission'd by him according to Law in Time of Rebellion and War.

We come now to what will fully evidence the Designs of the Clergy by such unwarrantable Complacency to the Court. The Church Government must not on any Account be alter'd no more than the State. I do swear, that I will not at any Time endeavour the Alteration of the Government in Church or State. Against which the Objection lay most plain and strong at the first Entrance of the Oath; that there was no Care taken of the Doctrine, but only of the Discipline of the Church, which points out to one as much as with a Finger, what the Bishops had then chiefly in View. The Papists need not scruple the taking this Oath, for Episcopacy remain'd in it's full Lustre, tho' the Papish Religion was introduc'd. But the King's Supremacy is jostled aside by this Oath, and makes better Room for an Ecclesiastical one; insomuch that the Party were forc'd immediately to have it thus worded, I will not endeavour to alter the Protestant Religion, or the Government of Church and State. And they valu'd themselves so much on their Condescension in the Matter, that they now call'd their Test a Security for the Protestant Religion. Mr. Locke expresses himself thus on this Occasion, But the Country Lords wonder'd at their Confidence in this, since they had never thought of it before, and had been by pure Shame compell'd to this Addition; for it was not unknown to them, that some of the Bishops themselves had told some Roman Catholick Lords of the House, that Care had been taken that it might be such an Oath as might not bear upon them. There was a great Struggle against the Words Endeavour to alter. The Earl of Shaftsbury said, It is a far different Thing to believe, or to be fully persuaded of the Truth of the Doctrine of our Church, and to swear never to endeavour to alter, which last must be utterly unlawful, unless you place an Infallibility in the Church or your self; you being otherwise oblig'd to alter, whenever a clearer or better Light comes to you. And he desir'd Leave to ask, Where are the Boundaries? or, Where shall we find how much is meant by the Protestant Religion? The Lord Keeper thinking he had got an Advantage, desires it might not be told in Oath, nor publish'd in the Streets of Askelon, that a Lord of so great Parts and Eminence, and professing himself for the Church of England, shou'd not know what is meant by the Protestant Religion: And I must desire desire that it may be told in Gath, and publish'd in the Streets of Askelon, that whatever the Lord Keeper might do, the Bishop of Winchester did not know what is meant by the Protestant Religion, by his Definition of it, the Thirty-nine Articles, the Liturgy, the Catechism, the Homilies, and the Canons; there not being one Protestant Doctor of the Reform'd Church in all Christendom, who wou'd have so interpreted it on the Continent. But the Earl of Shaftsbury, in his Reply, shew'd he knew more of the Matter than both the Bishop and the Keeper.

No Care of Doctrine.

Bishops' sentence in this, since they had never thought of it before, and had been by pure Shame compell'd to Papists.

"I beg so much Charity of you to believe that I know the Protestant Religion so well, and am so confirm'd in it, that I hope I shou'd burn for the Witness of it, if Providence shou'd call me to it. But I may perhaps think some Things not necessary which you account essential: Nay, I may think some Things not true, or agreeable to Scripture, which you may call Doctrines of the Church. Besides, when I am to swear never to endeavour to alter, it is certainly necessary to know how far the Extent of this Oath is; but since you have told me that the Protestant Religion is in those Five Tracts, I have still Power to ask, Whether you mean those whole Tracts were the Protestant Religion, or only that the Protestant Religion is contain'd in all these, but that every Part of these are not the Protestant Religion? If you mean the former of these, then I am extreamly in the Dark to find the Doctrine of Predestination in the seventeenth and eighteenth Articles, to be own'd by so few great Doctors of the Church, and to find the nineteenth Article to define the Church directly as the Independants do. Besides, the twentieth Article stating the Authority of the Church, is very dark, and either contradicts itself, or says nothing, or what is contrary to the known Laws of the Land. Further, Several other Things in the thirty-nine Articles have been preach'd and written against by Men of great Favour, Power, and Preferment in the Church.

"I humbly conceive the Liturgy is not so Sacred, being made by Men the other Day, and thought to be more differing from the Dissenting Protestants, and less easy to be comply'd with, upon the Advantage of a Pretence well known to us all, of making Abatements as might the better invite them, instead of which, there's scarce one Alteration but widens the Breach, and no Ordination allow'd by it here (as it now stands last Reform'd by the Act of Uniformity) but what is Episcopal. So that a Popish Priest, when converted, is capable of any Church Preferment, without Re-ordination; but a Protestant Minister, not Episcopally Ordain'd, is requir'd to be Re-ordin'd. As much as in us lies, unchurching all the Foreign Protestants that have not Bishops, though the contrary was both allow'd and practis'd from the Beginning of the Reformation to the Time of that Act, and several Bishops made of such as were never ordain'd Priests by Bishops; and I think, to endeavour to alter and restore the Liturgy to what it was in Queen Elizabeth's Days, may consist with my being a very good Protestant. As to the Catechism, I really think it may be amend'd, and dare declare to you, it is not well that there is not a better made. For the Homilies, I believe there may be a better Book made; and Homily the third, of Repairing and keeping Clean Churches, may be omitted. What is yet stronger than all this, the Canons of our Church are directly the old Popish Canons, which are full in Force, and no other, as will appear, if you turn to Stat. 25 Hen. VIII. cap. 10. confirm'd and renew'd by 1 Eliz. where all those Canons are establish'd, till an Alteration shall be made by the King in pursuance of that Act; which was attempted by Edward VI. but not perfected, and let alone ever since, for what Reason the Lords the Bishops can best tell; and it is very hard to be oblig'd by Oath not to endeavour to alter either the English Common-Prayer, or the Canon of the Mass.

The Reasons of this Lord, and others, who spoke to the same Thing, were so cogent, that the House seem'd convinc'd of the Necessity of an Expedient.

The Lord Wharton offer'd, as a Cure to the whole Oath, and what might make it pass in all the Parts of it, to add these Words at the latter End, As the same is, or shall be establish'd by Act of Parliament: But, says Mr. Locke, this was not endur'd at all. The Lord Grey of Rolleston offer'd another Expedient, which was the Addition of these Words, by Force or Fraud, and then it wou'd have run thus: I do swear not to endeavour by Force or Fraud to alter: This was also a Cure that wou'd have pass'd the whole Oath, the Duke of York and Bishop of Rochester both seconding it; but the Lord Treasurer, who, says Mr. Locke, had privately before consented to it, speaking against it, gave the Word and Sign to that Party; and it being put to the Question, the major-Vote answer'd all Arguments. This Lord Treasurer is the same who, when Sir Thomas Osborn, had been a main Instrument in rejecting this very Test at Oxford; but his Staff was so beneficial to his small Fortunes, which stood in indispensable Need of Recruits, that he abandon'd all his Sentiments of Liberty, and became the Tool of Arbitrary Power. The Conspirators were so flush'd by their Majority, that without considering the Remainder of the Test, they wou'd have it put to the Question entire; which was oppos'd by the Lord Mohun, and afterwards by as great Disorder in the House as ever had been seen there, proceeding to use Mr. Locke's Words, from the Rage those unreasonable Practices had caus'd in the Country Lords, who stood up in a Body, and cry'd out, ADJOURN, ADJOURN, with so loud a continued Voice, that when Silence was obtain'd, Fear did what Reason cou'd not do, and put off the Question for the whole Test.

Now comes the Consideration of the latter Part of the Oath. The Lords against the Bill objected, That it was not agreeable to the King's Crown and Dignity, to have his Subjects sworn to the Government of the Church equally as to himself; that it ought to be well understood before such an Act pass'd, what the Government of the Church was, and what the Boundaries; whether it derives no Power, nor Authority, nor the Exercise of any Power, Authority, or Function, but from the King, as Head of the Church; and from God, as through him all his other Officers do; otherwise there wou'd be Imperium in Imperio, and two distinct supream Powers, inconsistent with each other, in the same Place, and over the same Persons. Mr. Locke tells us, The Bishops alleg'd, that the Priesthood, their Power and Authorities, were deriv'd immediately from God; but that the Licence of exercising that Authority and Power in any Country, is deriv'd from the Civil Magistrate. To which it was reply'd, That it was dangerous to secure by Oath and Act of Parliament those in the Exercise of an Authority and Power in the King's Country, and over his Subjects, which being receiv'd from Christ himself, cannot be alter'd or limited by the King's Law; and that this was directly to set the Mitre above the Crown.

A.D. 1675 It was further offer'd, that this Oath was the greatest Attempt that had been made against the King's Supremacy since the Reformation. For the King in Parliament may alter, diminish, or enlarge, or take away any Bishoprick: He may take away any Part of a Diocese, or a whole Diocese, and put them under Deans or other Persons; for if this be not lawful, but that Episcopacy should be Jure Divino, the maintaining the Government as it is now is unlawful; so that, at best, the Government wants Alteration that is so imperfectly settled.

The Lord Stafford, whose Fate afterwards is so well known, as great a Bigot as he was to Popery, though he had till now been for the Bill, yet such was the Strength of the Reasons against it, with respect to this Part of the Test, that he freely declar'd, There ought to be an Addition to it, for preserving the Freedom of Debates in Parliament; which was also strongly supported by the Earls of Bridgewater, Clarendon, Denbigh, and Ailesbury; and the opposite Party was in the End oblig'd to agree that the Oath should run thus: I A. B. do swear, that I will not endeavour to alter the Protestant Religion, now by Law establish'd in the Church of England; nor the Government of the Kingdom, in Church or State, as it is now by Law establish'd. And a Proviso for Freedom of Debates in Parliament was mention'd, which breaking the main Design of the Bill, it was from thence-forward manag'd with less Warmth by the Favourers of it. The Marquess of Winchester, before the finishing of the Oath, tender'd an additional one, which would have been very serviceable to the Publick if it could have pass'd.

M. of Winton's Oath against Places and Pensions. I A. B. do swear, that I will never by Threats, Injunctions, Promises, Advantages, or Invitations, by or from any Person whatsoever, nor from the Hopes or Prospect of any Gift, Place, Office, or Benefit whatsoever, give my Vote other than according to my Opinion and Conscience, as I shall be truly and really persuaded upon the Debate of any Business in Parliament. So help me God. This was intended only to be taken by the Members of Both Houses. To this the Lord Keeper seem'd very averse, and declar'd it in a Speech that has so much Flattery in it, 'tis perfectly nauseous. It is an useless Oath; for all Gifts, Places, and Offices, are likeliest to come from the King; and no Member of Parliament in either House can do too much for the King, or be too much of his Side; and Men may lawfully and worthily have in their Prospect such Offices or Benefits from him. When such Doctrine as this was taught in so august an Assembly, was it not wonderful that we preserv'd our Liberties! But there was a noble Band of Peers who stood in the Breach, and defended their Birth-right with equal Reason and Courage. These reply'd, "That Men had been, might, and Lord Keeper's nauseous Speech.

He is answer'd.

"were likely to be, in either House, too much for the King, as they call'd it, and that whoever endeavour'd to give more Power to the King than the Law and Constitution of the Government had given, especially if it tended to the introducing an absolute and arbitrary Government, might justly be said to do too much for the King, and to be directed in his Judgment by the Prospect of Advantages and Rewards; though when it is consider'd, that every Deviation of the Crown towards absolute Power, lessens the King in the Love and Affection of his People, making him become less in their Interest, a wise Prince will not think it a Service done him." Which modest and just Reasoning, shews what little need Truth has of any Authority but its own to support it: The Debate having been spun on to this Length, the Court-Lords found it was in vain for them to contend with the Country-Lords, who had the Right and the Reason on their Side; so they resolv'd to give up the Field of Argument, and rely on their major Vote, which the Duke of Buckingham endeavour'd to put off by a Speech made late at Night, consisting of eloquent and well-plac'd Nonsense. But the Earl of Winchelsea perceiving what he aim'd at, cry'd out, The Question, the Question; and, as Mr. Locke phrases it, the major Vote, Ultima Ratio Senatuum & Consistorum, carry'd it as the Court and Clergy would have it.

The Debate lasted seventeen whole Days, the House during that Time sat often till Midnight; but the Opposition this Bill met with, and a Dispute about Privilege arising between the two Houses, were the Occasion that the Lords who were for the Bill took so little Care of it afterwards, that 'twas never reported from the Committee to the House.

Never was there shewn, since the Restoration, such a Spirit of Liberty as on this Occasion: This Bill would for ever have put an End to any in England. What is most inglorious to the Lords who call'd themselves Protestants, and yet gave this Countenance to Despotick Power, is, that the very Roman Catholics join'd heartily with the other Lords who so resolutely defended their own and the People's Liberties. Besides the Lord Stafford before-mention'd, the Lord Petre was warm against this Bill, and spoke often, as did the Lord Audley, and both are to be found among the Protesting Lords; which occasion'd this very just Observation of Mr. Locke, But thus much I shall say of the Roman Catholick Peers, That if they were safe in their Estates, and yet kept out of Office, their Votes in that House would not be the most unsafe to England of any Sort of Men in it. And I have the Honour to know a Roman Catholick Peer whom I have more than once heard speak with Indignation of those base Men, who would sacrifice the Interest and Glory of their Country to Party and Prejudice. I cannot close this Matter, without remembering the Zeal of some other Lords, as indeed there was Reason for it, their All being at Stake. We find the Earls of Bedford, Devonshire, Burlington, Stamford, the Lord Say and Sele, the Lord Paget, the Lord Viscount Hereford, the Lord Viscount Townshend, distinguish'd themselves on this Occasion. The Earl of Carnarvon came out of the Country on purpose to give his Vote against this Bill. The Earl of Rutland, the Lord Sandys, the Lord Herbert of Cherbury, the Lord North, and the Lord Crew, sent their Proxies. But to deliver all their Names to Posterity in Records worthy their Merit, must be the Business of some immortal Pen; to which I shall be proud to be assisting, by handing them to it as far as they have come to my Knowledge: For these that follow were not all, but their Weight and Number became so important a Cause.

Duke of Buckingham, Marquess of Winchester, Lords of the County Party, Earl of Rutland, Earl of Bedford, Earl of Dorset, Earl of Salisbury, Earl of Devonshire, Earl of Bridgewater, Earl of Bolingbroke, Earl of Berks, Earl of Bristol, Earl of Carnarvon, Earl of Ailesbury, Earl of Denbigh, Earl of Stamford, Earl of Clarendon, Earl of Shaftesbury, Earl of Burlington, Lord Viscount Hereford, Lord Viscount Say and Sele, Lord Viscount Townshend, Lord Viscount Stafford, Lord Viscount Halifax, Lord Audley, Lord Fitzwalter, Lord Wharton, Lord Eure, Lord Paget, Lord Mohun,

At the Close of this famous Contest, there happen'd as warm a one between the two Houses about Appeals, in the Case of Fagg and Shirley. The latter, Dr. Shirley, brought an Appeal in the House of Lords from a Decree in Chancery, against Sir John Fagg, a Member of the House of Commons, which that House look'd upon as an open Infringement of their Privileges: Accordingly they order'd Dr. Shirley to be taken into Custody of the Serjeant at Arms, and the first Account they heard of him, was, that their Warrant for taking the Doctor into Custody, was forcibly taken from the Serjeant's Deputy by the Lord Mobun. The Commons demanded Justice against the Lord Mobun; the Lords justify'd him. The Commons voted against any Commoner's pleading at the Lord's Bar against any Member of their House, and committed Serjeant Pemberton, Serjeant Peck, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Porter, Council for Shirley, to the Custody of their Serjeant, and Sir John Fagg to the Tower, for his Compliance with the Lords.

On this Occasion the King summon'd both Houses to attend him at Whitehall, and told them, he look'd on their Difference about Appeals, to be a malicious Design against the Church: For ever since the New Faction has been form'd, of the High Episcopal Men and the Old Cavaliers, they have taken upon them the Name of the Church. Whenever they have been in Danger, the Church has been in Danger; whenever they have flourish'd by Bartholomew Acts, Five Mile Acts, Schism Acts, Occasional Acts, the Church has been flourishing. One would think that Shirley and Fagg's Case had no more to do with the Church of England than with the Church of Geneva; but it is solemnly said from the Throne. Bishop Burnet seems to think the Case of the Appeal was no Design against the Church, but that it happen'd in Course, though it produc'd great Effects: For both Houses standing on their Privileges, and no likelihood appearing of any Accommodation, the King, June the 9th, prorogu'd the Parliament to the 13th of October. The Commons had voted 300,000 Pounds for building of Ships, but at the same time had resolv'd to appropriate Tonnage and Poundage, amounting to 400,000 Pounds a Year, to the Use of the Navy, as it was first design'd, which was not at all to the good liking of the Court; who had rather lose the other 300,000 Pounds, than admit of a Fund to be appropriated to the Navy, which they had appropriated so long to more gallant Uses. Besides, 'twas visible enough that the Pensioners in the House would not be able to support the Treasurer Danby, and that a great Party had agreed to give no Money while the present Lord Treasurer continu'd in his Office.

Echard enlarges on Sir William Temple's Negotiations concerning King Charles's Mediation; Nimeguen was named by Temple, to be the Place of Treaty: But Mareschal de Turenne being kill'd this Year by a Cannon-Ball in a Skirmish, Triers taken by the Germans, and some other Advantages happening on the Side of the Confederates, the King writes immediately to Temple to induce the Prince of Orange to a Peace by a new Argument, the Greatness of the House of Austria, which no doubt was dictated by the French Court. The Prince answer'd that Chimerical Argument with good Sense: There is no Fear of that till they go beyond the Peace of the Pyrenees; whenever that shall happen, I shall be as good a French-man as I am now a Spaniard. An excellent Saying, if Wisdom had had any Weight in our Counsels. Temple tells us of Discourie he had with the King about the Affairs abroad, in which there does not appear much Depth of Policy; and he must take Sir William to know less than he did of Men and Things, to think to impose what he said as good Reason on a Minister of his Capacity and Experience. Some of the Leaders in both Houses have a Mind to engage me in a War with France, which they shall not do for many Reasons, and among the rest, because I am sure if they did, they would leave me in it, and make use of it to ruin my Ministers. He knew they would not leave him in it, if he was in earnest, and did not misapply the Money they gave him for the War, on his Women and extravagant Pleasures. And as to his Ministers, if they had serv'd him, given him faithful Counsel, and manag'd his Revenues as they ought to have done, he would have parted with them as freely as with his Parliament. The true Reason, of which he said not a Word, was, that he had a Pension from the French King, and lov'd his Religion and Government, which by the private League between them were to be establish'd in England. Bishop Burnet tells us, He had round Sums of Money sent him. The King desir'd Sir William Temple to reconcile Arlington The King and Danby, which was no grateful Employment; French for Arlington hated Temple as a Creature of Danby's, and his Endeavours were ineffectual. Pensioner.

There is very little Business done now in England, but what relates to the Parliament, which the Court was afraid of losing, after they had been at such Expence to keep them Staunch. Sir Harbottle Grimston took Occasion, on a Debate about Grievances, to say, That considering the Extent of Privilege, he look'd on a standing Parliament as the greatest Grievance of the Nation, so many Men being exempted from Justice, and from the Demands of their Creditors, for so long, and so indefinite a Time. Though this Motion was let fall, it was not forgot, as we shall see in the Sequel.

We have made some mention of the Popish Plot, as it was carry'd on by Coleman in Generals, before the Particulars broke out; and by his Letter to the Pope's Inter-nuntio of the 30th of August this Year, we find it thrives amain. "The Duke hath almost surmounted all the Difficulties which have oppos'd his Establishment; the Face of Affairs are well chang'd: For we now passionately wish to see the coming on of the Parliament, which we have so much fear'd before; and while it was held doubtful whether it ought to meet or no, we employ'd all our Power to bring it on; which Point we have gain'd but within these few Days: And for my Part, I no ways doubt but that we shall receive as much Good by it, as we apprehend Ill, provided that the Duke fail not in the Execution of the good Resolutions he hath taken."

In a long Letter to La Chaise, the French King's and to his Confessor, he says thus: "I take our Case to be much the same as it was the last Sessions; if we can advance the Duke's Interest one Step forward, we shall put him out of the Reach of all Chances for ever, and all would come over to him, as the only steady Centre of our Government." It is from hence very plain that they look'd not on King Charles as a steady Centre; and being impatient to have a Prince on the Throne who was steady to them, 'tis not strange that they resolv'd to remove the unsteady One, to place him upon it, whose Steadiness they were sure of. He proceeds, "In order to this, we have two great Designs to attempt the next Sessions: 1. That which we went about before, viz. To gainst the Pope's Inter-nuntio, and to put King."

A.D. 1675 " put the Parliament upon making it their humble Request to the King, that the Fleet may be put to his Royal Highness's Care. 2. To get an Act for a general Liberty of Conscience. If we carry these two, or either of them, we shall in Effect do what we list afterwards.—Therefore if his most Christian Majesty would stand by us a little in this Conjunction, and help us to such a Sum as 20,000 Pounds, which is no great Matter to venture upon such an Undertaking as this, I would be content to be sacrificed to the utmost Malice of my Enemies if I did not succeed. I have propos'd this several Times to Monsieur Ruwigy, who seems always of my Opinion; but I know not, being a Protestant, whether he will be as zealous in this Point as a Catholick would be; because our prevailing in these things will give the greatest Blow to the Protestant Religion, that ever it receiv'd since its Birth.

Here Echard, after a Popish Author, assures us, there was not so much as a Snip of Paper discover'd against the Papists who suffer'd for the Plot. Coleman was one of them, and never did Traitor leave such a Snip of Treason behind him. He writes for 20,000 Pounds, to enable him to destroy the Religion of his Country; and again, Ruwigy, perhaps, would not be very glad to see it destroy'd, especially when he believes there is another way of doing his Master's Business without it, which is by a Dissolution of the Parliament. But I think our Case extremely alter'd from what it was a Year ago, in relation to a Dissolution; for then the Body of our governing Ministers, all but the Earl of Arlington, was entirely united to the Duke, and would have govern'd his Way, if they had been free from all Fear and Compulso, as they would have been, if the Parliament had been dissolv'd. But having since then been engag'd in quite different Counsels, and embark'd themselves and Interests upon other Bottoms, having declar'd themselves against Popery, &c. to dissolve the Parliament simply, and without any other Step made, will leave them to govern what way they list. Soon after, and a little before the Meeting of the Parliament, he sent another Letter to the same Confessor, which when discover'd, made a mighty Impression upon the Nation; and the more, because he told him of writing after a Way invisible to other People by the Juice of a Lemon. In which Letter he has these treasonable Words; We have here a mighty Work upon our Hands, no less than the Conversion of three Kingdoms, and by that, perhaps, the subduing of a Pessilent Herefy. Not a Snip of Paper, says Mr. Archdeacon, which has domineer'd over a great Part of the Northern World a long Time. There were never such Hopes of Success since the Death of Queen Mary, as now in our Days; when God has given us a Prince who is become (may I say a Miracle) zealous of being the Author and Instrument of so glorious a Work; but the Opposition we are sure to meet with, is also like to be great; so that it imports us to get all the Aid and Assistance we can; for the Harvest is great, and the Labourers but few. If the Duke of York had a Share in this Treason, equal to what his Secretary vouches for him, what fine Protestants were those, who after the Discovery of it, treated the Bill of Exclusion as Echard treats it, a Work of Sedition and Rebellion? The Prince to be excluded is in a Conspiracy against the Religion of the Country he is to reign over, and zealous for its Destruction: Yet the Compleat Historians cannot bear to have his Heirship interrupted, tho' there was no other Way of saving the Church, of which they were Members, if not Ministers.

His Treason.

A.D. 1675 On the 18th of October the Parliament met, and the King made a Speech to them, wherein he desir'd they would lay aside, or postpone the Contest in Shirley and Fagg's Case, between the two Houses: He recommended to them the Security of the Protestant Religion, himself still a Papist, and the providing for the Anticipations of his Funds, and for Building of Ships, promising for the future to be a better Husband than he finds he has been, though we shall not find it in the future Accounts. There is so little Conscience in the Length of the Keeper's Speech, that I shall leave it entire in Echard's Chronicle, who boasts that he has crowded it in all, without Abridgment or Mutilation. He forgets not the King's unwearied Zeal for the Reformed Religion, nor the Anticipations, nor the Building of Ships; but since, as the Reverend Historian informs us, Neither his Rhetorick, nor his Promises, avail'd much with the House of Commons: We will see what they did.

They began with re-assuming such publick Bills as they cou'd not compleat last Session; as the Habeas Corpus Act, the Act against sending Men Prisoners beyond Sea; another against raising Money without Consent of Parliament; a fourth against Papists sitting in either House; another for speedier convicting of Papists; another for recalling the King's Subjects out of the French Service. And as to the Supply, they proceeded in the former Method of the two Bills, one for raising 300,000 Pounds, and the other for appropriating Tonnage and Poundage for the Use of the Navy. In the Lord's House there was a good Disposition towards Things of publick Interest. But, says Mr. Marvel, 300,000 Pounds was so insipid a Thing to those that had been continually regal'd with Millions; and the Act of Appropriation, with some others, went so much against Stomach, that there wanted only an Opportunity to reject them, and that which was readiest at Hand was the late Quarrel betwixt the House of Lords and the Commons; which was reviv'd and Shirley carry'd on with more Heat than ever in the last and Fagg Session. In the House of Commons the Debates ran high about the Supply; the Pensioners were for giving more than was propos'd, knowing that nothing cou'd come to them out of that. 'Twas said the King had not enough in his Hands to maintain the Government, and secure the Nation, tho' our Neutrality at that Time made Trade flow in upon us, so that the Customs rose higher than ever. On the other Side 'twas said, If Anticipations were once admitted as a Reason for a Supply, the Court would never want that Reason. It was therefore fitter to examine by whose Means, and on what Designs those Anticipations were made. At last the Question was put, and the Vote being then stated, the previous Question was also put, whether the main Question shou'd be then put or not? The Votes happening to be equal, Sir Charles Harbord, Chairman of the Committee, gave it for putting the main Question. But some of the Country Party coming in between the two Questions, the main Question was lost by two or three Votes, which made the Court very indifferent as to their sitting. Sir Charles Harbord was much blam'd for his Rashness. His Excuse was, that it was the Duty of the Chair always to set Matters forward, and so he ought to have given it for putting the main Question; and if there had been the same Equality, he said He would have given it for the Court. He was rich and covetous, and had known some of the Extent of the King's Liberality. His Son, Mr. William Harbord, Privy-Counsellor to King William, was talk'd of for a smart Repartee he made

A.D. 1675 made to his Father in this Debate. Sir Charles had said, The right Way to gain the King is to lay your Hands on your Purfes and deal roundly with him. His Son, Mr. William Harbord, said, I second the Motion; but I mean, we shou'd lay our Hands on our Purfes as I my self do, holding his Pocket very fast, and keeping it close shut. The Earl of Danby was much disappointed at this. The Court had try'd their whole Strength to keep off the Petition of Appeal, till they saw what might be expected from the Commons; and as soon as their grand Vote was lost, the Lords went upon the Petition; and the Commons, as has been hinted, opposing them vigorously, it was visible that the Parliament wou'd be quickly prorogu'd. Upon this it was propos'd in the House of Lords to address the King for Dissolving the present Parliament: 'Twas evident the two Houses cou'd no longer maintain the Correspondence that was necessary; the Contest about the Appeal wou'd drop with this Parliament, but cou'd not while this lasted. It was said a Standing Parliament chang'd the Constitution of England. The King did no more consult with his People, nor know them. But he had now a Cabal of single Persons to deal with, &c. The Majority of the Temporal Lords were for it; but the Bench of Bishops, says my Lord of Sarum, was against it, and so it was not carry'd, tho' the Duke of York voted for it, and we having before us

A LIST of the Lords who were present at the Vote for an Address to the King for Dissolving the Parliament, November the 20th, we shall insert it.

21 Lay Lords, 13 Bishops, who were all that were in the House.

Lords present 34. Gave Proxies 16.—Total 50.

I cannot close the History of this Session of Parliament without remembering Part of a Speech of the Earl of Shaftsbury's, about the Appeal; and a whole Speech of the Duke of Buckingham's, about a Toleration for Dissenters. The Reader will in both find Strength of Reason, and Beauty of Style, uncorrupted with the Paint of Affectation, as in the Lord Keeper's Harangues.

The first is the Beginning of the Earl of Shaftsbury's Speech, the 20th of October.

My Lords,

"Our All is at Stake, and therefore you must Earl of give me Leave to speak freely before we part Shaftsbury with it. My Lord Bishop of Salisbury is of ry's Speech. Opinion, That we shou'd rather appoint a Day to consider what to do upon the Petition of Appeal, than to appoint a Day of Hearing: And my Lord Keeper, for I may name them at a Committee of the whole House, tells us in very eloquent and study'd Language, That he will propose us a Way less liable to Exception, and much less offensive and ruinous to our own Privileges than that of appointing a Day of Hearing. And, I beseech your Lordships, did not you, after all these fine Words, expect some admirable Proposal? But it ended in this, That your Lordships shou'd appoint a Day, nay a very long Day, to consider what you wou'd do in it. And my Lord hath undertaken to convince you, that this is your only Course by several undeniable Reasons; the first of which is, That 'tis against your Judicature to hear this Cause, which is not proper before us, nor ought to be reliev'd by us. To this, my Lords, give me Leave to answer, That I did not expect from a Man professing the Law, that after no Answer by Order of the Court was put in, and a Day had been appointed for hearing, which by some Accident was set aside, and the Plaintiff moving for a second Day to be assign'd, that even without Council on both Sides, the Court did enter into the Merits of the Cause; and if your Lordships shou'd do it here in a Cause attended with the Circumstances this is, it wou'd not only be an apparent Injustice, but a plain Subterfuge, to avoid a Point you durst not maintain.

The Speech is not too long to be inserted without Mutilation; but this Year has already given too much Length to our History. The Duke of Buckingham's is the more worth repeating; for that it is full of those Sentiments of Piety and Charity, which wou'd have been more natural in the Bishops, but they did not drop a Hint of that Kind in all this long Parliament.

My Lords,

There is a thing call'd Property (whatever Duke of some Men may think) that the People of England Buckingham are fondest of. It is that they will never part ham's with, and it is that his Majesty in his Speech has Speech for promis'd to take particular Care of. This, my Toleration. Lords, in my Opinion, can never be done without an Indulgence to all Protestant Dissenters. It is certainly a very uneasy kind of Life to any Man that has either Christian Charity, Good Nature, or Humanity, to see his Fellow Subjects daily abus'd, divested of their Liberty and Birth-rights, and miserably thrown out of their Possessions and Free-holds, only because they cannot agree with others

A.D. 1675; others in the same Opinions and Niceries of Religion, which their Consciences will not give them Leave to consent to, and which even by the Consent of those who wou'd impose them, are no way necessary to Salvation.

But, my Lords, besides this, and all that may be said upon it, in order to the Improvement of our Trade, and the Encrease of the Wealth, Strength and Greatness of this Nation, which, with your Leave, I shall presume to discourse of at some other Time, there is, methinks, in this Notion of Persecution, a very gross Mistake, both as to the Point of Government and Religion.

There is so, as to the Point of Government, because it makes every Man's Safety depend upon the wrong Place, not upon the Governor, or a Man's living well towards the Civil Government establish'd by Law, but upon his being transported with Zeal for every Opinion that is held by those that have Power in the Church that is in Fashion.

And I perceive it's a Mistake in Religion, for that it is positively against the express Doctrine and Example of Jesus Christ: Nay, my Lords, as to our Protestant Religion, there is something yet worse; for we Protestants maintain, that none of these Opinions, which Christians here differ about, are Infallible; therefore in us it is somewhat an unexcusable Conception, that Men ought to be depriv'd of their Inheritance, and all their certain Conveniencies and Advantages of Life, because they will not agree with us in our uncertain Opinions of Religion.

My humble Motion to your Lordships therefore is, That you will give me Leave to bring in a Bill of Indulgence to all Protestant Dissenters. I know very well, that every Peer of the Realm has a Right to bring into Parliament any Bill which he conceives to be useful to this Nation. But I thought it more respectful to your Lordships to ask your Leave for it before, and I cannot think that doing of it will be any Prejudice to the Bill, because I am confident the Reason, the Prudence, and the Charitableness of it will be able to justify it to this House and the whole World.

Accordingly the House gave the Duke of Buckingham Leave to bring in a Bill six Days before the Parliament was prorogu'd to the 15th of February, 1677, almost a Year and three Months.

As we have taken Notice of some leading Members of the House of Peers, who distinguish'd themselves in the two last Sessions of Parliament by their Zeal for the Protestant Religion and Liberty, so shou'd we also remember some leading Members of the House of Commons in the same Sessions, as Sir Harbottle Grimston, Lord Russell, Lord Cavendish, Sir William Coventry, Col. Birch, Sir Thomas Littleton, Sir Thomas Lee, Mr. Powle, Mr. Waller, Mr. Vaughan, &c. who, by their good Sense, Experience, Steadiness and Courage, weather'd all the Tempests that were rais'd by the Intrigues of the Enemies to their Country, and sat in that House so long, that they at length became a Part of that Majority, which, before this Parliament was dissolv'd, became as good Patriots as were in the succeeding Assemblies.

About a Month after this Sessions was over, the King having created Sir Heneage Finch Baron of Daventry, chang'd his Title of Lord Keeper into that of Lord High Chancellor of England. Some Time before this he appointed John Lord Berkley, Sir William Temple, and Sir Lionel Jenkins, to be his Ambassadors Plenipotentiaries at the Treaty of Nimeguen. In the Christmas Holidays a Proclamation was publish'd against Coffee-houses, as Places of Resort for idle and disaffected Persons; but the Coffee-men giving 500 Pounds Bond not to suffer any Libels, that is, News to be read in their Houses, they were permitted to sell Coffee by Licence. The Ministry was not satisfy'd with this Care against seditious Libels, by which was understood every Pamphlet that did not flatter them; so a Proclamation was issu'd for the better Discovery of Libellers, with a Promise of 50 Pounds Reward for each Discovery. Mr. Locke's Account of the Debates about the Test of Abhorrence was one of the State Libels, against whom these Proclamations were intended. We must not omit that this Year his Majesty was visited by the Prince of Newburgh, attended with a Train of fifty Persons of Quality and Servants.

We shall borrow the Promotions this Year from Mr. Archdeacon, where they appear more ornamented; Giles Strangeways, Esq; Christopher Duke of Albemarle, and Dr. Compton were made Privy-Counsellors. Thomas Povey, Esq; Master of Requests, in the Room of Sir Thomas Beverley, deceas'd. Sir Richard Bulstrode, Resident at Brussels. And this Year also, we read in the same History, the two young Princesses, Lady Mary and Lady Anne, were confirm'd in the King's Chapel, to the great Joy and Satisfaction of all who had any Fears and Apprehensions of Popery.

In a Design of this Nature 'twas impossible to be so copious upon the Affairs of Scotland and Ireland, as the Gentlemen Natives of those Kingdoms may expect. The History of England, and of the Design form'd against the Religion, Rights and Liberties of English-men since the Stuartine Government, was the original Intention of this Work, and to take in what relates to Scotland and Ireland no farther than the Affairs there have Connection with those in England, and with the Contrivances of the common Enemy to destroy the Constitution in Church and State, as establish'd in the three Kingdoms.

After the Executions for the Tumult at Pentland-Hill, in Scotland, were pretty well over, the King, says Bishop Burnet, was more gentle than the Bishops. Dalziel, who commanded the King's Forces, threaten'd to spit Men, and roast them: Some he kill'd in cold, or rather hot Blood; for he was drunk when he order'd one to be hang'd, because he wou'd not tell where his Father was. When he heard of any who did not go to Church, he did not as the new Laws enjoin'd, set a Fine upon them, but he set as many Soldiers on them as shou'd eat them up in a Night. By this means all People were struck with such a Terror, that they came regularly to Church; and my Lord of Sarum tells us, The Clergy were so delighted with it, that they us'd to speak of those Times, as the Poets do of the Golden Age. They never interceded for any Compassion to their People, nor did they take care to live more regularly, or to labour more carefully. They look'd on the Soldiery as their Patrons; they were ever in their Company, complying with their Excesses; and if they were not much wrong'd, they rather led them into them, than check'd them for them. Dalziel himself, and his Officers, were so disgusted with them, that they encreas'd the Complaints, which had now more Credit from them, than from those of the Country, who were look'd on as their Enemies. Things of so strange a Pitch in Vice were told of them, that they seem'd scarce credible. What a fine Change the Scots Bishops made since the Restoration in the Ministry of the Gospel!

A.D. 1676. I mention not the Treaty of Accommodation between the Episcopal and Presbyterian Parties in Scotland, in the Year 1669, because it succeeded not; nor the Project of Union between the two Kingdoms, for the same Reason. The turning out of Burnet, Archbishop of Glasgow, and putting the pious Leighton into his See, might have produc'd good Effects in that Part of Scotland, had the Kirk-men been ever so little dispos'd to moderate Compliances; but they generally look'd upon themselves as under the Obligation of the Covenant, from whence they cou'd not deviate without Sin; to which, whatever they had, 'tis plain their Opponents had no Regard; for such a Crew was never thrust into any Church or Temple, as the Scots Curates were, whom the Scots Bishops brought along with them into that Protestant Church. But instead of the Comprehension, which holy Leighton desir'd, there were still severer Acts pass'd by the Government; and besides the arbitrary Fines put on those who did not come to hear those vicious Curates, Conversions were made by Dragoons, in Imitation of the French King's military Missions. There was an Act pass'd in the Year 1670, making all Field-Meetings Treason: Though half of the Parliament abhor'd the Act, yet so abject were they in their Submissions to the Duke of Lauderdale, who manag'd all things, that only the young Earl of Cassilis voted in the Negative. Some Ministers took out Licences from the Bishop of the Diocess, to preach under the before-mention'd Restrictions; one of which was so contrary to the Principles of Presbytery, that the most zealous and religious Kirk-men cou'd not comply; and they, and their Pastors, met to worship God in the Fields. The Presbyterians were for a while cajol'd, in order to bring them to accept of the pretended Indulgence granted by a dispensing Power in Scotland, as in England, but few were drawn in by it. Those that refus'd the Rise of the Licences were now call'd Whiggs, some say, the Whiggs from a Drink compos'd of Water and soure Milk, us'd by the meaner Sort of People; and were represented to his Majesty as a Party who were not to be suffer'd in any Government, but ought to be rooted off from the Face of the Earth. They were look'd on as Rebels, and if they wou'd meet to worship God, it must be in a Body, and in Arms, their Enemies being every where ready to cut them to pieces. Their Field-Assemblies were the Field-Conventicles, so much rail'd at by such as knew nothing of them; nor that they were only Religious Assemblies, hateful to none but Men of no Religion, or a Religion worse than none, which every Religion is, that renounces Charity and Mercy. The People who thus met in the Fields, were now term'd Cameronians, from one Mr. Cameron, whom my Author calls a zealous Assertor of the Sovereignty of Conscience over the Laws of Men: Words which have as much Truth in them as Spirit. Let us see what the same Author adds, "If the Persecution was cruel and furious before, it was now raging and unsufferable, carry'd on with such Madness, and with such an unsatisfy'd Thirst of Blood, that I believe none of the Heathen Persecutions in the Primitive Times cou'd go beyond it in all its Parts. It is true, they did not immediately torment the Body by Fire, by Racks, and a vast variety of instrumental Torments; though they had Cruelty enough that Way too, as in those dreadful Engines of Barbarity, the Boot and the Thumbkins, than which a more exquisite Torture cou'd not easily be devis'd. But they had Torments beyond the Cruelty of Death, which they forc'd the poor persecuted Protestants to suffer, driving them from their Persecution worse than Pagan.

 "unsufferable, insupportable Hunger and Cold,
 "in a Climate the most unhospitable, and Places
 "most barren and empty of Sustenance or Relief of any in these Parts of the World." The Horror is already too strong, and I cannot go through the rest of it; but when I consider by what Hands this Hellish Work was done, I am astonish'd, beyond Conception, that any Christian Senate shou'd have put it into their Power, or indeed have suffer'd such a merciless Blood-thirsty Generation to have had a Being or Countenance within their Jurisdiction. I shall close this Account of the barbarous Persecution, in the Words of the former Historian: "I have talk'd with many sober and judicious Persons, who then liv'd in that Part of the Country, and were Eye-witnesses to much of it. I find they all agree in this, that many Thousands of people perish'd under the violent Hands of these, besides those that were kill'd under Pretence of being in Rebellion. One Reverend Minister assur'd me, that taking in the People who dy'd in Prisons, and in Banishment, they had an Account of above 18,000 Persons, whose Blood these Persecutors have to account for, &c." By the before-mention'd Act, All Persons of what Quality, Age, Sex, or Sex whatsoever, were oblig'd to answer upon Oath, and depose all they knew of Field Meetings, and to answer the Questions that shou'd be ask'd them upon Oath; which Questions, the Officers and Dragoons were authoriz'd to put to them, and to use them at Discretion, if they were not satisfy'd with the Answers that were given them; in Consequence of which Power and Persecution, all these Horrors were committed. As to the Conferences between Leighton on one Side, and Hutchinson on the other, about Terms of Accommodation, mention'd at large by Bishop Burnet, I do not enter into the Particulars of it, under Conviction, that tho' Leighton's Design was doubtless very honest, yet there was no Thought of accommodating Matters in the other Bishops, who had the King's and the Commissioners Ear much more than Leighton. As to the Commissioner Lauderdale, he was such a Composition of Lewdness, Tyranny, Corruption, Dissimulation, and all Vices, that 'tis a Disgrace to History to have to do with him. We have seen what an Act he has pass'd in Scotland, and yet before he went to Scotland, he signify'd to Mr. Baxter, that there was a Purpose of taking off the Oath of Canonical Obedience, and all Impositions of Conformity there, save only that it shou'd be necessary to sit in Presbyteries and Synods with the Bishops and Moderators. Lauderdale inform'd him, he had the King's Consent to offer him what Place in Scotland he wou'd choose, either a Church or a Colledge in one of the Universities, or a Bishoprick; but he excus'd himself on account of interposition, and the Circumstances of his Family. After Lauderdale was in Scotland, Sir Robert Murray, a Man of great Worth, Learning, and Honour, sent Mr. Baxter the Frame of a Body of Church-Discipline for Scotland, and desir'd his Animadversions; which whoever will read in Baxter's Life at large, will not think Hutchinson, and the zealous Presbyterians so much to blame, as the Bishop of Salisbury represents them, in refusing Leighton's Propositions, which are most of them consider'd accidentally in those Animadversions. Some time after the passing of that Tyrannical Act against Field Meetings, Lauderdale return'd to London, where he stay'd till after the French Conquests in Holland; and when he came back to Edinburgh, he seem'd much lifted up with A.D. 1676 with them, and talk'd of De Witt's Fate with so much Pleasure, that it cou'd not be heard without Horror. He treated all People so scornfully, that his Behaviour was insufferable. He carry'd his Dutche's in a sort of Triumph about the Country with him, and he was every where receiv'd with as much Respect as if the King had been there in Person; which enrag'd the Nobility, and they made great Applications to Duke Hamilton to head a Party against him. His Wife behav'd as insolently towards the Ladies and Gentlemen, as he did towards the Lords and Gentlemen. He expected an Address from the Presbyterians for a Toleration, as it was in England in the Year 1672; but, says my Lord of Sarum, The Presbyterians understanding they were only to be made use of in order to the introducing of Popery, resolv'd to be passive and silent. Upon this he broke out into Fury and Rage against them. The Bishop adds, I visited some of them in Prison, and saw in them the blind Madness of ill grounded Zeal; which has as much Sophistry in it, as any of the Arguments us'd by Gunning, Morley, &c. If the Men were Mad, they were Mad, and consequently blind with a Witnes's; if they were not Mad, but did really believe that the Solemn League and Covenant, which they had sworn, oblig'd their Consciences, and they cou'd not break it without Perjury, nor be perjur'd without endangering the Salvation of their Souls, there was no Blindness nor Madness in their Zeal, but a Sincerity and Warmth which may well enough pass for Folly or Frenzy in Minds that gravitate eternally to the Centre of this World.

Bishop Burnet answered.

Duke Lauderdale held a Parliament at Edinburgh in 1675, and Duke Hamilton, join'd by the Earls of Rothes, Tweeddale, Argyle, and other Principal Lords, fell immediately upon Grievances, which struck Lauderdale as one dead; and he declar'd in the Privy-Council, that he had Power, and was ready to redress all the Grievances complain'd of. In the mean time, he referr'd the Complaints to the Lords of the Articles, as the Words of an Act empower'd him to do. And those Lords who were to prepare Things for the Parliament, being mostly of the King's making, the Matter was kept in Suspence by the Prerogative, though in Truth those Lords were only a Committee of Parliament, to put Motions into the Form of Acts, the Parliament having still an entire Authority to examine into the State of the Nation.

The House of Commons in England fell upon Lauderdale for his evil Counsels, and enquir'd, as far as it concern'd the Safety of England, into his Conduct in Scotland. During these Enquiries, the King wrote to Duke Hamilton to come up to London; and when he and Lord Tweeddale arriv'd at Court, they were so well receiv'd, that they hop'd to carry their Point against Lauderdale: But the King's Design in it was to make the House of Commons believe he wou'd part with Lauderdale, if they wou'd give him Money, and employ those other two Lords; in which they and the Scots Nation being disappointed, it enrag'd a violent Party so much, that Propositions were offer'd for destroying Lauderdale and his Adherents, but it was rejected with Abhorrence. The Duke of Lauderdale stood his Ground at Court, notwithstanding the House of Commons address'd against him. Bishop Burnet informs us, that he set up himself as a Champion for the Church of England, though, as the Duke of York said of him, He wou'd do any thing to save himself. He brought Sharp with him to London, who went about assuring all People, That the Party set up in Scotland against Lauderdale, was likewise set against the Church. Which, to use my Sharp makes Lauderdale the Church.

Lord of Sarum's Words, was notoriously false; and I observe whenever that same Sharp is mention'd in his Lordship's History, there is almost always something coming very false and very wicked.

A.D. 1676

His Falshood and Wickedness.

Lord Kincardin coming to Court, wou'd have given the King some further Light into Lauderdale's ill Government, but it was a String his Majesty wou'd not suffer to be touch'd: That Flatterer having not only said at the Council-Board, That his Edicts were Laws, but told the King, There was a Spirit of Rebellion that ran through all Sorts of People, and it must be subdu'd by Acts of Power, tho' neither legal nor just. The Man who said it dy'd in his Bed. Lauderdale demand'd of the King, that Kincardin shou'd be sent Home: His Majesty reply'd, He saw no Reason for it, and wou'd not do it. Upon which he goes to his Apartment, and fell into a Fit of Distraction, gather'd up all his Commissions and Papers, and was about carrying 'em to the King. But the Marquess of Athol went to his Majesty, and told him, He had sent Duke Lauderdale Home half mad, and begg'd his Majesty to take Pity upon him: So the Earl of Kincardin was order'd down to Scotland. What a Genius for Government had this Monarch, who uses a good Subject ill to humour a Sycophant loaden with the Curses of all honest Men in the three Kingdoms?

Affairs in Ireland went not better than in England and Scotland: When the Source is corrupted, let the Stream divide itself into ever so many Branches, they will all participate of the original Corruption. That busy Agent for the Irish Rebels, Richard Talbot, in 1671, deliver'd a Petition to the King for a Re-hearing of the former Judgments against the Papists, many of whom had been disposse's'd of their Lands by the Act of Settlement; at which the House of Commons in England taking Offence, Talbot's Agency and boasted Interest prov'd very insignificant.

We have mention'd the Earl of Essex's being appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, of whom we read thus in Bishop Burnet's Memoirs. He cou'd never understand how he came to be rais'd to that Post, for he had never pretended to it; and he was a violent Enemy to Popery, not so much from any fix'd Principle in Religion, in which, says the Bishop, he was too loose, as because he look'd on it as an Invasion made on the Freedom of humane Nature. In his Government of Ireland he exceeded all that had gone before him, and is still Essex's consider'd as a Pattern to all that came after him. He study'd to understand exactly well the Constitution and Interest of the Nation: He read over all their Council-Books, and made large Abstracts out of them to guide him, so as to advance every thing that had been at any time set on Foot for the Good of the Kingdom. He made several Volumes of Tables of the Estates and Persons that were in every County and Town, and got true Characters of all that were capable to serve the Publick. He prefer'd Men always for their Merit, without any Application from themselves; and watch'd over all about him, that there shou'd be no Bribes going among his Servants.

The Revenue of Ireland was then in the Earl of Ranelagh's Management, one of the ablest Men that Island had bred, capable of all Affairs, even in the midst of a loose Run of Pleasure. He had undertaken to furnish the King with Money for the building of Windsor, out of the Revenue of Ireland; and it was believ'd the Dutche's of Portsmouth had a great yearly Pension out of his Office. By this Means Payments in Ireland were not regularly made, of which the Earl of Essex complain'd. The King wou'd not own however, how much he had of Lord Ranelagh, but press'd Lord Essex to pass his Accounts.

A.D. 1676 counts. My Lord Essex reply'd, I cannot pass 'em as Accomps; but if the King will forgive Lord Ranelagh, I will pass a Discharge, but not an ill Accompt. His Majesty was not pleas'd with this, nor with his Exactness in that Government, it reproach'd his own too much. It was not an uncommon Thing for this King to cheat himself, that is, take a small Sum for his Privy-Purse to defraud the Exchequer; for what was carry'd thither was not so easily to be manag'd as what he had in his Pocket. A Courtier being apply'd to by the East-India Company only to have a Word or two alter'd in their Charter, begg'd it of the King, representing it as a small Business, that he might get something by it. His Majesty ask'd him what he was to have for it. The Courtier reply'd, Ten thousand Pounds. God's-fish, cry'd the King, 'tis too little; 'tis worth Twenty thousand Pounds, Half mine, Half thine. The Business was done, and the Money divided accordingly. The Earl of Essex telling Bishop Burnet a Story like it relating to Ireland, put me in Mind of this, which I had from a Person concern'd in it. Secretary Coventry told the Earl of Essex, that there was once a Plantation Cause at the Council-Board, which the King espous'd so openly, he was troubled to see it, and told him secretly, 'Twas a very bad Cause which he was supporting. The King answer'd him, But I have good Money for doing it.

Sir J. B.

About this Time 1675, there was a Proposition made for farming the Revenue of Ireland. The Lord Danby seem'd sometime to favour one Set of Men, who offer'd to farm it, but on a sudden, he turn'd to another. The Secret of this broke out, and that he was to have great Advantages by the second Proposition. The Matter was brought to the Council Table, and some were examin'd upon Oath. Lord Widdrington confess'd he had made an Offer of a round Sum to Lord Danby, which was not accepted. Lord Halifax observ'd, that the Lord Treasurer had reject'd that Offer very mildly, but not so as to discourage a second Attempt, adding, It would be somewhat strange if a Man shou'd ask the Use of another Man's Wife, and if the other shou'd indeed refuse it, but with great Civility. So far we have copy'd Bishop Burnet's Memoirs. But in others we find that the Person employ'd in this Farm was one Thomas Sheridan, who having been bred in Trinity College in Dublin, and being in Deacon's Orders, left very fair Hopes of rising in the Church to be Collector of Cork in Ireland. A Post procur'd him, as it was suppos'd, by a Popish Interest, as being a proper Station for him to receive Intelligence from abroad, which he cou'd easily hand about to the Irish Papists at home. The Farmers were then London Brewers, and being wealthy, moderate Citizens, were call'd the Fanatick Farmers, whose Time of Farm being expir'd, the Papists put in for it, by Lord Widdrington first, and afterwards by this Sheridan, who coming from Ireland just before the London Brewers Farm was out, fell in with Coleman, and by his Means with the Duke of York, and was ever after an active Tool for his Faction: However, he was not suffer'd to throw off the Mask at once. He continu'd in Appearance so good a Protestant, that he was thought a Presbyterian, and being not well enough known in London, Muschamp, one of the old Farmers, and Sir J. S. another of them, and a greater Projector, had the Conduct of the Affair. These apply'd to Sir William Petty, a Man of a large Estate in Ireland, and so willing to encrease it, that he was not over-nice in the Methods of doing it. Sir W. P. engaging in it, Sheridan acquainted the Duke and Coleman with it; and one Ryder, a young Man who had 20,000 Pounds of his own and his Sister's Fortune, was drawn in to embrace it; so there was Money and Sir W. Petty's Credit ready for them to set the Project on Foot. The Earl of Essex had Intelligence from Court, and some Spies of the Popish Clergy in Ireland, that the Project of the Farm was only Part of the Design to get him remov'd; so he obtain'd Leave to come to Court, and left the Lord Primate and the Lord Graund Justices in his Absence, and tho' the new Farmers carry'd their Scheme, yet he got so far into the good Graces of the Duke of York, to whom he made assiduous Court, that he was permitted to return Lord Lieutenant to Ireland, and very happily prevented the Machinations of the Irish taking Effect so soon as was intended. These were some Incidents whose Springs appear not in the common History, as Echard calls all Histories but his own, which is, I must confess, the most uncommon one that ever was written by Historiographer; but in his and other such Pieces one may find the Address of the Parliament of England concerning the Grievances in Ireland about a Year after the Earl of Essex went over Lord Lieutenant; and it is not to be doubted but his Lordship, by his Friends in England, furnish'd some of the Materials for it, which sufficiently set forth the Contrivances of the Papists to introduce Tyranny and Popery in Ireland. It specifies the great Calamities which had befallen the Protestants in that Kingdom from the Papists, profess'd Enemies to their Religion and the English Interest; how they abuse his Majesty's Clemency, and are become more insolent and presumptuous than formerly, to the apparent Danger of that Kingdom, and his Majesty's Protestant Subjects there; the Consequence of which may prove very fatal to England, if not timely prevented. In order to which the Parliament in all Humility present his Majesty with these Petitions; "That for establishing and quieting the Possessions of his Majesty's Subjects in that Kingdom, his Majesty wou'd be pleas'd to maintain the Act of Settlement, and Explanatory Act thereupon, and to recal the Commission of Enquiry into Irish Affairs, bearing Date the 17th Day of January, 1671-2, as containing many new and extraordinary Powers, not only to the Prejudice of particular Persons, whose Estates and Titles are thereby made liable to be question'd, but in a Manner to the Overthrow of the Act of Settlement; and if pursu'd, may be the Occasion of great Charge and Attendance to many of your Subjects in Ireland, and shake the Peace and Security of the whole. 2. That your Majesty will give Order that no Papist be either continu'd, or be hereafter admitted to be Judges, Justices of the Peace, Sheriffs, Coroners, or Mayors, Sovereigns or Portreeves in the Kingdom. 3. That the Titular Popish Archbishops, Bishops, Vicars General, Abbots, and all other exercising Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction by the Pope's Authority, and in particular Peter Talbot, pretended Archbishop of Dublin, for his notorious Disloyalty to your Majesty, and Disobedience and Contempt of your Laws, may be commanded by Proclamation forthwith to depart out of Ireland, and all other your Majesty's Dominions, or otherwise to be prosecuted according to Law. And that all Convents, Seminaries, and publick Popish Schools may be dissolv'd and suppress'd, and the regular Priests commanded to depart under the like Penalties. 4. That no Irish Papist be admitted to inhabit in any Corporation in that Kingdom, unless duly licens'd according to the aforesaid Act of Settlement; and that your Majesty wou'd be pleas'd

" to

A.D. 1676 " to recall your Letters of the 26th of February, 1671-2, and your Proclamation thereupon, whereby general Licence is given such Papists as inhabit in Corporations there. 5. That your Majesty's Letters of the 28th of September, 1672, and the Order of Council thereupon, whereby your Subjects are requir'd not to prosecute any Actions against the IRISH, for any Wrongs or Injuries committed during the late Rebellion, may likewise be recall'd. 6. That Col. Richard Talbot, who hath notoriously assum'd to himself the Title of Agent for the Roman Catholics in Ireland, be immediately dismiss'd out of all Command, either Civil or Military, and forbid any Access to your Majesty's Court. 7. That your Majesty wou'd be pleas'd from Time to Time, out of your Princely Wisdom, to give such further Orders and Directions to the Lord Lieutenant, as may best conduce to the Encouragement of the English Planters, and Protestant Interest, and the Suppression of the Insolencies and Disorders of the Irish Papists there — These our humble Desires we present to your Majesty, as the best Means to preserve the Peace and Safety of that your Kingdom, which hath been so much of late in Danger from the Practices of the said Irish Papists, and particularly of the said Richard and Peter Talbot." All the Answer to this very reasonable Address was, That he wou'd before the next Meeting of Parliament take such effectual Care, that no Man shou'd have Reason to complain: Which was leaving Matters just as they were; and so we shall certainly find them, when we visit that Kingdom again; and besides all this, there was an Order sent to the Lord Lieutenant in 1672, to dispense with the Papists wearing Arms.

Such are the Happineffes of the glorious Reign we are writing of; they are dispens'd with so equal a Hand over the three Kingdoms, that it is indeed difficult to determine which was most happy.

In England very little is to be done by the Ministry this Year, and not much more abroad by her Ambassadors, Mediators at Nimeguen, where the Plenipotentiaries had Leisure enough to amuse themselves with all Kinds of Diversions; for none of the Parties seem'd very forward to treat. The Confederates were in Hopes to draw in the King of England, and thereby procure at least better Terms of France; and the King of England was all the while in full Pension from the French King, which he cou'd not live without as long as he liv'd without a Parliament, and both the Monarchs knew well enough how the English Nation were inclin'd. The Pension was 1,200,000 Crowns a Year, of which 600,000 Crowns were paid down, and 600,000 Crowns by way of Donative; and in case of Rebellion, it was to be augmented to 12 Millions of Livres a Year; and 25 Millions of Livres were bid by the Court of France for the Princess Mary, the Duke's eldest Daughter. There was a Fund of 20 Millions assign'd by the French King for these three Kingdoms, out of which sometimes the King, sometimes the Duke, sometimes the Ministers, and sometimes the Leaders of Parties, had Donatives, according as the French Ambassador and French Emisaries represented the State of Affairs. Four, six and eight Millions of Livres have been yearly remitted from France to Scotland and Ireland. The French were fortunate, and cou'd the better afford to pay. Lewis XIV. began the Campaign in Person with the Siege of Conde, and finish'd it with that of Bouchain about the latter End of May. Those two small Towns having crown'd him with fresh Laurels, he hasten'd back to Paris, leaving the Command of his Army in the Netherlands to Marschal Schomberg, who took Aire, and march'd to the Relief of Maestricht, besieg'd by the Prince of Orange, who not being join'd as he expected by the Forces of Munster and Lunenburgh, and having a sick Army before the Place, thought fit not to engage the Enemy at such a Disadvantage, and rais'd the Siege. About the Beginning of this Year the Dutcheffs of Mazarine arriv'd in England from Savoy, where she had liv'd two or three Years with her Sister, Wife of the Constable de Colonna, who had left her Husband, as the Dutcheffs of Mazarine had left hers. They were both Nieces to Cardinal Mazarine, Daughters of his Sister Hieromina Mazarini Mancini, who was Aunt to Mary d'Est, Dutcheffs of York. King Charles wou'd feign have marry'd Hortensia Mazarini Mancini; now Dutcheffs of Mazarine, when he was in Exile; but the Cardinal wou'd not hear of it, in such Fear was he of Cromwel and the Common-wealth. The Marquess of Ormond made the Proposal to the Cardinal, while the King was turning Papist at Fontenabia; but Mazarine rejected it: Yet after the Restoration he wou'd have set a Marriage-Treaty on Foot, and prevail'd with the Queen-Mother of England to undertake it, under Pretence of congratulating her Son upon his being restor'd. She had a Commission to offer him twenty Millions of Livres Portion with Hortensia Mancini; but he was a King of three Kingdoms, and had Ladies enough at his Devotion. Monsieur St. Evremond mentions this Treaty in the Funerall Oration for Madame de Mazarine. When the latter arriv'd in England, she was in the Zenith of her Charms, and the Dutcheffs of Portsmouth grown sickly; by which Means Mazarine began to gain very much upon the King; but she was far from being a prudent, or faithful Mistress. The Prince of Monaco coming to the Court of England in the Bloom and Vigour of Youth, she cast her Eye upon him as much as he did upon her. Monsieur St. Evremond saw it immediately, and fearing she might not only lose the King, but the 4000 Pounds a Year Pension he allow'd her, us'd all the Force of his Reason and Eloquence to dissuade her from any Gallantry with the Prince of Monaco; which it seems was quite contrary to the Design of those who were Instruments of bringing her into England, as we read in the Life of Monsieur de St. Evremond. The Duke of Buckingham put the Dutcheffs of Portsmouth upon King Charles II. to out the Dutcheffs of Cleaveland; and the present Ministry got over the Dutcheffs of Mazarine to out the Dutcheffs of Portsmouth. Let us see how the French Author runs in English: "I have already spoken of the Power the Dutcheffs of Portsmouth had over King Charles, whose natural Indolence, and his Love of Women, deliver'd him up to his Mistresses, and Madam de Portsmouth was the Favourite Mistress; she govern'd him as she was instructed by the Court of France. It is a French-King man who writes thus, and who makes a better Judgment of this King and his Government, than govern'd all our Compleat Historians, who are so dazzled with his Majesty's Zeal for the Church, that they have no Eyes for his Vices and Weaknesses." The King of England forgetting the true Interest of his Kingdom, and even his own Interest, became shamefully a Pensioner of Lewis XIV. The Friends to Liberty were turn'd out of all Employments, and excluded the Management of Affairs, which put them upon several Contrivances to deliver their Country from such an infamous Bargain and Sale: All which not succeeding, they at last consider'd that the only Way

Dutcheffs of Mazarine comes to England.

The King wou'd have marry'd her.

Charles govern'd as France have him.

A.D. 1676 "Way wou'd be to disgrace the Dutcheſs of Portsmouth, and to put in her Place another Woman, in whom they might confide. They caſt their Eyes on the Dutcheſs of Mazarine, who was ſuperior to Portsmouth both in Beauty and Wit." It is to be ſuppos'd, that Monſieur St. Evremond had a Hand in the Contrivance, and that he was on that Account the more ſollicitous for her keeping her Ground at Court; but her Fondneſs for Monaco diſguſted the King, who took away her Penſion, which however was reſtor'd to her not long after, and her Houſe near St. James's was the Rendezvous of all the Men of Letters and Pleaſure to the Day of her Death. She brought over with her the celebrated Abbot de St. Real, whoſe Works are in ſuch Eſtream with the Ingenious.

This Digreſſion is the leſs Impertinent, for that it gives one a very good Idea of the Happineſs of our Church to have ſuch a Head, and of our Kingdom to have ſuch a King.

Sir William Temple complies with a French Intereſt.

One may perceive, that as well verſ'd as Sir William Temple was in Negotiations, and as well as he was diſpos'd to the publick Intereſt, yet he gave up ſometimes his own Judgment to his Maſter's, or rather to his Maſter's Pleaſure, and was as forward in promoting a ſeparate Peace between France and Holland, as King Charles cou'd deſire. He went ſo far, as to tell the Prince of Orange, he knew not a Man in Holland, who was not of his Mind; Tes, reply'd his Highneſs, I am ſure I know One, and that is my Self, and I'll hinder it as long as I can, but if any thing ſhould happen to me, I know it would be done in two Days. Sir William Temple, who was as polite as able, maintain'd his Maſter's Character, and the Ceremonial, with great Punctilio and Elegance; but his Mediation was little heeded by the Confederates, who were too wiſe not to obſerve that King Charles waited for Opportunities, rather to do them ill Offices than good, or indeed equal Offices. Sir William urging the Neceſſity of a ſeparate Peace from the dilatory Proceedings of the Germans and Spaniards, the Prince of Orange ſaid, The Appearances are very ill for the next Campaign, but Campaigns do not always end as they begin, that Accidents may happen, which no Man can foreſee, and if we come to one fair Battle, none can answer for the Event. The Hero ſtill, and how unlike his Uncle does he talk? The King of England may make a Peace when he pleaſes, before it begins, but if he is ſo indifferent as to let that Season paſs, for my Part, I am oblig'd to go on and take my Fortune. I this very Morning ſaw a poor old Man tugging alone in his little Boat, with his Oar againſt the Eddy of a Stream, upon a Canal, and when with the laſt Effort, he was juſt got up to the Place intended, the Force of the Eddy carry'd him quite back again, and thus three or four Times, while I ſaw him. This old Man's Buſineſs and mine are too like one another; however, we ought to do juſt as the old Man did, without knowing what will ſucceed, any more than what did in the poor Man's Caſe.

French rob the Engliſh at Sea.

The Buſineſs of the Stuartine Princes, was generally done by Proclamations, which were minded or not minded, according as the Court were inclin'd: Two were at this Time publiſh'd, one againſt Engliſh Officers and Seamen entering into Foreign Services; another againſt the committing Acts of Hoſtility, under the Protection of the Engliſh Coaſts and Ports, in which the French were not only insolent againſt the Dutch, with whom they were in War, but againſt the Engliſh themſelves, with whom they pretended to be in Peace, and it is ſuppos'd they endamag'd the Engliſh Merchants much more by their Cap-

A.D. 1678 tures, than the Amount of King Charles's Penſion came to, which was little conſider'd by him or his Miniſters, 'till at laſt a loud and general Clamour reach'd their Ears, and they were forc'd to do ſomething towards ſatisfying the injur'd People.

The Merchants of London preſented a Petition to the King and Council, in May this Year, concerning the Ships taken by French Privateers; wherein they complain'd, 1. That the Delay and Charge of proſecuting the Law in France, does commonly make the Owners become Loſers of half the Value, whenever they are moſt ſucceſſful. 2. That there's no Reparation ever gotten from Privateers for what they plunder and imbezzele, which makes them freely ſeize upon all they meet, and perpetually moleſt the Engliſh Navigation.

Upon Complaint of this Grievance in the French Court, the Method of Redreſs prov'd a new Oppreſſion; for Sir Ellis Leighton, Secretary to the Lord Berkley, the Engliſh Ambaſſador in the Court of France, being appointed to ſolicit there the Reſtitution of the Engliſh Ships, was as great a Villain as his Brother the Archbiſhop was a Saint, and behav'd ſo corruptly in his Negotiation, by receiving Bribes, and making Bargains for Reſtitutions, that the Engliſh Merchants were diſcourag'd in their Applications for Reparation of Damages. Being convicted of this Villainy, he was ſent for home and examin'd; 'twas intended to proſecute him, but he kept out of the Way, and the Search for him was not over diligent. When he was under Examination, he was ſo impudent as to ſay, He wonder'd how theſe Merchants dar'd to ſpeak any thing againſt the greateſt King in Europe, as the King of France was! The Council heard him with Indignation, and he was order'd to be committed when caught. The Merchants Petition being refer'd to the Lords Committee of Trade, they gave it as their Opinion, That his Maſteſty had juſt Occaſion from the Injuries paſſ'd, and thoſe which are now depending, and which do every Day encreaſe, to make a very ſerious Representation of all unto his moſt Chriſtian Maſteſty, and not only preſs for ſome better Method of repairing the Grievances mention'd, but earneſtly to iſſiſt on the Calling in of all Privateers, or elſe your Maſteſty muſt do Right, and give Defence to your Subjects from all the Inſolencies which they ſo frequently meet. Sign'd by Finch, Angleſey, Bridgwater, Bath, Craven, H. Coventry, G. Carteret, J. Ernle.

The Ships and Cargoes were ſaid to be worth near a Million Sterling. I have a Liſt of the Ships and their Owners, as the St. John, John St. John Maſter, belonging to the Earl of Bolingbroke, the Sherrard of Boſton, to the Lord Sherrard, the Lady of Virginia, to Sir Arthur Ingram, the Oak to Sir John Frederick, &c. ſome of which were taken with this insolent Circumſtance, Go tell your King of it.

Secretary Coventry was upon this order'd to tranſmit a Copy of the Report of the Lords Committees of Trade to the Engliſh Ambaſſador in France, and to attend the French Ambaſſador in England with it likewise, that the Evils complain'd of may be redreſs'd. Inſtead of which, Marvel tells us, the French Picaroons continu'd to murder, plunder and conſiſcate Engliſh Merchants, their Ships and Cargoes, 'till the Time of the Parliaments ſitting, inſomuch that it was doubted whether the Miniſters were not Complices in the Matter: "And yet all this while, that they made theſe intolerable and barbarous Piracies and Depredations upon his Maſteſty's Subjects, they were from England more diligently than ever ſupply'd with Recruits, and thoſe that wou'd go voluntarily into the French Service

A.D. 1676 " Service were encourag'd, others that would not, press'd, imprison'd, and carry'd over by main Force, and constrain'd; even as the Parliament here was ready to sit down, notwithstanding all their former frequent Applications to the contrary; and his Majesty's Magazines were daily empty'd to furnish the French with all Sorts of Ammunition, &c." while the King was, by his Ministers, acting the Part of Mediator between France and the Confederates.

Echard and the Compleat Historians remember how the King was alarm'd at the Growth of Popery, and order'd the Secretaries of State to let foreign Ambassadors know, that he will not have Masses said, nor Sermons preach'd in English in their Houses or Chappels; which Farce was as often play'd, as there was a Game to play, but was the Subject of Ridicule to all sober thinking People of whatever Denomination.

I must, for my Part, own, that every Thing in this Administration appears to me so base and dishonourable, that I cannot with Pleasure dwell on the Decorations of it, by Promotions and Preferments, but the Compleat Historian and Echard speak of them, as if they had been the Reward of Merit and Virtue, in virtuous and worthy Times.

Dr. Blandford dying, Dr. James Fleetwood is made Bishop of Worcester. I will repeat the Compleat Historian's Words, that the Reader may see what Materials he picks up for his important History.

" On Sunday the 29th of August, his Lordship elect was consecrated in St. Peter's Church in Broadstreet, London, by the Right Reverend Father in God, John, Lord Bishop of Rochester, his Grace of Canterbury's Commissioner for that Purpose, being assisted by the Bishops of Ely, Chichester and Lincoln. And after the Performance and Solemnity, their Lordships, with many of the Nobility, and other Persons of Quality, were entertain'd at Drapers-Hall." Where will you meet with such Passages in Thucydides, or Livy, and what a Fund of Curiosity must a Man have to be entertain'd with them?

On the Death of Dr. Henckman, Dr. Compton was made Bishop of London, Dr. Fell, Bishop of Oxford, and the two Sheriffs of London, John Peak and Thomas Stamp were Knighted. The King and Queen, the Duke and Dutchess of York, the Lady Mary, and Lady Ann, din'd at Guild-Hall on the Lord Mayor's Day; and Sir Edward Walker being dead, Sir Thomas Doleman was made Clerk of the Council, and the Bishop of Durham, a Privy-Counsellor. I own my self indebted for these Events, to Mr. Archdeacon and the Compleat Historian: To the latter, I owe what follows of the Case of the Dissenters this Year, which for its Ingenuity and Truth deserves Remembrance. " The Dissenters had now some Advancement of improving in popular Reputation, by being generally averse to the Measures conducing to Popery, and the Grandeur of France, and by falling in with those Patriots in both Houses of Parliament, who seem'd most zealous in the Love and Service of their Country." So far has the Truth prevail'd, and a Confession of their Deserts is extorted, but then comes, And yet their own History has little to boast of, but the Prosecution of some of their Teachers, and a Story of Judgments upon some of the Informers. Never were two Monosyllables guilty of so much Non-sense as his And yet. The Dissenters boasted not of their Love to their Country, to the Protestant Religion and Liberty, and yet they boasted of being beggar'd and jail'd, which indeed was the very Boast of their Enemies, who jail'd them and beggar'd them, and yet here is intended, for some of that awkward Raillery which we meet with in Fable: 'Tis a Pretence to Mirth without Wit, and History without Fact. He tells us then a Story of thirteen Bishops, and Sir Nathaniel Hern, Sheriff of London, which he took from Baxter, where he might have learn'd better, if he had thought it possible for any one to teach him. He had seen in Baxter's Life, what a Crew of Rascals and Scoundrels, Justices and Informers were set to work to ruin dissenting Ministers and People; such Justices as Ross of Brentford, Philips, Archbishop Sheldon's Man, Starling, Sheldon, Davis of London, Parry, one of the Ruffians who slit Sir John Coventry's Nose, made a Justice for this Drudgery, Grey, Sir Philip Matthews, &c. such Informers as Keling, Marshall and Strowd, Fellows possess'd with so many Devils, the Horrors of their Consciences, that the Fate of the Swine would have been a Blessing to them; yet how tenderly does the Compleat Historian speak of them?

On the 15th of February the Parliament met, and great were the Expectations of the People of all Religions and Parties. There had been a warm Argument without Doors, concerning the Validity of the intended Session; some arguing that by the antient Laws of England, the Parliament was dissolv'd by so long a Prorogation, as fifteen Months: This was argu'd within Doors, as soon as the Session was open'd, which I shall give an Account of in Mr. Marvel's Words.

" His Majesty demanded of the Parliament, Debates in his Speech, a Supply for building of Ships, about the Excise upon Beer and Ale, which was to expire the 24th of June, 1677, and recommended earnestly a good Correspondence between the two Houses, representing their last Differences, as the Reason of so long a Prorogation, to allay them." After this, The Lord Chancellor, says Echard, made a long and eloquent Speech, the greatest Part of which seems necessary to be remember'd; and knowing what a good Judge he is of such Eloquence, and such Necessity, I lay him and the Chancellor's Speech aside, to see what Marvel writes of them both. " The Lord Chancellor, as is usual with him, spoil'd all which the King had said so well, with straining to do it better; for indeed the Mischances of all the Sessions, since he had the Seals, may in great Part be ascrib'd to his indiscreet and unlucky Eloquence, and had not the Lord Treasurer a far more effectual Way of Persuasion with the Commons, who were in Pension, there had been the same Danger of the ill Success of this Meeting, as of those formerly." Each House being now seated, the Case of this long Prorogation had taken Place so far without Doors, and was of that Consequence to the Constitution of all Parliaments, and the Validity of all Proceedings in this Session, that even the Commons, tho' much against their Wills, cou'd not pass it by, but they handled it so tenderly, as if they were afraid to touch it.

The first Day, instead of the Question whether the Parliament were by this unprecedented Prorogation indeed dissolv'd, it was propos'd, something ridiculously, says Marvel, whether this Prorogation were not an Adjournment? and this Debate too they adjourn'd till next Day, and from thence till a longer time, when those who had propos'd it, before they would enter upon the Debate, ask'd, whether they might have Liberty? As if that had not been more than imply'd before, by adjourning the Debate, and as if Freedom of Speech was not a Concession of Right, which the King grants at the first Opening of all Parliaments; but by this Faintness, they taught the House to deny them

Lord Chancellor Finch's Eloquence unlucky and indiscreet.

A.D. 1677 them it, and the Matter was wrapp'd up in a cleanly Question, Whether their Grand Committees shou'd sit? Which involving the Legitimacy of the Houses sitting, was carry'd in the Affirmative. But it went otherwise in the Lords House, where the Duke of Buckingham argu'd by all the Laws of Parliament, and with great Strength of Reason, that this Prorogation was Null, and this Parliament consequently dissolv'd; offering to maintain it to all the Judges, and desiring, as had been usual in such Cases, but wou'd not here be admitted, that even They might give their Opinions. My Lord Fretchville cry'd out, To the Bar, the only Argument he was capable of expressing, which was oppos'd by the Earl of Salisbury, with the Height of Cecilian Courage and Reason, and the Duke of Buckingham's Proposal asserted. Then Lord Arundel of Trevice cry'd out, To the Bar, but that was not minded; and the Courtiers of the House of Commons brought up Advice every Moment, that the Matter was yet in Agitation among them; by which means and Lord Shaftsbury.

The Duke of Bucks, the Earl of Salisbury, the Earl of Shaftsbury, and the Lord Wharton sent to the Tower.

Duke of Buckingham's Repartee to Shaftsbury.

the Earl of Shaftsbury had Opportunity to appear with such extraordinary Vigour, both in what concern'd the Duke of Buckingham's Person, and his Proposal, that as the Duke of Buckingham might have stood single in any rational Contest, so the Earl of Shaftsbury was more properly another Principal. The Lord Chancellor, in answer, undertook to make the Prorogation look very formal, laying, says Marvel, the best Colours upon it, after his manner when Advocate, that the Cause wou'd bear. So that upon the Question, it was carry'd for the Prorogation; and the Court-Lords being thus flush'd, but not satisfy'd with their Victory, fell upon their Adversaries in cool Blood, questioning such as they thought fit that same Night, and the next Morning sentencing them; the Duke of Bucks, the Earl of Salisbury, the Earl of Shaftsbury, and the Lord Wharton, to be committed to the Tower during his Majesty's and the House's Pleasure. The Duke of Buckingham finding how 'twas likely to go with them, slipp'd out of the House while the Earl of Anglesey was arguing against committing them. The House understanding he had withdrawn himself, were in a Rage, and intended to address the King for a Proclamation against him; but the Duke knowing it was only a Tower Business for a Week or two, wou'd not give them so much Trouble, and the next Day appear'd in his Place. The Court-Lords immediately cry'd out, To the Bar. The Duke, who had the happiest Way in the World to turn any thing serious into a Jest, and extricate himself out of Difficulties, rose up, and said, I beg your Lordships Pardon for retiring the Night before: You very well know the exact Economy I keep in my Family, and perceiving your Lordships intended I shou'd be some time in another Place, I only went Home to set my House in Order, and am now come to submit myself to your Lordship's Pleasure; which was to send him to the Tower after the other three Lords. I have been told that the Earl of Shaftsbury, who was jealous of the Duke of Buckingham's setting himself up for the Head of his Party, us'd to speak slightly of him, as a Man that was inconstant, giddy, and had his Head full of Whimfies, suitable to the Character of him in Absalom and Achitophel; which the Duke was inform'd of, and re-sented. It happen'd that the Earl of Salisbury, the Lord Wharton, and himself, were discharg'd on their Submission, and only the Earl of Shaftsbury remain'd in the Tower. The Earl look'd out of Window as the Duke of Buckingham was taking Coach, and cry'd, What, my Lord, are you going to leave us? Ay, my Lord, says he, such giddy-headed Fellows as I can never stay long in a

A.D. 1677 Place.

The sending these Lords to the Tower was reckon'd a very rash and unjustifiable Action. Lord Hallifax said, If an idle Motion was made, and check'd at first, he that made it might be censur'd for it, tho' it was seldom, if ever, to be practis'd in a Free Council, where every Man was not bound to be wise, nor to make an impertinent Motion. But when the Motion was entertain'd, and the Debate follow'd, and a Question was put upon it, it was destructive to the Freedom of Publick Councils to call any one to account for it: They might with the same Justice call them to account for their Debates and Votes; so that no Man was safe, unless he cou'd know where the Majority wou'd be. Here wou'd be a Precedent to tip down so many Lords at a time, and garble the House, as often as any Party shou'd have a Majority. Upon this the House first order'd them to ask Pardon as Delinquents, which they refus'd. The Earl of Shaftsbury was the first who was call'd on, probably by the Management of the Lord Chancellor, who had succeeded him in the Chancery, with very unequal Merit, which naturally leads to Envy, and that to Injustice. King Charles himself had said of Lord Shaftsbury, when he had the Seals, That King he had a Chancellor who knew as much Law as Charles's any of his Judges, and as much Divinity as any of his Bishops; which was not the Lord Chancellor Finch's Character. The Earl of Shaftsbury desir'd he might have his Servants to wait on him in the Tower, and the first he nam'd was his Cook, as had been concerted with the Duke of Bucks; but Lord Wharton was too grave for so ludicrous a thing, which the King highly resent-ed. These Lords were much visit'd in the Tower, and to put a Stop to it, they were made close Prisoners, not to be visit'd without Leave from the King, or the House; and particular Observations were made of all who ask'd Leave, which was much cry'd out against. The three Lords that were discharg'd lay there some Months, and got out by petitioning the King. Lord Shaftsbury wou'd not petition, but mov'd for a Discharge in the King's-Bench. The Ministry was not so weak as not to know who were fit Tools for the Work they had to do, and every Bench of Judges, Bishops, &c. were well supply'd with Persons who were ready to do whatever the Court requir'd of them. Scroggs the Chief Justice, and his Brethren, said, the Earl of Shaftsbury was committed by an Order of the House of Lords, which was a superior Court to them, and they cou'd not take Cognizance of the Matter. The Lord Treasurer Danby censur'd this Motion highly, as done in Contempt of the House of Lords, who were then under Prorogation: He threaten'd to make use of it against the Lord Shaftsbury next Session of Parliament, yet he himself was afterwards forc'd to make the same Motion at the King's-Bench Bar, and complain'd of the Injustice of that Court, for refusing to bail or discharge him; tho' in that they follow'd the Precedent, which at this Time was directed by himself.

The Debate about the Dissolution had the Effect in the House of Commons which was foreseen, for that House was much inflam'd against Lord Shaftsbury and his Party; which being compos'd of moderate Church-men and Dissenters, has very much reconcil'd the Compleat Historian to this Session. The Commons voted 600,000 Pounds for building thirty Ships; however, a Clause was put in the Bill by the Country-Party, with Intent to lose it, which was, that the Money shou'd be accounted for to them, in hopes the Lords wou'd alter that Clause, and make it accountable to both Houses; which was done by the

the Peers, and Conferences held upon it. The Lords thought that since they paid a Share of the Tax, it was not reasonable to exclude them from the Accompts. The Commons adher'd to their Clause, and the Bill was in great Danger of being lost; but some of the Tools just mention'd, being set to work to prevail with the Majority of the Peers, they receded. The Parliament continu'd the additional Excise three Years longer, but things did not go so swimmingly to the End of the Session; for the Progress of the French King's Arms in the Netherlands made such an Impression on the Parliament, that they wou'd not be contented without some Measures were taken by our Court to give a Check to them. Valenciennes being taken, and St. Omer in Danger, the Prince of Orange march'd thither, and too rashly ventur'd a Battel with the Duke of Orleans. Some Regiments of Marines, on whom the Prince depended much, basely ran away; yet the other Bodies fought so well, that he lost not much, besides the Honour of the Day. But St. Omer immediately capitulated, and Cambray soon after. Upon which Sir William Coventry open'd the Business in the House of Commons, and shew'd the Danger of all the Spanish Netherlands falling under the Power of France, which must end in the Ruin of the United Provinces, if a timely Stop was not put to the French Conquests. He demonstrated that the Interest of England made it necessary for the King to withdraw his Mediation, and enter into the Alliance against France. The whole House went into this: Great Complaints were made of the Regiments the King kept in the French Army, and of the great Service that was done by them. 'Tis true, the King suffer'd the Dutch to make Levies, but there was another sort of Encouragement given to the Levies for France, particularly in Scotland, where it look'd more like a Press than a Levy. They had not only the publick Goals given them to keep their Men in, but when the Goals were full, they had the Castle of Edinburgh assign'd them. Some of the Presbyterians taken at Meetings were deliver'd to the French Officers. The Spanish Ambassador complain'd of it, but the infamous Lauderdale kept up those Levies, notwithstanding a Proclamation to the contrary. The Presbyterians, and other Recruits, were hasten'd a-board before the Proclamation came down to Scotland; yet they were not fail'd then, and the Proclamation was conceal'd till they were fail'd: So apparently, says Bishop Burnet, was the Kingdom in a French Management.

Sir William Coventry's Speech for a War with France.

Scots Presbyterians sent into the French Service.

The House of Commons press'd the King, by repeated Addresses, to fall into the Interest of Europe, as well as into his own, which made him uneasy; and he sent them several angry Answers. For one must do this Justice to the Stuartine Princes, to observe, that though they were afraid to give any Foreigners an angry Word, they never wanted Courage to insult their Parliaments. His Majesty said, Peace and War were undoubtedly Matters within his Prerogative, in which they ought not to meddle. Which is every whit as whimsical, as if when a House is on Fire, and a Neighbour shou'd come to assist the Owner in putting of it out, he shou'd bid him Hold his Tongue and his Hand, the House is his, and what has he to do with it? tho' his Neighbour is sure to have the same Fate with his own. To talk of Prerogative, when the Enemy is at the Gates, argues as much want of Sense as Decency: 'Tis my Prerogative to ruin my self, if I think fit, and you too. And if the one cou'd have been done without the other, the Parliament wou'd have been in the wrong to have expos'd themselves to such ill Treatment for doing their Duty only. Bishop Burnet tells us,

"The King in common Discourse remember'd often the Parliament's engaging his Father and Grand-father in the Affairs of Germany, and to break the Match with Spain, which prov'd fatal to them; and he resolv'd not to be serv'd in such a manner." We hear very much of this King's Wit, but the Proofs of it are ever in Jest and Repartees. Cou'd he think to palm such Reasoning on Men who knew Fact and Argument? The Parliament wou'd have engag'd his Grand-father in War with the Emperor, if they had found him sincere in it, and had not squander'd away the Money they gave him for it on Minions and Flatterers. The Match with Spain was broken off only to make a worse Match with France, and that was the Ruin of his Father. He durst not tell the People that he was in Pension, that he took the French King's Money, and if he fell out with him shou'd have no more. 'Tis honestly, though not very elegantly said by a modern Author: "I cannot, my Lord, without some Reluctancy, think that a King, who for near twenty Years had had the greatest Opportunity of any of his Predecessors to make himself great both at Home and Abroad, shou'd fall to so abject a State, as to become a French Pensioner; which, without the Addition of any other Crime, is more than enough eternally to blast the Memory of an English Monarch."

The King demanded 600,000 Pounds more than the Commons had given him, to enable him to enter into Alliances, which they had all the Reason in the World to think he did not intend, but to spend that Money, as he had spent the immense Sums already given him. His Phrase was, To enable him to speak more effectually; but the Parliament very justly distrusted him, and the thing being unparliamentary, to give Money to maintain Alliances and Wars, before those Alliances or Wars are made, the other 600,000 Pounds was deny'd; upon which he dismiss'd them for five Weeks. On the 22d of May the Parliament met again, and great Debates arose about the Averfion of the Ministers to enter into Alliances against France; upon which the Parliament resolv'd on a vigorous Address, wherein they represent'd the Purse and Power of France to be too great to be contended with by this Nation singly; neither cou'd the Dutch withstand them, but both together might; and the Charges and Inconveniencies that wou'd fall on the Kingdom, if the Dutch, for want of timely Encouragement and Assistance shou'd make a separate Peace, wou'd be insupportable: And therefore they advis'd, and humbly pray'd his Majesty, to enter into a League Offensive and Defensive with the Dutch, and with others, against France, for saving the Spanish Netherlands, as the only Means to defend Britain: Assuring him, That the Sequel of such Alliance wou'd end in Safety, in regard his People were unanimous in the Cause; and they promis'd to support those Alliances with all their Power.

But Bishop Parker informs us, the Popish Cabal cou'd see Safety and not Danger from the Growth of the French Power; and pursuant to the Advice of the Cabal, the King in a Speech to the Commons told them, in a Style that wou'd have better become the Plantagenets, Their Address contain'd Things unfit for them to meddle with, for they entrenched on his undoubted Prerogative of making Peace and War; which had never, when the Sword was not drawn, been so dangerously invaded. The Word dangerously is extremely proper, because the Tenor of the Address was to bring him and his People out of Danger. They did not content themselves with desiring him to enter into Leagues, but tell him what sort of Leagues they must be, and with whom; and he

A.D. 1677 was very much hurt by it. A Traveller out of his Way, amid Darknets and Precipices, meets with a Person, who not only tells him he is out of his Way, but puts him into the right Path, and the Traveller says, These are things unfit for you to meddle with; if I go out of the Way, and tumble down the Precipice, it is my Prerogative: Besides, you might have told me I'm wrong, and desir'd me to take care not to tumble, but what had you to do to set me right? Common Sense is sufficient to avoid such false Reasoning, and what follows only aggravates it. If I shou'd suffer that Fundamental Power of making War and Peace, to be so invaded, as to have the Manner and Circumstances of Leagues prescrib'd, no Prince or Potentate wou'd longer believe the Sovereignty of England rests in the Crown; wherefore no Condition shall make me depart from so essential a Part of the Monarchy. Sovereignty, Crown, and Monarchy, make up the Reason of this Sentence: The Interest and Safety of England, and all Europe, the Protestant Religion, and the Liberty of Nations, have no Weight in this Reasoning. Let us read what the Learned Acherley writes upon it: "By the Fundamental Constitution of Parliament, and by the express Words of the original Summons to it, they had a Right to enquire into the State of the Nation, and to advise the King what to do; what Wars to make, and what Alliances to enter into, in case those Wars, and those Alliances were necessary for the Defence of the Nation: For who cou'd be more proper to give Advice about that Defence, than those who were to bear the Charges, and to suffer most for want of that Defence? And if this were not reasonable, the Constitution and the Form of this Government were egregiously infirm and defective. Many Precedents might be produc'd to support this Argument, As to the Sentiments of neighbouring Princes and Potentates, it was argu'd, That Reputation was the Life of Government, and Disreputation the Bane of it; and that every Prince in Europe was well appriz'd, that the Acts of the King's Sovereignty, whether those Acts were War or Peace, without the good-liking or Consent of his Parliament, were half-form'd Things, without Sinews or Strength to defend this Nation's Friends, or offend it's Enemies." When we follow a learned Lawyer, we tread on sure Ground; and the Court Sophistry, which like an Ignis Fatuus misguides the Compleat Historians, appears naked and shameless. The Parliament was adjourn'd to the 16th of July, to give the French King a full Swing of Devastation and Ruin in Flanders. We shall prove in the Sequel, that King Charles was at this very Juncture chaffering, by his Ministers in France, for more Money; and that one Reason given for it, was, That he had been absolutely the Occasion of the French King's Conquests in Flanders. There were two or three good Acts pass'd before the Adjournment; as 1. The Act for preventing Frauds and Perjuries. 2. An Act for taking away the Writ de Heretico Comburendo, &c. And the Adjournment itself was a very extraordinary one; for upon his Majesty's signifying his Pleasure that it shou'd be so, Mr. Edward Seymour, afterwards Sir Edward, the Speaker, without the Consent of the House, or so much as putting the Question, adjourn'd them; tho' Sir John Finch, the Chancellor's Uncle, was for the same thing impeach'd of High Treason in Parliament, 1640. So that if the Parliament was not dissolv'd by the last Prorogation, it made it a Question now, whether it was not dissolv'd by their Separation, without Prorogation or legal Adjournment?

A.D. 1677 De Salinas, the Spanish Envoy in England, having heard that King Charles had call'd the Parliament a Company of Rogues, he took care to let some of the Members know it, it being on Account of the Address they had presented for an Alliance against France, which that Minister came to forward; and the King resented his telling it so much, that he was order'd to depart the Kingdom. A Company of Rogues is not very courtly Language for the Representatives of the Nation. I abhor Ribaldry as much as any Man, and I have never been provok'd to hard Names, but when I am speaking of Criminals that deserve Punishment rather by the Hangman than the Historian.

At this Time Sir William Temple was sent for into England, under the Notion of preferring him to be Secretary of State; but it was on Condition he laid down 10,000 Pounds for it, after so many Services; and after he had spent much of his own Fortune in his Embassies. The King discours'd him frequently about the general Peace, and the Prince of Orange's intended Journey into England, the latter of which his Majesty did not at all desire. He said, The Parliament wou'd never be quiet or easy with him while the War lasted abroad; that they had got it into their Heads to draw him into it whether he wou'd or no; that they pretended Publick Ends, and Dangers from France, and there might be both meant by a great many honest Men amongst them, but the Hears had been rais'd by some Faction's Leaders, who thought more of themselves than any thing else, and had a Mind to engage him in a War, and then leave him in it, unless they might have their Terms in removing and filling up Places, and he was very unwilling to be so much at their Mercy. That besides, he saw the longer it continu'd, the worse it wou'd be for the Confederates; and therefore he wou'd fain have the Prince make the Peace for them, if they wou'd not do it for themselves; and if he and the Prince cou'd fall into the Terms of it, he was sure it might be done. Sir William Temple represented the Inflexibility of the Prince in the Point of the Treaty, without the joint Concurrence and Satisfaction of all the Confederates; and if his Majesty wou'd try another Hand in the Negotiation, Mr. Hyde was a very proper Person to be employ'd: To which the King consented, and Mr. Hyde was dispatch'd to his Highness, Mr. Hyde whom he found at the Camp, firm and resolute against the Peace, on any other Conditions than in Holland. Concert with the Allies.

The Prince's Marriage with the Lady Mary, Prince of Orange's was so great a Blessing to these three Kingdoms, that 'tis no Wonder so many claim a Share of the Merit of it; which seems to be owing mostly to the Earl of Danby, who had run himself so much into the ill Will of the People, that he saw his Ruin wou'd be inevitable, if he did not make his Peace by some very popular Action; and there were two Steps to be taken which cou'd not fail of appeasing them; the one was a good Peace between France and the Confederates, the other the Marriage of the Princess Mary, the Duke's eldest Daughter, to the Prince of Orange. Sir William Temple was in great Confidence with Danby, and the latter gave Temple full Assurance that he might speak of it to the Prince, without Fear of giving Offence either to the King or Duke. Great Offers were made to the latter, to draw him into the Alliance; and that of commanding the Confederate Army stagger'd him so much, that the French Emisaries were alarm'd: However, cautious Men were still jealous of the Lord Treasurer in these Matters. Some thought the Talk of an Alliance with Holland, in case France did not conclude a Peace before the next Campaign, was

A.D. 1677 was only an Artifice to draw Money from the Parliament for raising an Army; which when it was rais'd, might be sold again to France for a greater Sum of Money, or made use of to master Parliaments, and the whole Nation. 'Twas whisper'd that was the Scheme by which he maintain'd himself in the King and the Duke's Confidence, even when he declar'd himself an open Enemy to that which they were still supporting; which he did with so little Decency, that at Archbishop San-croft's Consecration-Dinner, Sheldon being lately dead, he drank Confusion to all who were not for a War with France; which not only lets us into the false Character of that Minister, but into the Custom of Consecration-Dinners in those Days, so much boasted of by the Compleat Historian. It was the Earl of Danby who got the Prince of Orange to send Bentinck to England, to ask the King Leave to come over at the End of the Campaign; with which the Court of France was not pleas'd, suspecting a Design for the Marriage. But the King assur'd Barillon, who was sent Ambassador from France chiefly on that Account, that there was not a Thought of it; and that the Prince of Orange had only a Mind to talk with him: As also, that he hop'd he shou'd bring him into such Measures as wou'd produce a speedy Peace.

Earl of Danby's great Share in it.

The Prince of Orange comes to England.

The Campaign ended unsuccessfully to the Prince, who fate down before Charleroy, but was forc'd to raise the Siege. When that was over, he came to England, and stay'd some Time here talking to his two Uncles about a Peace; but they cou'd not bring him to their Terms. He was a Man of Honour and Resolution. He knew Men and Business; and there was no Likelihood of his two Uncles working on such a Prince as he, who was more than a Match for both of them in Politicks, notwithstanding they were almost as old again as their Nephew. After a fruitless Stay of some Weeks, he intended to go back without proposing Marriage. He had no Mind to be deny'd; and he saw no Hope of succeeding, unless he wou'd enter more entirely into his Uncle's Measures. The King, who judg'd of the Prince by himself, thought his Nephew's Head and Heart wou'd have been set upon the young Lady, whom tho' his Highness lov'd and esteem'd, yet he prefer'd his Honour to his Passion, a Sentiment which his Majesty cou'd not be sensible of, and therefore treated with the Prince as with a young Man who wanted a Wife as much as he did a Mistress, and wou'd be brought to any thing for a fair Bed-fellow. But the Prince's wife Conduct taught him another Lesson. The Earl of Danby finding his Highness wou'd not be put off, and fearing to lose the Merit of this Marriage, press'd him to stay two or three Days longer, and leave the Management of that Matter to him. So next Monday Morning, after he had taken Care by all his Creatures about the King to put him in a very good Humour, he came to his Majesty and told him he had receiv'd Letters from all the best Friends he had in England, and shew'd a Bundle of them, in which he was pretty sure the King wou'd not trouble himself to look, and they all agreed in the same Advice, that the Duke's Daughter be marry'd to the Prince of Orange, for they all believe he came over on that Account; and if he went away without her, no body wou'd doubt but that he had propos'd a Marriage, and had been deny'd; upon which the Parliament wou'd certainly make Addresses to the King for it; and if the Marriage was made upon that, his Majesty wou'd lose the Grace and Thanks of it: But if it was still deny'd, even after the Addresses of both Houses, it wou'd raise Jealousies which might have very ill Consequences; whereas, if the King did it of his own Motion, he wou'd have the Honour of it, and by so doing bring the Prince into a greater Dependance upon himself, and beget in the Nation such a good Opinion of him, as wou'd lay a Foundation for a mutual Confidence. This he enforc'd with all the Topicks he cou'd think of. His Majesty said, The Prince has not so much as propos'd it. The Lord Danby reply'd, He has spoke of it only to me, because he apprehended he shou'd not succeed in it. My Brother, reply'd his Majesty, will never consent to it. May be not, says Lord Danby, unless you take upon you to command it, and I think it is the Duke's Interest to have it done more than your Majesty's. All People are now possess'd of his being a Papist, and are very apprehensive of it; but if they see his Daughter given to one who is at the Head of the Protestant Party, it will very much soften those Apprehensions, when it appears that his Religion is only a personal Thing, not to be deriv'd to his Children after him. By which Discourse the King was convinc'd, and sent for the Duke, the Earl of Danby staying still with him. When the Duke came, the King said, I have sent for you to desire you would consent to a Thing, which I am sure is as much for your Interest as for my Quiet and Satisfaction. The Duke, without asking what it was, reply'd, I will be always ready to comply with the King's Pleasure in every thing. Upon which the King left it to the Lord Treasurer to say over all he had said on that Head to himself; at which the Duke seem'd much concern'd. But his Majesty saying, I desire it of you for my sake as well as for your own, his Royal Highness consented to it; so Lord Danby sent immediately for the Prince, and in the King's Name order'd a Council to be summon'd. As soon as the Prince came, the King in a very obliging Manner said to him, Nephew, It is not good for Man to be alone, I will give you a Help-meet for you, telling him he wou'd bestow his Neece on him. And the Duke in as obliging a Manner, and with seeming Heartiness, gave his Consent. The King adding, Nephew, Remember Love and War do not agree very well together. This happy Agreement was made the 23d of October; and the News of the intended Marriage was soon spread in Court and City; all, except the French and Popish Faction, rejoyc'd mightily at it. Barillon was amaz'd: He flew to the Dutcheſs of Portsmouth, and got her to send all her Creatures to desire to speak with the King. She wrote him several Billets to the same Purpose. But the Earl of Danby having taken Care to have a Council summon'd, took Care also that neither the King nor the Duke shou'd be spok'd to till the Matter was declar'd at that Board. And when that was done the King presented the Prince to the young Lady as the Person he design'd shou'd be her Husband. When Barillon saw it was gone so far, he sent a Courier to the Court of France with the News; upon whose Arrival Mr. Montagu, afterwards Duke of Montagu, King Charles's Ambassador, was sent for. When he came to Versailles he saw the King the most mov'd that he had ever observ'd him to be. He ask'd him when the Marriage was to be made? Mr. Montagu understood not what he meant. Upon which the most Christian King explain'd all to him. The Ambassador protested he knew nothing of the whole Matter. The King said, I always believ'd the Journey wou'd end in that. And he seem'd to think the Court of England had now forsaken him, which made him the

How the French King receiv'd the News.

A.D. 1677 more generous in his Money Negotiations to prevent it. He spoke of the King's Part in it with Decency, but expostulated severely on the Duke's Part, who had now given his Daughter to the greatest Enemy he had in the World. Mr. Montagu had no Answer to make; but next Night he had a Courier with Letters from the King, the Duke, and the Prince, to the French King. The Prince would have avoided this Piece of Courtship, but his Uncle oblig'd him to it, as a Civility due to Kindred and Blood. The King assur'd his Brother of France, he had made the Match with a Design to engage the Prince to be more tractable in the Treaty which was now going on at Nimeguen. The French King receiv'd these Letters civilly, but did not seem much satisfy'd with them. Mr. Montagu was call'd over soon after this to get new Instructions; and the Lord Treasurer ask'd him how the French King receiv'd the News of the Marriage. He answer'd, As he would have done the Loss of an Army. He spoke very hardly of the Duke for consenting to it, and not at least acquainting him with it. The Earl of Danby reply'd, He wrong'd him, for the Duke did not know it an Hour before it was publish'd, and the King himself not above two Hours.

Lord Danby's Account of it different from Sir William Temple's.

This Account entirely differs from Sir William Temple's, who makes himself to be the sole Agent in the Success of this momentous Affair; whereas, according to this Account, which the Duke of Montagu told Bishop Burnet, Sir William Temple was not present when the King was persuaded to consent to it, when the Duke was sent for by the King, when the Prince came to them, and the Lord Treasurer, and when the Princess was given to him. Lord Montagu was known to be no Friend of Lord Danby's; yet he does this Justice to him; and the Lord Danby, when Duke of Leeds, said, He would not suffer that Part of his Service to be buried in Oblivion. Had it not been for the personal Virtues and Graces of her Royal Highness the Princess, and for the Interest the Marriage gave the Prince of Orange in the Parliament and People of England, and the strengthening of the Protestant Interest in Christendom, the Princess's Portion could not have tempted the Prince, it being but 40,000 Pounds, and the Jointure of the Dowager of Orange was 12 or 14,000 Pounds a Year. A Day or two after the Marriage was agreed on, the King and Queen, the Duke (the Dutchess lay in at that Time of the Duke of Cambridge) and the two Princesses his Daughters, saw the Lord Mayor's Shew, and afterwards din'd with him, then Sir Francis Chaplin, at Guild-hall. 'Twas about this Time, if not at this very Feast, that Sir Nicholas Butler a Quack Spy, afterwards a Privy-Counsellor.

Sir J. T. his false Tale of a Plot.

Sir Nicholas Butler a Quack, who had renounc'd Baptism in Oliver's Time, and was now a Court Spy, afterwards a Privy-Counsellor, came to the King and told him he had just discover'd a Conspiracy against his Life, and that the Fanatics, himself a Baptist, had resolv'd to execute it on the Lord Mayor's Day, that they had prepar'd a Cross-Bow for that Purpose, which had the Force of a Gun, and with it they intended to shoot him from Bow Steeple, as he stood in the Balcony at the Angel in Cheapside to see the Pageants. Upon this Sir Robert Southwell, then one of the Clerks of the Council, was sent to Bow Church early in the Morning to observe the Conspirators, that on a Signal given they might be seiz'd. Sir Robert got up into the Church at the Place assign'd by Butler, and there attended till the Pageants were come into Cheapside, when he perceiv'd a lusty, rugged Fellow press forward to

A.D. 1677 look into the Street, with a Great-Coat on, and something strutting out under it. Sir Robert Southwell presently concluded that was the Person he wanted; so he got near him, and with as little Suspicion as might be endeavour'd to feel for the Cross-Bow. The Man finding him fumbling about his Cloaths, star'd at him; and if Sir Robert's Aspect and Dress had not shewn him to be a Person of Quality, he fancy'd the Fellow would have secur'd him for a Pick-Pocket. But at last Southwell spy'd the fatal Easing under his Coat. It seems the Man was a Carpenter, and had a great Rule stuck into his Girdle. It was about this Time also that the Court began to hearken to Whispers of dark Designs of the Dissenters, as Echard calls them, tho' God knows, they had no other Design than to procure, if they cou'd, Friends enough in Parliament to repeal those cruel and unnatural Laws that depriv'd them of their Liberty Spiritual and Temporal, the Birth-right of every good Englishman and Protestant. We shall see hereafter what Tragedies those Whispers produc'd.

The Prince of Orange's Marriage with the Princess Mary was consummated the 4th of November; and a few Days after the King, the Duke, the Prince, the Lord Treasurer, and Sir William Temple, enter'd in Earnest on the Debate of the Peace, the Terms of which were at last agreed upon, "That France should restore to the Emperor all that had been taken from him; the Dutchy of Lorraine to the Duke; and all on both Sides between France and Holland; and to Spain the Towns of Aeth, Charleroy, Audenard, Courtray, Tournay, Conde, Valenciennes, St. Guislain and Binch." These Conditions were sent to France by the Lord Duras, afterwards Earl of Feversham; and the King assur'd his Highness, He would never part from the least Point of the Scheme, tho' even Echard is forc'd to own, That the Business came to be drawn out into so many Messages from England, and Returns from France, that it diminish'd into nothing. The Reader cannot forget that his Majesty immediately after his breaking his Word with the Presbyterians, valu'd himself to his Parliament on his Sincerity, and that the Chancellor Hyde spoke very much of his being a King of his Word. Mr. Ackerley assures us the Matter of the Scheme was spun out into dilatory Expostulations by Concert with Duras himself, who carry'd it over. Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Orange embark'd for Holland as soon as the Terms of the Peace were adjusted.

When the Parliament met on the 16th of July, Secretary Covenry signify'd they should be adjourn'd to the 3d of December, which Mr. Speaker Seymour did again by his own Authority: But before that the King issu'd out his Proclamation, that he expected not the Members Attendance. When the House met the 3d of December, the Secretary deliver'd a Message from the King, that they should adjourn to the 15th of January, which Speaker Seymour did a third Time. The King thought himself pretty sure of the Parliament's meeting him in a good Humour, upon the Marriage of his Niece to a Protestant Prince; and to be still surer of it, he sent Mr. Thynne to Holland with a Draught of a June Alliance to be made with the States General, in order to compel France and Spain to fall in with the Scheme agreed upon, which he knew France would never consent to, nor did he ever intend to compel her, but was even continuing his Demands of Money from the French King for the Services he had done, and was to do him,

A.D. 1678 as will be prov'd hereafter. Hyde was come from Nimeguen, where he was added to the Number of the English Plenipotentiaries Mediators, to wait on the Princess of Orange; and the Treaty the States. Thynne brought over, was sign'd the 16th of January.

1678. Having at the Close of the last Year omitted the Promotions and Preferments, which are the darling Ornaments of our Compleat Histories, I shall adorn mine out of Edward in the Beginning of this. His Grace Henry Duke of Newcastle, and Earl Danby Lord Treasurer, were made Knights of the Garter in the Room of two Knights deceas'd, William Duke of Newcastle, and George Earl of Bristol. The Duke of Ormond was again made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in the Room of the Earl of Essex, who, as the Archdeacon tells us with singular Satisfaction, began now to decline in the King's Favour, who had been long declining in that of the Publick. In the Beginning of January his Majesty was pleas'd to make George Wharton, Esq; a Baronet, and some Weeks before to confer the Honour of Knighthood on William Royston and Thomas Beckford, Citizens of London. I must confess I do affect a Negligence of Chronology in such Memoirs as these, which are to have no more Room than we can spare, and to take it where it happens.

Honours that are the Reward of illustrious Actions and exalted Worth, deserve Immortality, if our Histories were to be immortal, and wou'd eternally be read with Pleasure: But in such Times as these, the Streams must participate of the Source, and to let them, like some Rivers, lose themselves in the Sands of Oblivion, wou'd have been our Choice, had we not been misled by the Compleat Historians.

Parliament. The Parliament met on the 15th of January, and by the King's Directions adjourn'd for thirteen Days, within which Time his Majesty shou'd, as he intimated, have Matters of great Importance to impart to them. And when they met, he acquainted them with ordinary Matters touching the Prince's Marriage, and with the Alliance he had made with Holland against France. The Money-Treaty was then actually on Foot at Paris. He demanded Supplies to raise 30,000 Men, and for a Fleet of 90 Men of War, in order to declare and carry on a War vigorously against France. Sir William Coventry shew'd the great Inconvenience of raising a Land-Army, the Danger that might follow on it, the little Use cou'd be made of it, and the great Charge it must put the Nation to. He was for hiring Troops from the German Princes, and for assisting the Dutch with Money. He mov'd to recall our Forces out of the French Service, and put them into the Dutch. He thought it did more properly belong to England to set out a great Fleet, and to cut off the French Trade every where, than to keep up a Land-Army; for the French were then very high in Manufactures and Commerce; their People were ingenious as well as industrious; they wrought hard, and liv'd low, so they sold cheaper than others cou'd do; and it was found that we sent very near a Million in Specie every Year for the Balance of our Trade with them. This is the Reign so much cry'd up for the Flourishing Trade! This is the Monarch so extoll'd for his Care of the Church and Commerce! But, says Bishop Burnet, "The King had promis'd so many Commissions to Men of Quality in both Houses, that it was carry'd for a Land-Force."

Sir William Coventry's Speech about the French Trade.

A.D. 1678 The Commons believing now the King to be in Earnest, address'd him not to admit of any Treaty of Peace, whereby the French King shou'd be left in Possession of any greater Dominion or Power than was left him by the Pyrenean Treaty, and to stop all Commerce with France. The latter he consented to by a severe Act, prohibiting the Importation of French Manufactures or Growth for three Years, and to the next Session of Parliament after that. This Prohibition was well look'd to for a Year; but the Court was too much French (to use Bishop Burnet's Words) not to connive at the Breach of it afterwards. The Address about the Terms of the Treaty try'd the Popish Cabal to the Quick, and the King, by a Message in Writing sent the 4th of February, reviv'd his Quarrels with the Commons about their meddling with Matters which were not fit for them, such as the Security of their Religion, Liberties and Properties, and invading his Prerogative, to destroy them by a War or a Peace, as he thought fit, without taking their Advice in the Matter: He told them they had taken no Notice of his Speech when he adjourn'd them in May, but had added to their former ill Conduct new Invasions of his Prerogatives, adding, That the Rights of making and managing War and Peace were his; and if they thought he wou'd depart from any Part of those Rights, they were mistaken. A Thread-bare Topick too much worn to deserve further Observation. Whoever question'd the Prerogative of making and managing Peace and War? And whoever doubted the Right of the Parliament to address and advise in both Cases as the Necessity of Affairs requir'd? Acherly, after Bishop Parker, informs us, The King threaten'd the Commons, if they would not grant the Money demanded, he would immediately relinquish the War. Upon which they pass'd the Poll-Bill to raise one Million; but at the same Time, on the 14th of March, they prepar'd an Address, to proclaim War against France instantly, and to dismiss the French Ambassador. Which Address they sent to the Lords for their Concurrence. But before the Address cou'd be perfect'd in the Lord's House, the Popish Cabal, says Acherly, hasten'd the King to anticipate it, and to secure against all Events the Money-Bill, which he did by passing it on the 20th of March, and on that Day dismiss'd their Sitting for a Month. In this Manner, according to Bishop Parker, the King at length, with much Ado, extorted from the Commons that Supply, which he had, without Effect, desir'd for a whole Year together.

Trade with France prohibited.

P. 693.

In the Preamble of the before-mention'd Act of Prohibition, it was set forth that we were in actual War with France, which was accepted to as not true in Fact. But the Ministry, not very scrupulous as to the Truth of their Facts, affirm'd we were already engag'd so far with the Allies, that it was really a War, and that our Troops were recall'd from France. Secretary Coventry, one of the Ministers, said in some Heat, The King was engag'd, and he wou'd rather be guilty of the Murder of forty Men, than do any thing to retard the Progress of the War. An odd Expression, which was often objected to him afterwards. It must not be forgot, that Edward tells us, the King prepar'd for this Session of Parliament, by doing some terrible Things as well as popular, to shew his Authority as well as Clemency in suppressing Libels and seditious Discourses, particularly Mr. Andrew Marvel's Growth of Popery, which is as full of Truth as the Addresses publish'd in his Majesty's Gazette some Time after were full

A.D. 1678 full of Falshood. Another Thing omitted by me at the Opening of this Session, was a Vote upon a Motion of the Lord Obrian, who had marry'd the Earl of Danby's Daughter, for 70,000 Pounds for a solemn Funeral of his late Majesty King Charles I. whose Corpse, by the Way, they never cou'd find, and to erect a Monument for the said Prince of Glorious Memory: The said Sum to be rais'd by a Two Month's Tax, to begin at the Expiration of the present Tax for erecting Men of War. The Archdeacon says, the Nation had stood oblig'd to do this for many Tears; and the Bond is not yet cancell'd, for the Thing is not yet done.

A Poll being granted, the additional Customs continu'd, and 600,000 Pounds given for Land-Forces, an Army of 20,000 effective Men was rais'd and cloath'd in six Weeks Time. The Spanish Ambassador solicited to have a Body of them sent immediately into Flanders, and offer'd to put Ostend and Newport into the Hands of the English. But our Court were ever dilatory in all Engagements with the Confederates.

An Army of 20,000 Men rais'd in 6 Weeks. At this Time the French King made a Step, which struck Terror into the Dutch and Louvois, who was the Contriver of it, gain'd the Credit with him, which he maintain'd so long afterwards. He propos'd to him the taking of Ghent, which being so near the Dutch wou'd, he thought, immediately dispose them to a separate Peace; but how to accomplish it did not appear very easy, without being observ'd, which wou'd have certainly oblig'd the King of England to have sent Troops to re-inforce that Garrison. Wherefore Louvois laid such a Scheme of Marches and Counter-marches, as did amuse all the Allies. Sometimes the Design seem'd to be on the Rhine, sometimes on Luxemburgh. And while the Confederate Forces were sent to defend those Places where they apprehended the Design was laid, and none of the French Generals themselves did apprehend what the true Design was, the French Army on a sudden invests Ghent, which Town and Cittadel were quickly taken. This was Louvois's Master-piece. It had the Effect intended, and brought the Dutch to resolve on a Peace. The French King might have taken Bruges, Ostend and Newport; but he only took Ypres, for he had no Mind to provoke the English. He was sure of his Point by the Fright this put the Hollanders into. The English were equally frighten'd, and the Duke of Monmouth was dispatch'd away with some of the Guards to join their Army, while a large Detachment was preparing to follow them.

A fine Scheme of Louvois.

English Troops sent to Flanders.

Echard tells us what Care was taken to prevent the Publishing of Pamphlets in Favour of the Reform'd Religion, and the Rights, Properties and Liberties of English Men, but he did not tell us that the most execrable Libeller, who ever sold Lies and Scandal, Roger L'Estrange, was licens'd to break open Houses and Closets on Suspicion only of any such good Pamphlet, and that the King's terrifying Speech about his Prerogative, was publish'd in the next News-Book that came out after the Parliament was adjourn'd, such an equal Hand was carry'd in this just Administration.

On the 11th of April the Parliament met again, and adjourn'd to the Monday following; at which time, by the King's particular Appointment, they chose a new Speaker in the House of Commons. Sir Robert Sawyer, of whom Echard says the very Best he can, that he was one of the King's Council, learned, and a great Practicer in the Exchequer, but being troubled with the Stone, Mr. Edward Seymour was again re-instated in the Chair; and these Times, as we may perceive, A.D. 1678 being very godly, he informs us there was a strict Fast kept all over England. The Archdeacon seems to have found out the Lord Chancellor at last; for he brings his long Speech, as he calls it, into five or six Lines: The chief Thing in it was an Intimation of a Peace between the French King and the States; upon which the Commons voted, May the 4th, to give their humble Advice to his Majesty, that he would forthwith enter into the present Alliance with the Confederates, and an actual War with France, and again, by a Majority of sixteen Voices, that the late Leagues made with the States General of the United Provinces, are not pursuant to the Addresses of this House, nor consistent with the Good and Safety of the Kingdom. Rare Management! The King being disoblig'd, cries Echard, return'd them this Answer, That having been acquainted with the Votes of the 4th Instant, his Majesty is very much surpriz'd, both with the Matter and Manner of them, but if he had had Exceptions to neither, yet his Majesty having ask'd the Advice of both the Houses, doth not think fit to give any Answer to any thing of that Nature, 'till he hath the concurrent Advice of both Houses. Mr. Archdeacon goes sweetly on with such Messages and Answers, as if there was no Harm said or done, and he did, or perhaps cou'd not see, that if the Advice was good, the Answer should have been so too, and that the King knew better than any Man, that the Lords would not have fail'd to have given their Concurrence.

The next Address, May 11th, shew'd that the Pensioners in this House, either wanted their Pay, or were weary, and asham'd of voting always against their Consciences, as the King was often told in a joking Way, and would laugh at what does not seem very laughable. The Commons humbly thank'd his Majesty for demanding their Advice, which accordingly they had given, and besought him to communicate to them his Resolutions thereupon; and whereas they conceive that the Inconveniencies and Dangers which the Kingdom now lies under, might totally, or in a great Measure have been prevented, in case his Majesty had accepted of the Advice by them given in their Addresses, that therefore he would be pleas'd to remove those Counsellors who advis'd him to give those Answers which he did to the said Addresses, and in fine, that he would be pleas'd to remove the Duke of Lauderdale from his Presence and Councils. Bravely said! like Britons! like Protestants! and now at last, after eighteen Years incessant Apprehension, Anxiety, Perplexity, Persecution, Danger, and almost Despair, we have an English Parliament, nay that very Parliament who pass'd the Bartholomew Act, the Militia Act, the Corporation Act, the Five Mile Act, and that repeal'd the Triennial Act; that very Parliament is at last become English, and as long as they have fate, the Nation were willing to keep them longer. The King's Answer was, En Maître, I am surpriz'd at the Extravagancy of your Address, and unwilling at present to give it such a due Answer as it deserves. Well said, Mr. Archdeacon will say, if he says any thing, but he may very well apply to himself, with Respect to this Government, what a fine Wit said of the Dispensary.

*I view thee always with a Lover's Eye,
Thou hast no Fault, or I no Fault can spy;
Thou art all Beauty, or all Blindness I.*

It is not so with me, I never look'd upon it with the Eye of a Lover, I never saw any Charms, but eternally meet with Blemishes.

His

A.D. 1678 His Majesty, after his last excellent Speech, on the 13th of May, prorog'd the Parliament to the 23d of May. We are told that what the King resented most, was a Vote, at the Motion of Sir Thomas Clarges, Monk's Wife's Brother, that no Money should be given, 'till Satisfaction was given in Matters of Religion. Eckard, who does not know when Sir William Temple is good, and when he is not, copies him, and calls this an unlucky peevish Vote; whereas, both Sir William and he too, might have call'd it a crooked lean Vote. They had trusted the King so long, that they could trust him no longer, without putting every thing that was dear to them to the Hazard. To desire a little Security, is to be peevish to make a sensible Motion, and to carry it, is to be unlucky; what follows after Temple, is not more important. The King reproach'd Sir William with his popular Notions of War, and ask'd him, how he thought he cou'd trust a House of Commons to carry him through the War, if he should engage; if Sir William cou'd not have thought how, he cou'd not think at all. He might have trusted them as Men are to be trusted to do a Thing; on the doing of which depend whatever is valuable to them in this Life, or whatever they believe of another. I repeat no more of his Copy after Temple, it being only equal to that Author, in the worst Parts of his Writings, where they are affected and superficial.

The Vote for the last Address was so distasteful, and indeed disgraceful to the Court, that the Earl of Danby must'r'd his whole Army of Pensioners, to form a Majority on their Side; but he cou'd not accomplish it, tho' in an Opinion that he had, he got the King to send a Message, desiring an additional Revenue of 300,000 Pounds a Year, during Life. This set the House in a Flame. It was said, Here's no Demand for a War, but for a Revenue, which would furnish the King so well, that there would be no more need of Parliaments. The Court Party thought such a Gift as this would make them useless, so the Matter was rejected without a Division. The Lord Treasurer was much censur'd for this rash Attempt, which too bare-facedly discover'd the Designs of the Court.

Bishop Burnet informs us, that he at the same time order'd Mr. Montagu to treat with the Court of France for a Peace, in case they would engage to pay the King 300,000 Pounds a Year for three Years; which when it came afterwards to be known, was generally believ'd to be a Design to keep up and model the Army now rais'd. The King reckon'd there would be Money enough to pay them, till the Nation shou'd be brought under a military Government; which was the Intention of the Court, and fully proves the Conspiracy of the Stuartine Princes against the British Constitution. It is confess'd by Jonathan Swift, D. D. who among ten thousand Scandals published by him in his Tales of Tubs, Gullivers, Proserpina, &c. has given the World one Piece of Secret History, for which they are much oblig'd to him; for it will teach them as much in Politicks, as his Tale of a Tub will corrupt them in Conscience. It is quoted by Eckard himself: "Swift acquaints us that France, in order to break the Force of the Confederates, and elude all just Conditions of a general Peace, resolv'd by any means to enter into separate Measures with Holland; to which End it was absolutely necessary to engage the good Offices of the King of England, who was look'd upon as the Master of the Peace whenever he pleas'd (and so any Monarch of a Princely Genius would have been in his Circumstances) "The Bargain was struck for three or four hundred thousand Pounds, What a Royal House we had! But when all was agreed, Monsieur Barillon, the French Ambassador, told the King, that he had Orders from his Master, before Payment, to add a private Article, by which his Majesty shou'd be engag'd never to keep above 8000 Men of standing Troops in his three Kingdoms. This unexpected Proposal put the King in a Rage; and made him say, Gods-fish, Does my Brother of France think to serve me thus? Are all his Promises to make me absolute Master of my Parliaments come to this? Or does he think that a Thing to be done with 8000 Men?" There's the Proof; Jonathan Swift, Dean of St. Patrick's, gives Evidence, that King Charles II. was in a Secret League with King Lewis XIV. to enslave the three Free Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

Sir William Temple, to whom Swift was Chaplain, tells us, that the Prince of Orange having sent Van Lerwen over to England, to fit into the Intentions of our Court, by which the States would be determin'd as to Peace or War. The Hollander told him, that notwithstanding the general Disposition to Peace in Holland, yet if the King would immediately declare the War, he believ'd the States would pursue it, and put a stop to the Treaty of Peace. Sir William Temple told the King of it, but the Opportunity was lost. He shou'd have taken hold of it on the Return of the Lord Duras from France, before the Parliament had conceiv'd such a Jealousy of his Conduct. His Majesty saw his Time was slip'd; but the Turn he gave it, was, Since the Dutch will have a Peace upon the French Terms, and France offers Money for my Consent to what I can't help, I don't know why I shou'd not get the Money. Sir William Temple, and Archdeacon Eckard, thinks this a witty Turn. I don't see any Appearance of Wit, but a Certainty of something else, for which I have a Name if I durst speak it. He cou'd help the Peace if he would, Van Lerwen declar'd, The States would still go on with the War, if he would immediately enter into it; that would have help'd it. Indeed, there's generally thought to be a great deal of Wit in getting Money, and in that Sense the Turn was extremely witty. But when the Matter was blown, as it was not long after, the Lord Treasurer became the most hated Minister that had ever been about the King. All People said now, they saw the Secret of that high Favour he had been in, and the black Design he was contriving. At this Time Expresses went very frequently between England and France, and the State of Foreign Affairs vary'd every Post; so that it was visible we were in a Secret Negotiation. Mr. Montagu, who was a Man of Pleasure, had an Intrigue with the Dutches of Cleveland, who was quite cast off by the King, and was then at Paris. His Majesty had order'd him to find out an Astrologer, of whom he had a good Opinion, for he had long before his Restoration foretold he shou'd enter London on the 29th of May: He was yet living, and Mr. Montagu found him out. He saw he was capable of being corrupted, so he resolv'd to prompt him to send the King such Hints as would serve his own Ends; but he was so bewitch'd with the Dutches of Cleveland, that he trusted her with the Secret; and she growing jealous of a new Amour, took all the Ways she cou'd think of to ruin him, reserving this of the Astrologer for her last Shift, by which she compass'd her Ends: For Mr. Montagu was entirely lost upon it with the King, and coming over with-

A.D. 1678 out being recall'd, the Earl of Sunderland was sent Ambassador in his room.

All this while the Treaty went on at Nimeguen, Sir William Temple and Sir Lionel Jenkins being the English Plenipotentiaries there, and Mr. Hyde and Mr. Godolphin manag'd at the Hague. The States were resolv'd to have a Peace, which the Prince of Orange did all he cou'd to hinder. De Wit's Party began to get Strength again, and infus'd a Jealousy in all People, that the Prince intended to keep up the War for his own Ends. A Peace might be now had, by restoring all that belong'd to the States, and by a tolerable Barrier in Flanders. 'Tis true, the great Difficulty was concerning their Allies, the King of Denmark, and Elector of Brandenburgh, who had fallen on the Swede, and beaten him out of Germany, upon that King's declaring for France. No Peace cou'd be had unless the Swede was restor'd: The Princes, who had been quite exhausted by that War, wou'd not consent to this; but pres'd the States to stick by them, who had stuck so fast by the States in their Extremity. This was the Prince of Orange's constant Topick, How cou'd they expect any of their Allies wou'd adhere to them, if they now forsook such faithful Friends? But nothing cou'd prevent it. It was given out in Holland, that no Dependance cou'd be made on England, that Court being so entirely in a French Interest, that they expected they wou'd, as they had once done, sell them again to France. Which Report was believ'd to be spread by the French Ministers themselves, who, to come at their Ends, were apt enough to give up even those that sacrific'd every thing to them. It was said the Court of France wou'd consider both Denmark and Brandenburgh, and repay the Charge of the War against Sweden; which was thought to be a Design to force those Princes into a Dependance upon France, who wou'd not continue those Payments so much for past, as for future Services.

Orange beats Luxemburg
at Mons.

In the mean time the French had block'd up Mons, and the Prince of Orange march'd thither to drive them from their Posts. Luxemburg commanded the French Army, and seem'd to be in full Expectation of a Peace when the Prince came and attack'd him on the 14th of August; and notwithstanding the Advantage of his Situation, it appear'd how much the Dutch Army was now superior to the French, for they beat them out of several Entrenchments. The Prince had no Order to stop, but knew however that the Peace was just upon a Conclusion, though it had not been yet formally intimated to him; which made it lawful for him to take all Advantages, and he was not apprehensive of a new Embroilment, but rather wish'd it. The French Treasure was so exhausted, and their King so weary of the War, that no Notice was taken of the Business of Mons, where the Duke of Monmouth, who commanded a Body of 10,000 English, signaliz'd himself so much, that he acquir'd a great Character as a General and a Soldier. The Treaty of Nimeguen was concluded about the 20th of August, and ratify'd the 20th of September; but our Ambassadors Mediators had no better Part in it than that of Form and Title. The Ministers of the Confederates took no more Notice of them than they were forc'd to: New Difficulties arose after the Conclusion of the Treaty, upon the French King's refusing to evacuate Ghent, Aeth, Charleroy, Oudenard, Courtray, and Limburgh, the six Cities which were to be restor'd to Spain, till Restitution was made to Sweden of all that had been taken from her. Upon this the English struck in again, and even the Duke of Tork declar'd in the Foreign Committee,

Duke of Monmouth sig-

himself.

That it was plain by this Step, that France was not sincere in the Business of the Peace; that they aim'd at the Universal Monarchy, and none but the King cou'd hinder them from it, in the Posture that Christendom then stood. In this Disposition Sir William Temple, who had been sometime in England, was sent to Holland with Van Leven, and an Alliance was enter'd into with the Dutch, by a Treaty form'd in five or six Days; upon which the French evacuated the six Towns, and got Denmark and Brandenburgh into their Dependance, under Pretence of repaying the Charge of the War. A general Peace quickly follow'd, and there was no more Occasion for our Troops beyond Seas. The French was so apprehensive of them, that young Ruvigny, afterwards Earl of Galway, was sent over to England to get the Army disbanded: And the Force of Money was so strong, that he had Orders to offer six Millions of Livres, in case the Army was disbanded in August. Monsieur Ruvigny had such an ill Opinion of the Designs of our Court, if the Army was kept up, that he insist'd on fixing a Day for disbanding it; at which the Duke of Tork was very uneasy, and the Army not being disbanded at the Time prefix'd, the French King sav'd his Money. The Troops were brought into England, and kept up under Colour of wanting Money to pay them.

The French King's Money did not only pass in England about the Time of the Treaty of Nimeguen, it was current in Holland also; and tho' the Prince of Orange told Sir William Temple, He wou'd hinder the Peace as long as he cou'd, yet the Louvestein Party, and many of their principal Men, push'd hard for it, and the Clamour ran high against prolonging the War; for which Mr. Montagu, then the English Ambassador in France, gives us this Reason: The King of France is in very good Humour, upon the Assurances, I believe, he has of having such a Peace from the Dutch as he desires; which has been manag'd under-hand by great Presents to those that are not Well-wishers to the Prince of Orange. The Pensioner Fagel surpriz'd an original Letter from Mr. Louvois to Mr. D'Estrades, in which he bids him tell those of his Correspondents in Holland, from whence the late Advices came, That in case they gave him no better, he wou'd certainly stop their Pensions; and he had daily good Advices thence. His Emisaries insinuated to the People of the United Provinces, that since the Prince of Orange's Marriage, the King and Duke had drawn over the Prince to the Interest of France; and that there was a private Understanding between them, to the Danger of the Liberties of Holland, which at length had the Effect they desir'd. It made the Dutch jealous of the Prince, destroy'd the Confidence in him which he deserv'd, and prepar'd the Way for the Dutch to comply with the hard Terms impos'd upon them and their Confederates in the Treaty of Nimeguen. The Prince did all he cou'd, without making a Breach in the Constitution, to oppose that Peace; but as a very good Author informs us, The Conduct of King Charles had spread such a Humour and Diffidence in the States, that it was not to be avoided. Their Allies loudly exclaim'd at the arbitrary Terms to which they were, as it were, commanded to submit by LEWIS XIV. as a Conqueror. They cry'd out they were abandon'd and betray'd into so fatal a Conjunction. Their Complaints avail'd no more than the Parliament's Addresses; the Peace was concluded, and France gain'd her Ends. Thus, says the same Author, in six Months time it cost the Kingdom a Million to procure such a Peace with Hol-

A.D. 1678 as the French desir'd; and such was the End of the fatal War begun by England and France, against the Dutch and their Confederates, in 1672, by which the FRENCH King dissolv'd the Confederacy against him, extended his Dominions, seiz'd on great Tracts of Land, had Time given him to refresh his Troops, and maintain great Part of them by his Conquests, to make a very considerable Addition to his Fleet, to settle a better Oeconomy in his Finances, and replenish it with Treasure; the deplorable Effects of all which we have groan'd under ever since.

All Europe saw plainly that the King of England acted only as he was directed by the Counsels of France, and his Ambassadors at Nimeguen were look'd on rather as Ambassadors from an Ally. Sir William Temple was honest, and would gladly have serv'd the Confederates if he cou'd. Sir Lionel Jenkins every one knew to be a Court Tool, of mean Parts, with much Pedantry, and good Staunch Principles of Religion and Government. There was an Account of the Treaty of Nimeguen written in French, by Monsieur d'Avaux's Secretary, in which the two British Ministers are thus spoken of: Sir William Temple, says the French-man, was too much a Friend to the Allies, and too little a Friend to us; nay, he cou'd not be brought to consent to some things in our Favour, which the King his Master had allow'd him to do; but Sir Lionel Jenkins was a good Mediator.

Papish Plot.

Having dispatch'd Foreign Affairs, we must review those of England, where we are on the Brink of a Discovery which struck the three Kingdoms with Terror and Amazement. The Papists had been all this while branching out Coleman's general Conspiracy, and several Agents had receiv'd Instructions as to several Parts of it; but before any Particulars were known, they buzz'd

Sham Plot about, that the Dissenters were plotting against the Government, and the Presbyterians, who brought in the King, were going to turn him out again. John Claypole, Esq; of Northamptonshire, a Gentleman of a most mild, peaceable Disposition, was pitch'd upon to be the Head of this Plot. He was accordingly apprehended, and hurry'd

Mr. Claypole imprisoned. away to the Tower in June. His great Crime, in Appearance, being his having marry'd one of Oliver's Daughters, and the King, as we have remember'd, wou'd very gladly have marry'd another, if he cou'd have recover'd his Crown by it. Mr. Claypole had an Habeas Corpus to the King's Bench, and was brought up in order to be bail'd, and produc'd Persons of Worth to bail him; but Scroggs, lately made Chief Justice for that and other such Jobs, set the Penalty of the Bail so high, that those Persons excus'd themselves, and Mr. Claypole was remanded to the Tower. But the Term after, when the Conspiracy against the Government appear'd to be the Design of the Papists, he was let go, and no further Enquiry was made on whose, or on what Evidence he was committed.

Suddenly discharg'd.

I am far from being visionary, or over credulous: I cou'd as soon believe the Story of Mahomet and his Pigeon, as Echard's Tale of Oliver Cromwel and the Devil. I do not think we are justify'd in imputing to the First Cause, what Second Causes may very naturally produce, which makes me very cautious in interpreting common Incidents as Judgments. I am not over fond of conjecturing as to the Springs and Wheels that move the State-Machine, and all Political Events, but I don't think 'tis wild guessing to suspect that this Fanatical Plot was inventing, in order to throw the Popish Plot upon the Fanatics, if it had been put in Execution. For in the Gunpowder Plot, there was such a devilish Design, and another Northamptonshire Gentleman, Mr. Pickering, a noted Puritan, was pitch'd upon to be the Head of, as is elsewhere mention'd.

A.D. 1678

In the mean time the Parliament met, on the 23d of May, and his Majesty, in a short Speech, desir'd them to raise Money for maintaining or disbanding the Army, and gave them a Caution against tacking together several Matters in one Bill. Echard tells us, that the Lord Chancellor made a long Speech again; and truly a long one it was, and it had been well if that had been its only Fault: The Flattery is so fulsome, that there is nothing like it in the Harangues of the French Academicians on their Grand Monarch, who, however, had the Superficies of a Hero, and that's enough for Flatterers. The English Nation were now in the lowest Degree of Reputation and Interest Abroad; the People at Home, unless we except the persecuting Prelates, their Justices and Informers, were in the greatest Anxiety, through their Fears of a French Government and Religion. Yet does the Lord Chancellor call upon the three Kingdoms, with all the Pomp of puffy Eloquence, to shew a Time, if they can, since the Lord World began, and these Islands were first inhabited (The Phrase is, Since this Nation was first inhabited, which bordering upon Nonsense, I made bold to correct; to inhabit a Nation, being in my humble Conception not so good as to inhabit an Island) Let them shew the Time, says his Lordship, when there were fewer Grievances, or less Cause of Complaint, than at this present Time: Nay, let them search all Ages and Places, and tell us when and where there was ever found a happier People than we are at this Day, having the Purse and Seal in our Possession. He added something about the Money, and against the Tack; he then bids them Embellish the History of this Parliament, which had several Embellishments in his Predecessor Clarendon's Time.

The Peace was not then concluded at Nimeguen, and the Commons resolv'd to support the King, if he wou'd enter into a War with France; if not, to provide for the speedy disbanding of the Army, which they voted the next Day, and on the 4th of June pass'd a Vote for 200,000 Pounds, for disbanding the Army by the End of this present June, and 200,000 Pounds for the Expence of the Fleet. They continu'd the Time of Disbanding till the latter End of July, and the King in a second Speech, June the 18th, having told them that if they desir'd he shou'd live in Quiet, they must add 300,000 Pounds a Year for Life to his Revenue, they gave a total Denial to it. Upon a Motion to give the King a Compensation for what Customs he lost by the Act of Prohibition, it pass'd also in the Negative. Year 145, Noes 202. On the 15th of July, his Majesty coming to the House, pass'd the Supply Bill, amounting to 619,000 Pounds, for disbanding the Army, for the Fleet, and Algiers, with which Government the King had been almost in continual War, these Pyrates having lost the Terror they had of the English Maritime Power in the Time of Blake; and several other Bills, particularly the Act for burying in Woollen. Then the Lord Chancellor prorogu'd the Parliament to the first of August, but they met not till the 21st of October.

It was happy for England that the Papists were under Infatuation, blinded by Bigotry and Rage, which stirr'd them up to commit a most horrid Murder on the Person of Sir Edmundbury God-frey, Brother and Uncle to Messieurs Godfrey, late mundbu-Merchants in London, and a zealous Justice of the Peace against Papists, within the Liberties of Westminister; dar'd.

A.D. 1678 Westminster; for this bloody Attempt of theirs breaking out about the Time of the Discovery of the Popish Plot, very much confirm'd People in the Belief of that damnable Conspiracy. Eckard, who has carefully study'd the most lying Libeller that ever wrote, Roger L'Estrange, endeavours in several Places of his History, to ridicule, though very aukardly, not only the Popish Plot, but the Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, whom he calls that melancholly Gentleman, to intimate, that in his Melancholly he stabb'd himself. I will take the Liberty with L'Estrange which his Character justifies; There's no Decency towards a Villain, that had a hundred times deserv'd the Gallows, which he was condemn'd to thirty Years before. The Lord L - - - in a Speech in the House of Peers, gives a lively Picture of this Scribler; who, without the least Knowledge of the Strength, Purity, and Elegance of Stile, was cry'd up, at our two famous Universities, as a Master of the English Tongue. He publish'd a Heap of Libels and Lampoons to rail away the Popish Plot, and Sir Edmundbury Godfrey's Murder, in Language which wou'd be a Shame to our Markets; and his Lordship takes this Notice of him.

Lord L - - - I wou'd not have so much as a Popish Man nor a Popish Woman to remain here, nor so much as a Popish Dog nor a Popish Bitch, nor so much as a Popish Cat that shou'd pur or mew about the King. We are in a Labyrinth of Evils, and must carefully endeavour to get out of them; and the greatest Dangers of all amongst us, are concerning Protestants; who notwithstanding the many Evidences of the Plot, have been industrious to revile the King's Witnesses; and such a one is ROGER L'ESTRANGE, who now disappears, being one of the greatest VILLAINS upon Earth, a ROGUE beyond my Skill to delineate; who has been the Bugbear of the Protestant Religion, and traduc'd the King and Kingdom's Evidences by his notorious Scribbling Writings, and has endeavour'd, as much as in him lay, to eclipse the Glory of the English Nation. He is a dangerous rank Papist, prov'd by good and substantial Evidence; for which, since he has walk'd under another Disguise, he deserves of all Men to be HANG'D, and I believe I shall live to see that be his Fate. He has scandaliz'd several of the Nobility, and detracted from the Rights of his Majesty's great Council, the Parliament: He is now fled from Justice, by which he confesses the Charge against him, and that shews him to be guilty. This wretched Fellow was made a Justice of Peace, to persecute Protestant Dissenters with his Power as well as with his Pen. He was afterwards dubb'd, and one of King James's House of Commons, whom Eckard so highly honours for their great Fortunes and Virtues. From his Invectives does that Historian take his Ribaldry against the Discovery of the Popish Plot, as will be observ'd in the Sequel.

Dr. Tongue the first Evidence of the Plot. Bishop Burnet informs us, that Dr. Tongue, a Clergy-man of the Church of England, brought the first Information of the Plot to him, on the 26th of September, and that he had always look'd upon him as a sincere Man. Now let us see how he is characteris'd by Eckard, to discredit the Conspiracy he was about to discover. He had a Prollick Brain, was of a restless humourous Temper, full of Variety of Projects, and scarce ever without a Pen in his Hand, and a Plot in his Head. The Wickedness of the Infination is thus continu'd: He seem'd to entertain Titus Oates out of Charity, who then went by the Name of Ambrose; and complaining that he knew not where to get Bread, the Doctor took him to his House, gave him Cloaths, Lodging, and Diet, and told him he wou'd put him in a Way. Thus does he very honestly introduce his Discovery of the Plot, as if it was a Contrivance of Dr. Tongue's, who put Oates upon forming one out of his Conversation with Papists at St. Omers, and in London. For Oates, who had his Education in the same University with Archdeacon Eckard, and got a Living in Sussex, turn'd Papist, and was initiated into the Romish idolatrous Mysteries at Salamanca in Spain, and St. Omer in Flanders; but his Father having been an Anabaptist Teacher, afterwards Parson of Hastings in Sussex, was the chief Reason that some did not give Credit to his Son's Evidence. I knew Oates, he was dull enough, and as impudent as dull, no more capable of forming the Plot, even as Eckard has copied it, than of writing Paradise Lost. The Design in general was by Fire and Sword, when all other Means fail'd, to subvert the establish'd Government and Religion of these Kingdoms, and introduce Popery. The Pope, in a Congregation de Propaganda Fide, consisting of above three hundred Persons, held about December, 1677, declar'd the King of England's Dominions to be Part of St. Peter's Patrimony, as forfeited to the Holy See for Heresy, and so to be dispos'd of as he shou'd think fit. Cardinal Howard, nominal Archbishop of Canterbury, was accordingly appointed Legate of England, to take Possession of it in the Pope's Name; he was also to have 40,000 Crowns a Year Augmentation, for the Maintenance of his Legatine Authority.

Perrot was made Archbishop of York; Corker, Bishop of London; Whitebread, Bishop of Winchester; Strange, Bishop of Durham; Godden, Bishop of Salisbury; Napper, Bishop of Norwich; Lord Arundel of Wardour, Lord Chancellor of England; Lord Powis, Lord Treasurer; Sir William Godolphin, Lord Privy-Seal; Edward Coleman, Esq; Secretary of State; Lord Bellasis, General of the Army; John Lambert, Esq; Adjutant-General; Richard Langhorn, Esq; Advocate-General.

The Lay-Officers had all Commissions sent them ready seal'd by Johannes Paulus de Oliva, Father-General of the Jesuit's Society residing at Rome, who was to give Directions to the Provincial of the Jesuits at London, how to proceed in this Affair. Pedro de Jeronimo de Corduba, Provincial of the Jesuits in Spain, was to assist with Counsel and Money, and misrepresent the Actions of his Britannick Majesty to the Spanish Court; which likewise was to be done by a Jesuit, Confessor to the Emperor, in relation to England and that Court. The Correspondence for France was carry'd on between Coleman and Father Terriers first, and afterwards Father La Chaise, Confessor to the French King. And that the Duke of York approv'd of, and even authoris'd that Correspondence for destroying our Religion and Liberties, appears by his own Letter to La Chaise, beginning thus. The 24 of June last past, 1674, his most Christian Majesty offer'd me most generously his Friendship, and the use of his Purse, against the Designs of my Enemies and his, and protested to me that his Interest and mine were so closely link'd together, that those that oppos'd the one shou'd be look'd upon as Enemies to the other; and told me, it was his Opinion that that Parliament was neither in his Interest nor mine, &c. He refer'd himself for further Explanations to Sir William Throgmorton, who was sent to France on purpose, and to Coleman.

The Conspirators having their several Parts allotted them, Grove and Pickering were to shoot the King; Coniers and Anderton, two Monks, and four Irish Russians, to stab him; Sir George Wakeman, King.

Oates's Birth and Education.

Popish Bishop of Salisbury; Shops in England.

Popish Lords and Gentlemen in the Plot.

The Duke of York in it.

Grove and Pickering to shoot the King.

A.D. 1678 Wakeman, the Queen's Physician, to poison him; for it does not appear that the general Rising was to be till after they had made away with the King, who, tho' a Papist, and their own, yet he had too little Religion to hazard his Crown, or even his Pleasures, by hastening on their Work, as they wou'd have had him. 5000 Pounds were enter'd in their Books as paid to Wakeman in part of 15,000 Pounds which he was to have for poisoning the King. They were to make use of the Duke's Name and Interest, if he wou'd comply with these Conditions. "1. To accept of the three Kingdoms as a Gift from the Pope, and hold them in Fee of him, and confirm their Settlement of the Church and State. Next, if he wou'd exterminate all Protestants, if he wou'd pardon the Murderers of his Brother, the Murderers of his People, and those who shou'd fire the remaining Part of the City and Suburbs. "2. For that was the second Particular of their Work, to fire London and Westminster, and the adjacent Places, as also other the chief Cities and Towns of England immediately on the Killing of his Majesty, and then lay the whole Load both of the Murder and Firing on the Presbyterians and Fanaticks, thereby provoking the Episcopal Men to join with them and cut them off, that so Protestants being weaken'd by their own Feuds, they might have the better Opportunity and easier Task to subdue them all. "3. By a general Massacre; to which Purpose they are said to have form'd an Army, consisting of 50,000 Men, to be rais'd about London, the Officers all resolute Papists, and for the most part French and Irish. These they gave out were enough to cut the Throats of 100,000 Protestants, especially being taken upon a Surprize, when the Militia of London were unprovided and undisciplin'd, and the Country generally disarm'd. The Conspirators were besides to have 10,000 French Soldiers from Flanders, and 30,000 Pilgrims and Lay-Brothers from Spain, to assist them. 4. In Ireland the Pope had made Talkos, the Titular Archbishop of Dublin, his Legate, to take Possession for him of that Kingdom, whose Brother was to be General of all the Forces there, consisting of 70,000 Papists, besides the French Auxiliaries. There it was to be carry'd on by a general Rebellion and Massacre of the Protestants, as in 1641, which they call'd Demonstrating of their Zeal for the Catholick Faith. Four Jesuits undertook to assassinate the Duke of Ormond, and the better to carry on the whole, the Pope was to contribute 800,000 Crowns; and the French had privately sent over some Supplies of Men and Arms, and were to furnish them with more as soon as they shou'd be in Action, La Chaise having a great Influence in promoting all these Transactions. Such, says Echard, was the Sum and Substance of this formidable Plot, of which all these, with many other Particulars, were formally and solemnly given in upon Oath, not at once, or all together, but at several Times, and by several Parcels, who seem'd to start up exactly as the Stories met with Credit and Encouragement, and by their Oaths and Narratives for a while bore down all Opposition. Now comes the wise Reflections of this Wise One, spoken with an Air, as if it had been his own, and not borrow'd from L'Estrange, or the scandalous Writer of the Compendium. And yet after all the strictest and coolest Examinations, and after a full Length of Time, the Government could find very little Foundation to support so vast a Fabrick, besides downright Swearing and Assurance. Now he imitates their wretched Railery, and hooks in the Gunpowder Plot, to take its Share of his vile Mirth; not a Gun, not a Sword, not a Dagger, not a Flash of Powder, or a Dark-Lanthorn, to effect the strange Villainy, and, excepting Coleman's Writing, not one Snip of an original Letter or Commission.

The King, who knew what a good Friend he had been to Popery, was not easily brought to take any Notice of this Popish Plot. Bishop Burnet tells us, Dr. Tongue came to him the 26th of September, and told him of strange Designs against the King's Person; which he acquainted Dr. Lloyd, afterwards Bishop Lloyd with. The latter going to the Secretary's Office, found Tongue had been there making Discoveries; and on the 27th of September, Titus Oates was brought before the Council, having first sworn to his Narrative of the Plot before Sir Edmundbury Godfrey. Kirby, a Chymist in the King's Laboratory, had been long acquainted with Tongue, as Tongue had been with Oates, and by Kirby's Means Tongue had Audience of the King himself, to whom he repeated most of the Passages above-mention'd. His Majesty said, he knew not what to make of it. However, he referr'd him to the Earl of Danby, who, according to my Lord of Sarum, handled the Matter too remissly. And the King himself, when all the Town was in a terrible Alarm at the Rumour of a Popish Plot, heeded it so little, that he went to the Horse-Races at Newmarket. Oates deliver'd his Narrative to the Council, most of whom believ'd his Evidence so far, as to issue Warrants for apprehending several Plotters nam'd by him, as Sir George Wakeman, the Queen's Physician; Mr. Edward Coleman, Secretary to the Duke of York; Mr. Langborn, of the Inner-Temple; Thomas Whitebread, Provincial of the Jesuits in England; John Gaven, William Ireland, Anthony Turner, William Marshall, William Rumsley, James Corker, Thomas Pickering. I know not upon what Humour it was, that Bishop Burnet makes Slight of this Plot; but I can never think he had any Reason for it, by Oates's calling Father La Chaise Father le Shee, in his Testimony concerning Coleman's treasonable Correspondence with the French King's Confessor, the Mistake being very easy. Oates was a passionate, rash, half-witted Fellow, and his want of Judgment might run him a little too far into Particulars. But that there was a treasonable Plot in general, &c. that the Persons he accus'd were particularly engag'd in it, there is no Room to question. Oates, at the Opening of the Plot, referr'd himself to Coleman's Letters, which sufficiently prov'd that he knew there were such Letters, and Treason in them. The Court cou'd not help enquiring into this, but proceeded so slowly in it, that Coleman had Time enough to convey away all his Papers relating to the last two Years, when the Conspiracy was branching and ripening. But his Servant Boatman being examin'd, depos'd, That he saw Coleman's Book of Entries for the two last Years but two Days before he was made Prisoner, and that he had usually Letters every Post from beyond Sea. However, the Letters that were found, the Contents of which are in the preceding Pages, are sufficient to prove him a Traitor, and to confirm one in an entire Belief of the Plot; and my Lord of Sarum observes, they gain'd Universal Credit. At the same Time a Packet of dangerous Letters were directed to Father Bedingsfield, the Duke's Confessor at Windsor, which fully corroborated the traitorous Designs discover'd by Oates; but they were suspected not to have been genuine by Bedingsfield's shewing them himself, and declaring he knew not what they meant, nor whom they came from.

Sir Edmund-bury Godfrey murder'd by Papists.

Duke of Norfolk suspected.

The Body found.

Titus Oates going to Sir Edmund-bury Godfrey to make Oath to his Narrative before he gave it to the Council, was a Diffidence of them, that they wou'd not prosecute it, and Sir Edmund was chid for meddling in the Matter, which so irritated the Papists and Conspirators, that they resolv'd to destroy him. Bishop Burnet says, 'Tis certain Godfrey grew apprehensive; for meeting me in the Street after some Discourse of the present State of Affairs, he said, I believe my self shall be knock'd on the Head: Yet he took no Care of himself, and went about according to his own Maxim still without a Servant; for he us'd to say, the Servants in London are corrupted by the Illness and ill Company they fall into while they attend on their Masters. Saturday the 12th of October, Sir Edmund-bury Godfrey went abroad in the Morning, and was seen about One o'Clock near St. Clement's Church in the Strand, but was never seen any more. The execrable L'Estrange has endeavour'd to render the Death of Sir Edmund-bury Godfrey a Self-Murder, and collected some Lies injurious to that Gentleman's Character. One cou'd not expect better from a mercenary Scribler. But it is not excusable in the Archdeacon to tell us, that Sir Edmund was a Favourer of the Papists; whereas Bishop Burnet assures us, He was a zealous Protestant, and had kind Thoughts of the Dissenters. He was a punctual Man in all his Ways, and therefore it was the more taken Notice of when he was missing. The Council sat upon it, and were going to order a Search of all the Houses about Town, but were diverted from it by many Stories that were brought them by the Duke of Norfolk. Sometimes it was said he was indecently marry'd, and the Scene of the Places where it was reported to be, was often shifted, and the last Place he was seen at, being near Arundel-House, it brought the Duke under Suspicion; At length, on Thursday the 17th of October, 'twas given out that his Body was found in a Ditch near Pancras Church, with his Sword thrust through it; but no Blood was on his Cloaths, or about him. His Shoes were clean, his Money was in his Pocket, but nothing was about his Neck, and a Mark an Inch broad was all round it, which shew'd he was strangled. His Breast also was mark'd all over with Bruises, and his Neck broken. A Melancholy Man, as Echard calls him, cou'd not do all this to himself. Dr. Lloyd, Dr. Burnet, late Bishops of Salisbury and Worcester, saw the Body, and what follows of their Evidence gives one more than Suspicion that Priests were concern'd in the Murder. There were many Drops of White Wax Lights on his Breeches, which he never us'd in his House; and since only Persons of Quality or Priests use those Lights, this made all People conclude in whose Hands he must have been. 'Twas visible he was first strangled, then carry'd to that Place. The King was easily made believe that he was Hypochondriacal, and had stab'd himself; upon which Dr. Lloyd went and told him what he had seen. Nothing in the World cou'd have happen'd to give so much Credit to the Popish Plot as this horrid Murder of a worthy Magistrate, just as it was discover'd. Coke gives a pretty good Account of Sir Edmund-bury's Assassination.

Some Time before it Le Faire, Pritchard, and two or three Priests more, treated with one Bedloe to be assisting in the taking him off. Bedloe promis'd to do it for a Sum of Money, but relenting, afterwards fail'd them, and came not at the Time appointed. Two Days after, October the 4th, he met Le Faire in Red-Lion-Court, and he charg'd him with being worse than his Word. Bedloe made some Excuses, and Le Faire seem'd to be satisfy'd, Bedloe promising to meet Le Faire at Somerset-House at 9 o'Clock that Night, where the Priest told him Sir Edmund was kill'd, and if he wou'd help carry him off, he shou'd still have a good Part of the Sum agreed upon. Bedloe demanded to see the Body, which he did, and then they consulted how to dispose of it. Bedloe advis'd the sinking it in the River with Weights; and while they were talking about it Prance comes in. He was a Silver-Smith, who work'd for the Priests in Somerset-House, and assisted at the Murder of Sir Edmund-bury Godfrey. His Neighbours observing he had absented himself from his House about the Time of the Assassination, represented it to some Members of Parliament as Matter of Suspicion, upon which he was order'd to be seiz'd; and brought before the House of Commons, who order'd Sir Richard Everard and Sir Charles Harbord to examine him.

In the mean while Bedloe goes to Bristol, in order to ship himself for Ireland; but whether he was really troubled in Conscience for concealing the Murder, or was set upon it in Hopes of a Reward for the Discovery, he surrender'd himself as an Evidence to the Mayor of Bristol, John Lloyd, Esq; who sent him to London, where he was carry'd before a Committee of the House of Lords to be examin'd. He there found Prance in the Lobby, whom he had never seen before, but at Somerset-House, and that by Candle-Light, and in a Wig, yet he knew him at Sight, and discover'd him, and upon Search the Wig was found about him; so Prance made a full Discovery of the Murder. And as Prance and Bedloe did not act in Concert, or indeed know one another, the Evidence is as clear as plain Truth can make it, tho' L'Estrange and Echard have very impotently endeavour'd to disguise it with Grimace and Ridicule. The Murderers were Le Faire, Pritchard, Kelly and Fitzgerald, Popish Priests, Berry the Porter at Somerset-House, Green, Cushion-Man to the Queen's Chappel, Lawrence Hill, Servant to Dr. Godden, Treasurer of the Chappel, Father Lewson, Vernattis, &c. Notwithstanding that, by the Evidence of two Bishops it is prov'd, that Sir Edmund-bury Godfrey was strangled, and that Bedloe's Evidence is the strongest Confirmation of Prance's, how awkward and shocking is the Archdeacon's poor Pretences to Wit, which is however borrow'd from other Pretenders! It was found exceeding useful to tack the Murder to the Plot, and make one a Part, or rather a Support of the other. They pitch'd upon Somerset-House, and add'd at last to that as a Popish Palace, tho' two Miles from that where the Body was found. Suppose it had been ten Miles, when they had got the Body out of Town, they might drop it where they pleas'd, and think it safer two Miles off than two Quarters of a Mile. His whole Representation is one continu'd Falshood, darded with dull Jest not his own, for they wou'd then have been duller still. I do not see the least Reason in the World to doubt his being murder'd, and by Priests, or Persons who trade in Wax-Lights; or that the Murderers were not the same whom Bedloe and Prance charg'd with it.

In the midst of this Affright and Indignation the Parliament met the 21st of October. The King was hard put to it to tell what he had to say. He believ'd not a Word of the Plot, and the Generality of both Houses believ'd every Word of it. He own'd he had been inform'd of a Design against his Person by Jesuits, of which he shou'd forbear any Opinion, lest he might seem to say too much or too little. But it was hazarding too much to tell them, as he did after, The French had impos'd such a scandalous Peace on the Confederates with his Conniavnce, for which he had Money from France; That the Part he had in the Preservation of his Neighbourhood, and the well securing Flanders, was sufficiently known. The Lord Chancellor made another long Speech, and mention'd the Plot, but not in the Stile of the House of Commons, as we shall see presently. Mr. Archdeacon, as well as the common Writers, informs us, that the King wou'd not have had the Plot brought into Parliament, but the Lord Danby wou'd do it, and no doubt it was to ingratiate himself with the People, who had a kind of Abhorrence for him, that he laid Oates's Informations before the House of Peers the first Day of their Meeting. The King told him, Tho' you do not believe it, you shall find you have given the Parliament a Handle to ruin your self, as well as to disturb all my Affairs, and that you will live to repent it. The Politicks of which are to me incomprehensible. He gave them no Handle to ruin him by laying the Popish Plot before them; the Handle was his chaffering with France for Money, to engage the King to abandon the Confederates. He might indeed repent afterwards of what he had done to make the Papists his Enemies, when he found that he cou'd not make the Protestants his Friends. Eckhard takes a great deal of Pains to prove that the King did not believe the Plot. I am apt to believe he durst not believe it, and that the Papists knew too much of him for him to quarrel with them. But I have better Authority to be confirm'd in the Belief of it, than the King had to be confirm'd in the Disbelief, upon a Tavern Contest between Oates and Tongue about the Merit of the Discovery. My Authority is that of Archbishop Tillotson, who had it from Langhorn's Wife, as zealous a Protestant as her Husband was a Papist, that before Oates had spoken a Word of Commissions, or had accus'd her Husband, she engag'd her Son, a hot, indiscreet Papist in Discourse, on the Designs of the Catholics; he said, they were so well laid, it was impossible they cou'd miscarry, and that his Father wou'd be one of the greatest Men in England, for he had seen a Commission from the Pope constituting him Advocate General: The very Commission mention'd for Langhorn in Oates's Narrative. However, there are still two other Evidences in Bishop Burnet's Memoirs, two Snips of Paper, though the Archdeacon protests there was not one to corroborate Oates's Testimony. "Amongst the Papers of the Jesuits that were seiz'd on when they were clapp'd up, two Letters were found, which seem'd to confirm all; one from Rome, which mention'd the sending over the Patents, of which 'twas said in the Letter, that they guess'd the Contents, tho' their Patrons there carry'd their Matters so secretly, that nothing was known but as they thought fit. Another Letter was written to a Jesuit in the Country, citing him to come to London by the 24th of April, which was the Day on which Oates wrote they held their Consult, and that fifty of them had sign'd the Resolution of killing the King, which was to be executed by Grove and Pickering. In the End of that Letter it was added, I need not enjoin Secrecy, for the Nature of the Thing requires it.

Before any of the Conspirators for the Plot came to Trial, one Staley, a Goldsmith in Covent-Garden, was taken on an Information given against him by Cartairs a Scots-man, who came to London to accuse Duke Lauderdale of Male-Administration in Scotland. Staley being at a Publick-House in his Neighbourhood, and Cartairs in another Room of the same House, he made Oath that he heard Staley say in French, The King is a Rogue, and persecutes the People of God, and he himself would stab him if no body else would. Which Information happening about the Time of Bedloe's coming in with his Evidence, continu'd the Ferment the Nation was in against the Papists. Tongue, Oates and Bedloe were lodg'd and liberally maintain'd at the publick Charge, and Guards order'd to attend them for the Security of their Persons. Both Houses petition'd the King for a Day of General Fast and Humiliation, to implore the Mercy and Protection of Almighty God to his Majesty's Royal Person, and in him to all his Loyal Subjects; and it was appointed by Proclamation, and celebrated the 13th of November. The next Address was for ordering all Papists to depart the Cities of London and Westminster, and Parts adjacent; another to forbid suspicious Persons the Court, and to set Guards of the Train'd-Bands in London, Westminster and Southwark.

On the 24th of October Oates's Examination was taken in the House of Peers by the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, who there seal'd twenty six Warrants against several Lords and others mention'd in that Examination. Upon which the Lord Powis, the Lord Stafford, the Lord Arundel of Wardour, the Lord Pette, the Lord Bellasis, and Sir Henry Tichburne were taken into Custody, and shortly after committed to the Tower, as were several others to Newgate; but the 31st of October the House of Commons

Resolv'd, Nemine contradicente,

That there is, and hath been a Damnable and Hellish Plot contriv'd and carry'd on by Popish Recusants, for Assassinating and Murdering the King, for subverting the Government, and Rooting out and Destroying the Protestant Religion.

To which Vote the Lords readily agreed, Nemine contradicente; but Eckhard, wiser than the Lords and Commons of England, cou'd, after his most serious Consideration, see no Foundation for it. The Lords desir'd the Commons to sit de Die in Diem, Forenoon and Afternoon, as their Lordships had resolv'd to do, to consider what is necessary for preventing imminent Dangers. And on the same Day the People were strangely affected with the Sight of the Funeral of Sir Edmundsbury Godfrey. The Solemnity proceeded from Bridewell to St. Martin's in the Fields. Seventy two London Divines went in Procession before the Corpse, and above a Thousand Persons of Quality and principal Citizens follow'd after it. Dr. Lloyd, afterwards Bishop of Worcester, preach'd the Funeral Sermon. It went very much against the Grain; but the general Disposition of the People oblig'd the King to issue out a Proclamation against the Papists, wherein he says, The Lords and Commons having taken into their serious Consideration the bloody and traitorous Designs of Popish Recusants against his Majesty's Sacred Person and Government, therefore he commanded them to depart &c.

Walter Herbert, Esq; Secretary to Prince Rupert, a Member of the House of Commons mov'd in this or the last Session of Parliament, for an Act to repeal the Statute de Hæretico comburendo. The House immediately order'd such a Bill to be brought in, and wonder'd that it had not been done before. It pass'd

Namius contradicente, and Herbert had the Thanks of the House: But it met with Opposition from the Bishops in the House of Lords, not one of them voting for it, except the very learned and reverend Dr. Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln.

The Lord Shaftsbury having upon his Submission got out of the Tower, was very active in the Prosecution of the Plot, so were the Dukes of Monmouth and Buckingham, the Lord Hallifax, the Earl of Essex, and the leading Members of both Houses. Many hard Things were said against the Duke of York. The Danger of his Succession was in every one's Mouth; but the Thought of Exclusion was not yet mature. The Commons debated an Address to send him away from Court; but it was not determin'd.

While Examinations were going on, and Preparations were making for the Trial of the Prisoners, a Bill was brought into the House of Commons, requiring all Members of either House, and all such as might come into the King's Court or Presence, to take a Test against Popery; in which not only Transubstantiation was renounc'd, but the Worship of the Virgin Mary and the Saints, as it was practis'd in the Church of Rome, was declar'd to be Idolatrous. This pass'd in the House of Commons without any Difficulty. But we are come now to a new Discovery, which is, that the persecuting Prelates, who pretended to be such good Churchmen, were really Romanists; for Gunning, Bishop of Ely, maintain'd, That the Church of Rome was not Idolatrous. Dr. Barlow, the very learned and reverend Bishop of Lincoln, answer'd him; and it has been the great Happiness of the Church of England, that she has never wanted learned and pious Bishops to assert the Reformation, when the Banerists, the Lauds, the Sheddens, the Morleys, the Wards, the Gunnings, the Meres, the Kens would have run her back to Popery. This is the Gunning who pretended to dispute with Mr. Baxter; but instead of Reason and Argument, made use of Insolence and Passion. Bishop Burnet says the Lords did not much mind him; and Echard assures us, that the Charge against him of favouring Popery was false and malicious. My Lord of Salisbury adds, Gunning declar'd he could not take the Test with a good Conscience; yet as soon as the Bill pass'd he took it in the Crown. Echard assures us he was a Man of exemplary Piety, and diffusive Charity, and a great deal more in the same Strain, which is as much his own Picture as Gunning's. The Duke got a Proviso to be put in the Bill for excepting himself: He spoke upon that Occasion with great Earnestness and Tears in his Eyes, saying, I am now to cast my self on your Favour in the greatest Concern I can have in this World, and I solemnly protest, that whatever my Religion may be, it shall only be a private Thing between God and my own Soul, and that no Effect of it shou'd ever appear in the Government. This too is a Prince of his Word; and to make it good as soon as 'twas in his Power, he made Popish Privy-Counsellors, Generals and Admirals, Judges, Heads and Fellows of Colleges, and put the Government into the Hands of Papists. He spoke much of his Duty to the King, and of his Zeal for the Nation, which he shew'd sufficiently in his Secret League with France. The Proviso was carry'd for him by a few Voices only. This Bill being sent back to the House of Commons with Alterations, they pass'd them, but not without great Difficulty; for Sir Jonathan Trelawny, and

Bishop
Gunning for Popery.

Mr. Ash being violently heated in the Debate, opprobrious Words pass'd between them, which provok'd the Knight so much, that he gave Mr. Ash a Box on the Ear, which Ash return'd with a Slap over the Face, and both put their Hands to their Swords. Upon which the House sent Trelawny to the Tower, and the Speaker, by their Order, reprimanded Ash. There was another Proviso to except nine Ladies about the Queen; and she said she would have all the Ladies of that Religion cast Lots who shou'd be comprehended: Only she nam'd the Dutchess of Portsmouth as one whom she would not expose to the Uncertainty of a Lot, which was not thought very decent in her.

On the 9th of November the King came to Parliament, and made a Speech to both Houses, wherein he assur'd them he would concur in any Bills for the Security of the Protestant Religion, which did not alter the Succession; for which the House of Commons thank'd him, and he thank'd them for their Thanks.

After this Echard tells us, the Credit of the Plot began to sink, and then he brings Bedloe on the Stage, himself speaking a Prologue for him to open his Character. A Fellow who went by a false Name, a Son of a Whore, a poor Foot-Boy (one of Lord Bellasis's Livery-Men) a Jail-Bird for his Villainy, a Letter-Carrier, skilful in all the Arts of Cheating, to get Watches, Coats, Horses, to bilk Vintners, a Liar, a Romancer, a wild Arab, who liv'd upon Prey, a notorious Impostor; in Sum, an admirable Second to help out Oates. The Stupidity of this Writer is equal to his Assurance: He could not see that L'Estrange and the Papists had scrap'd together as much Scandal as their lewd Inventions could produce, to bespatter the King's Evidences, and turn their Plot into a Sham, so he carefully disperses the Filth they had heap'd up; and drudges in the same Dunghil his Predecessor Roger L'Estrange had labour'd in before. Did these Men ever hear of Persons of Honour and Wisdom, who engag'd in Conspiracies to cut Throats, and destroy Religion and Government? How can you come at Villainy but by Villainy? and in the most wicked Conspiracies there are Degrees of Guilt in the Conspirators. Oates and Bedloe might be at first taken in, by accompanying themselves with the other Conspirators, and the Hopes of sharing their Fortunes; but being wicked Persons, and having not so much Zeal for Popery as the rest had upon finding themselves neglected, the Hopes of Reward and Revenge did very naturally lead them to make the most of what they knew; and as they could not counterfeit Coleman's Letters, nor the Jesuits Letters before-mention'd, nor Mrs. Langborn's Information, and all those Letters agreeing with their Evidence, besides a hundred other corroborating Circumstances in their several Trials, there is enough to satisfy any reasonable Man, that there was a Popish Plot, and that those Men who suffer'd for it, were engag'd in it so far as to deserve the Punishment they met with. Nothing is more foolish than the Objection these Libellers make to Oates's and Bedloe's Evidence, on account of their adding to it from Time to Time, as if in a hundred Consultations. In a hundred several Places many Passages might be forgotten, which they might upon Recollection recover, especially when the Memory is awaken'd by pertinent Interrogatories: But in short, it was the King's Interest, and the Interest of all Papists and their Abettors, to have this Plot disbeliev'd; for if full Credit was given to it, and it had been fully trac'd to

A.D. 1678 it's Original, the Affassination Part had probably been fasten'd on Particulars; but the general Design to alter our Religion and Government by the Assistance of the French King, wou'd, it is to be fear'd, have been found out very near the Throne, which confirm'd the Saying of a witty Courtier, That the King knew more of the Plot than any of his Evidences.

The King knew of it.

Upon Bedloe's Examination before the House of Lords, Warrants were issu'd for apprehending Comers, a Benedictine Monk, Le Faire, Simmonds, Waisb, Pritchard, and others, as Persons guilty of the DAMNABLE and HELLISH PLOT, the Terms made use of seriously by the Parliament, but by Echard with a Fleer, as if any thing could be more Hellish and Damnable than Application to the French King for Money to enable the Conspirators to subvert the Constitution, and destroy our Religion and Liberties; which, if the Duke of York's Letter to La Chaise does not fully prove, Coleman's Letter to that Jesuit does. Bedloe was exact in that Part of the Evidence relating to an Army from Spain under the Notion of Pilgrims, and the Parliament address'd the King to recall Sir William Godolphin, his Ambassador at Madrid, who was accus'd of High-Treason, and that a Commission might be issu'd to render the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to all the King's and the Duke's Servants, and all Persons of the Inns of Court. The House of Commons had address'd his Majesty for banishing Papists ten Miles from London; but the Proclamation coming out without any such Restriction, they presented another Address, wherein they say, That so great a Neglect would be a great Discouragement to this Kingdom, and Papists would from thence take Occasion to say, That all our Fears were groundless. It is too great a Countenance to the dangerous Factions, which are already come to that Height, that it renders all Manner of Discouragement on that Side necessary: It is against the Laws and Statutes of the Realm, which, as they are preserv'd and maintain'd by your Majesty's Authority, so we assure our selves, you will not suffer them to be thus violated by your Family and Royal Presence, upon the account of Popish Recusants. A few Days after, November the 18th, the House was inform'd, that there were several Commissions granted to Papists, and Warrants that they shou'd be muster'd, notwithstanding they had not taken the Oaths, and subscrib'd the Declaration, as the Statute enjoins. Here's dispensing Power and Popery with a Witness! These Commissions were counter-sign'd by Sir Joseph Williamson, Secretary of State, whom, as a Member of their House, they sent to the Tower. But the King sent for them to the Banqueting-House, where he told them, Tho' you have committed my Servant without acquainting me, yet I intend to deal more freely with you, and acquaint you with my Intentions to release my Secretary; which he did so hastily, that he was releas'd before the Commons cou'd get an Address against it drawn up and presented, and then the Answer was, It came too late.

Commons Address against Papists.

Dispensing Power and Popery.

Sir Joseph Williamson sent to the Tower.

On the 25th of November the King made another Speech to the Parliament, to desire a second Supply for Disbanding the Army, he having, as he said, spent the first in keeping it up for the Honour and Interest of the Nation, which had not been enough consider'd in this Reign to be a Topick to beg Money upon. The Parliament immediately address'd his Majesty to recall his Troops from Flanders, and to to disband all Forces rais'd since Michaelmas, A.D. 1678 1677.

A general Alarm.

The Nation was now so much alarm'd, that all People furnish'd themselves with Arms, which heighten'd the Jealousy of the Court. A Bill pass'd in both Houses, for raising all the Militia, and for keeping it together for six Weeks, a third Part being to serve a Fortnight, and so round. This Bill the King totally rejected, alledging, that it was to put the Militia out of his Power, which thing he wou'd not do, no not for an Hour; but if the Commons wou'd assist him with Money for that, he wou'd take Care to raise such a Part of the Militia as should secure the Peace of the Government, and his own Person. If Echard cou'd have found out a worse Libeller than L'Estrange to discredit this Plot, he wou'd have made use of him, as he does of the Jesuit Orleans, after whom he tells us, much Injustice was committed in the Prosecution of it. He then comes to the Trial of William Staley the Goldsmith, before spoken of, who was try'd before the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, the 21st of November; and Echard's own Account of it proves, that that Traitor had much Justice done him. The Witnesses, William Carstairs and Alexander Sutherland, positively swore the Words as spoken in this Manner. Staley was at an Eating-House in Convent-Garden, with one Fromante a French-man, who said in French, The King of England is a great Tormenter of the People of God. A Discourse very natural, when so many good Catholics were in Jail for Treason, Murder, &c. Staley answer'd, The King of England, furiously repeating the Words, is a grand Heretick, and the greatest Rogue in the World; here's the Heart, striking his Hand upon his Breast, and here's the Hand that will kill him myself. There was a third Witness, who swore he heard Staley speak something with great Earnestness, and Captain Carstairs told him at the Instant, that in English it was, He would kill the King. As slight as L'Estrange, Echard, and other Writers make of this Crime of Staley's, 'tis with me of the last Importance, for we shall find by the Blunders in Staley's Defence, that a King and Killing was talk'd of, and if so there, in a Cook's Shop, it was doubtless much more deliberated, and concerted in their Cabals, and dark Meetings. Staley own'd he was then there with Fromante, but deny'd he spoke the Words, affirming, they only spoke of the French King, and the Words sworn by the Witnesses in French, must signify, I will kill myself, rather than I will kill him myself. But to this the Court observ'd, "First, that the Witnesses swore directly that it was the King of England he spoke of, and nam'd him twice, nor did he count the French King a Heretick; and as to the Second, they observ'd that after he had given the King such scurrilous Names, it could not be Sense to say, He would kill himself." The Prisoner having little more to say, the Jury found him Guilty, without going from the Bar, and he was condemn'd to be hang'd, drawn and quarter'd. Dr. Lloyd visited him after his Condemnation, and he was offer'd a Pardon, if he wou'd make Discoveries, which probably he cou'd not do in Particulars, and as for Generals, there was more than enough already discover'd. I wonder Bishop Burnet took so much Pains as he said he did, to save Staley, for if the two Scots-men were profligate Fellows, 'twas not likely the English-man would be drawn in by them to forswear himself, and Staley confessing that King was spoken of, and Killing also, is such a Corroboration of their Evidence, that there's no room left to doubt it. Staley was executed at Tyburn the 26th of November; he carry'd himself seriously and discreetly. His Majesty gave his Quarters to his Friends, who bury'd them in Convent-Garden Church, after having caus'd Masses to be said, and other Popish Ceremonies to be perform'd over the Quarters, which a great Number of Papists attended at the Funeral, and Information of it being given to the State, the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, Sir Richard How and Sir John Chapman, were order'd to cause them to be taken up, and put on the City Gates.

Coleman
try'd.

The next Trial was that of Coleman, who was brought to the King's-Bench Bar the 27th of November. The Charge against him was, for conspiring the Death of the King, and endeavouring to subvert the Government of England, and the Protestant Religion. To blacken the Prosecution, Echard opens the Evidence with Reflections on Dr. Oates and Capt. Bedloe, who both swore, that they had carry'd treasonable Letters from Coleman to La Chaise. Such Letters were found upon the Prisoner, and given in Evidence also; they are mention'd in the preceding Pages. The Contents were to give the greatest Blow to the Protestant Religion it ever had receiv'd, that they had a mighty Work, the Conversion of three Kingdoms upon their Hands, and the utter subduing a Pestilent Heresy; that the Opposition they shall meet with, requires them to get all Aid and Assistance. I think we need go no farther, tho' Echard, as weakly, and as wrongfully as one might expect from such a Champion, for such a Cause, endeavours to extenuate Coleman's Guilt, by saying, there was no mention in the Letters of making use of any Foreign Power besides Money, the very Sinews of War, and that in one Letter, he demanded of the French King but 300,000 Pounds; he acknowledges he made other Demands in other Letters. Supposing that the Evidence of his Conspiring the Death of the King, was not so clear as was pretended, that which was prov'd upon him, his Endeavour to destroy the Government and Religion of his Country, had as much Proof as a Man's own Inditing and Writing a Thing can give it. Echard hangs still upon Oates and Bedloe's Rashness in their Swearing, and after Coleman has own'd his Letters, would bring him off, by passing the Expressions in them, as extravagant only; but it was an Extravagance that would have brought Popery and Slavery upon us; and according to Dr. Welwood, Coleman's Letters alone, without any other concurring Evidence, are more than sufficient to put the Matter out of Doubt, and the Jury, Men of so good a Character, that Coleman did not pretend to except against one of the whole Pannel, was so well satisfy'd with the Testimony that was given, that they brought him in Guilty, after a short Deliberation. Echard catches the last Sayings of the Popish Traitors, as so many Reflections on the Justice of the Nation, in prosecuting this Plot, tho' he cou'd not but have heard that the Popish Priests have a Power to absolve their Penitents from the Guilt of all Falshood, and even Perjury, which is for the Good of their Church, and I wish no other Priests may not carry the Doctrine of Absolution too far. Three of them, Cook, Snat and Collier, did so in King William's Reign, and absolv'd an Assassin at the Gallows, who was in a Plot to murder that Prince. Echard tells us, that one of the last Things Coleman said to the Lord Chief Justice, who ask'd if he had not laid aside any Book or Paper? No, by the living God, reply'd Coleman; whereas his Man Boatman had sworn, that his Book of Entries for the two last Years, was remov'd a Day or two before he was apprehended. After Sentence, many were sent to Coleman from both Houses, offering to interpose for his Pardon, if he would confess, but he still protested his Innocence, and took great Care to vindicate his Master the Duke. He own'd he had himself receiv'd 2500 Guineas of the French Ambassador, to gain some Persons to the Duke's Interest, but had kept them himself. Sir Thomas Littleton, and other Members of Parliament, were with him, not long before his Execution. He seem'd willing to be question'd about the King, but Bishop Burnet says, they did not think fit to do it, nor to report what he said concerning it, which is a Hint that will occasion great Speculation among speculative Readers. It was then given out, that Coleman was kept from making Confessions, by Hopes the Duke of York sent him of a Pardon; and that when he saw there was none like to come, he shou'd say, There is no Faith in Man; which I doubt not would have been true enough, if he had said it: For as he kept Correspondence with La Chaise, by Command of the Duke, and as the Duke refers La Chaise to him in his own Letter, one can make no Question, but he was authoriz'd to say what he did, and whether the Duke of York would engage in such a dangerous Correspondence, without being sure of his Brother's Approbation, let the Reader determine. He was executed at Tyburn the 3d of December, and suffer'd with great Devotion and Composedness. The King gave back his Estate to his Wife and Children, and his Quarters to be bury'd. I shall not enlarge upon Oates and Bedloe's Accusation of the Queen, for I do not much give into it, having Occasion to know more of that Princess than the common Writers, as the Archdeacon has it. For some of the last Words she said before her Death, at Lisbon, were, to an English Physician, from whom I had it, The Queen sitting up in her Bed, call'd to him to hold her while she said softly to this Effect, That when she was in England, she had been wrongfully charg'd with endeavouring to bring in Popery; that she never had desir'd any more Favour for those of her own Religion, than was granted them by her Marriage Articles; that she had never been a Promoter of the French Interest; on the Contrary, that it was one of her greatest Grievs, at her going out of the World, to think that when she was gone, the French Faction, in her Brother's Court, might do the Confederates ill Offices, for it was she that had kept him firm to them.

The Conversation between King Charles and Dr. Burnet at this Juncture, is worth repeating entire. "I waited often on him all the Month of December, he came to me to Chiswick's, a Page of the Back-Stairs, and kept the Time he had assign'd me to a Minute. He was alone, and talk'd much, and very free with me. He suspected some had set on Oates, and instructed him, naming the Earl of Shaftsbury: I was of another Mind, thinking the many gross Things in his Narrative shew'd there was no abler Head than Oates or Tonge in the framing it. Oates in his first Story had cover'd the Duke and Ministers so much, that from thence it seem'd clear, that Lord Shaftsbury had no Hand in it.

The King must not be a very good Judge of Design and Expression, to think Oates's Narrative had a Word in it from the Pen of the Earl of Shaftsbury, that Rhapsody had its Growth among the Dregs of the People, as appears by the base Thoughts, and baser Language, and there's a Rage in it, which borders pretty near upon Frenzy, the Effect of Oates and Tonge's Want of both Sense and Judgment, but I'm apt to think they two had Helps in the Contrivance and Formation of the Narrative, which had they had more Judgment and Sense, they would not have let pass as it is. I may go so far as to believe a great Part of it is Invention, without giving any one Cause to suspect the Whole; for as some Parts were prov'd by Coleman, and the Jesuits Letters, so others which might have been prov'd further by the Letters and Papers that were sunk, should not be wholly condemn'd. Dr. Burnet's Conversation with his Majesty continu'd thus.

"The King fancied there was a Design of a Rebellion on Foot, I assur'd him I saw no Appearances of it; I told him there was a Report breaking out that he intended to legitimate the Duke of Monmouth. He answer'd quick, As well as I love him, I had rather see him hang'd; yet he apprehended a Rebellion not so much that he seem'd ill pleas'd, that the Party who was so zealous about the Plot, should flatter themselves with great Imaginations, hoping that would keep them quiet, in a Dependence upon himself; and he suffer'd the Duke of Monmouth to use all Methods to make himself popular, reckoning that he cou'd keep him in his own Management. He was surpriz'd when I told him Coleman had insinuated, that he knew of all their Foreign Negotiations, or at least, he seem'd so to me. I press'd him much to oblige the Duke to enter into Conferences with some of our Divines, and to be present at them himself, which would very much clear him of Jealousy, and might have a good Effect on his Brother; at least it would give the World some Hopes, like what Henry IV. of France, his Grand-father did, which kept a Party firm to him for some time before he chang'd; the King answer'd, My Brother has neither Henry IV's Understanding, nor his Conscience; for he believ'd that King was always indifferent as to those Matters. The King spoke much to me concerning Oates's accusing the Queen, and acquainted me with the whole Progress of it. He said she was a weak Woman, and had some disagreeable Humours, but was not capable of a wicked Thing, and considering his Faultiness towards her in other Things, he thought it a horrid Thing to abandon her. I told him there was no Possibility of laying the Heat that was now rais'd, but by changing his Ministry; that the Earl of Danby was universally odious, and there was a Design against him, but I knew not the Particulars; he said, that lies at the Bottom.

On the same Day that Coleman was try'd, came out a Proclamation, pursuant to an Address of the House of Lords, declaring in these Words, "That if any Person or Persons shall before the 25th Day of December next, make any further Discovery of the late horrid Design, &c. he shall for every such Discovery, receive the Reward of 200 Pounds;" and the Commons gave such Credit to Oates and Bedloe's Accusation of the Queen, that they address'd his Majesty to remove her, and all her Family, and all reputed Papists from Whitehall, which was follow'd with another Address, to have all Papists and reputed Papists, in all Parts of England, apprehended and secur'd. The King resenting Oates's accusing the Queen, order'd a stricter Guard upon him than ever, which occasion'd the Commons to order another Address, That Oates might be freed from his Restraint, attended by his own Servants, and a competent Allowance be appointed for his Maintenance, and on the 5th of December, they resolv'd to impeach the Lord Arundel of Warder, the Lord Powis, the Lord Petre, Lord Bellasis, Lord Viscount Stafford, severally of High-Treason; which several Impeachments were carry'd up to the Lords by several Members of the House of Commons. These Lords had two Days before been found guilty by special Indictments, to the same Purpose, by the Grand Jury of Middlesex, before special Commissioners sitting at Westminster, and had they been arraign'd and try'd, Oates and Bedloe's Evidence would have charg'd every one of them with Treason; but now for some Reasons, those Proceedings were wav'd, and it was thought more effectual to proceed by way of Impeachment before the House of Lords.

On the 17th of December, William Ireland and Thomas Pickering, both Priests, and John Grove, a Lay-Brother, were arraign'd at the Old-Bailey, together with Thomas Whitebread and John Fenwick, two Jesuits: The three first were charg'd particularly with conspiring the King's Death. Oates swore that the Murder of the King was resolv'd on at the great Meeting, on the 24th of April, mention'd also in the Jesuits Letter. This Meeting was at the White-Horse in the Strand, Ireland was present at it; Pickering was to have 30,000 Masses, and Grove 1500 Pounds, to which Agreement Ireland consented, and sign'd it in Oates's Presence, as did also Pickering and Grove. Oates depos'd further, that in Pursuance of this Resolve, he saw Pickering and Grove walk several Times in the Park together, with screw'd Pistols, longer than ordinary ones, and shorter than Carabines; that they had Silver Bullets to shoot with, and Grove would have had them champ'd, to render the Wound incurable. This Assassination Plot was prov'd with other Circumstances by Bedloe's Evidence also, who swore that one Knight was to have kill'd the Earl of Shaftsbury, Pritchard the Duke of Buckingham, Oneal the Earl of Offory, Obrian the Duke of Ormond, &c. The three Assassins deny'd every Part of the Evidence against them, or that they had so much as any Knowledge of the King's Witnesses. Ireland offer'd to prove by twenty Witnesses, that he was in Staffordshire and Cheshire the whole Month of August and September, when it was sworn he was in London; but Sarah Payne, formerly a Servant to Grove, swore that she saw Mr. Ireland at a Scrivener's Door in Fetter-Lane, about the 12th or 13th of August; and whatever has been, or may be said against Oates and Bedloe's Evidence, at the Trial of Ireland, Pickering and Grove, it is certain, the Witnesses for the Prisoners had so little to say for them, that 'twas of no Service to them. The Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, in summing up the Evidence to the Jury, had these remarkable Expressions. If they had not murder'd Kings, I would not say they would have done ours, but when it hath been their Practice so to do, when they have debauch'd Mens Understandings, overturn'd all Morals, and destroy'd all Divinity, what shall I say of them?

them? When their Humility is such, that they tread upon the Necks of Emperors, their Charity such as to kill Princes, and their Vows of Poverty, such as to covet Kingdoms, what shall I judge of them? When they have Licences to lye, and Indulgences for Falshood; nay, when they can make him a Saint, that dies in One, and then pray to it, as the Carpenter first makes an Image, and then worships it; and can they think to bring in that Wooden Religion of theirs amongst us in this Nation, what shall I think of them? What shall I say to them? What shall I do with them? They eat their God, they kill their King and Saint the Murtherer; they indulge all sorts of Sins, and no humane Bonds can hold them. Jefferies, Recorder of London, the greatest Butcher afterwards that ever was stain'd with Blood, made a long Speech when he pass'd Sentence upon them, and said in it, among other Flourishes of his, You must e'er long appear before the great Tribunal, where your Masses will not signify so many Groats to you, no not one Farthing. I must say, for the Sake of those silly People, whom you have impos'd upon with such Fallacies, that the Masses can no more save you from a future Damnation, than they do from a present Condemnation. In another Place he advis'd them not to rely upon their Masses, Tricks and Trumperies; and afterwards proceeded thus, I am sorry with all my Soul to hear a Lay-man should with so much Malice declare, That a Bullet, if round and smooth, was not safe enough to execute his Villainies by. But he must be sure not only to set his poisonous Invention on work about it, but he must add thereto his poisonous Teeth, for Fear, if the Bullet were smooth, it might light in some Part where the Wound might be cur'd. But such is the Height of some Mens Malice, that they will put all the Venom and Malice they can into their Actions. I am sure this was so horrid a Design, that nothing but a Conclave of Devils in Hell, or a College of such Jesuits as yours on Earth, could have thought upon it. In Conclusion, he sentenc'd them to be drawn, hang'd, and quarter'd: However, he deferr'd issuing a Warrant for Execution so long, that the House of Commons sent for him to give an Account why it was not done. He said he had as yet receiv'd no Order from the King, and no Order came till the 15th of January, when Ireland and Grove were hang'd at Tyburn; but Pickering was not executed till the 9th of May. They all deny'd the Fact to the last. We have spoken already, and shall still speak of the Validity of such Denials from Persons who depend more on the Priest's Absolution and the Prayers of the Church, than on Repentance, or Innocence, or the Merits of our Saviour. While the Popish Plot was under Prosecution, a great Design was laid to ruin the Earl of Danby, Lord Treasurer, who, to prevent it, laid another Design to ruin Mr. Montagu, late Ambassador in France, who was too cunning and too quick for him. Echard assures us, the French Ambassador and the Dutchess of Portsmouth join'd with the Lord Russel, the Duke of Monmouth, the Earls of Shafsbury and Essex, in the Design against Danby, which is as likely as many other Events of his. The Lord Russel caballing with the Dutchess of Portsmouth, Barillon the French Ambassador, with the Earl of Shafsbury, and the late Earl of Galway with both Russel and Portsmouth. Let us see how it is represented by Bishop Burnet.

in France, and fearing the Letter he had written him might be produc'd in Evidence against him, resolv'd to be before-hand, and accuse Montagu, but first to secure his own Letters. In order to this, the Court Tool, Jenkins, who was the Shadow of an Ambassador at Nimeguen, was directed to write over, that he understood Mr. Montagu had been engag'd in dangerous Practices with Con, the Pope's Nuntio at Paris, who was indeed the Pope's Agent there, a crafty covetous Fellow, who sold Montagu some Secrets which were worth his Money. Upon the Receipt of Jenkins's Letters, Orders were given for seizing Mr. Montagu's Papers; but as he had got himself chosen a Member of the House of Commons for the Borough of Northampton, to strengthen his Interest against the Treasurer, so he had foreseen the other's Design against him, and remov'd his most valuable Papers; among which were several Letters of Danby's about the Money Affair, the most scandalous that a King was ever concern'd in; and a King who wou'd sell his Subjects for a little French Gold, might very well make no Conscience of persecuting and oppressing them for Conscience sake, at the Instigation of Sheldon and such Bishops, who had a Party in the House of Commons that was ready to give him any thing, if he wou'd give them Laws against Protestant Dissenters. Montagu, says Bishop Burnet, understood the Arts of a Court too well to be caught by Danby, and had put the Box, with the Treasurer's Letters in them, in a safe Place. As soon as Orders were issu'd for seizing Montagu's Papers, his Majesty sent a Message to the House of Commons concerning Jenkins's Information against him, and that he had order'd his Papers to be seiz'd. The House did not much approve of those Orders, and desir'd to know, Whether the Information was upon Oath, and of what Nature the Offence was? Upon which Mr. Montagu sat silent, and a Debate ensu'd that lasted very long: At the End of it Mr. Montagu stood up, and said, He had a Box in which were some Papers of very great Importance; if the House thought fit, he wou'd send for them. Three of the Members were immediately appointed to fetch them; when it was come, he open'd it, and took out two Letters of the Lord Danby's, that contain'd Instructions to him to treat with the King of France for 300,000 Pounds a Year, for three Years, if a Peace succeeded, since it wou'd not be convenient for the King to meet a Parliament in all that Time; and he was charg'd to mention no Part of this to the Secretary of State. What ado did Echard make with the Kingdom's Happiness in having such a King, when he was passing the good Staunck Acts before-mention'd? And how did the two Chancellors, Hyde and Finch, cry up the Blessings he brought in with him to the English Nation? The Measure of them is now compleat, and our Parliaments sit or not sit, according as the Money comes from France. It was easy to foresee he wou'd prove such a King as this, from his Religion and Morals, and the People of England ow'd it all to trusting him at his Restoration. The first Letter which Montagu produc'd, was dated the 17th of January, 1677, and contains as follows. Yesterday young Ruigny came to me, with Monsieur Barillon (having given me his Father's Letters the Day before) about Money and discours'd much upon the Confidence the French King hath of the Firmness of Ours to him (This was at the very Instant when King Charles was earnestly pressing his Parliament to give him Money to act vigorously against him) and and of the good Opinion his Master has of me ; of his King's Resolution to condescend to any thing that is not infamous to him, for the Satisfaction of our King. How certainly our King may depend upon all Assistance and Supplies from his Master, in case the Friendship be preserv'd — The main of their Drift was, to engage me to prevail with the Prince of Orange, as to the Town of Tournay. The King must come to some Declaration of his Mind to the Parliament when it meets. That which makes the Hopes of Peace less probable, is, that the Duke grows every Day less inclin'd to it, and has created a greater Indifferency in the King than I could have imagin'd ; which being added to the French King's Resolutions not to part with Tournay, does, I confess, make me despair of any Accommodation. Nevertheless, I am assur'd that one principal Cause of this Adjournment for Thirteen Days, hath been to see if any Expedient for the Peace could have been found in that Time ; and the Effect of the Adjournment hath hitherto been, that no body will believe other than that the Peace is already concluded. The second Letter produc'd by Mr. Montagu, was dated March 25, 1678, and it is worth noting, that this Letter was written four or five Days after the Parliament pass'd the Poll Bill, to raise a Naval and Land Force for an actual War with the French King. In it were these Expressions ; In case the Conditions of Peace shall be accepted, the King expects to have Six Millions of Livres a Year for three Years, from the Time that this Agreement shall be sign'd betwixt his Majesty and the King of France, because it will probably be two or three Years before the Parliament will be in Humour to give him any Supplies after the making any Peace with France. For my Part, it is astonishing to think to what a Degree of — the Word is too foul to be nam'd, a King and Ministry must be come to, that could look a Parliament in the Face, after such a Discovery. A Secret League with a profess'd Enemy to their Religion and Liberties, which both King and Ministers were sworn to defend. How base, how despicable must it appear to brave, generous Minds ! A Plantagenet would sooner have robb'd a Shrine, than have taken a Bribe of a Foreign Enemy against his own People. The French Ambassador here has always agreed to that Sum, but not for so long a Time. If you find the Peace will not be accepted, you are not to mention the Money at all ; and all possible Care must be taken to have this whole Negotiation as private as is possible, for fear of giving Offence at Home. Honest Men are not afraid of giving Offence by their Actions, nor asham'd of shewing them to the Sun : Poor England ! That ever it should have been thy Misfortune to fall into such Hands. At the Bottom of this Letter are these Words, THIS LETTER WAS WRIT BY MY ORDER,

C. R.

These Letters being read in the House of Commons, Sir Francis Winnington, then Solicitor General, fell severely upon them. He said, Here was a Minister, who going out of the Affairs of his own Province, was directing the King's Ambassadors, and excluding the Secretary of State, whose Office it was, from the Knowledge of it : For that also was in the last Letter, You must not say a Syllable to the Secretary. Here was the Faith of England, added Winnington, to our Allies, and our Interest likewise set to Sale for French Money, and that to keep off a Session of Parliament. This was a Design to sell the Nation, and subvert the Government, and is HIGH TREASON. It being my original Design to prove this upon the Stuartine Race, I have reason to desire that the Testimony of King Charles's own Solicitor here may be taken Notice of.

We'll see what the learned Lawyer writes on this Occasion : It was argu'd in the House of Commons, That now it was evident that there was a Secret League with France ; that King Charles was to have Assistance and Supplies from thence against Some-body ; which could not be against Holland or Spain, and therefore it must be against his own People. And yet this Assistance or Supplies were not to be had but upon Condition, If the Friendship should be preserv'd. King Charles must either comply with whatsoever France impos'd, or break the Friendship. Again, These Letters shew'd the Secret League subsisted and was carrying on at the very Time when the Parliament was, on the 15th of January, 1677, directed to adjourn for thirteen Days, to be then acquainted with a Matter of great Importance : The meaning of which was, That the Expedient for the Peace was the settling the Price for it ; for the Matter of great Importance, when it came out, was no more, but that his Majesty had, on the 16th of January, 1677, made an Alliance with the Dutch against France. It was therefore agreed, That it was plain the Army of 20,000 Men, lately rais'd, was rais'd for some Purpose, but not to make War against France. That from these Letters might be collected, that there was some DARK Meaning in the King's desiring a Continuance of these new rais'd Forces ; and above all it was plain, that the Reasons why his Majesty refus'd to make Alliances and War against France, were to preserve his Friendship with Lewis XIV. in hopes of Assistance and Supplies against Some-body. And upon the whole, the Alliance with the Dutch, and the late Speeches and Messages to the Parliament, touching the Defence of the Nation, could proceed from no other Cause but Insincerity ; which proves, that the British State was under the Influence of Those who were engag'd in an Interest against it.

The Question being put, after a Debate, Whether the Earl of Danby should be Impeach'd of High Treason, it was carry'd by a Majority of above Seventy Voices, and the Impeachment was the next Day carry'd up to the Lords by Sir Henry Capel, Brother to the Earl of Essex, with a Desire that the said Thomas Earl of Danby might be sequestred from Parliament, and forthwith committed to Custody. But the Majority of the Lords were against committing him, till the Articles were exhibited, and Proof of them produc'd. Upon this it was visible the Commons would have complain'd that the Lords deny'd them Justice, so there was no making up the Matter ; and on Monday the 30th of December, the King came to the House and prorogu'd the Parliament till the 4th of February, but they never sat more. Their Continuance from first to last, was seventeen Years, seven Months, and twenty-two Days.

To imitate the Compleat Historians, I should close the Year with Honours and Preferments ; but I shall abridge their Account for Reasons before hinted.

Privy-Counsellors made this Year, George Lord Berkeley, James Earl of Salisbury, Henry Earl of Clarendon. James Earl of Arran, Duke Hamilton's Son was sworn Gentleman of the Bed-chamber. Robert Earl of Sunderland bought the Green, Berry, and Hill try'd for the Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey.

When the Archdeacon comes to the Trials of the Murderers of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, his Account is one continu'd false Representation in Favour of Prance, and the other Murderers. 'Tis no Matter that he has copy'd L'Estrange, or any such villainous Libeller; he takes their Guilt upon himself, and is accountable for it to the Truth. He tells us, he deny'd the first Evidence he had given of Sir Edmundbury's Murder by Green, Berry, Hill, &c. before the King; and being oblig'd to tell us, that he afterwards recanted that Denial, he imputes it to the barbarous Usage of him in Newgate, which he represents as a sort of Torture, to force a new Confession from him. He stood firm in his Denial, against all Terrors and Temptations, for about twelve Days, says Mr. Archdeacon. Bishop Burnet says, As soon as he was carry'd back to Prison, he sent the Keeper of Newgate to the King, to tell him, that all he had sworn was true, but that the Horror and Confusion he was in put him on denying it. He assures us, Prance's Story was a strange one: Bishop Burnet, That it was a confiding Story, supported by collateral Proofs, as it will appear to be in a Paragraph or two; and the former's treating that Consistency, as an extravagant incredible Piece of Forgery, calling the Assassins, the reputed Murderers, deserves other sort of Correction than the Lash of a Pen, as being a flagrant Affront on the Justice of the Nation, in the Punishment of those Criminals, for whom he pleads as earnestly, as if he had been fee'd for it. The following Account is taken from my Lord of Sarum.

On the 10th of February came on the Trial of Green, Berry, and Hill, for the Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey; thus related by Prance, a Goldsmith, that wrought for the Queen's Chappel. This Prance having absented himself from his House two or three Days, about the Time when the Murder was committed, a Lodger in his House calling it to mind, upon Bedloe's swearing he saw the Body in Somerset-House, fancy'd that it was the very Time in which he was from Home, and that he might be concern'd in it, though it appear'd afterwards that his Absence was a Week before. On this Information he was seiz'd, and carry'd to Westminster. Bedloe accidentally passing by, not knowing any thing concerning him, or whether he was a Papist or a Protestant, at first Sight charg'd some-body to seize on him, for he was not appriz'd that he was already in Custody, attesting that he was one of those he saw about Godfrey's Body. Yet for some Days he deny'd every thing; however, at length he confess'd all as follows. Girald and Kelly, two Priests, drew him and three others into it: Green, who belong'd to the Queen's Chappel, Hill, who had serv'd Golden, the most celebrated Writer among the Papists, and Berry the Porter of Somerset-House. These all, except Berry, had several Meetings, in which the Priests persuaded them it was no Sin, but a meritorious Action, to dispatch Godfrey, who had been a busy Man in taking Depositions against them; and that the taking him off would terrify others. Prance nam'd an Ale-house where they us'd to meet, and the People of that House did confirm this of their meeting there. After they had resolv'd on it, they follow'd Sir Edmund for several Days. The Morning before they kill'd him, Hill went to his House, to see if he was yet gone out, and spoke to his Maid; but finding he was not at Home, they stay'd for his coming. This was confirm'd by the Maid, who, upon Hill's being taken up, went to Newgate, and in a Crowd of Prisoners distinguish'd him, crying, He's the Person who ask'd for my Master, the Morning before he was lost. Prance gives in Evidence, that the Murderers met at such an Ale-house, 'tis confirm'd by the Ale-house-keepers. Prance swears, that Hill enquir'd for Sir Edmundbury the Morning before he went out; 'tis confirm'd by the Maid, who knew not Hill but by his coming to enquire for her Master. Here is no Concert, and no Proof can be better circumstantiated and confirm'd. Prance goes on, they dogg'd him into a Place near St. Clement's Church, where he was kept till Night; when Prance was appointed to wait at Somerset-House, and as Godfrey went by the Water-Gate, two of them pretended to be hot in a Quarrel, one run out to call a Magistrate, who press'd Sir Edmundbury to go in and part them, which he was not very ready to do, yet at last they prevail'd with him; then Green got behind him, and pull'd a Cravat about his Neck, drew him down to the Ground, and strangled him. Upon that Girald would have run him through, but the rest diverted him from it, representing the Danger of a Discovery by the Blood's being seen there. Upon which they carry'd his Body up to Godden's Room, who was then in France, and Hill kept the Key. Two Days after they remov'd it to a Room cross the upper Court, and that not being found a convenient Place, they carry'd it back to Godden's Lodgings; from whence they resolv'd to remove it by Night, in a Sedan, to the remote Parts of the Town, and fling it into some Ditch. On Wednesday a Sedan was provided; and one of the Centinels swore he saw a Sedan brought in. Prance said he was carry'd out, and Green having got a Horse ready, he was laid upon his Back as soon as they got clear of the Town; and from thence convey'd, as he believ'd, to the Place where he was found. Prance added another Particular, that some Days after the Fact, those who had been concern'd in it, and two others who were in the Secret, appointed to meet at Bow, where they talk'd much of this Matter; which was confirm'd by a Servant at that House, who was coming in and out to them, and heard them often mention Godfrey's Name, upon which he stood at the Door out of Curiosity to hearken; but one of them came out, and threaten'd him for it. This full Evidence is what Eckard makes Grimaces at, though it is hardly possible to get more Light in so dark and devilish a Business. He confess'd all this before he deny'd his Confession to the King; he deny'd his Denial: He afterwards again deny'd his Confession, and again deny'd his Denial to Dr. Lloyd, late Bishop of Worcester, to whom he confess'd this whole Matter again, and stood to his Confession at the Trial of the Murderers; and he did it in such a manner, that Bishop Lloyd said, It was not possible for him to doubt of Prance's Sincerity. And now let the Reader turn to that good Protestant, Eckard's, Account of him.

Denials of Papists at their Death not ed.

I shall not repeat Bedloe's Evidence, there being no occasion for it after Prance's, That and the others was more than sufficient to convict the Assassins, who were sentenc'd to be hang'd by the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs. There's an Expression of his to the Jury upon their bringing them in guilty, which deserves remembrance: Gentlemen, you have found the same Verdict that I would have found, if I had been one with you; and, if it were the last Word I were to speak in this world, I should have pronounced them guilty. At which Words the whole Assembly in Westminster-Hall gave a great Shout of Applause. Hill and Green were hang'd at Tyburn on the 21st of February, and Berry a Week after. They all died hard, as the Cant is, and deny'd the Fact to the last, which Echard lays great Strefs upon. So should I too, if their wicked Practices had not prov'd, that as they could do, so they could say any thing; and Berry's being an Apostate to Popery, and saying he was still a Protestant in his Heart, does not at all mend the Matter. It behov'd the Papists and their Abettors, I mean the persecuting Church-men, to do all that in them lay to prevent the belief of Sir Edmondbury Godfrey's Murther, there being nothing in the world which so much supported the belief of the Popish Plot; and there were many lying Libels publish'd by L'Estrange, and others, to ridicule and vilify the Prosecution of the Plot-ters and the Murtherers. But the Characters of those Scriblers are so profligate, that no Man of common Sense, and common Honesty, ever made use of them. My Lord Bishop of Salisbury, in his Memoirs, argues very justly on the little Dependence that is to be made upon the Denials of Popish Malefactors, even with their last Breath, when Facts have been prov'd upon them. "The visible Evidences that appear'd, made all People conclude there was great plotting among them. And it was generally believ'd, that the Bulk of what was sworn by the Witnesses was true, tho' they had by all appearance dress'd it up with incredible Circumstances. What the Men of Learning knew concerning their Principles, both of deposing of Kings, and of the Lawfulness of murdering them, when so depos'd, made them easily conclude, that since they saw the Duke was so entirely theirs, and that the King was so little to be depended upon, they might think the present Conjunction was not to be lost: And since the Duke's eldest Daughter was already out of their hands, they might make the more haste to set the Duke on the Throne. The Tempers, as well as the Morals of the Jesuits, made it reasonable to believe, that they were not apt to neglect such Advantages, nor to stick at any sort of Falshood, in order to their own Defence. The Doctrine of Probability, besides many other Maxims that are current amongst them, made many give little Credit to their Witnesses, or to their most solemn Denials, even at their Execution. Many things were brought to shew, that by the casuistical Divinity taught amongst them, and publish'd by them to the World, there was no Practice so bad, but that the Doctrines of Probability, and of ordering the Intention, might justify it." Instead of this just Reasoning, their Advocate Echard tells us, One of the Murderers said, he was as innocent as the Child new-born, and all of them continually deny'd they had any knowledge of it. He ends his own Narrative with tacking Oates's and Bedloe's Bill of Charges to it and this Jest, Many Persons have since thought that their Bills and their Narratives were equally credible: and he grounds this dull Raillery upon Oates's Sum total 1.678 : 12 : 6.

which is so far from being incredible, that I myself, in one Cause only, was forc'd to expend near a Third of that Sum on account of the Publick, where there was not a third Part of the Number of Witnesses, but the like Difficulty in getting them to speak what they knew; and all the World knows what a hard Matter it is to get People, who are not willing to give Evidence, to swear to even the most notorious Truth. Echard takes particular notice of Oates's Perjury, in swearing Ireland to have been in London, when forty Witnesses testify'd he was in Staffordshire. He would not tell us that Jennison, a Gentleman of good Family and Estate, observing that Ireland had defended himself against Oates chiefly by this, that he was in Staffordshire from the beginning of August, till the 12th of September, and died, affirming this to be true, seem'd much surpris'd at it, and, as Bishop Burnet informs us, turn'd Protestant upon it. For he said, he saw him in London on the 19th of August; on which Day he fix'd upon this account, that he saw him the Day before he went down in the Stage-Coach to York, which was prov'd by the Entry-Books of the Coach to be the 20th of August. He affirm'd he was come to Town from Windsor; and going to see him, found him drawing off his Boots. Ireland ask'd him, What News? and in particular, How the King was attended at Windsor? Jennison answering, He walks about very carelessly, with few about him. Then said Ireland, It would be easy to take him off. To which Jennison reply'd, God forbid; and Ireland said, I do not mean it can lawfully be done. Jennison produc'd one Smith, a Priest, who had also turn'd Protestant, and depos'd, He was told at Rome, that there was a Design to kill the King.

Jennison's Evidence confirms Oates's.

Besides Jennison, came in one Dugdale, who had been the Lord Aston's Bailiff, and liv'd in fair Reputation in the Country, and discover'd a Correspondence that Evers, the Lord Aston's Jesuit, held with the Jesuits in London, who had writ to Evers of the Design of killing the King, and desir'd him to find out Men proper to execute it, whether they were Gentlemen or not. This he swore was writ plain in a Letter from Whitebread the Provincial, directed to himself, but he knew it was meant for Evers. Evers, and Gavan, another Jesuit, press'd Dugdale to undertake it, promising he should be canonized for it. Bishop Burnet says he was a Man of Sense and Temper, and behav'd himself decently, having somewhat in his Air and Deportment which dispos'd People to believe him, Insomuch that the King himself began to believe there was something more than he knew of in the Plot, tho' Tom Killigrew said, Your Majesty knows more of it than any one else, and your Discovery of it will quickly satisfy your People. There was one Circumstance which confirm'd Dugdale's Evidence: He had talk'd of a Justice of Peace in Westminster, that was kill'd on the Tuesday after Godfrey was miss'd; so that the News of this must have been writ from London on the Saturday-Night's Post. He did not think it a Secret, but talk'd of it as News in an Ale-house, and several Persons swore they heard him tell it. He depos'd, he saw this in a Letter writ by Harcourt the Jesuit to Evers, in which Godfrey was nam'd. He added, that the Duke of York sent to Coleman, when he was in Newgate, to persuade him to discover nothing, and desired to know whether he had made any discovery of their Designs to any other Person; and Coleman sending back answer, he had spoke of them to Godfrey, the Duke gave order to kill him. The Earl of Essex declar'd that Dugdale swore this at his first Examination; but since it was only hear-say from Evers, and nothing in Law, it was not made a part of it, because it would heighten the Fury against the Duke, and the King charg'd Dugdale not to speak of it. This Dugdale, doubtless, was a Kinsman, as well as Countryman of the Herald Dugdale, whose View of the Troubles, tho' now waste Paper, was thought by one of our Universities a valuable Present for the Queen.

The Fury of the People was so fierce against the Duke, that the King himself thought his absence was the surest way to allay it. The Duke did not care to stir. The Earl of Danby persuaded the King to send him beyond Sea, that there might be no colour for suspecting the Counsels were influenc'd by him. He urg'd to the Duke, that if the King, and the new Parliament that was to be, came to an Agreement, he might depend on the Promise his Majesty would make to recall him immediately; and if they did not agree, no part of the Blame would be cast on him. No matter for that, he stuck close still, and would not go, till the King told him positively, It is for both our service, and must be done.

Before he went away, his Majesty gave him all possible Satisfaction with relation to the Duke of Monmouth, who was become very popular, and his Creatures gave out, he was the King's lawful Son. Upon which, his Majesty made a solemn Declaration in Council, and both sign'd and swore it, that he was never marry'd, nor contracted to that Duke's Mother, nor to any other Woman, except to his present Queen. The Duke of Tork went first to Holland, and then to Brussels, where he was not very welcome, as appear'd by the Coldness of their Carriage towards him.

Upon the Dissolution of the last Parliament, which was done by Proclamation the 24th of January, Writs were issued for calling a new one to meet the 6th of March following; and three or four Days after the Parliament was dissolv'd, Roger Earl of Castlemain, Mr. Daniel Arthur of London, Merchant, and — Sheldon Esq; who had been taken up for the Papish-Plot, were discharg'd upon Bail. Papists flock'd to London from all parts of the Kingdom, and behav'd so insolently, that the Government was obliged to command them to depart by another Proclamation; and by another, a Reward of 200 l. was promis'd to every new Discoverer of the Papish-Plot: the King and his Ministers being resolv'd to value themselves to the new Parliament on their Zeal for such Discoveries.

The Compleat Historian tells us, The Dissenters knew how to make some Advantages of the Papish-Plot; that is, they fell in with those that were for a vigorous Prosecution of it, and what was the Advantage they could make of it, more than they had a natural Right to, Liberty of Conscience, and to be freed from those flinging Laws, which Sheldon, Morley, and other such Prelates procur'd against them? 'Tis a shame not only to Christianity, but to Humanity, that such Laws were ever made, and a shame it is to find Writers speaking of them without Horror and Detestation. The Dissenters did their utmost to get a good Protestant Parliament; and moderate Church-men joining in with them, such a Parliament was chosen, as would have made England happy in any other Reign. They met the 6th of March, and the King told them what great Things he had already done, for preventing the Progress of the Papish-Plot; as the Exclusion of the Papish Lords from their Seats in Parliament, and the Execution of several Men upon the score of the Plot, as well as the Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey; but above all, that he had commanded his Brother from him, because he would not leave malicious Men room to say, he had not remov'd all Causes which could be pretended to influence him toward Papish Counsels; and as he had not been slack in putting the present Laws in execution against Papists, so he was ready to join in making such further Laws, as might be necessary for the securing the Kingdom. He then demanded a Supply, and concluded with a Desire to have this a Healing Parliament. The Lord Chancellor's Speech was long, and, if we could take Echard's Word for it, eloquent; but he thinks Length is Eloquence, tho' it must be confess'd, that this Speech of the Chancellor's, is the best he ever made, and the only one that cannot justly be called too long. I shall insert part of it as a full Answer to all Echard's Insinuations of the Forgery of the Plot: "We had need look about us, for his Majesty's Royal Person hath been in danger, by a Conspiracy against his sacred Life, maliciously contriv'd, and industriously carry'd on by those Seminary Priests and Jesuits, and their Adherents, who think themselves under some Obligations of Conscience to effect it; and having vow'd the Subversion of the True Religion amongst us, find no way so likely to compass it, as to wound us in the Head, and to kill the Defender of the Faith. His Majesty wanted no sufficient Evidence of his Zeal for our Religion, (we must remember he was all the while a Papist.) without this Testimony from his Enemies, who were about to sacrifice him for it: But it hath ever been the Practice of those Votaries, first to murder the Fame of Princes, and then their Persons; first to slander them to their People, as if they favour'd Papists, and then to assassinate them for being too zealous Protestants." His Majesty is not only a zealous, but a too zealous Protestant. "And thus, by all the Ways and Means which our Law calls Treason, and their Divinity calls Merit and Martyrdom, they are trying to set up the Dominion and the Supremacy of the Pope; as if the Dignity of the Triple Crown could never be sufficiently advanc'd, unless these three Kingdoms were added unto him, and all brought back again under that Yoke, which neither we nor our Forefathers were able to bear."

The Commons being to chuse a Speaker, Col. Birch nam'd Mr. Seymour, who in the last Parliament had struck in with such Heat against Popery, that he was become popular. The Court named Sir Thomas Meers, but Mr. Seymour carry'd it by a great Majority. When he was next day presented to the King, his Majesty refus'd to confirm the Election. He said, He had other Occasions for him, which could not be dispens'd with. Upon this, a long and warm Debate ensu'd, and several Members spoke: as,

Mr. Sacheverell.

It was never known that a Person should be excepted against, and no Reason at all given. 'Tis done on purpose to gratify some particular Person, for Mr. Seymour is a Man who perform'd on it the Service formerly without Complaint; and as he would not consent to the Prejudice of one Hair of the Crown, or Prerogative, so he will not infringe the Liberty of the People, in parting with the least of their just Rights.

Mr. Williams.

This seems to be a Question of Right; for a hundred Years past, it has not been known that any Speaker presented to the Kings or Queens of England, were ever excepted against, without some Reason given, or for some great Cause;

the King.

A. D. 1679. Cause; and the Thing in itself of presenting him to the King, is, I humbly conceive, but a bare Compliment. If we suffer this, we shall be put upon daily. Let us adjourn for the present.

Sir Thomas Clarges.

Sir Thomas Clarges's. There were Parliaments long before there were Speakers chosen; and afterwards, for the Ease of the House, among themselves, they pitch'd upon a Speaker. Besides, I can prove, not long since, that Parliaments have adjourn'd themselves de Die in Diem, for fourteen Days together, without any Speaker among them, and the Clerk of the House always put the Word for Adjournment. Gentlemen, all our Lives and Liberties are to be preserv'd by this House, and therefore we are to preserve the Liberties of it.

Mr. Garraway.

Mr. Garraway's. If you admit this, you would admit any thing. If Mr. Seymour be rejected from being Speaker, and no Reason given, pray who must chuse the Speaker, the King or us? It's plain, not us. I remember, when Popham was Speaker, he was rejected; but the Reason was given, because he had been wounded, and was sickly; and another, for not being able to endure, by reason of Disability of Body: but nothing of this can be objected against Mr. Seymour, he being an approv'd Person by his Majesty the last Parliament.

Sir Thomas Lee.

Sir Thomas Lee's. I cannot forget how we address'd ourselves to his Majesty last Parliament, as fearing his Person to be in danger, by reason of the Plot; but we receiv'd no Answer at all in a whole Week, from Monday to Monday, when we were immediately prorog'd unexpectedly, and immediately after dissolv'd as unexpectedly; and, I suppose, the same Persons that gave that Advice, gave this also. To except against a Speaker, without giving a Reason, is to do any thing that may set us together by the Ears, and then they have their design'd Ends; but I shall not consent to part with the least Right that belongs to my Country, for whom I am chosen a Representative.

Col. Birch.

Col. Birch's. He that advis'd this, will readily advise more, I'll warrant you. This is only a Bone cast amongst us. I thought we could not have oblig'd his Majesty more, than to pitch upon a Privy Counsellor, and one in so great Favour with his Majesty, and in several great Places and Employments under him: Besides, yesterday he was at Whitehall, after we had chosen him Speaker, to acquaint his Majesty with it, and then his Majesty was very well pleas'd with the Choice, and for the Truth of this I appeal to Mr. Seymour himself; but this ill Advice is given since by some, I fear, too near the King. I shall not touch upon Prerogative; but let's think of Adjournment at present.

Mr. Powle.

M. Powle's. This is an ominous Thing to stumble at the Threshold, before we are in the House: but this Advice must proceed from some who are too near the King, and fearful we should agree; but I hope there is no Man here, a Representative of his Country, that is fearful of speaking his Mind freely, in favour of those whom he represents, nor yet afraid of being dissolv'd, if it be to-morrow, for maintaining the Right of those who chuse them to sit here for them. I will not invade Prerogative, neither will I consent to the Infringement of the least Liberty of my Country; but let us do nothing hastily, but consider Precedents, and adjourn ourselves till to-morrow Nine a-clock. To which the whole House agreed. A Temper was found at last; Seymour's Election was let fall, but the Point was settled, that the Right of Electing was in the House, and that the Confirmation was a thing of course; after which, William Gregory Esq; Sergeant at Law, was recommended to the House by the Lord Russell, and chosen Speaker. This Parliament began where the last left off, and appointed a Committee of Secrecy to take Informations, prepare Evidence, and draw up Articles against the impeach'd Lords in the Tower. They also sent a Message to the House of Peers, to put them in mind of the Impeachment of High Treason exhibited against Thomas Earl of Danby, and to desire that he may be committed to safe Custody: Resolving again, "That it be refer'd to the Committee of Secrecy to draw up further Articles against him." However, the Letters produc'd against the Earl, being written by the King's particular Command, and some private Papers being necessary for his Defence, which his Majesty would not suffer to be made publick, he at last resolv'd to adhere to the Benefit of the Pardon the King had granted him, and to keep himself out of the way as long as he could. His Conduct is much condemn'd by Bishop Burnet, both as to Discretion and Probity. "When he was leaving the Treasury, he made great Advantage by several Payments, which he got the King to order, that were due upon such slight Pretences, that it was believ'd he had a large Share of them to himself. He advis'd his Majesty to reject Seymour the Speaker, for which the House fell upon him immediately, and he sharpen'd them against him by it. Those who intended to serve him, said, The Heat that Dispute had rais'd, which was wholly imputed to him, on account of a private Quarrel he had with Seymour, had put it out of their power to do it. He took out a Pardon under the Great Seal. The Lord Chancellor durst not venture to pass it; so the King order'd the Seal to be put to the Pardon in his own presence. And thus, according to the Lord Finch's Figure, when he was afterwards question'd about it, It did not pass thro' the ordinary Methods of Production, but was an immediate Effect of his Majesty's Power of creating." He also took out a Warrant to be Marquis of Carmarthen, which Title he took afterwards by Patent from King William. The King told the Parliament, the Earl of Danby had done nothing but by his Order, and therefore he had pardon'd him; and if there was any defect in his Pardon, he would pass it over and the Parliament again, till it should be quite legal. But this was not a Parliament to be talk'd to at that rate; nor was he a Monarch of that high Character, as to give himself those Airs.

The House of Commons had debated the Impeachment with great Warmth; and Mr. Powle particularly said,

Mr. Speaker,

I should have been pleas'd to have heard something omitted, needful to have been spoken unto from some other Member of this House, rather than against myself; it is concerning the Earl of Danby, who stands impeach'd by the Commons of England of High Treason.

The Person to whom we owe the Dangers and Fears of the French King against us.

The Person to whom we owe the Threats and severe Answers to those humble Addresses we made the last Sessions of Parliament.

The Person to whom we owe the Ruin of this Nation, and exhausting the King's Revenue.

The Person to whom we owe the Expence of 200000 Pounds and upwards, within a Year, unaccounted for.

A. D. 1679.

His ill Conduct.

The King talks im- periously to the Par- liament for him.

The King designs to enslave England.

The Person to whom we owe the raising of a standing Army, to be kept up by the Receipt of six Millions of Livres yearly, for three Tears together, to enslave us and our Religion.

The Person to whom we owe the late Bone that was thrown in the Sitting of the last Parliament, to hinder the good Issue that might have come by their Proceedings, who is now laying down his Staff, and making up his Account in the Treasury as he pleases, to enrich himself out of the Spoils of the People, and so depart.

My humble Motion is, that a Message be sent immediately to the Lords from the Commons of England, to desire their Lordships, that Thomas Earl of Danby be immediately committed to safe Custody, he being impeach'd by the Commons of England of High Treason. And the Lords voting he should be committed, he withdrew, and a Bill of Banishment past the House of Peers, and was sent down to the House of Commons, Bill to banish him.

where Sir Francis Winnington fell upon it furiously; he said, "It was an Act to let all Ministers see the worst Thing that could happen to them, after they had been engag'd in the blackest Designs, and had got great Rewards of Wealth and Honour. All they could suffer was, to be oblig'd to live beyond Sea." This set the House in a flame, and the Court, to quench it, offer'd a Bill to degrade the Earl of Danby from his Peerage, as well as to banish him, and to declare, that, for the future, no Pardon should be pleaded in Bar of an Impeachment: But the House was so exasperated against him, that nothing less than a Prosecution for High Treason would content them. They threw out the Bill of Banishment, and instead of it, order'd a Bill of Attainder to be brought in. The Earl of Essex had been made first Commissioner of the Treasury, and he and the Earl of Sunderland join'd with the Duke of Monmouth, to press the King to change his Counsels, and turn to another Method of Government. Who his Counsellors were, will be seen by the following Order.

I. "Whether Foreigners, Popish Recusants, that are, and have long been here settled

"House-keepers, and are Tradesmen; viz. Chirurgeons, Taylors, Perriwig Makers, or ordinary Shop-keepers, following Employments for their own Advantage, but not otherwise Merchants; but are certify'd to be Merchant Strangers, shall be excus'd from taking the Oaths, or finding Sureties, or either of them?"

II. "Whether such Foreigners, being certify'd by Ambassadors, or other Foreign Ministers to be their Servants, at this Time shall be excus'd?"

III. "Whether Foreigners, Popish Recusants, settled here House-keepers, but neither are Tradesmen, Travellers, or Foreign Ministers Servants shall be excus'd?"

IV. Whether native Subjects of our Sovereign Lord, that are menial Servants of Foreign Ministers shall be excus'd?

V. "Whether marry'd Women being Popish Recusants, but their Husbands Protestants, shall be excus'd?"

VI. "Whether Popish Recusants that have taken the Oaths, found Sureties, have appear'd, and are convict, shall find new Sureties, or be continu'd over.

His Majesty receiv'd Answer from the Judges in Writing, in the following Words,

May it please your Majesty,

"We have met and consider'd of the Questions propos'd to us, and do hereby humbly return our Opinions.

To the First we are of Opinion,

I. "That Foreigners, being Popish Recusants, and exercising ordinary Trades, but no Merchants, are not excus'd from taking the Oaths, or finding Sureties.

II. To the Second, "That Foreigners, tho' certify'd by Ambassadors to be their Servants, except they are their menial Servants, are not excus'd.

III. To the Third, "That Foreigners, tho' settled House-keepers, being no Travellers or Foreign Ministers Servants, are not excus'd.

IV. To the Fourth, "That the King's native Subjects are not excus'd from taking the Oaths, being menial Servants to Foreign Ministers.

V. To the Fifth, "We find no Law that excuses a Feme Covert, being a Papist, from taking the Oaths, tho' her Husband be a Protestant."

VI. To the Sixth, "That a Popish Recusant having taken the Oaths, is not bound to find new Sureties, unless upon a new Tender of the Oaths he shall refuse to take them.

All which, with great Humility, we submit to your Majesty's Judgment.

This Report of the Judges was sent to the Custos of every County, to be communicated to the Justices of the Peace. Sir Robert Southwel, the Clerk of the Council, was accus'd by one Mr. Chetwins of being negligent in the Matter of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey. One John Nalson, a Law Doctor, and History Writer, was taken into Custody by the Sergeant at Arms attending the House of Commons for writing a Libel against Mr. Montagu. Col. Edward Sackville was expell'd the

A. D. 1679. the House of Commons, for saying, They were Sons of Whores that said there was a Plot, and he was a lying Rogue that said it: You have a Sketch of the good Sense and good Manners of the Popish Faction in Sackville's Ribaldry. Bedloe gave Evidence against Danby, that he took him one day into his Closet, and ask'd him, Whether the Duke of Buckingham, or Lord Shaftesbury, or any of the Members of the House of Commons, had desir'd him to say any thing against him, and to tell him who they were, and he would reward him, and to know if he would desist from giving Evidence against the — and the Lords in the Tower.

Danby
tamperers with Bedloe.

To which Bedloe answer'd, That he had been an ill Man, and desir'd to be so no more. The Earl reply'd, You may have a great Sum of Money, and live in another Country, as Geneva, Sweden, or New England; and should have what Money he would ask to maintain him there: But Bedloe refusing, Danby began to threaten him, saying, There's a Boat and a Yatch ready to carry you far enough for telling of Tales. After this the Guards were as Spies upon him, and he was very ill us'd till he was remedy'd by the Parliament's Address to the King in his behalf, both as to Safety and Reward. Oates also declar'd, that being one day in the Privy Garden, the Earl of

Andinsful:
Oates.

Danby passing by, reflected upon him, saying, There goes one of the Saviours of England, but I hope to see him hang'd within a month; for it was a very courtly Business to ridicule the Plot: and probably, had the Truth been fully discover'd, the Courtiers would have been found among the Plotters, who were indefatigable in their Endeavours to cry down, and bribe off the Witnesses. One Reading a Lawyer, Solicitor for the Popish Lords in the Tower, insinuated himself into Bedloe's Confidence, and was much in his Company, always pressing him before others to tell all he knew: He lent him Money very freely, which Bedloe often wanted to support his Extravagancies; and he seem'd at first to design only to find out somewhat that should destroy the Credit of his Testimony: But he ventur'd on other Practices, and offer'd him much Money, if he wou'd turn his Evidence against the Popish Lords into Hearsay, so that it should not come home against them. Bedloe acquainted both Prince Rupert and the Earl of Essex with the whole Negotiation, and plac'd two Witnesses secretly in his Chamber, when Reading was to come to him; at which time, he drew him into Discourses, which discover'd the whole Practice of that Corruption. Reading had got a Paper ready drawn, containing Instructions how he should soften his Depositions, so as not to affect the Lords: With these Witnesses, and this Paper, Bedloe charg'd Reading. The Witnesses were Wiggins his Man, and one S — a worthless Branch of a very worthy Family, who was some Years ago employ'd in a Villainous Affair against the Writer of this History, and by a greater Villain than Bedloe. The whole Matter concerning Reading's Subornation was prov'd beyond Contradiction; and as this rais'd Bedloe's Credit, so it laid a heavy Load on the Popish Lords, of whom the Lord Stafford only offer'd 300 Pounds for this Service. The Proofs were plain against Reading, and he was put in the Pillory, where the Multitude sufficiently pelted him.

Danby's Servants tamper with Oates's.

The Conspirators took another Way to destroy Oates's Evidence; one of the Earl of Danby's Servants swore that Oates made an abominable Attempt upon him, too foul for the Purity of History. Another of them depos'd, that Oates's Servants told them many odious things of the King, which look'd like one that intended rather to ruin than to save him. Oates's Servants deny'd every Word of it, but fasten'd what was said upon those who had been with him, as a Practice of their's; for which they were pillory'd and pelted, as Reading had been: And to put things of a Sort together, as my Lord of Sarum does, tho' they happen'd not all at once, one Tasborough, who belong'd to the Duke of York, enter'd into a Correspondence with Dugdale, who was courting a Kinswoman of his. 'Twas propos'd that Dugdale should sign a Paper, re- Dugdale tracting all he had formerly sworn, and should tamper'd upon that go beyond Sea; for which he was wish by promis'd in the Duke's Name a considerable Re- Tasbo-ward: He had written the Paper, as was de- rough.

fir'd, but he was too cunning for Tasborough, and he prov'd his Practices upon him; for which Tasborough was fin'd, and put in the Pillory. These Contrivances to corrupt the Witnesses, carry'd on by the Duke of York's, and the Lord Treasurer's Servants, and by the Popish impeach'd Lords Solicitor, is sufficient to convince any reasonable Man, that they were all conscious of the Validity of the Evidence, and endeavour'd to have it stifled by Subornation and Perjury.

The Bill to attain the Earl of Danby having easily pass'd the House of Commons, was the first of April sent up to the Lords by Sir Robert Peyton, but had not so easy a Passage in that House; there were no less than three Conferences upon it: The first and third manag'd for the Lords by the Earl of Anglesey, and other Lords; the second by the Earl of Huntington, and other Peers; upon whose Report, their Lordships thought fit to pass the Bill, and the Earl surrender'd himself: Upon which he was committed to the Tower, there being a Clause in the Bill, which allow'd him a Trial, if he surrender'd himself by a Time therein mention'd. The Earl, by Advice of the celebrated Lawyer Mr. Pollexfen, insisted upon his Pardon; for a Trial must have brought the French Money-Letters on the Stage, and what a Figure his Majesty would then have made there, is easy to imagine.

Committed to the Tower.

Mention has been made of the King's Intention to change his Counsels, and Counsellors; which was chiefly owing to the Advice of Sir William Temple, as he represents it; but the Bishop of Salisbury gives the Merit of it to the Duke of Monmouth, Earl of Essex, and Earl of Sunderland. Lord Halifax told the Bishop, the King would be very willing to have Lord Shaftesbury brought in; for he thought he was only angry in revenge, because he was not employ'd: Sir William Temple tells us, he oppos'd it even with Passion; but his Majesty would not only have him of the Council, but that he should be President of it. The old Council was all made up of Danby's Creatures; the new, of the chief Men of both Houses of Parliament. This was carry'd with such Secrecy, that it was not so much as suspected, till the Day before it was done. The King was weary of the Vexation he had been long in, and desir'd to be at ease: He would have done any thing at that time, as Bishop Burnet observes, to put an end to the Plot, which lost him what little Credit he had both at home and abroad: He was forc'd at home to dissemble an extraordinary Zeal in the Prosecution of it, at the same time that he could not help ridiculing it upon all Occasions; and his Friends abroad, who knew him to be as much a Papist, as a Man so much a Libertine in Principle and Practice could be, must be shock'd at his giving up so many good Catholics, as were executed for that Conspiracy.

On the 20th of April, the Privy Council were extraordinarily assembled, and the Lord Chan-

A Popular Step.

This being one of the most popular Steps the King ever took, he went immediately to the House of Lords, and sending for the Commons, told them what he had done, which was not receiv'd with such general Satisfaction, as might have been expected, because they had no Confidence in the Doer. The Duke's Creatures were so excluded out of all Commissions, as well as out of the Council, that they gave both him and themselves for lost: Yet the King's Inflexibility in the Point of the Succession, shews he was still govern'd by his Brother's Maxims; to whose Counsels, it was not long before he gave himself up entirely. Many wise Men suspected all that was doing; they said the King was what he was before, no Change appear'd in him; and all this was only an Artifice to lay the Heat the Nation was in, to gain so many Members over to him, and draw Money from the Commons; in which, however, he had not the Success he hop'd for. Bishop Burnet says, "no Part of the Change that was then made, was more acceptable than that of the Judges; the Lord Danby had brought in some sad Creatures to those important Posts, as Scroggs, North, Bertie, Wyndham, Bramstone, &c." but they were not all remov'd. "Sir William Jones had the new modelling of the Bench; and he put in very worthy Men in the room of those ignorant Judges that were now dismiss'd."

Bad

We have mention'd the Change in the Admiralty: That Commission was given to Sir Henry Capel, Sir Humphry Winch, Sir Thomas Meers, Daniel Finch, Edward Vaughan, and Edward Hales, Esqs;

A. D.

Lords of the Admiralty.

On the 1st of May, the Commons reviv'd a Committee to consider what Part of the Money given for disbanding the Army is yet undispos'd of, and remaining in the Exchequer; and a Week after, an Act pass'd the Royal Assent, to raise 206462*l.* for disbanding the Forces rais'd since the 29th of September 1677. and the Commissioners appointed to disband them were Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir Thomas Player, Col. Birch, and Col. Whitley.

On the 5th of May the House of Commons resolv'd, "That the Pardon pleaded by the Earl of Danby, was illegal and void, and ought not to be allow'd, in bar of the Impeachment of the Commons of England;" which one would think a small Portion of Understanding and Honesty might have led People into; for then such Impeachments, which are the greatest Security they have for their Rights and Liberties, would be of no more Force than the Court pleas'd, and ill Ministers might as easily procure a Pardon for the Crimes they committed, as they had procur'd the Power to commit them. The same Day the Speaker, with the House, went up to the Lords Bar, and demanded Judgment against the Earl, who stood to his Plea of Pardon; and the Lords Petre, Bellasis, Stafford, Arundel, and Powis, having given in their Answers to the Commons Impeachment, a Difference arose between the two Houses, about the Bishops being present at the Trials of these Lords. The Bishops had stuck close to the King and his Counsels, and his Majesty was very desirous to stick to them as his fast Friends. Many of them had been promoted by Danby's Interest, and these were sure to be a Part of the Dead Weight on all Occasions, when Spiritual and Temporal Liberty was in question. It was said that tho the Bishops had no Right to vote in the final Judgment; yet they might vote in all Preliminaries: In the Case of the Earl of Danby, the allowing or not allowing the Pardon to be good was but preliminary; and yet the whole Matter was concluded by it: which induc'd the Commons to insist upon it, That the Bishops ought not to have any Vote in any Proceedings upon Impeachments against the Lords in the Tower. The Lords voted that they had a Right to stay in Court in Capital Cases, till the Court gave Judgment; which Vote was strenuously oppos'd by the Earl of Shaftesbury, Earl of Essex, the Lord Hollis, and other Peers; and as strenuously espous'd by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Roberts, &c.

A. D. 1679. There was one Thomas Hunt, Esq; a doughty Author, who wrote for the Affirmative in this grand Question; but in the Negative appear'd the Lord Hollis, assisted by those famous Antiquaries, William Petty, Esq; of the Inner Temple; and Mr. Atwood, of Gray's Inn: but I have often thought how Titus, Timothy, and the Primitive Christian Bishops, would have taken it to have been put upon Trials in Cases of Blood; and yet the Then Bishops were very hard to be persuaded to withdraw in such a Case, which there is not one Layman in a thousand, but would be glad to be excused from, it being a kind of Jury upon Life and Death. The Commons were not satisfy'd with their involuntary withdrawing, and leaving a Protest behind them, that it was their Right to assist in Trials of Blood; and resolv'd on the 24th of May, that they would not proceed to the Trial of the Popish Lords, before Judgment be given on the Earl of Danby's Pardon. They also voted, that no Commoner should plead the Validity of that Pardon at the Lords Bar; and upon this Difference between the two Houses, his Majesty three Days after prorogu'd them to the 24th of August, as well to screen the five Popish impeach'd Lords, as the Earl of Danby. The Force of whose Prosecution, says the judicious Acherley, could not be avoided or baffled, but by resorting to that inglorious Practice of dispersing the Parliament, and deserting the Course of Justice.

Bishops censured. The Bishops Behaviour on this occasion was much censur'd, and they lost the Good-will of the People so generally, that they thought of securing their Honour, Revenues, Powers, and Prerogatives, by asserting the unlimited Authority of the Sovereign, and the indispensable Duty of the Subject in Passive Obedience. My Lord of Sarum acknowledges, the Bishops were exposed to the Popular Fury, and every where censur'd, as a Set of Men, that for their own Ends, and for every Punctilio that they pretended to, would expose the Nation, and the Protestant Religion to ruin. The greater part of the Clergy delivered themselves up to much Heat and Indiscretion, which was vented both in their Pulpits, and common Conversation, and most particularly at the Elections of Parliament-Men, which drew much Hatred and Censure upon them: They seem'd now to lay down all Fears and Apprehensions of Popery; and nothing was so common in their Mouths, as the Year Forty-One; being so ignorant and stupid, as not to know, that the very Parliament that brought in the King, justify'd the Cause of the Forty-One Parliament, till the Force was put on them by the Soldiery, and that it was founded in Right and Reason. But indeed, the Stupidity and Ignorance of those Pulpiteers, were equal to their Malice and Rage; Bishop Burnet informs us, that they learn'd their Lessons of the execrable L'Estrange, who corrupted them, and the vilest Part of the People, with his Penny Papers; and out of this Corruption grew that odious Faction, call'd Tories, a Name given to the wildest of the Wild Irish.

Moderate Churchmen, and Protestant Dissenters, thought it high time to oppose those dangerous Tenets, which insensibly led them to Popery and Slavery; and this they did with great Zeal in and out of Parliament; for which their lewd Adversaries fix'd the Term Whig upon them, by way of Reproach, as being such another Sort of Men, as the Cameronian Covenanters in Scotland: And from these Beginnings rose at this time, the two Parties which have since divided the Nation.

Bill of Exclusion. Before the Prorogation of the Parliament, the Bill of Exclusion was brought into the House of Commons, as the only way to quiet Peoples Fears on account of the Duke's Succession. The Leaders in both Houses who were for it, had well consider'd the Matter before this bold, but necessary Step, was agreed upon: The Earl of Shaftesbury's Project was for excluding him simply, and making the Succession to go on as if he was dead, as the only Mean which was easy and safe both for the Crown and the People. This was nothing but the disinheriting the next Heir; which certainly the King and Parliament might do, says the Bishop of Salisbury, as well as any private Man might disinheret his next Heir, if he had a mind to it. The King would not consent to this. He had faithfully promis'd the Duke that he never would. And he thought if Acts of Exclusion were once begun, it would not be easy to stop them, but that upon any Discontent at the next Heir, they would be set a-foot. But the King's Thoughts ran upon every thing more than the Security of the Religion and Liberty of his Country. People will never be discontented at the next Heir, unless their Liberty and Religion are in the utmost danger, and then to set a-foot Exclusion, is both just and necessary. People are not so delighted with the Difficulties and Dangers in altering Successions, as to run into it out of Humour or Wantonness. The truth is, King Charles hated the Constitution of England, as it is Free and Protestant, and did not care what became of it, as long as his Family was in the Saddle. The Earl of Effex, and the Lord Hallifax propos'd such Limitations of the Duke's Authority, when the Crown should devolve to him, as would disable him from doing any Harm either to Church or State: Such as the taking out of his hands all Power in Ecclesiastical Matters, the Disposal of the publick Money, with the Power of Peace and War: All these to be lodg'd in both Houses of Parliament; and that whatever Parliament was in being, or the last that had been in being at the King's Death, should meet without a new Summons; which, with other Limitations, was by the King's Command propos'd to the Parliament in a Speech of the Lord Finch's. The Lord Shaftesbury argu'd against it, as much more prejudicial to the Crown, than the Exclusion of one Heir; for this chang'd the whole Government, and set up a Democracy instead of a Monarchy. Bishop Burnet observes, "That Lord Hallifax's arguing so much against the Danger of turning the Monarchy to be elective, was the more extraordinary in him, because he had made an Hereditary Monarchy the Subject of his Mirth; and had often said, Who takes a Coach-man to drive him, because his Father was a good Coachman? Yet he was now jealous of a small Slip in the Succession; but he at the same time study'd to infuse into some a Zeal for a Commonwealth, of which, as appears by his Writings, he thought as favourably as a Man could do, who expected still more Honours from the King; who, in good Reigns, is the Fountain of all Honour. Upon this Difference of Opinion, a Faction was quickly form'd in the new Council. The Lords Effex, Sunderland, and Hallifax, were for Limitations. The Lord Shaftesbury, Lord Russel, and Mr. Powle, were for the Exclusion. Sir William Temple all this while trimm'd between both. He was probably in opinion for the Exclusion; but finding the King so inflexibly against it, he talk'd to him of Limitations only. The Duke was struck almost dead when he heard the News at Brussels, that the Lord Chancellor had propos'd the Limitations to both Houses of Parliament: My Lord of Sarum informs us, That he saw a Letter ter written by his Dutcheſs the next Day, wherein ſhe wrote, That as for all the HIGH Things which were ſaid by their Enemies, they look'd for them; but the Speech of the Lord Chancel- lor's was a Surprize, and a great Mortification to them. Their Apprehenſions of that did not hang long upon them. The Excluſion became the popular Expedient. Accordingly, after much debating, a Bill was order'd for excluding the Duke of York. Indeed the Limitations ſeem'd to be, as was then ſaid, Hedging in the Cuckow

by the Wiſe Men of Gotham. Were not the Practices of the Stuartine Race too well known for them to be truſted again in the Bonds of Acts of Parliament? Had not all of thoſe Princes broke thro' all ſuch Obligations? Nay, had not this very King been limited by the Triennial Act, which Limitation he ſoon got over, and inſtead of three Years, kept his Parliament twice three times three Years? I do not repeat the Biſhop of Salisbury's many Arguments for and againſt the Excluſion Bill, becauſe we who have liv'd ſince, and have ſeen the want of that Exclu-ſion make an Abdication Act neceſſary, after great Tyranny and Oppreſſion, muſt deteſt or deſpiſe all Arguments againſt it; and for it, is to be added, every Argument that was for the Revolution. When the Queſtion was put in the Houſe for committing the Bill of Excluſion, the Yeas were 207, the No's 128; but it went no farther that Session.

Before I proceed to the Inquiry into the State of the Penſion Affair in the laſt Parliament, I muſt correct an Error in Biſhop Burnet's Memoirs relating to the Biſhops Votes in capital Caſes. The reverend Author tells us, that Dr. Stillingfleet gave, upon this Occaſion, a great Proof of his being able to make himſelf Maſter of any Argument which he undertook. If the Biſhop of Salisbury ever read his Controverſy with Mr. Locke, he could not but ſee he was not Maſter of that Argument; and we are told, his being baffled in it was one means of ſhortening his Days. In this Argument, he did not drive Lord Hollis off the Stage, as Biſhop Burnet tells us; After the Lord Hollis and others had writ many Books about it, Stillingfleet publiſh'd a Treatiſe that diſcover'd more Skill: whereas that Lord wrote after Dr. Stillingfleet, whom he mentions in the Preface to his Conſiderations, in anſwer to the Doctor's grand Queſtion.

" read a ſecond Time."

Theſe Members are the ſame of whom Echard ſaid, when they were paſſing the afore-ſaid Acts, they were the richeſt, the wiſeſt, and worthieſt Gentlemen in the Kingdom.

The Practice was, that, beſides a Dinner, when they had done any Piece of eminent Service, every one found under his Plate ſuch a Parcel of Guineas, as it was thought his Day's Work had merited. Sir Richard Wiſeman and Sir John Copleſtone, were allow'd to keep Open-Houſe at the foot of the Parliament Stairs. So numerous were theſe Hirelings in that Aſſembly, that if any Point was carry'd there on the Side of the Country, it was often but by the poor Majority of two or three Voices. An Inſtance of their Integrity and Uprightneſs, appears in Mr. Bertie's Caſe,

A. D. 1679. Case, at a Committee of Elections between him and Mr. Trenchard: It being carry'd for Mr. Bertie, the Lord Obrian, who was related to the then Lord Treasurer the Earl of Danby, came to him in triumph with the News, crying out, My Lord, we have carry'd the Day, and voted thirteen more than one-and-twenty. The Charges of the Election of the Pensioners were defray'd, that of Northampton amounting to 14000 l. They all knew their Pay-day, insomuch that a great Officer was pleas'd to say, They came about him like so many Jackdaws for Cheese, at the End of every Sessions. But many of these Pensioners, finding at last that all was at stake, and that whatever they had of their own, as well as whatever they had got out of the Court, was in danger of being made a Prey to the French and Papists, began to be resty; and, tho' late, to atone for their past Errors, by their Zeal against both the Papists and the French. His Majesty himself ask'd a lofty West-Saxon, the Captain of the Band, What was the reason of this Revolt of some of the Troops? The West-Saxon reply'd, They had been of late neglected, and the Beasts only bellow'd for Fodder.

By the Records of the Exchequer, under the Article of Secret Service, it appears there was paid in three Years 294,916 l. 11 s. 4 d. in Mr. Bertie's Name, besides 84,640 l. to be distributed by him in New-Year's Gifts, as he should be privately directed.

On the 10th of May, both Houses of Parliament address'd the King, that for the Security of the City against the Designs of the Papists, the Militia be immediately rais'd. And the next Day being Sunday, the Commons resolv'd, Nemine Contradicente, That in defence of the King's Person, and the Protestant Religion, this House doth declare, That they will stand by his Majesty with their Lives and Fortunes; and that if his Majesty should come by any violent Death, they will revenge it to the utmost upon the Papists. Which Vote was drawn up in form of an Address, and presented to the King; whose Answer was, Gentlemen, I thank you for your Zeal for the Preservation of the Protestant Religion, and of my Person. And I assure you I shall do what in me lies, to secure the Protestant Religion, and am willing to do all such Things as may tend to the Good and Benefit of my Subjects. Three Days after, Mr. Powle brought a Message from him for Money for a Fleet, but the Commons put off the Debate of it, tho' they seem'd to have more Care of the King than he had of himself: For as Coke observes, He not only countenanc'd the Plotters, but ridicul'd the Plot. In his Speech at the opening of this Parliament, he told them, He had not been idle in discovering the Plot; and in the last, told Sir William Temple he was displeas'd with the Earl of Danby, for bringing it into Parliament against his absolute Command. This is what the Arch-deacon calls his fine Talent of Dissimulation; which is as inconsistent with Honour, as Fraud is with Honesty. But he did not so well dissemble as not to be perceiv'd. Coke adds, Oliver's Professions and Actions never appear'd so hypocritical and deceitful, as this King's. As to the Plot, the same Author proceeds; "It was prov'd by a Cloud of Witnesses, agreeing in the Manner and Circumstances of it; many of whom had never seen one another before they gave their Testimonies." Then he answers a threadbare Objection, much insisted upon by Mr. Echard, and not a little by Bishop Burnet. Tho' they both seem to me to object superciliously, because they would not be thought credulous, and to have weak Minds, which are soon impos'd on. The

The King's Dissimula-
tion.

Objection is, The Witnesses were of suspected Fame, and therefore no Credit ought to be given to them; which, according to Coke, will admit of a two-fold Answer.

"First, Truth is one, and consists in entire Parts; whereas Error and Falshood are infinite; and therefore it had been impossible, that Mowbray and Bolron, two of the Witnesses, who had never seen Oates and Bedloe, two other Witnesses, before they gave their Testimonies; and Bedloe, who had never known Mowbray, Bolron, nor Oates, should concur not only in the Design of killing the King, but in the Manner, Place and Circumstances of it.

"Secondly, Admit these Mens Evidences might not have been credited in other Cases; but it is fit to distinguish Cases Criminal from Cases Civil. In Civil Cases, Men may make Elections of what Witnesses they please; and it is their fault if they make not use of Men of known Integrity and Repute, that more Credit may be given to their Evidence; and the End of Civil Actions and Contracts is, that they may be known: but immoral and wicked Actions are Deeds of Darkeness, and contriv'd so as that they may not be known; and one never comes to the Knowledge of them, unless by accident, or from the Conspirators themselves. Suppose one Man only sees a Murderer, or a Thief kill or rob another, if his Testimony shall not be taken, because he is otherwise an ill Man, multitudes of Murders and Thefts might pass unpunished. Thus, if Cicero, when Fulvia first discover'd Catiline's Conspiracy to him, had told her she was a Whore, and no Credit was to be given to any thing she said, Rome might have been in a flame as London was, and all the Senators Throats might have been cut.

"But admit no Credit could be given to any or all these Mens Testimonies, who were all Roman Catholicks, I would know what Objection could be against Mr. Jennison, a Gentleman of Birth and Fortune, who gave no Evidence at Ireland's, Wakeman's, Pickering's or Grove's Trials, and chang'd his Religion, when he heard that Ireland, who was his Father Confessor, at his Death, deny'd he was in Town, but in Staffordshire, when Oates and Grove's Maid said he was in London in August 1678; whereas he knew the contrary, and depos'd, that in August 1678, when Ireland, at his Death, declar'd he was in Staffordshire, Ireland told Mr. Jennison in London, when he was newly return'd from Windsor, how easily the King might be taken off, and ask'd Mr. Jennison if he would be one of them, who should go to Windsor, and assist at the taking off the King, proffering to remit 200 Pounds, which Jennison ow'd Ireland, if he would. Then Ireland ask'd if he knew any stout Irish Men; Jennison answer'd, he knew Capt. Lavalian, Mr. Kerney, Brohal and Wilson. Ireland told him, he knew Lavalian and Wilson, and ask'd him again if he would go with them, and assist them in taking off the King. He then said he was going to the Club, where Mr. Coleman, Mr. Lavalian and Kerney would be, and he wanted 80 Pounds, which he desir'd Jennison to return him. The latter farther depos'd, That his Brother Mr. Thomas Jennison, a Jesuit, said, If C. R. will not be R. C. he shall not be long C. R. which he interpreted to be, Si Carolus Rex non esset Rex Catholicus, non diu foret Rex Carolus. If King Charles will not be a Catho-

"lick King, he shall not be long King Charles; and that it was no great Sin to take him off. Jennison desiring a Commission in the new-raised Army, his Brother the Jesuit told him, he would procure him one from the Duke of York; and that there was another Army to be raised after the King was killed. About this time there was a general Rumour of a Page being stabbed upon a Couch in the Night at Windsor. The King, who had been drinking very hard, lay down upon it, wrapt up in his Cloak; but Prince Rupert coming to him, with some difficulty prevail'd on him to go to Bed. The King throws off his Cloak, which a Page seeing on the Couch, wrapt himself up in it, and lay down on the Couch, where 'tis suppos'd he was stabbed in mistake for the King, who had been dogg'd to that Place."

Being come to the Trials of more of the Plotters, I was willing to clear up the Evidence against them still further; and this of Jennison proves the Lye in Ireland's Mouth, even with his last Breath; and that he propos'd the killing of the King to him in London, at the very time when, with his last Words, he declar'd he was in Staffordshire. The Particulars of Jennison's Testimony have that Air of Nature and Truth, that 'tis impossible not to be convinc'd by them; and as it confirms the Testimonies of Oates, Bedloe, Dugdale, &c. there is no room to suspect Imposture in the latter. What said an ingenious Writer, contemporary with these Facts! These and innumerable other Discouragements hath the Plot met with, which, being observ'd, together with the due Circumstances of the Evidence, I think, no Man that is not in the whole or part of the Plot himself, can doubt the Truth of it. Indeed, at the first, many thought to cast a Suspicion upon what Oates and Bedloe inform'd, as being two Persons of vicious Life and Conversation. But how ridiculous is this? As if such Rogues would trust such a Villany with honest Men, or any but those that had been as bad as themselves; you might as well expect a Highway-man should go and acquaint my Lord Chief Justice, when and where he meant to commit the next Robbery. So that from the Nature of the Evidence, or Credit of the Informants, no Man can take exception against the Information of Dr. Oates, or Mr. Bedloe, or any of the rest, to whom Mr. Jennison has lately given no small Credit, in discovering the four Villains, that, as Mr. Oates had said, were to have assassinated his Majesty.

sullen.

The King, upon the Prorogation of the Parliament, became sullen and thoughtful. He found he had to do with People that could neither be manag'd nor frighten'd. From this time his Temper was observ'd to change very visibly. He began to give hard Names to Things and Persons, and the Plot hanging on him still, he knew not how to meet his Parliament, without continuing the Prosecution of the Plotters; so five of the Jesuits that had been accus'd of it, were brought to their Trial: They were, Thomas Whitebread, their Provincial; William Harcourt, the reputed Rector of London; John Fenwick, their Procurator in England; John Gawen and Anthony Turner, Men of great Gravity and Learning, says Echard. Oates repeated against them his former Evidence, and they prepar'd a great Defence against it. For sixteen People came over from their House at St. Omers, who testify'd, that Oates had stay'd among them all the while, from December 77, till June 78; so that he could not possibly be in London in the April between, at those Consultations, where it was resolv'd to kill the King, as he had sworn. This they re-member'd the more particularly, because he sat at the Table by himself in the Refectory, which made his being there to be the more observ'd; for as he was not mix'd with the Scholars, so neither was he admitted to the Jesuit's Table. They said he was among them every day, except one or two, in which he was in the Infirmary. They also testified, that some of those, whom he swore came over with him into England, to the Grand Consultation in April, staid all that Summer in Flanders. This Evidence gives great Satisfaction to Mr. Archdeacon, who does not seem to be at all pleas'd with what follows. Oates produc'd seven or eight Persons, who depos'd, that they saw him in England about the beginning of May, and that he being known formerly to them in a Clergyman's Habit, they had observ'd him so much the more, by reason of the Change in his Dress; with one of these he had din'd. Echard adds the Testimony of an Islington Schoolmaster to the same purpose, only because he afterwards retracted it. *Tho' then he spoke home, which no body else did, a notorious Falstity; for the Person who swore Oates din'd with him, at the time the St. Omers Boys swore he din'd in Flanders, spoke home. But there was another Evidence that spoke still more home, and that was an old Dominican Friar, who was still of the Church and Order, and depos'd, that he saw him, and spoke frequently with him at that very time. By this, says Bishop Burnet, the Credit of the St. Omers Scholars was quite blasted. There was no reason to mistrust those who had no Interest in the matter, and swore, that they saw Oates about that time; whereas the Evidence given by the Scholars bred in the Jesuits College, when it was to save the Lives of some of their Order, was liable to a very just Suspicion. Oates, says Echard, produc'd one, and but one Witness, who did affirm, they saw Ireland in London, when he swore he was there; but I can produce two Witnesses, as Grove's Maid, and Mr. Jennison, both before mention'd. Bedloe swore the Plot for killing the King, and raising a Popish Army, against them all; and Prance swore it against Harcourt. Dugdale gave in the Evidence before spoken of, the Letter from Whitebread to Evers about the Assassins hir'd to kill the King. He also mention'd the Letter he had receiv'd concerning Sir Edmondbury Godfrey's Murder, which the Lord Chief Justice took particular notice of, in summing up the Evidence, and when he spoke to the Prisoners: *This will stick, I assure you, Sirs, upon all your Party. While this Gentleman's Blood lies upon you, it must be yet further told you, that in what you did do, you have given us a Specimen of what you would do. We have a Testimony, that, for promoting your Cause, you would not stick at the Protestants' Blood. You began with Sir Edmondbury Godfrey; but who knows where you would have made an end? It was this Man you kill'd in his Person, but in Effigy the whole Nation. It was in one Man's Blood your Hands were imbrued; but your Souls were dipt in the Blood of us all. This was a Handset only of what was to follow; and so long as we are convinc'd you kill'd him, we cannot but believe you would also kill the King. We cannot but believe you would make us all away, that stand in the way of your Religion. A Religion which, according to what it is, you would bring in upon us, by a Conversion of us with Blood, and by a Baptism with Fire. God keep the Land from one, and the City from the other. The Jury, after a short Consideration, brought all the five Prisoners in guilty. But Sentence was respited till the next day, June 14th.

A. D. 1679. When Richard Langhorn Esq; Counsellor at Law, of the Temple, and a bigotted Papist, was brought to his Trial at the Old Bailey. Oates swore he saw a Letter of his to a Foreign Papist, where he had written with his own Hand, We have now a fair Opportunity to begin or give the Blow; that by order of Whitebread, he gave Mr. Langhorn an Account of the Resolve at the Grand Consult, April the 24th, to kill the King; and that Langhorn lifting up his Hands and Eyes, said, God give you a good Success. That he saw several Commissions in his Chambers, sign'd by Johannes Paulus de Oliva, by virtue of a Brief from the Pope; as one to Lord Arundel, to be Lord Chancellor; to Lord Powis, to be Treasurer; and to Langhorn himself, to be Advocate General; that he was disgusted that G. Wakeman was not content with 10000 Pounds to poison the King. Bedloe swore that he brought Letters from Harcourt to Langhorn, specifying, that the Lord Bellasis, and the rest concern'd, should be ready, for that their Spanish Correspondents had sent some Irish disbanded Soldiers to land at Milford, &c. Langhorn made use of the St. Omers Boys; but their Evidence seem'd to be so baffled, that it serv'd him in no stead; and the Jury having brought him in Guilty, he and the five Jesuits receiv'd Sentence together, to be hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, at the pronouncing of which there was a very great Acclamation in the Hall. They all of them suffer'd at Tyburn; and went off like Ireland, denying the Facts prov'd against them with their last Breath; but their Denials made no Impression on the People, the Belief being general, that they thought it lawful to utter the greatest Falshoods and Lyes in favour of their Religion and Cause.

Scroggs check'd. The Court began to grow weary of indulging the zealous Protestants in the Prosecution of the Plot; and it was intimated to Scroggs, the Chief Justice, that he must abate of his Fury, if he hop'd for Pavour; and we shall find he will change his Tone in the Trial of Sir George Wakeman, and turn his Rage against the Witnesses, which he had hitherto very inhumanly employ'd against the Criminals.

Turns against the Evidence. The Division in the new Privy Council, made the King as uneasy as the ill Humour of the Parliament. The Time of the Prorogation being almost expir'd, and Matters not very well prepar'd for their Meeting, most of the Lords of the Council were for putting off the Session to October; and a Day was appointed for considering the Matter in full Council. The Earls of Sunderland, Essex, the Lord Hallifax, and Sir William Temple, were for dissolving this Parliament, and calling a new one. The Duke of Monmouth, now in the height of his Glory and Interest, the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Lord Russell, and Lord Cavendish, were for the Parliament's meeting; so was the Lord Chancellor Finch, and the first that spoke against the Dissolution, in which he was powerfully seconded by the Earl of Shaftesbury, and even by the Marquis of Worcester, the Earls of Arlington and Anglesey, who had not been consult'd with before hand, and knew nothing of the King's Intention, which being explain'd to them by Sir William Temple, 'twas carry'd, that the Parliament should be dissolv'd, and his Majesty order'd the Chancellor to draw up a Proclamation for it, the 10th of July; in which also a new Parliament was summon'd to meet the 19th of October. But the Dissolution gave general Disgust; and I do not see wherein Sir William Temple and his three Associates, Essex, Sunderland and Hallifax, shew'd their Wisdom or their Love to their Country, by putting the King upon it. What a senseless Reflection have we in Echard, on the Zeal of the Protestant Party against Papists in the new Elections. The Leaders increas'd the Noise of Popery, French Pensioners, and Arbitrary Government; as if Matters, so well known, and prov'd, were nothing but the Noise and Clamour of Faction. Had the King no Pension from France? Had the Commons, who voted the persecuting Acts, no Pensions from the King? Was not the late perpetual Prorogations and Dissolutions of Parliaments, Arbitrary Government?

The Trial of Sir George Wakeman, Physician to the Queen, William Marshal and James Wakecorker, two Benedictine Monks, and William Rumsley, a Lay-Brother of that Order, came on at the Old Baily, the 18th of July, before Scroggs Lord Chief Justice, and other Judges, who had been acquainted with the Disposition of the Court in this Matter. Oates swore, That the Prisoner, in the Month of July 78, sending a Letter to Ashby the Jesuit, of Instructions, how he should order himself, before he went to and at the Bath, whither he was going, did afterwards in the same Letter write, The Queen will assist me to poison the King; which he knew to be his Hand-writing, because, some two days after, he saw Sir George at Ashby's Lodging, sit in a writing Posture, and then lay by his Pen, and rose up, and going away, left behind him a written Paper wet with the Ink, being an Apothecary's Bill; and the Hand of this Paper, so left by Sir George, was the same with that of the foremention'd Letter to Ashby. He further swore, that he was to have 15000 Pounds for poisoning the King; and that he saw a Receipt sign'd by Wakeman, for 5000 Pounds, part of the 15000. And Bedloe depos'd, that he heard Harcourt and Wakeman treat about poisoning the King, and saw Harcourt deliver Wakeman a Bill for 2000 Pounds, part of the 15000, saying, Sir George, this must be well follow'd, because so much depends upon it; for if we should miss to kill him at Windsor, or you miss in your way, we will do it at Newmarket. Echard owns, that as soon as Bedloe had given this Evidence, Wakeman said privately to his Fellow Prisoners, There is my Business done. The Testimony given by Oates is very plain and positive; so is Bedloe's, nothing can be plainer; and the first Proof Wakeman produc'd against it, was as weak and trifling as one as ever was produc'd by Guilt, a piece of a Letter of Directions to Ashby, wherein the Queen was not nam'd; and when Oates said that was not the Letter he saw, Wakeman, says Echard, argued, how improbable it was, he should write two Letters about the same Thing. Tho' nothing is more probable, than that a Physician might write two Letters about the same Thing to his Patient, at the latter's Importunity or Desire to have some Particulars farther explain'd, or on some Alteration in the Distemper, or Miscarriage of a former Letter, or that a Letter might be written on purpose to confront Oates's Evidence. As to Sir Philip Floyd's witnessing, that Oates had, before the Council, declar'd the Letter about Wakeman's poisoning the King, was from Whitebread to Fenwick; and that with Hands up-lifted, Oates should say, God forbid I should accuse Sir George Wakeman, for I know nothing more of him: 'tis too Theatrical to be genuine; but if it were, every one knew that Oates had then pass thro' a long fatiguing Examination, that his Spirits were quite spent. Coke tells us, Oates was then so tir'd, weak, and confounded with his other Evidence, that he was scarce able to stand; and his Head not being the most clear, at the best, it is not at all strange, that it was then so

A. D. 1679. A new one call'd.

A. D. 1679. confus'd, as to forget many Passages, which he recover'd upon Recollection. The truth is this:

Scroggs was a lewd, insolent, mercenary Wretch, who would not have been suffer'd on a Bench of Justice in better Times; and it is astonishing that he did ever let his Rage loose against the Popish Assassins and Conspirators. The Court permitted him at first to cajole the People; but as soon as he understood it was not pleasing to the King, he endeavour'd to atone for the past, by his shameless Behaviour towards the Witnesses for the future. Bishop Burnet tells us, this wicked Judge was more valu'd for a Readiness in Speaking, than either for Learning in his Profession, or any moral Virtue. His Life was indecently scandalous, and his Fortunes were very low. He was rais'd by the Earl of Danby's Favour. And it was a melancholy thing to see so bad, so ignorant, so poor a Man rais'd up to that great Post. When he saw the King had an ill Opinion of the Plot, he grew cold in the Pursuit of it. He began to neglect and check the Witnesses. This is the unjust Judge, whom Echard extols for his strict Carriage, and a bragging Speech he made concerning Wakeman's Trial, upon the first day of Michaelmas Term; That he was neither afraid nor asham'd of what he had done. And the Reverend Historian adds, Master Justice Jones, and Master Justice Dolben, appear'd as Compurgators of the Honesty and Integrity of the Chief Justice. If there is one Minister or Magistrate viler than another, he does not fail to load him with Eulogy. Sir William Jones, the supposed Author of the just and modest Vindication of the two last Parliaments, and the greatest Lawyer of his Time, says, not only Scroggs, but his Compurgators behav'd themselves very unlike the same Men they were. Nor did they fear the Perversion of Justice, but the Misapplication of Mercy, &c. Wakeman and the Priests were by their nefarious Conduct acquitted; but Wakeman did not think fit to trust again to his Innocence; for he fled out of England as soon as he got his Liberty. I have intimated elsewhere, that I believe People were mistaken in their Censures of the Queen, with respect to the Popish Plot; but it is very natural to think, that the chief Plotters gave out they were countenanc'd by her, to engage and hearten others in the Plot. The Queen got a Man of great Quality to be sent over Ambassador from Portugal, not knowing how much she might stand in need of such a Protection. For both Oates and Bedloe had depos'd at Wakeman's Trial, that they were told, she was to assist him to poison the King. The Ambassador went the next day, with great State, to thank Scroggs, and probably to pay him for his good Offices in that Trial. The Bishop of Salisbury writes of it; If he meant well by this Compliment, it was very unadvisedly done; for the Chief Justice was expos'd to much Censure by it.

An Incident or two of great Importance happening now in Scotland, we must review the Transactions in that Kingdom, and in Ireland, from the Time where we left off.

Scotland.

The Duke of Lauderdale had master'd all Opposition in Scotland so entirely, that there seem'd no room for the least hope of Relief against the Tyranny of a Person universally hated and abhorr'd. The Field-Meetings encreas'd mightily. Men came to them arm'd, and great Numbers were out-law'd upon it. A Writ was issu'd, which was in the obsolete Laws, call'd Intercommuning, because it made all who harbour'd such Persons, or did not seize them when they had it in their power, to be involv'd in the same Guilt. By this means many apprehending a severe Prosecution, left their Houses, and went about in Bands, which the Privy Council pretended was a State of War.

And upon an old Statute, which was almost quite forgotten, it was maintain'd, that the King had a Power to take any Castle, that lay convenient for his Forces, and put a Garrison in it: Thus twelve Houses were mark'd out, of which, two were the chief Dwelling-Houses of two Peers: The rest were the Houses of Gentlemen, who had gone into the Party against Duke Lauderdale. And tho' these were Houses of no strength, and not at all properly situated for the suppressing of Field Meetings; yet they were taken, and Soldiers put in them, whom the Countries about were requir'd to furnish with all Necessaries, which was against the express Words of the Law, that had lately settled the Militia; and an Act of Tyranny, as enormous as ever was committed by Lewis XIV. Great Opposition was made to it; yet it was kept up above a Year, till the Houses were quite ruin'd by the rude Soldiers; who understood, that the more Waste they made, it would be the more acceptable. One Carstairs, a loose sort of a Gentleman, propos'd to Sharp, Archbishop of St. Andrews, to go disguis'd to the Field Meetings, and carry some Persons with him, to witness against Preachers, and others whom they saw there. Among others, Carstairs happen'd to see a noted Minister, one Mr. Kirkton, who was a very cautious Man, and had been very seldom at those Meetings: Carstairs seeing him afterwards in Edinburgh, pretended he had a Warrant, and would carry him to Gaol, unless he would give him Money, which Kirkton refusing, Carstairs offer'd Violence; and the famous Mr. Baillie, of Jerviswood, Brother-in-Law to Kirkton, deliver'd the latter out of his hands; for which, the Privy Council fin'd Mr. Baillie 500 l. tho' Carstairs had no Warrant to seize Kirkton. 'Tis true, he got one afterwards, and it was antedated, but he was asham'd to shew it: Duke Hamilton, and Lord Kincardin were turn'd out of the Council, for opposing this Injustice. We have mention'd the cruel Proceedings against Mr. Mitchel for an Assault on Sharp, which so irritated a disgusted People against him, that he might well be apprehensive of some other such Attempt; especially considering, that the Protestants in Scotland were now labouring under greater Hardships than the Protestants in France.

The Field Meetings continuing, and encreasing, Duke Lauderdale threaten'd to extirpate them, and ruin the whole Country if a stop was not put to them; tho' the neighbouring Gentlemen represented to him, that the Covenanters dispers'd themselves quietly to their several Habitations, after Praying and Preaching were over, so they said there was no harm done; which not satisfying Lauderdale, a new Motion was set on foot in the Western Parts of Scotland: All Landlords were requir'd to enter into Bonds for themselves, their Wives, Children, Servants, Tenants, and all that liv'd upon their Estates; that they should not go to the Field Meetings, nor harbour any vagrant Teachers, or any inter-commun'd Persons. This was generally refus'd by them, as a thing they could not perform; they could not be answerable for their Servants, much less their Tenants; and if any of their Tenants, or Servants, did, tho' out of spite, and to do them a mischief, get into such an Assembly, their Bond would be forfeited. Upon which, Lauderdale wrote to the King, that the Country was in a State of Rebellion, and that it was necessary to proceed to Hostilities. Accordingly all the Forces then in Scotland were sent into the West

A. D. 1679.

A. D. 1679. West Country, with some Cannon, as if they were going on some dangerous Expedition: Letters were written to the Lords in the Highlands, to send all the Strength they could, to assist the King's Army. The Marquis of Athol, never backward in any such righteous Cause, sent 2400 Men; the Earl of Braidalbin, 1700; and others so many, that 8000 Highlanders were brought into the Country; and, as my Lord of Sarum informs us, let loose upon free Quarter. Here was an Army, but no Enemy appear'd. The Highlanders were very unruly, and stole and robb'd every where. The Gentlemen of the Country were requir'd to deliver up their Arms, and to keep no Horse above four Pounds Price. The Gentlemen look'd on, and would do nothing, which put Lauderdale into such a Frenzy, that at the Council-Table He, that old rank Presbyterian Covenanter, made bare his Arms above his Elbow, and swore by Jehovah, he would make them enter into those Bonds. Duke Hamilton, and others, who were vex'd to see such Waste made on their Estates, especially in Plowing-Time, went to Edinburgh, to try if it was possible to mollify him: But a Proclamation was issued out, requiring all the Inhabitants of those Countries to go to their Houses, to be assis- tant to the King's Host; and to obey such Orders, as should be sent them: And by another Procla- mation, all Men were forbidden to go out of the Kingdom, without Leave from the Council, who were only Tools to the Monster that was at the Head of them. Bishop Burnet writes, These things seem'd done to force a Rebellion, which they thought would be soon quash'd; and give a Colour to keep up a standing Army, which Duke Lauderdale's Party depended on so much, that they began to divide in their Hopes the con- fiscated Estates among them: So that on Valen- tine's Day, instead of drawing Mistresses, they drew Estates; and great Joy appear'd in their Looks, upon a false Alarm that was brought them of an Insurrection; and they were as much dejected, when they knew it was false.

To force a

These Ruffians and Robbers are all this while pretending Zeal for Episcopacy, and that they will extirpate the Presbyterians, if they cannot extirpate Presbytery. Can a Set of Villains without Morals, without Principles sacred or civil, have any Regard to Religion? The Brutality of the persecuting Pagans equals not that of Lau- derdale. The arbitrary Acts of the Governments of Morocco, or Moscow, come not up to those in Scotland in the Reign of Charles the II<sup>d</sup>, and in the Ministry of that loath'd Wretch Lauderdale, who is using all his damnable Arts, to drive the Scotch Protestants into Rebellion, that he might afterwards murder and plunder them. Bishop Burnet says, "It was happy for the publick Peace, that the People were universally pos- sels'd with this Opinion; for when they saw a Rebellion was desir'd, they bore the present Oppression more quietly, than perhaps they would have done." The next Project of Lau- derdale's to force a Rebellion, was the putting in suit an old obsolete Writ, call'd Law Borough, because us'd chiefly in Boroughs, by which all who were serv'd with it, were oblig'd to give Sureties for the good Behaviour, not only of themselves, but of their Families. Duke Hamil- ton, who had notice that it was design'd to serve it upon him, took with him about twelve Noble- men, and fifty Gentlemen of Quality, and went to London to complain of all this; which, says the Bishop, look'd like French, or rather like Turkish Government. Lauderdale being alarm'd at it, dismiss'd the Highlanders, after they had wasted the West of Scotland above two Months;

but he was more afraid than he needed have been, for the King took all his arbitrary Acts upon himself, by refusing to see Duke Hamilton, and the Scots Noblemen; and he was so delight- ed with Lauderdale's Management, that tho' he believ'd he was crazy, he would not disown him. My Lord Bishop adds, All People said, that by the Management in SCOTLAND, it ap- pear'd what was the Spirit of the Government, and what would be done in England, as soon as the Designs of the Court were brought to a greater Perfection. He observes further, that the Lord Chancellor Finch oppos'd the Scots Noblemen and Gentlemen, when they were allow'd a Hear- ing before the Council. And Lauderdale, in their absence, on a sudden summon'd a Convention of the Estates, among whom, by Corruption, he got a great Majority; who gave Money for main- taining a greater Force, and wrote a Letter to the King, not only justifying, but magnifying Duke Lauderdale's Government; so base and so abject a Thing, that it brought the whole Nation under great Contempt!

Upon the Discovery of the Papist-Plot in Eng- land, the Disgrace of the Earl of Danby, and the Removal of the Duke of York, who were Lau- derdale's chief Supporters, the Scots Lords and Gentlemen renew'd their Complaints against him, and were allow'd a Hearing by the King; and it was prov'd, that his giving free Quarter to the Soldiers and Highlanders in the West of Scot- land, was against the whole Constitution and ex- press Laws of the Kingdom. The Earls of Es- sex and Hallifax, who were at the hearing, told Bishop Burnet, That every thing was made out fully; and Mr. May said, he asking the King in a familiar way, What do you think now of your Lauderdale? His Majesty answer'd, They have objected many damn'd Things he has done against them, but there is nothing objected that is against my Service. My Lord of Sarum reflects thus upon it: "Such are the Notions that many Kings drink in, by which they set up an In- terest for themselves, in opposition to the In- terest of the People. And as soon as the Peo- ple observe that, which they will do sooner or later, they will then naturally mind their own Interest, and set it up as much in opposition to the Prince. And in this Contest, the People will grow always too hard for the Prince."

In the mean time, all the Year 1677 and 1678, Lauderdale's Tyranny continu'd to provoke the People to Action, which they carefully avoided; but whenever they held their Field-Meetings, they had always a Party of 30, 40, 50 or 60 young Men, who were Scouts, to observe the E- nemy, and give notice to the Assembly to sepa- rate; or, in case of surprize, to make Resistance while the old Men, Women, and Children got off: And this Bravery of theirs for some time gave a Check to the Fury of the Prelates and their Instruments, such as Graham Laird of Claverhouse, afterwards Viscount Dundee, who died by the Sword at the Battle of Gillicranky in King William's Reign, when it was hop'd by all good Men, that he had been reserv'd for the Hal- ter: his Hands having been so often stain'd with the Blood of Innocents, that it is said he kill'd a- bove 100 Men in cold Blood, making it his busi- ness to pursue poor Protestants with a Crew of Dragoons and Highlanders. These military Ex- ecutions so exasperated some resolute Men a- mong the Covenanters, that they resolv'd to take vengeance on one of their chief Persecutors, the Laird of ——— a cruel bloody Man, who a few days before had butcher'd several of their Bre- thren in Fife. The Cameronians had not then thought of the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, who happen'd to be passing on the Road in his Coach as the five Covenanters were looking after this Laird: Whom missing, they resolv'd that Sharp the Archbishop should not escape them. So they rode after him, and coming up to his Coach, quickly stopp'd it, disarm'd his Servants, and gave him notice of their Resolutions; letting him know his Offences, his Apostacy, Perjury, Pride, Cruelty and Injustice, and exhorting him to make confession of his Guilt, to repent heartily of the Wickedness of his Life, and the innocent Blood he had shed, the Time being come that he was to die for the same.

It was some time before they could convince him they were in earnest, and he seem'd to smile at what they said about the Wickedness of his Life. His Daughter also, who was with him in the Coach, rail'd at them with much foul Language: But they caus'd her to come out of the Coach, and let him know that his Moments were very few; that they would wait for him yet a little while, and admonish'd him not to trifle with his Soul, but to call upon God for Mercy. After which, seeing them indeed in earnest, he began to beg for Life. But they soon gave him to understand, they were not to be put by their Purpose, and that there was no Mercy to be shewn to him who had shewn no Mercy. Upon which he began to think of Death; but instead of putting up Prayers to God, as his own Heart directed him, he pull'd a little Prayer-Book out of his Pocket, and was about to read over some Words to himself; at which those extempore Cameronians conceiv'd such Indignation, that they were all ready to fire at him. However, they waited yet a little longer, and call'd again upon him to commend his Soul to God's Mercy, for that he should immediately die; and accordingly they immediately fir'd upon him with their Pistols; and to rid him of Life with as little Torture as might be, they ran him thro' also with their Swords, the 3d of May. Echard's Account of this Incident, is a String of Falsities. He tells us, the Cameronians enquired after the Archbishop in a Village, whereas they met him accidentally on a Moor; that there were twelve Horsemen with Pistols, whereas there were but five; that they wounded the Postillion, and shot or hamstring'd the Coach-Horses; that they call'd him Dog, and, which I believe they might, Apostate, Betrayer of the Godly, Persecutor of Christ's Church: All which was literally true. That his Daughter came out of the Coach, and upon her Knees movingly begg'd her Father's Life; instead of which, she treated them with provoking Language, and came not out of the Coach till they caus'd her to do it; That the Reverence of his Person, and his compos'd Carriage surpris'd them.

I am weary of repeating so many Untruths in favour of a Prelate, who, tho' he did not deserve to die by these Hands, deserv'd to die by the Hands of the Hangman, for his barbarous and deceitful dealing with Mr. Mitchel before-mention'd; and we may remember a Saying of Bishop Burnet's on that occasion, What Sharp did then to preserve himself from such Practices, was probably that which both in the just Judgment of God, and the inflam'd Fury of Men, brought him two Tears after to such a dismal End. Echard introduces this Story with setting forth what an Influence the Earl of Shaftesbury's Speech in the House of Lords at Westminster, had on the depress'd Party in Scotland, insinuating, that the Impression it made on the Minds of the Scotts Presbyterians, produc'd such a terrible Effect, and he introduces his Account of the ensuing Tumult with a Falsity still more notorious; for he assures us, Mr. Huckston of Ratthillet, who join'd the Cameronians upon London-Hill about a Month after, was one of those that shot the Archbishop. Now Huckston was the only Man among them who endeavour'd to dissuade those that were looking after the Laird of — from Mem. Ch. meddling with Sharp; and when he could not Scotl. p. prevail with them, he rode off, and would have 209. no hand in it, as our Author informs us, who takes his Account from one of the Persons concern'd in that Business. From the same Author, I shall borrow the Story of the Borbwell-Brig War, which Echard makes so formidable, and offers it as another Effect of the Lord Shaftesbury's Speech; being so blind as not to see that the Scribler who made that Insinuation before him, did it to blacken that Lord, who had but too much reason to complain in his Speech, We have a little Sister, &c. of the tyrannical Government in Scotland, and the Insolence of the Ib. 195. Papists in Ireland.

There was a very great Meeting of the persecuted People in the Fields near London-Hill, where, by report, many Thousands met together. Their Intention was to have had the Communion, and to have made it a Day both of Humiliation and Rejoicing; a Day of Humiliation for the Apostacy of their Brethren, and for the Sins of the Land: And a Day of solemn Joy, for the Liberty of, and Affection of the People to, the Service and Worship of God.

As it was a very great Meeting, so the Number of Men was greater than were in Arms for their Defence, than was usual on other and ordinary Occasions, there being about 200 Men with Fire-Arms prepar'd for, and resolv'd to do their Parts with the Enemy, if they came, as was threaten'd, to disturb them.

Claverhouse, afterwards Dundee, having Information of this Assembly, prepared also to attack them, boasting what havock he would make of the Cameronians on that occasion. It seems he said, I hear they have some Fire-Men among them; but if they offer to make one Shot at my Men, I will save the Council and Courts of Justice the trouble of prosecuting my Prisoners with the Formality of the Law, for I will immediately hang up every one of them that falls into my hand, tho' I take 500 of them. It was confidently reported, that some of the Soldiers of his own Troops gave private notice of this, and of the Measures he had taken for assaulting the Meeting. For tho', generally speaking, the Soldiers were as barbarous and cruel as their Officers could desire, yet it was often found they were less so than their Officers. However it was, the poor persecuted Protestants had receiv'd Information, that Claverhouse, with 300 Dragoons, was resolv'd to surround the Meeting, and put them all to the Sword. This Account came not to them till after they were assembled, and their Worship was actually begun. Upon which, the Men who had the Guard of the Meeting, far from being surpris'd, consulted what they should do, whether they should disperse for that time, and appoint another Meeting at another Place and Time, or what Course they should take.

They had not many Hours to deliberate, much less to put in execution what they should resolve. But, in a word, it was concluded the People should be desir'd to sit still, and compose themselves, whatever should happen, leaving the Event to Providence, and the good Pleasure of God, and that they should send for Help to all the neighbouring Places.

Thus we see how execrably false is the Archdeacon's Relation of this Meeting. He boldly affirms, that upon the arrival of the Lord Shaftesbury's

On Sunday the 1st of June, they rendezvous'd upon Loudon-Hill. Thus does he make them commit several rebellious Acts before the great Meeting on Loudon-Hill; where, in the defence of the natural Liberty, which every Soul has to worship God Almighty as his Conscience directs, they did rebel, as far as resisting a barbarous Butcher of innocent religious People is Rebellion. The Covenanters had 250 Men well arm'd at their first Muster, and by the Assistance that came in to them, they made 400. The Assembly was great, and the People sat all on the Ground upon the side of a steep Hill, the Minister preaching to them from a little Tent near the bottom of the Hill. The bloody Claverhouse, with his Dragoons, came on with great Fury, and not expecting Resistance, kept no Scouts before him: When on a sudden they were challeng'd and bid stand, by an Out-Guard of the Persecuted; who, finding them come on, fired at them, and retreated to the main Body. But the Dragoons were a second time surpriz'd, when they advanced to that Body, and found it large and advantageously posted. The first Line of whom fir'd a Volly of Shot upon them, killing and wounding 16 or 17 Men, with some Horses.

This brought them to halt, and prepare for a Battle: but finding a large Ditch cast up in the front of the Persecuted, with a low, old, ruin'd Wall, which serv'd them as a Parapet, from whence they fir'd with more security, the Dragoons stood but two or three Fires, and retreated, having lost about 30 Men. In this Action, Mr. Cleeland, a young Gentleman, who, 18 Years after, was Lieutenant-Colonel to the Earl of Angus's Regiment, and distinguish'd himself in several gallant Actions; laid hands on the Bridle of Claverhouse's Horse, and had certainly taken him Prisoner, if he had been well seconded. The Defeat of the Dragoons, made the Persecuted terrible to the Council at Edinburgh; and had they continu'd to have acted on the Defensive only, it was thought they would in time have ruin'd all the Troops of their Persecutors: But their pushing things to extremity, ruin'd them.

The Council at Edinburgh sent the Earl of Linlithgow against them, with a Force much greater than was necessary to disperse that Company of raw undisciplin'd Men. However, Linlithgow did not venture to engage them; and some impute his Retreat to an Understanding he had with Lauderdale, who was willing that the Cameronians should increase in number, not only to have the more Blood and Confiscations, but that their Desperation might justify the Violences he had committed. Echard assures us, all Things were ripe for an Insurrection. Which is so false, that Bishop Burnet assures us, It appear'd there were no Designs form'd for a Rebellion, since none came into it but those desperate inter-communed Men, who were hunted from their Houses. The Persecuted publish'd a sort of Manifesto, complaining of the Oppressions they lay under, asserting the Obligation of the Covenant, and demanding a free Parliament. Mr. Archdeacon informs us, that their Manifesto was in a Stile as barbarous as if it had been drawn up by a Hottentot; for that it imperiously commanded the Magistrates to turn out all the Archbishops, Bishops, and Curates, with their Bairns, &c. When the News of this Insurrection came to England, the King was for suppressing it immediately by Forces from England, under the Command of the Duke of Monmouth. The Earl of Essex, the Lord Hallifax, and those of the Council who hated Shaftesbury, were jealous of Monmouth's Greatness, as he was that Lord's Friend: but the Necessity of the Affair requiring dispatch, they were all forc'd to fall in with his Majesty's Opinion, and send away the Duke of Monmouth to Scotland with such Troops as were ready, but they could not follow him fast enough to be in that Service; for the Duke setting out from London the 20th of June, rode three hundred Miles on that Day and the two next, and on the 23d put himself at the Head of the Earl of Linlithgow's and other Forces in Scotland, attack'd the Cameronians at Bothwell-Briggs, while they were irresolute, and consulting whether to yield or defend themselves, and entirely defeated them, killing about 400, and taking 1200 Prisoners. The rest escap'd, and dispers'd themselves as well as they could; nor were the Persecutors at all satisfy'd with the Duke of Monmouth's Conduct, who refus'd, at their request, to let the poor People be pursu'd and massacred by the Dragoons. If ever Men in the world had Right to Resistance, it was the Right of these Cameronians, whom the King had given up to the brutal Rage of that detested Apostate and Tyrant Lauderdale; and the Slaughter and Execution of these Persecuted Protestants, was as much a Massacre as those in France and Ireland, with regard to the Cruelty and Injustice. Lauderdale's Faction complain'd against the Duke of Monmouth to the Court of England, for giving a check to the Dragoons in the intended Butchery.

It was believ'd that the King, who found he could not manage His new Council as he had done the old one, and could not bear the Influence the Earl of Shaftesbury had upon it, sent the Duke of Monmouth into Scotland with a double Prospect, That he might destroy the Covenanters, and disoblige their Friends in England, for they could not want Friends in a Free Protestant Nation: and that still acting in concert with his Brother, tho' in a pretended Banishment, he was resolv'd to take hold of the Complaints against Monmouth, to pick a Quarrel with him, and recall his Brother.

After the Suppression of the Insurrection in Scotland, "The Persecutors, to use the Words of my Mem. Ch. "Scots Author, gave themselves a full swing in all their bloody Measures, letting loose the most cruel and furious Agents of Tyranny, to execute whatever their private Rage, as well as publick could dictate to them. Under the pretence of rooting out Rebellion, and of executing Justice, they pursu'd the Innocent as well as the Guilty, and put to death hundreds of People by all manner of Cruelties, and on the meanest Pretences imaginable, nay, often without any pretences at all, and that in the most barbarous manner." I must continue the Memoirs of this Writer a Paragraph or two, for it will prove to us, that this Reign in Scotland, and under the execrable Lauderdale, was Nerone Neronior, more tyrannical than that of Nero; and that this Reign in England, under the Duke of York was not much better, will appear in the Sequel. "If I should take all verbal Relations that I have met with, in conversing amongst those that were Eye-

"Witnesses of the Cruelties of that Time, it would exceed, if we consider the Smallness of the Country, and Numbers of the People concern'd; I say, it would exceed all that ever was set down in any History of all Persecutions, whether of Popish or Heathen Tyrants."

"The first Year after this Insurrection, 1680, was wholly taken up in searching after, and pursuing those who were actually in the Army, but had by the Mismanagement, as they call'd it, of the Duke of Monmouth, made their Escape. For, by the way, their Desire was, that when the Body that defended Bothwell-bridge was defeated, and the rest began to disperse, they should have been all surrounded and cut in pieces, or pursu'd, and no Quarter given them, till not a Man of them had been left to carry News to Glasgow of their Defeat. And this having fail'd, they resolv'd, if possible, to find out every Man that had been at Bothwell, and put them to death, wherever they found them; upon the very Spot.

"In order to this, they neither requir'd much Evidence of the Fact, nor took the pains to examine the Persons themselves. But if any one told them, such a Man, or such Men had been at Bothwell Bridge, they immediately sent Soldiers to their Houses, who were to ask them no Questions, but seize upon them, drag them just out of the Doors, and shoot them dead in a moment. How many poor innocent Men, after protesting in the most solemn manner, That they had not been any way concern'd in the Bothwell Affair, have they shot to Death, with those Protestations in their Mouths; and when they have fallen on their Knees, and begg'd for a Minute's time to commend their Souls to God, have deny'd them, and shot them kneeling, as they were with that Request in their Mouths!"

These Tormentors and Butchers were the Men whom the Scots Prelates encourag'd in their sanguinary Missions. These were the Means made use of to make the Persecuted renounce the Reform'd Religion, and profess themselves Members of the Apostate Skarp's Church. The Heathens look'd on the primitive Christians as impious in denying Adoration to their Deities. The Scots Covenanters were of the same Religion, with respect to Faith and Doctrine, but deny'd Adoration to the Prelates. Good God! what infinite Difference there is between the Case of the Heathens and Christians, and that of the Bishops and Presbyters! Yet did the Scots Bishops patronize the Persecution of their Countrymen, of the same Faith and Doctrine, in a manner more barbarous than the Heathen Persecutions, purely because they prefer'd the Discipline of Presbyters to Theirs. Where is there now such a Religion in the World, that is not under the Papal Tyranny? Where are such Tyrants and Tormentors to be met, since our glorious King William the Third, of Blessed and Immortal Memory, deliver'd us from them? I could take many Sheets out of my Scots Author on the same Subject; but I am both weary and ashamed of it.

When the Duke of Monmouth return'd to London, he was receiv'd by the People with so much Joy, that the King's Jealousy encreas'd daily; and at last he was prevail'd upon by the Earl of Effex, and the Earl of Hallifax, to recall his Brother from Brussels. The Duke of York talk'd of Monmouth's Expedition in Scotland, as a courting the People there, and their Friends in England, by his sparing those that were left alive. The King himself said to his Son, If I had been there, we would not have had the trouble of Prisoners. Monmouth answer'd, I cannot kill Men in cold Blood, that's work only for Butchers. Duke Lauderdale's Creatures press'd the keeping the Army some time in that Country, with a design to have them eat it up: But the Duke of Monmouth sent home the Militia, and put the Troops under Discipline, so that all the Country was sensible he had preserv'd them from Ruin. He mov'd the King to grant an Indemnity for what was past, and a Liberty to hold Meetings under the King's Licence; but these softening Measures fell with him, and Rage and Slaughter reign'd again under the Duke of York, to whom, some Months after, was given the Government of Scotland.

We left the Earl of Effex in the Government of Ireland, A. D. 1676, when Sheridan's new Farmers had got Possession of the Revenue there. The Earl had a difficult Game to play. He had, as it is believ'd, made fair Promises of being kind to the Irish, and to stand by Sheridan's Farmers. To the first he gave good Words, and receiv'd them well at Court; but the Farmers beginning to make great Changes in their Officers, he thought fit to put a stop to it, otherwise all the Ports in that Kingdom would soon have been in the hands of Papists, which must have had very dangerous Consequences; and the first Step he took towards it, was, to put the Lord Granard upon moving at the Council-Board, that Enquiry should be made into the Farmers Securities, which Danby had pass'd in England too easily. The Earl of Effex seem'd to oppose this Motion, and put off that Enquiry, of which he gave the Duke of York an Account, tho' he underhand encourag'd Complaints against them, which he declin'd hearing for a while; but at last, as if over-power'd by their Weight and Number, he sent the Objections to the Farmers, who were all the Duke of York's Creatures, to the King, and a Commission of Inspection was issu'd. Some time after the Popish Plot broke out in England, upon which Sheridan, having spoken some Words in favour of his Friend Coleman, was sent for to England, and examin'd at the Bar of the House of Commons, where he had the Impudence to declare himself to be descended from the O Sheridans, ancient Kings of Ulster; whereas his Father was a Bishop's Turnspit. He got himself out of that Affair by his Impudence and Cunning, neither of which he wanted. But the Earl of Effex lost so far the Duke's Favour, that he soon after lost his Government. The Earl of Burlington was nam'd for his Successor, on condition, He who was rich, would lend the King Money; and Talbot was to manage this Affair, by means of the Earl of Orrery, who thought himself oblig'd by Lord Effex. The Earl of Burlington lik'd the Lieutenantancy of Ireland very well; but he lik'd not to part with his Money for it. So the Lord Effex was continu'd a little longer.

Just before the breaking out of the Popish Plot, it was design'd, that the French King should demand the Performance of the Articles he had made with King Charles the Second, in behalf of the Irish; and the King of England was to admit some French Forces to join those Irish, which the Earl of Tyrone and the Lord Brittas were to raise, in order to make a Diversion in Ireland, while the Conspirators were at work in England: But the whole of the Intrigue was kept from the King. He knew only so much of it as refer'd to the French King's demanding the Promises made by him, when in Exile, in favour of the Irish. The Duke undertook to qualify the King, if any Discovery was made of the intended Insurrection of the Irish. But some

Every one thought the Duke of Ormond the most proper Person for the Lieutenancy of Ireland, on account of his great Knowledge of the Country and People, and his great Interest in both. But this Duke having at last observ'd, that the King and his Brother were bent on subverting the Constitution both in Church and State, fell in heartily with those who were for preserving it, and had therefore been kept out of the Government of Ireland by the Duke of York's Intrigues against him, which he was now afraid to continue; and it being mov'd in Council, that the Duke of Ormond should succeed the Earl of Essex, it was not oppos'd by any one; so he went over Lord-Lieutenant once more, and behav'd with great Prudence and Courage. For the Duke of York having prevail'd with the King to order the raising some Irish Forces, under the notion of Foreign Service, the Duke of Ormond would not let them have Arms, and so they were exercis'd with Sticks. Upon the Discovery of the Popish Plot in England, they were all disbanded, and Orders came from England to the Lord-Lieutenant to disarm the Papists; but they had such timely notice of it by their Friends at Court, that there were not found 200 Arms in all Ireland: The Irish having a Contrivance to conceal their Arms by thrusting them into Bogs, filling the Barrels of their Guns with Butter, which prevents their taking any harm; and as for the Locks, they can easily hide them. The Lord Brittas, and other Conspirators, made their Escape; but the Earl of Tyrone was taken, and committed to the Gatehouse; Sheridan was seiz'd in London, and Talbot, afterwards Tyrconnel, in Ireland, where he was imprison'd in the Castle of Dublin, together with his Brother the titular Archbishop, who died there.

The Earl of Orrery, at this time, obtain'd Leave of the King to fortify his House Castle Martyr; he put a small Garison into it, and maintain'd it at his own Charge, being apprehensive of the like Designs in Ireland as in England; for he gave entire Credit to the Plot from the first Discovery of it, founding his Belief in his Experience of Popish Treachery and Cruelty. He writ to the Council, time after time, to have the Militia settled, but could not prevail till March 1679, and then those that appear'd were not half arm'd. Some time before this, the Earl had notice, that the Papists and their Abettors had sent the King Information, that the Protestant Dissenters in Ireland were forming themselves into a Body, in order to make a Disturbance, because the Plot was not duly prosecuted, and that the Earl knew of it: But he wrote to the Council in very pertinent Terms, that the Information was false and groundless, and he challeng'd any one to prove it, representing how ready the Dissenters of all Denominations, were to do as they were directed by the Government, of which those in his Neighbourhood had given him Assurance. Upon this the Information was trac'd to the Informer, who, on strict Examination, confess'd he was mistaken; but 'twas seen by this, how the Papists were contriving to turn the Plot off from themselves, and charge it upon the Dissenters, as they were contriving to do in England; where the Discovery of the Meat-Tub by Dangerfield, prov'd that damnable Design beyond all question.

He depos'd before Sir Robert Clayton the Lord Mayor, October 31. That having been discharg'd out of Newgate, by means of Mrs. Cellier, a Popish Midwife, he was sent for to the Tower, whither he went in disguise, and after much Discourse with my Lord Powis, he was carry'd into a Room where my Lord Arundel was, who having talk'd to him some time, ask'd him, If he would do any thing to make his Fortune; Dangerfield said, Yes, I will do any thing. Well then, said he, will you kill the King for a good Reward? You jest, Sir, says Dangerfield. Lord Arundel ask'd him again; he reply'd, Any body but the King and his Royal Brother. No, says my Lord, I don't mean so; but tell me, will you do it? The Man answer'd, No, without taking time to consider on't. Then said Lord Powis, No, no; come, come, my Lord Arundel does only this to try you: and pray, my Lord Arundel, continues Lord Powis, what will you give him to do so? 'Tis worth, said Lord Arundel, two thousand Pounds. No, no, says Lord Powis, you shall do that to my Lord Shaftesbury, and shall have 500 Pounds for your Reward. This Discovery of his is introduc'd, with some of Echard's Grimace, and pitiful Raillery on the Discoverer's Character; of which kind of Reflections enough has already been said. That clear-headed Writer would have the Actors in these devilish Plots, to be Men of Integrity and Honour, that their Words might go as far as other Mens Oaths; when, as I have said, it is impossible for Villany to be carry'd on and discover'd by any but Villains. Dangerfield, quoth he, appear'd to be as great a Cheat as Bedloe, tho' he had not the Fortune to draw as much Blood. Could he go so far in this Story, without knowing the Reason why he drew it not? He was detected before his Plot was ripe, and his Evidence was afterwards brow-beaten and ridicul'd, because the King and his Brother were in the Plot. The Wickedness of villifying Dangerfield's Testimony about the Meat-Tub, is the more shocking because no Plot was ever plainer, none ever better discover'd. Yet Echard tells us with a wry Mouth, This dark Intrigue came seasonably for the support of the Credit of the Grand Plot. The bare Relation of the Meat-Tub Plot is sufficient to gain the Reader's Credit; and never was anything more diabolical contriv'd in an infernal Divan. I shall take it up where I set it down, the Offer of 500 Pounds to murder my Lord Shaftesbury, which Dangerfield promis'd to undertake. I make use of Echard's Abridgment of Dangerfield's Narrative, printed by order of the House of Commons, to shew that, if he was capable of Conviction, the very telling it only would have convinc'd him of the Villany.

"Whereupon they told him of one Rigaut, a Virginia Merchant, that would advise with him about it, and secure him the Money; and the next day, waiting on the Lord Castlemain, he appear'd much enrag'd, saying, Why were you so unwilling to do what you were taken out of Prison for? Whereupon he made haste away; but Mrs. Cellier excus'd his Lordship's Passion at that time. Soon after he went to meet Sir Robert Peyton at Gaddbury's the Astrologer, where Gaddbury appear'd very angry, because he refus'd to kill the King; adding, That he had calculated his Nativity, and found him a fit Person for that Enterprize, and that he might come off with safety. Then the Countess of Powis dictat'd to him Remarks of four Clubs in the Town, and Names of several Persons to be chief Officers and Commanders in an Insurrection, which was intended by the Presbyterians.

"Dangerfield was introduc'd by the Lord Peterborough to the Duke of York, and acquainted him with this Presbyterian Plot; the Duke gave him twenty Guineas with his own Hand, and brought him to the King, who order'd him forty Pounds. About the same time, in pursuance of the Lords Instructions, he went twice to murder the Earl of Shaftesbury, arm'd with a Dagger given him by Mrs. Cellier, pretending Business from her and the Lady Powis; but was both times prevented by People's coming in, and his own guilty Fears; for which the Countess call'd him Coward, and Mrs. Cellier said, She would go and let the World know, that some of her Sex were more brave than Men;" but she could not meet with a fair Opportunity. Then Dangerfield put the treasonable Letters, which the Lady Powis had dictated to him, directed to the chief Protestant Lords and Gentlemen, and the List of the pretended Officers Civil and Military above-mention'd into a Bundle, which he design'd to drop in some proper Place, and then to have them found upon Search, and produc'd as a Proof to confirm the Information he had given the King and Duke, who very greedily swallow'd this Plot tho' they would not smell to the Popish one. These Papers did Dangerfield carry to the Lodgings of Coll. Roderick Mansel in Axe-Yard, Westminster; for which purpose, he had taken Lodgings in the same House; having done this, he inform'd two Custom-House Officers, that there was Lace lodg'd in Mansel's Room, to the Value of 2000 Pounds, and put them upon searching for it, himself accompanying them. The Officers finding nothing, he bad them remove the Bed, and they would find something, for he had pinn'd the Papers behind Mansel's Bed's Head; and himself first discovering them there, cry'd out, here is Treason; adding, the Papers must be carry'd to the Secretary of State: but the Custom-House Officers knowing their Duty better, carry'd them first to their Masters, the Commissioners of the Customs, which Coll. Mansel hearing of, he immediately apply'd to that Board; and those Gentlemen, like Men of Honour, order'd them to be deliver'd to the Colonel, whose next Work was to find out Dangerfield, who went then by the Name of Willoughby, and finding him four Days after at Mrs. Cellier's House, he had him brought before the Council, who having taken a full Examination of this horrid Conspiracy, made this Warrant for his Commitment. These are in his Majesty's Name to require you to take into Custody the Person of Thomas Willoughby herewith sent you, for forging of Letters importing High Treason, and fixing the same privately at Mr. Mansel's Chamber, to render him guilty thereof without Cause; and you are to keep him safe till he shall be delivered by due Course of Law; for which, this shall be your Warrant.

To the Keeper of Newgate, or his Deputy.

We are coming now to a new Proof of this Hellish Contrivance, for Sir William Waller, a Justice of Peace, and a zealous Protestant, searching the House of Mrs. Cellier, where Dangerfield was taken, found a Bundle of Papers, being Copies of the above-mention'd Letters and List, in a Meal-Tub, where her Maid swore they were put by her Order. Here are several Snips of Paper for Mr. Archdeacon. Here's a Confirmation of Evidence, as strong as that of Sense can make it. Yet he calls it a dark Intrigue, a little Accident to keep up the Heat and Ferour too against the Popish Plot. Here's a Conspiracy against the most noble Blood in England, carry'd on in concert with the Popish Lords in the Tower, yet they must not be suspected of Conspiring. What frontless Partiality is this! The Papists and Tories, for they are now tack'd together, had in view the Destruction of the whole Presbyterian Party in this cursed Contrivance. It was the first Plot call'd Presbyterian, tho' with their wonted Stupidity, they pick'd up a Parcel of Names, among whom there was not one Presbyterian, but the Lord Wharton.

The same Day that Dangerfield was sent to Newgate, Mrs. Cellier was sent thither also; and the former being afraid he should be brought to an Account for the Guilt of the Libel and List, confess'd the whole Intrigue to the Lord Mayor four days after. Cellier behav'd herself before the King and Council with all the Impudence imaginable. I shall not enter into the Detail of her Examination, but only take notice of one Passage, which seems to shew the Assurance of this Female Plotter, and the good Humour of the Prince that was present when she was examin'd.

Mrs. Cel-lier's Impudence.

Adams was one of the Evidences against her.

Adams. Your bawdy Story I left out of the Depositions, I was asham'd to speak it.

King. What can she speak Bawdy too?

Adams. Yes indeed she did.

Lord Chancellor. Ay, she's fit for any thing.

Cellier. My Lord I never spoke an immodest Word in my Life; Mrs. Adams, tho' you contrive to take away my Life, do not take away my Honour. What did I say?

King. What did she say, come tell us the Story.

Adams. She said—she said—she said, that—she said—that if she did not lose her Hands, she could get Money as long as—

Adams made as if she was asham'd, and could not speak such Words.

Cell. I said, if I did not lose my Hands, I should get Money as long as Men kiss'd their Wives.

Adams. By the Oath I have taken, she said their Mistresses too.

Cell. Did I so! Pray what else do they keep them for.

Ld Chanc. That was but witty.

King. 'Twas but her natural Practice.

'Tis observable, that tho' she was several times examin'd by the Council, the King being present; yet his Majesty did not in Person manage any Part of the Examination, but this relating to the Bawdy.

Upon Dangerfield's Discovery, the Earl of Castlemain was committed to the Tower, from whence he had been bail'd before, as having been charg'd only by Oates. Mr. Rigant was sent to Newgate; Gadbury, Fellow-Labourer Gadbury with Roger L'Estrange, to the Gatehouse; Lady Powis to the Tower, for High Treason, of which 'tis very evident she was most guilty.

Some

A. D. 1679. Some time before this, the King fell sick at Windsor, and his Life began to be in danger, which occasion'd a general Consternation. The People, says Echard very prettily, looking upon any thing that should happen ill to the King, as the End of the World. The Earls of Essex and Halifax having mov'd his Majesty to send for the Duke of York from Brussels, he immediately embark'd for England, and arriv'd at Windsor the second of September, to the great Mortification of the Earl of Shaftesbury, and the Duke of Monmouth's Party, who were farther mortify'd, by that Duke's losing his Place of Captain General, and the Earl of Shaftesbury that of President of the Council. The Duke of York, on the King's Recovery return'd to Brussels; the Duke of Monmouth having before been order'd to pass over to Holland. The Lord Russell, the Lord Cavendish, Sir Henry Capel, and Mr. Powle, finding the King's Head and Heart were against popular Counsels, and being not willing to serve him against the Interest of their Country, went to him together, and desir'd him to excuse their Attendance any more upon him at Council. The King, who was weary of such faithful Counsellors, and wanted such as would promote his arbitrary Measures, reply'd, with all my Heart. The Earl of Essex quitted the Treasury. Mr. Lawrence Hyde, and Mr. Sydney Godolphin, were sworn of the Privy Council; Monk's Son, Christopher Duke of Albemarle, as great a Soldier as Politician, was made Captain of the Life-Guard; the Earl of Radnor, President of the Council; and Sir Stephen Fox, one of the Lords of the Treasury.

On Thursday the 27th of November, the Duke of Monmouth return'd to London; and tho' it was Mid-night when he arriv'd, yet the Watch having spread the News of it, the City was presently illuminated with Bonfires; and the Bells rang every where to express the Citizens great Joy. The Duke of York, with his Dutches, and his Daughter, the Lady Anne, went to Scotland, where he arriv'd the 4th of December; and govern'd that Kingdom in such a manner, as increas'd the Apprehensions People had of his Succession. The King would not see the Duke of Monmouth, because he came home without leave, and requir'd him to go back again; for he was now quite gone over to the Popish Party, and had put himself into the worst hands he could think of, his Brother, the Duke of York's, whose Emisaries had the Government of him, when he was not present to govern him himself. Some of Monmouth's Friends advis'd him to comply, but the Earl of Shaftesbury's Advice prevail'd; and that was to stay in England, and trust to the Affections of the People; accordingly he went round many Parts of England, pretending it was for Hunting, and Horse-Matches; many Thousands coming together in most Places to see him, particularly in Somersetshire, where, when he came to Sir William Portman's, near Taunton, it was thought he had not many less than 20000 Men with him, most on horseback; but this was a sandy Foundation for him to build upon, especially since his Architect, the Lord Shaftesbury, consider'd nothing in the Counsels he gave him, but gratifying his own Ambition and Revenge. He set on foot Petitions for a Parliament, in order to the securing the King's Person, and the Protestant Religion; and Multitudes in all Parts of the Nation set their Hands to those Petitions, which were presented to his Majesty by Persons of the best Quality. The Petition from London was subscrib'd by above 20000 Hands. Sir Gilbert Gerrard, accompany'd with eight Gentlemen of Note, and several eminent Citizens, presented a Petition from some Thousands of his Majesty's Subjects in London, Westminster, and Paris adjacent, for the Sitting of the Parliament: In which Petition were these Expressions; There is a most damnable and bellish Popish Plot, branch'd forth into the most horrid Villanies against his Majesty's most sacred Person, the Protestant Religion, and the well-establish'd Government of this Realm; for which, several of the principal Conspirators stand impeach'd by Parliament: Therefore in such a time, when his Majesty's Person, as also the Protestant Religion, and the Government of the Nation are in most imminent Danger, we most humbly and earnestly pray, that the Parliament, which is prorogu'd until the 26th Day of January may then sit to try the Offenders, and to redress all the most important Grievances, no otherwise to be redress'd. The Roll of Names to this Petition was above 100 Yards in Length. To which the King return'd this Answer, I look upon myself to be the Head of the Government, and the only Judge of what is fit to be done in such Cases; and I will do what I think most for the Good of myself and my People. Then turning to Sir Gilbert, he said, I did not expect to find one of your Name, and particularly you, in such a thing, and I am sorry for it; which Sir Gilbert Gerrard was not, but would have vindicated what he had done, if the King would have staid to have heard him. The Wiltshire Petition was deliver'd by the famous Thomas Thynne, Esq; accompany'd by Sir Walter St. John, Grandfather to the late Lord Bolingbroke, and Sir Edward Hungerford. The King ask'd them, Whether they had their Directions from the Grand Jury. But what was a pack'd Grand Jury, such as abhorr'd these Petitions, to such Men as Mr. Thynne, Sir Walter St. John, and Sir Edward Hungerford? Mr. Thynne answer'd, no: The King presently reply'd, what indeed I am ashamed to repeat; considering to whom he spoke; Why say you then that you come from the County? You come from a Company of loose People: Protestant Dissenters, and sober Churchmen. What do you take me to be? I know well enough, but I care not to tell it. What do you take yourselves to be, I admire Gentlemen of your Estates should animate People to Mutiny and Rebellion. You see, to petition the Stuartine Princes is to rebel. You would not take it well I should meddle with your Affairs, and I desire you would not meddle with mine, especially with a Matter, which is so essential a Part of my Prerogative. How they do hang upon that Word, and upon all occasions bring it in by the Head and Shoulders? His Majesty's Answer to Sir Robert Barrington, Colonel Mildmay, and Mr. Honeywood, who presented the Essex Petition, is still worse: I am extremely surpris'd to see you meddle with Matters that so immediately concern the Crown and me, and that against the Sense of the best and chiefest Men of the County; I believe some of you, who have sign'd the Petition may mean well, but they are abus'd by those who do not. I am not willing to call to mind Things past, yet I cannot but remember the Act of Oblivion, tho' not as some do; and those who had stood in need of that Act, would do well not to take such Courses as might need another; I very well remember FORTY: and so, says Echard, he turn'd away; and indeed he might very well be willing to get out of the Hearing of an Answer. To the Gentlemen from the Justices of the Peace in Berkshire, he said, We will agree this Matter over a Cup of Ale, when we meet at Windsor; tho' I wonder my Neighbours will meddle with my Business: As if the Gentlemen of England had nothing to do in the Security of their Religion, Rights, Liberties, and Properties, which he was so far from taking care of, that he was an Enemy to their Religion; and

and as to their temporal Concerns, his secret Engagements with the French King, shew what was his Concern for them. The Petitions from Tork, Surry, &c. were sign'd by many Thousands of Freeholders. The King endeavour'd to put a stop to that from London, by sending an Order to the Lord Mayor, December the 20th, not to suffer Persons to go about to get Hands; but to seize them, and bring them before the Council Board, where they were sure to meet with good Usage from Mr. Lawrence Hyde, the Marquis of Worcester, and those that kept their Places there, after the Protestant Lords were gone. Two days after, the King put forth a Proclamation against Petitioning, of which, we shall hear more hereafter; and another to declare his Intention to prorogue the Parliament, which seems to be done to spite the Petitioners; and it has been observ'd of the Stuartine Kings, that when the People have been very earnest for, or against any thing, they always would be as earnest against it, or for it. One cannot by their Actions think they did really know what the Duty of a King was, that a good Prince has in truth no separate Interest of his own, and that the Interest of the People, is the Interest of the King. It is not in common Sense to suppose that the well-being of eight or ten Millions of Souls in this World, and the next, must depend on the Passion or Folly of one Person: Nor is it common Sense to imagine, that People when they suffer have not a Right to complain, or to petition when they are aggriev'd. But the Stuartine Kings always treated their Subjects, as if they took them to be Fools as well as Slaves, tho' they had of all Princes that ever reign'd the least Pretence to do so, from the Strength or Extent of their Genius; for I defy the greatest Bigot to the Race to produce one wise step in all their History, which was not forced from them, I will not say by the Petitions, but by the Clamours of the People. North, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, drew up the Proclamation against Petitioning, as contrary to the common and known Law of the Land, and tending to raise Rebellion. A Word these Kings and their Ministers made use of to frighten the People, as Nurses and old Women do of raw Head and bloody Bones to frighten Children.

1680.King prorogues the
ment.

WE have already mention'd the Petitions from several Cities and Counties for the Meeting of the Parliament, and the King's neglecting them; inasmuch, that on the 26th of January, the Day to which the Parliament was prorogu'd, he came to the House of Lords, and sending for the Commons, told both Houses, that the Distractions and Jealousies at home were of such a nature, and so heighten'd and improv'd by the Malice and Industry of ill Men, that he is unalterably of opinion, that a longer Interval of Parliament will be absolutely necessary; accordingly the Lord Chancellor, by his Command, prorogu'd the Parliament to the 15th of April: one of the fine Strokes in Politics in this Reign. The People were in a general Ferment under the Apprehensions of Popery. The Parliament's vigorous Resolutions could only quiet their Minds. They earnestly petition'd, and impatiently waited for a Session. A longer Interval of Parliament is absolutely necessary for composing and quieting of Men's Minds.

The Judges were well instructed, and the Popish Conspirators might now venture to take their Trials. Sir Thomas Gascoigne, an old Yorkshire Knight, was arraign'd at the King's-Bench Bar in Westminster-Hall, upon an Information of High Treason, in conspiring the Death of the King, and the Subversion of the Government. The chief Evidence against him were Wolven, who had been Bailiff of his Colephs, and one Morv-bray, who had belong'd to his Family, who both swore home; but Sir Thomas Hudson, Foreman, and the rest of a Yorkshire Jury, clear'd him, giving more credit to the Prisoner than to the Witnesses.

About the same time was try'd William Laud, of note only for his Name and his Crime, the tearing a Petition for the sitting of the Parliament, as it was handing about for Subscription; but the Jury would not find him guilty, nor his two Accomplices Whitfield and Smallbones: but they convicted Ben. Harris, the Publisher of the Weekly Domestic Intelligence, for publishing the Appeal from the Country to the City; and the Court sentenc'd him to be pillory'd, to pay 50*l.* Fine, and be imprison'd a Year. Francis Smith and Langley Curtis were also convicted of publishing a Pamphlet for the Country Party, as was Henry Cave the Author.

However, the Duke of York did not think fit to stand it out against the Clamour of the People, but to absent himself some time longer, under colour of the Commission of Scotland, which Kingdom is highly recommended by him in a Speech he made to the Privy Council there, for a brave and loyal Nobility and Gentry, a regular Privy Council, for Judicatures fill'd with upright Judges; and for some other the like Blessings under his auspicious Government, which the Scots cannot think of to this day without Terror and Trembling. He left Edinburgh in February, and there being no Parliament sitting, he made use of the Interval to return to Court, where the King receiv'd him with the greater Tokens of Affection, for that he knew it would mortify the Protestants. We have just mention'd the Conviction of Booksellers and others, for certain Pamphlets in Vindication of the Protestant Religion, and the People's Rights and Liberties, which began now to be openly attack'd, and to quash all Attempts in Defence of those dear Liberties and Rights, and our most holy Religion. The Judges were directed to declare, That the King might prohibit the Printing and Publishing of all News-Books and Pamphlets; and presently a Proclamation was issu'd, to suppress all Pamphlets and News-Books that had not the Royal Licence. There cannot be a surer Mark of an ill Government, than its being afraid of the Press: Honesty fears no Slander, but Guilt starts at a Whisper.

Archdeacon Echard tells us, the very Counties that had address'd for the Parliament's sitting, grew ashamed of what they had done, and sent up Addresses of Abhorrence of those Petitions. One as blind as himself might have seen that those Counter-Petitions were extorted from those Counties by Menaces, or that they were wheedled out of them by Fraud: for can any thing be more unnatural, than for a Free People to petition to be Slaves, to destroy the Fences of their Liberty, or make way for Tyranny to destroy them, which would be the natural Consequence of the Subversion of our Parliamentary Constitution. The Grand-Jury of Westminster was very forward with their abhorring Petition, which was presented by Withens the Lawyer, one of their Parliament Men. There came the like Petitions from Surrey, Essex, Middlesex, and Norfolk: Which last mention'd County sent his Majesty their humble Thanks for recalling the Duke from Flanders. His Majesty knighted Withens, and several other Abhorrrers were dubb'd, to encourage the Work all over England.

I have seen a very particular Account of the Duke of Monmouth's Mother's pretended Marriage

A.D. 1689. riage to the King; 'twas said to be printed at Cologne, where the Author would have us believe the Marriage was consummated; but it is a Heap of Falsities and Inconsistencies. The King's Amour with her was some Years before he was at Cologne; nay, at the very time that his Father was about to be try'd, condemn'd, and executed, the Duke being born at Rotterdam a few Months after. But it was now rumour'd, that Sir Gilbert Gerrard had Proofs of that Marriage in a Black Box, which, upon examination, he solemnly deny'd before the King and Council; and it is most certain, that Rumour was only rais'd to puzzle the Duke of York's Cause still more, and encrease the Party of the Duke of Monmouth, tho' the Falshood of it was the occasion that it had quite contrary Effects. The King made three Declarations one after another, that he was never marry'd to any Woman but Queen Catherine; and considering how little Credit was given to this false Rumour, he seems to over-act in this Part to shew how unalterably he was attach'd to his Brother's and the Popish Interest. The Earl of Shaftesbury was thought to be at the bottom of this Rumour, tho' it is by no means worthy his great Genius for Politicks.

Rumour of the King's Marriage to the Duke of Monmouth's Mother.

The Lord Chief Justice Scroggs makes use of this Interval of Parliament, to discharge the Popish Prisoners as fast as they are brought before him. The Grand-Jury of Middlesex brought in the Bill against the Countess of Powis Ignoramus, and sav'd him the Drudgery of bringing her off. Richard Tasborough Esq; of Suffolk, was try'd for conspiring the Death of the King; and after a long Hearing to no purpose, says Echard, he was acquitted. Sir Henry Tickbourn, Mr. Roper, and John Caryl Esq; were bail'd, because there was no Witnesses against them but Dr. Oates. And the Countess of Powis, Sir Robert Peyton, and one Bedingfield were absolutely discharged of all Attendance; tho' as to the Countess, Fact is not capable of better Proof, than that she set Dangerfield on the Discovery of Mansel's Presbyterian Plot, that the Letters she dictated were treasonable, and that the Guilt and Punishment due to Forgery did of right belong to her. Mrs. Cellier was also acquitted on account of Dangerfield's being outlaw'd for Felony, and consequently his Evidence was not good. But Dangerfield had a Pardon which render'd him reluctus in Curia; and as impudent as Cellier was, she never had the Impudence to deny the treasonable Papers found in her Meal-Tub, Copies of those that were found in Col. Mansel's Lodgings. Echard is her Advocate against Dangerfield, that Great and Infamous Criminal, says he: but what says Mr. Baxter of that very Dangerfield? He confess'd all, and was a steadfast Convert and Protestant. Is it necessarily once a Rogue and always a Rogue, as is said of a Captain? But so much has been urg'd in vindication of such Evidence, and that Villany cannot be otherwise evidenc'd than by Villains, that we shall say no more of it. This is a grateful Period of Time with Mr. Archdeacon. Others that were to be try'd about the Popish Plot, were some bail'd, some absolutely discharg'd; as

Sir Anthony Dean and Mr. Pepys were discharg'd from further Attendance, and the Earl of Castlemain, on his Trial was acquitted by the Jury; which, to use the reverend Historian's own Phrase, was follow'd with great Shouts and Acclamations to the Disappointment and Mortification of many at that time.

Bedloe died at Bristol the 20th of August; and the Lord Chief Justice North being then there in his Circuit, he visited him before his Death; and with his last Words, Bedloe attested, That the Duke of York was engag'd in the Plot; That Anderton and Lodge, two Jesuits at Rome, own'd to him the King was to be made away with, and that every Word he had sworn against any of the Conspirators was true, and rather less than more than the Truth. North took the Deposition of this dying Man; yet Echard, who laid so great stress on the last Words of Green, Berry, Hill, and Staley, knows not how to speak fistly of the dying Words of one harden'd by so many Tears Villanies: and then to justify his uncharitable Censure, he remembers us of his changing and contradicting his Evidence. He had certainly no Occasion, no Temptation to depose a Confirmation of all of it before a Judge, just as he was going out of the World. He had no Cause to credit by it, as the Papists had by denying the Crimes they were charg'd with. The Papists could be absolv'd. Bedloe could have no Absolution for his lying in the last Moment of his Life; yet so very tender is Mr. Archdeacon of the Popish Interest, that he will not speak charitably, or indeed humanely of a Person who had born his Testimony against it.

A.D. 1689.

Bedloe confirms all at his Death.

The Juries impannel'd by Raymond and Lewis, Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, had lately appear'd to be so much at the Direction of the Judges, that the Citizens of London resolv'd to resume their ancient Right; and instead of taking a Sheriff, because the Lord-Mayor drank to a Man, to chuse two substantial discreet Citizens to discharge that Office. The Court was alarm'd at this Proceeding, and instructed their Creatures to make a vigorous Opposition, that they might keep Juries still in dependance upon them. The honest Citizens put up Slingsby Bethel Esq; who wrote that excellent Treatise of the Interest of Princes, wherein is more good Policy, than in the Earl of Clarendon's three Folio's, and Alderman Henry Cornish. The Election of these two Citizens was oppos'd by the Persecuting Party, who demanded a Poll for Mr. Box and Mr. Nicholson; and Echard pretends, the honest Livery-Men were forc'd to use Violence in procuring a Majority, tho' the Numbers for Bethel and Cornish were really almost double to those for Box and Nicholson.

Which Votes were declar'd to stand thus at a Common Hall, July 29th; tho' to animate those who poll'd against Bethel and Cornish, the King himself came into the City, and supp'd with Sir Simon Lewis the Sheriff; who being check'd by Mr. Osborn the Draper for some unwarrantable Proceeding, it was immediately call'd a Riot, and the King immediately order'd a Commission of Oyer and Terminer to be issu'd out for the trial of the said Riot; so hasty was he in pursuing these fatal Measures, that led directly to the Subversion of the People's Religion and Liberty.

The Duke of York continuing to shew by all his Conduct abroad and at home, that he was the most obstinate and inveterate Enemy of Liberty and Religion, several Persons of the greatest Eminence in the Kingdom for Birth, Quality, Fortune and Merit, presented Reasons for indicting him to the Grand-Jury of Middlesex, June 26, 1689. Two of which are as follow:

A. D.

"That there have been divers Letters read in both Houses of Parliament, and at the Secret Committees of both Houses, from several Cardinals, and others of Rome; and also from other Popish Bishops and Agents of the Pope in other foreign Parts, which do apparently shew the great Correspondencies between the Duke of York and the Pope. And how the Pope could not choose but weep for joy at the reading some of the Duke's Letters, and what great Satisfaction it was to the Pope to hear the Duke was advanc'd to the Catholick Religion. That the Pope has granted Breves to the Duke, sent him Beads, ample Indulgences, with much more to this purpose. That the whole House of Commons have declar'd him to be a Papist in their Votes, Sunday, April 6, 1679."

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That the Duke of York being a Papist, and the hopes of his coming such to the Crown, has given the greatest Countenance and Encouragement to the present Conspiracy, and Designs of the Papists against the King and the Protestant Religion. What this Conspiracy and Design is, will appear by a Declaration made by both Houses of Parliament, March 25, 1679.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in Parliament assembled, That they do declare that they are fully satisfy'd by the Proofs they have heard, that there now is, and for divers Tears last past, hath been a horrid and treasonable Plot and Conspiracy contriv'd and carry'd on, by those of the Popish Religion for the murdering of his Majesty's sacred Person, and for subverting the Protestant Religion, and the ancient well establish'd Government of this Realm.

These and other Reasons for the Indictment of the Duke of York, were sign'd by

The Fury was sent for up to the Court of Bing's-Bench, whilst they were on this Indictment, and dismiss'd; so that nothing further was done upon it, excepting that the Fury receiv'd the Presentment; and by dismissing them, a very great Number of Indictments were discharged: A Thing scarcely to be parallel'd, says my Author; and of very ill Consequence, not only to many private Persons, but chiefly to the Publick. The Duke was gone again to Scotland to be out of the Parliament's way, tho' he sat in the House of Lords when the Parliament was prorogu'd from the 15th of April to the 17th of May, and from thence, by several Prorogations, to the 21st of October. This Presentment was a terrible Mortification to him, and he and his Party must then have sunk, had not the King his Brother been as much of his Religion as of his Blood, with respect to Faith and Principle, tho' not to Bigotry and Zeal. As soon as the Duke was departed for Scotland, the Party for the Exclusion Bill began to work all their Engines for accomplishing it. The Chief of this Party were the Dutchess of Portsmouth, who was to manage with the King and the Earl of Sunderland. Mr. Godolphin, Lord Halifax, and others, were for Limitations; and with these the King join'd so heartily, that he would have agreed to any Limitations that should leave the Title of King to the Duke, tho' it should be little more than a mere Title: But he was positive and fix'd against the Exclusion. The Duke was obstinate against all Limitations; and that was acting a sincere Part, and letting the World see he was resolv'd to be limited by nothing but his Will and Pleasure. Mr. Hyde, and Sir Lionel Jenkins, lately made Secretary of State in the room of Mr. Coventry, were at the head of those that oppos'd the Bill of Exclusion in the House of Commons. But what are those Names to the following, who strenuously promoted it by their strong Arguments and strong Interest?

And a great Majority of the Members and Patriots, who were all for the Exclusion Bill.

Sir Lionel Jenkins, the Stickler against this P. 481. Bill, makes a sorry Figure in Sir William Temple's Memoirs: and Bishop Burnet tells us, he was a dull Man, as is plain enough by his Speeches in Echard against the Exclusion; but he does not escape the Archdeacon's Panegyrics on account of his Zeal for a Popish Successor.

About this time the Prince of Orange projected an Alliance against France, and most of the German Princes were dispos'd to come into it. For the French had set up a new Court at Metz, in which many Princes were, under pretence of Dependencies, and some old forgot or forg'd Titles, adjudg'd to lose their Territories, as belonging to the French Conquests. This, as my Lord of Sarum phrases it, was a mean as well as the perfidious Practice, in which the Court of France rais'd much more Jealousy and Hatred against themselves, than could be ever ballanc'd by such small Accessions as were adjudg'd by that Mock-Court. Had King Charles fallen in with this Disposition of the German Princes, such a Confederacy might have been form'd, as would have given a Check to the exorbitant Power of France. But he was deep in another dark Confederacy, to master his Parliaments by the help of French Money and French Forces, upon occasion, which made him deaf to all Proposals that were not consistent with his Engagements with Lewis the XIVth, who, according to Acherley, "grew up P. 601. to a View of Universal Monarchy, to a Puissance able to reduce even England as well as the Empire, Holland, &c. under an absolute Subjection, which could not afterwards be avoided, but by their uniting against that Potentate in two long and bloody Wars; the one in the Reign of King William III. and the other in the Reign of Queen Anne, in which their Liberty was put in doubt, their Wealth exhausted, and those Nations involv'd in Debts almost insuperable." These are the Blessings A League the two last Stuartine Kings entail'd on these Nations: These the Legacy they left us. All projected. which

A. D. 1680. which would have been prevented, and the English Liberties, and the Liberties of Europe, as well as the Protestant Religion, have been secur'd, by the Bill of Exclusion.

P. 479. The Earl of Sunderland enter'd into a particular Confidence with the Prince of Orange, which he manag'd by his Uncle Mr. Sydney, afterwards Earl of Rumney, who was sent Envoy to Holland. The Prince, according to Bishop Burnet, was confident, that if England would have come heartily into a Confederacy against France, a strong one might be form'd; but Van Beuning, who was then in England, wrote to the Town of Amsterdam, that they could not depend on the Faith or Assistance of England, for the Court was still in the French Interest. He thought the Jealousy between the Court and the Country Party then so high, that he did not believe it possible to heal Matters; so as to encourage the King to enter into any Alliance which might draw on a War. For the King seem'd to set that up for a Maxim, that his going into a War, was the putting himself into the hands of his Parliament, and was firmly resolv'd against it, tho' not for Van Beuning's Reason, so much as in consideration of his Secret League with that very Prince, who, at the same time, had in conception already subjected the British Empire. No body can think that, when he had reduc'd the Spanish Netherlands and Holland, he would have confin'd his Conquests to the Continent; and Lord Holles, who was Ambassador in France, thinks he intimated his intended Invasion of England, when he said once, I will bring my Men to a Place, where there are neither Gates nor Bars: And that Lord Holles did really believe he meant England, appears by this Expression in his Letter to the before mention'd Van Beuning; The wisest and greatest Men are not always so guarded, but that in their Gayeties their future Intentions drop out of their Mouths; and wicked Men do not only express their Natures in their wicked Sayings, by which Men may take Warning of them; but they live after their Deaths in those Sayings, as King Charles the Second does in this; God would not damn him for taking a little pleasure out of the way, which we have elsewhere mention'd after Bishop Burnet. Lord Holles, in the same Letter, gives us a just Character of the Government of England, since it fell into the hands of the Stuarts.

Two Grand Maxims of our Government; one was, That we should always keep the Balance of Christendom equal and steady, England only having the natural Advantage to do that; and this grew up with us from the Norman Conquest, for above 600 Years since. The other was, That we should always make ourselves the Head and Protection of the Protestant Interest, a Maxim that we took from the Reformation, and which we shew'd the World in Queen Elizabeth's Time. How we have kept to these two Maxims, our entering into a League to subvert and destroy the Protestant Religion, and to break the Bonds, and remove the Land-Marks of States and Kingdoms, will sufficiently declare unto you. Such was the Circumstances of the English, with respect to Foreign Affairs; and they are not more secure and honourable, with respect to Domestick; in which the rigid Clergy behav'd very indecently and unwarrantably, as that great Lawyer Sir John Hawles intimates; Many of the Clergy of the Church of England had been prevail'd with, to cry up the Popish as a Fanatick Plot. The Papists and the Church of England being, in the late Times, equally Sufferers, and oppress'd by the Fanaticks, they naturally grew to have a

A. D. 1680. kindness for each other, and both join'd in hating the Fanaticks; and therefore pretended, at least, that they did not believe any thing of the Popish Plot, but that that Report was given out by the Fanaticks, while they themselves were designing something against the Church of England. So far the Ecclesiastical Writer of the Compleat History goes; but he sinks what follows in Sir John Hawles's Remarks on Fitzharris's Trial. *The Papists having so great a part of the Clergy of the Church of England ready to believe any thing of a Fanatick Plot which they should forge; and observing, that that which gave Credit to the Popish Plot, was Writings, (not a Snip of Paper, says another Ecclesiastical Historian) concurring with oral Testimony, which it did; mind how Eckard and all of them endeavour to ridicule and baffle the Evidence: For very little of the Truth of the Popish Plot depended on the Credit of Oates, Bedloe, or any other Person. Mr. Archdeacon affirms, it all depended upon it, most of the Facts of that Design, when discover'd, proving themselves. To instance in one, Oates discover'd Coleman had Intelligence with Le Chaise, of a Design on England, and that Coleman had Papers testifying as much; when those Papers were seiz'd, and own'd by Coleman, and the purport of them was what Oates said they were, it was not material whether Oates was a Man of Truth or not, the Papers without Oates's Evidence sufficiently prov'd the Design. The Heads of the two reverend Historians were not clear enough to admit such solid Reasoning. Instead of this, one of them, an Archdeacon, writes with amazing Confidence, The Minds of the Parliament were fill'd and beaten with the Fears and Apprehensions of Popery, Plots and Conspiracies. And now all sorts of Plot-Discoverers apply'd themselves with their Narratives and Relations, and never fail'd of proportionable Encouragement. Dangerfield began with giving in his Information, which he treats as ludicrously, as if there had been much Mirth in a horrid Design against the Lives of the greatest and worthiest Men in the Kingdom. Sir John Hawles speaks of it thus, "Dangerfield was made use of to leave Papers in Col. Mansel's Lodgings, he being an Acquaintance of my Lord Shaftesbury's, importing a Plot; but that was so foolishly carried on, and the then Attorney General, who had the Examination of that Matter, not being qualify'd with the Assurance his Successor had, to carry on a Thing that had neither Sense nor Honesty in it, made such a scurvy Report of the Matter to the King and Council, that they were forc'd to vote Mansel innocent." However, Mr. Archdeacon is in a very good humour, that Mrs. Cellier, an Accomplice with Dangerfield in that hellish Contrivance, was clear'd, which so spirited that Bawd, that she publish'd a Narrative in opposition to Dangerfield's, call'd, Malice Defeated; wherein she scandalously reflected on several Persons of Eminence and Worth, and did not spare some in Power; and being try'd for publishing this Libel, Justice overtook her, and she was condemn'd to stand thrice in the Pillory, to pay Mrs. Cellier 1000 Pounds Fine, and to be imprison'd till her pillory'd. all was perform'd, which, as to the Pillory part, was to the endangering her Life, the Populace pelting her without Mercy; and tho' she richly deserv'd a Gibbet, yet the Mob were not to be her Executioners. I leave Sir William Temple's Account of the Lord Essex's Impatience to be Lord Lieutenant of Ireland again; and Lord Shaftesbury's saying to him, *My Lord, if you will come in to us, never trouble yourself, we will make

A.D. 1680. make you Lieutenant, &c. in the place where Edvard found them, being apprehensive that we have not the whole Truth.

On the 20th of October, the Duke and Dutches of York began their Journey to Scotland by Sea; the King accompanying them as low as Woolwich, and giving him, no doubt, all Assurances, that he would never consent to alter the Succession. Next day the Parliament met, after several Prorogations, when the King made a Speech to both Houses, wherein, after the Benefits, which Christendom as well as England may reap by the Alliances the King had made, he thought fit to renew all Assurance that can be desir'd for Security of the Protestant Religion, which he is resolv'd to maintain against the Conspiracies of our Enemies. We all know the Prince who said it, to be a Papist, and with what Conscience could he say it? Coke is a little coarse in his Expression, but he's honest, and therefore I sometimes make use of him; "Can any Man,
 " who reads the Transactions between the Pro-
 " rogation of the last Parliament, and the Meet" ing of this, force a Belief of this?" And concur with any new Remedies which shall be pro-pos'd, which may consist with preserving the Succession of the Crown in its due and legal Course;
 " that is, Let the Wolf be Shepherd, and let " the Sheep make what Laws they please." Then the King recommends to them a strict Inquiry into the Popish Plot, and that the Lords in the Tower be brought to a speedy Trial, without which, he did not think himself or the Parliament safe. Coke upon this. "The constant " Vogue was, That the King dissolv'd the two " last Parliaments, to preserve the Lords in the " Tower from being brought to a Trial; and I " am sure that you will soon hear that the King
 " did not believe his and the Nation's Safety did " consist in the Trial of the Lords in the Tower."
 He told the Parliament, what danger Tangier was in, and what vast Expence he must be at to keep it. "And that the Commons, last Parliament, drew up an Act, to settle it upon the " Imperial Crown of England; and that they
 " who did advise the King to part with Tangier
 " to any Foreign Prince or State, or were instrumental therein, ought to be accounted " Enemies to the King and Kingdom." Coke again, "What care the King took to keep it,
 " will soon appear, tho' 'twas said the Parlia" ment (I think it was out of the Chimney-Mo" ney) gave him 40000 Pounds per Ann. towards the Preservation of it, to the Crown of " England." The King goes on, and says, "That above all the Treasure in the World, which he was sure would give him greater Strength, both at home and abroad, than any Treasure can do, is a perfect Union among ourselves. Yet, says Coke, "he does not say wherein we should unite.
 " Truth and Unity are one, and consist in " entire Parts; but Falshood and Discord are " infinite. What Truth or Unity could be in " the King's loose and irregular Actions, so con-
 " founding, and every day varying from what " he had promis'd before? Or how is it possible " for the Nation to unite under Terms which " are inconsistent and impossible; viz. Unite " to preserve the Constitutions of the King" dom, and yet be at no Discord with the King,
 " who, they were morally certain, would make " it his Business to subvert them?" Here's enough of it, considering the Speech was so ill grounded, and the Art so little hid, that the Commons would not deign to debate one Paragraph. Nay, the Lord Chancellor was at so great a loss how to give it any Flourishes, that he chose rather to say nothing, but as his Ma-

 the Choice of a Speaker, and they unanimously chose William Williams, Esq; of Gray's Inn, Recorder of Chester; who being approv'd of by his Majesty, the House agreed upon an Address, wherein they express'd their Resolution to pursue, with a strict and impartial Inquiry, the execrable Popish Plot; and six Days after they proceeded to Votes about the before-mention'd Petitions.

"Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That it " is, and ever hath been the undoubted Right " of the Subjects of England, to petition the " King for the Calling and Sitting of Parlia" ments, and redressing Grievances. Resolved, " That to traduce such Petitioning as a Viola" tion of Duty, and to represent it to his Ma" jesty as tumultuary and seditious, is to betray
 " the Liberty of the Subject, and contributes " to the Design of subverting the ancient legal " Constitution of this Kingdom, and introdu" cing arbitrary Power." They order'd a Committee the next day to inquire of all such Persons, as have offended against these Rights of the Subject.

And the next Day, October 28th, Sir Francis Wythens, Head Steward of Westminster, and Citizen in Parliament for that City, being found guilty in particular, they voted him a Betrayer of the undoubted Rights of the Subjects of England, and order'd him to be expell'd the House, having first receiv'd their Censure upon his Knees at the Bar, which he suffer'd with great Dejection, both of Look and Mind. The infamous Jefferies was next question'd; he was Recorder of London, and the City petition'd the House against him. A Committee being order'd, they pass'd this Vote the 13th of November: Resolved, "That this Committee is of opinion, that
 " by the Evidence given to this Committee, it " does appear, that Sir George Jefferies, Recor" der of the City of London, by traducing and " obstructing Petitioning for the Sitting of the " Parliament, hath betray'd the Rights of the " Subject;" to which the House agreed, and 'twas order'd, That an humble Address be made to his Majesty, to remove him out of all publick Offices.
 They further order'd, that the Committee should enquire into all such Persons as had been advising or promoting of the late Proclamation, stil'd,
A Proclamation against tumultuous Petitioning.
 The Grand Juries of the Counties of Somerset and Devon having express'd their Abhorrence of such Petitioning, the House, on the 19th of November, order'd, that the two Foremen of the said Juries, William Coleman Esq; and Henry Walrond Esq; should be sent for in custody of the Sergeant at Arms; as were also Sir Giles
Philips, Capt. William Castle, William Starvel Esq; Mr. John Hutchinson, Mr. Thomas Staples, and Sir Thomas Holt, Sergeant at Law.
 The next day they voted Thomas Herbert Esq; of Monmouthshire, to be sent for in custody for prosecuting John Arnold Esq; Knight of that Shire at the Council-Table, for promoting Petitioning, and procuring Subscriptions. Edvard highly resents these vigorous Proceedings, and especially the keeping an Irish Man five Weeks in Prison upon bare Suspicion. This Irish Man is Thomas Sheridan before mention'd, whom he calls a Gentleman of a good Family; that the Injustice of the Parliament might be the more crying in this Gentleman's Case, who, in truth, was a notorious Villain, the Son of a Bishop's Turnspit, who had been bred up by Charity, and becoming a Deacon, was so zealous a Protestant, that Oliver, when he was in Ireland, order'd a Maintenance for himself and his three Sons, of

But this Man being an Agent for the Papists, and even for the very worst sort of Papists, is so civilly treated by Mr. Archdeacon, tho' the best Name his Countryman Tyrconnel could give him, was, Traytor, Cheat, Rogue. If one was to compliment such a vile Fellow as this, methinks one should be very careful not to say a false thing in his favour. We shall have occasion to speak further of these Parliamentary Prosecutions in the Sequel, and must now give a short Account of the grand Debate about the Bill of Exclusion. The noble Patriot William Lord Russel open'd it October the 26th, saying, It is my opinion, that the Life of the King, the Safety of the Nation, and the Protestant Religion, are in great danger from Popery; and that either the Parliament must suppress the Growth and Power thereof, or else Popery will soon destroy not only Parliaments, but all that is near and dear to Us. Wherefore I humbly move, that we may in the first place take into Consideration how to suppress Popery, and prevent a Popish Successor. His Lordship's Motion was seconded by the wise and honourable Sir Henry Capel, afterwards Lord Capel, who related, in a long Speech, How the Popish Party made it their Endeavours, by their diabolical Counsels, to weaken the Protestant Interest, in order to a general Destruction of it, by engaging us in a War against Holland; as also dividing our Fleet under Prince Rupert and General Monk, with a design to destroy them, as well as our Navy at Chatham. How when the City of London was burnt in 1666, those who were taken in carrying on that wicked Act, were discharged without Trial. Pray call to mind what the Archdeacon said directly contrary to this, that he had weigh'd all Circumstances, and found that no mortal Man had any hand in it, but that it was the Judgment of Heaven. Sir Henry Capel's Speech is as good as it is long; but what follows is entirely omitted by the reverend Historian, and his Partiality in it is shameless.

Lord Russel's Speech for the Exclusion.

Sir Henry Capel's Speech.

P. 859.

Sir Henry, speaking of the Faction that obtain'd the Oxford Act, and some others against the Dissenters, adds, Great Endeavours were us'd to have them executed severely, in expectation that the Dissenters would so be made weary of living quietly under them, and in the end be glad of a Toleration; but the Dissenters deceiv'd them, and submitted to the Laws, insomuch, that in the Year 1670, till 1671, there was hardly a Conventicle to be heard of in England. Edward positively asserts, they had now their open Meetings more full and frequent. Sir H. C. again, And might never have been more, if that Party had not been afraid of a great Disappointment thereby; wherefore, to revive our Divisions, and to bring in, as they hop'd, their own Religion, they employ'd all their Force again to get a Toleration. I say, they did it, because it cannot be imagin'd it could be from any Protestant Interest, both Church-men and Dissenters publicly declaring their Detestation of it. I do not mention his and other Members Reasons for the Exclusion, because there was not one Reason against it; and that it is now the greatest Nonsense in the World to argue against excluding a Prince, whom we abdicated eight Years after: For if the abdicating him, when he had been several Years in possession of the Throne, was rightful and lawful, it was much more so to exclude him, before he possess'd it, he having shewn his Disposition to do what he did, as evidently as if he had already done it; and 'twas apparent that he had

enter'd into a Conspiracy against the Religion, Rights and Liberties of the English Nation, long before the Parliament talk'd of an Exclusion, which being High Treason by our Laws, would have had worse Effects had he been brought to a Trial while he was a Subject. What was his employing Coleman to correspond with La Chaise about a Project for destroying the Pestilent Heresy? What his own Letter to La Chaise for Supplies from France? What his Endeavours to stifle the Popish Plot? What his Tampering with Dangerfield about a sham Presbyterian Plot, and a great variety of other such Offences, not so much as mention'd in the Arguments for excluding him? I shall only name the Gentlemen who spoke heartily and reasonably for the Exclusion, as,

Bishop Burnet says of Jenkins, He neither spoke nor writ well, and all his Arguments were heard with Indignation. They may be read in Echard's History, in which such sort of Speeches are carefully preserv'd; and it was mov'd in some of them, that the Duke of York's Daughters might be nam'd in the Bill of Exclusion as the next in Succession: But it was said that was not necessary, for since the Duke was only personally disabled, as if he had been actually dead, that carried the Succession over to his Daughters: However, tho' they would not name the Duke's Daughters, yet they sent such Assurances to the Prince of Orange, that nothing thus propos'd could be to his prejudice, that he believ'd them, and declar'd his Desire that the King would satisfy his Parliament. The States sent over Memorials to the King, pressing him to consent to the Exclusion. The Prince did not openly appear in this. But it being manag'd by Fagel, it was understood that he approv'd of it, which created a Hatred in the Duke to him that was never remov'd. The Earl of Sunderland, by means of Mr. Sidney, brought the States into it, but it had no Effect.

Prince of Orange for the Exclusion.

And the States.

Upon the first Debate of the Exclusion Bill this Sessions, the Duke's Friends were not prepar'd to speak for him, and when they spoke, their Arguments were extremely weak. Mr. Garraway was for having him heard, as if he could have spoke better for himself, than they did for him; or could vindicate the Charge brought against him by a Person of Quality, For making up the Match for the King, as foreseeing the Queen would have no Children; for the Loss of the Earl of Sandwich; for clearing of Persons taken in the Fire of London; the Death of Sir Edmund-bury Godfrey, &c. as in Echard's. Mr. Hyde was

A. D. 1680. for bearing him, and said, he doubted the Act would not be binding to him, and to a great many

Loyal Persons, who, if they had oppos'd it when it had the Royal Assent, would have been Rebels; and I believe there is not a Person in England, now so weak as to doubt, whether there is a Subject in the three Kingdoms, whom an Act of Parliament will not bind. Mr. Edward Seymour spoke more nervously and politely, I have been shot at by Wind guns, have we not great Experience of the Duke's Love for this Nation, in his Endeavours to destroy the Dutch, whose Interests are inseparable from ours; in his inveterate Enmity to our Religion; in his Abhorrence of English Liberty, and the like? Can so indiscreet an Attempt as the Alteration of the establish'd Religion, be made by a Prince so abounding in Prudence and Wisdom? It may be a sufficient Answer to this Interrogatory, that the same Mr. Seymour some time after took Arms against him for attempting it. Mr. Seymour said also, the Bill would not bind Ireland, as was experienc'd by the Bill for settling the Crown on King William and Queen Mary. Mr. F—— told the House, He never heard of any Law, which made an Opinion in Religion a Cause to be dispossest of Right. Did he never see or hear of any Man dispossest of his Right for being a Presbyterian? Excellent Logic! Because it may not be very equitable to dispossest a Man of his Right for an Opinion in Religion; or in other Words, to take away a private Man's Estate, because he is a Papist, since his Religion has no relation to any other Man's, or to any other Man's Liberty or Property; therefore it is not lawful to dispossest a Prince of his Right of Succession for his Opinion in Religion, tho' that Opinion brings every other Man's Religion into Danger, and his Principle is to subvert the Government, to which he pretends an Inheritance. One cannot imagine that such doughty Arguments as these, would sway much with a House that was full of the ablest Heads in the Kingdom. The Bill intitled, an

The Exclusion Bill sent to the Lords.

Act to disable the Duke of York to inherit the Imperial Crown of this Realm, was read the first time the 4th of November, and pass'd by a great Majority about ten Days after, when it was sent to the House of Lords by William Lord Russell, attended by the Lord Cavendish, Sir Henry Capel, and indeed by almost the whole House of Commons. The Earls of Shaftesbury, Essex, and Sunderland, were zealous for it, but the Lord Halifax deserted the Country Party, and appear'd with equal Zeal against it. Upon the first Reading it was carry'd in the Affirmative for a second by two Votes only, according to the Archdeacon. At the second Reading it was strenuously debated, the King being present all the time, to awe and influence the Members, so that on a Division it was thrown out by a Majority of thirty-three Voices; the Tale standing thus, No's 63. Yea's 30.

Thrown out.

P. 482.

Of the No's. Bishop Burnet tells us was the whole Bishops Bench; and Philips says, all the Bishops then present were for the Negative. Echard can't help falsifying Fact here too, by telling us, that we must except three of the Bishops. The House of Commons was inflam'd when they saw the Fate of their Bill, which Bishop Burnet says was thrown out at the first Reading.

16.

After the Bill was rejected, a noble Lord, one of the Minor Vote, spoke as follows.

My Lords,

"This noble Lord near me hath found fault with that Precedent that he supposes I offer'd your Lordships concerning the chargeable La"dies at Court; but I remember no such thing A. D. 1680. I said: but if I must speak of them, I shall say, as the Prophet did to King Saul, What means the Bleating of this kind of Cattle; and I hope the King will make me the same Answer, That he preserves them for Sacrifice. For there must be, in plain English, my Lords, a Change; we must neither have Popish Wife, nor Popish Favourite, nor Popish Mistress, nor Popish Counsellor at Court."

The last Paragraph of this Speech was extremely bold.

"However, we know who hears, and I am glad of this, that you have dealt so honourably, and so clearly in the King's Presence, and in the King's Hearing, that he cannot say he wants a right State of things; he hath it before him, and may take Counsel as he thinks fit."

While this Bill was in Debate in the House of Commons, the King sent them a Message, offering them any Security, but that without which they could never be secure, as was found by woful Experience. By another Message he demanded Supplies for the Defence of Tangier, besieged by the King of Fez: Upon which, the House resolv'd upon a Remonstrance, which was presented to the King the 13th of November, and was very unacceptable to him, as containing several Particulars of Misgovernment, and all the Grievances in his Reign, with relation to Popery.

Grievances.

"That Tangier had been several times under the Command of Popish Governors, that the Garrison was made up of Popish Officers and Irish Papists; that the bloody and restless Popish Party had found Protection from the Laws made against them, and were become able to influence Matters of State and Government; that the Continuance and Prorogation of Parliaments had been accommodated to serve the Purposes of that Party; Money rais'd upon the People to supply his Majesty's extraordinary Occasions, had by the Prevalence of Popish Counsels been employ'd to make War upon a Protestant State, and to advance and augment the dreadful Power of the French King; that great Numbers of his Majesty's Subjects were sent into, and continu'd in the Service of that King; and even the Ministers of England were made Instruments to press the States of Holland to accept of a Demand from the French King of admitting the publick Exercise of the Roman Catholick Religion; that if ever any Command was given and Engage for the Laws to be put in execution against the Papists, even from thence they gain'd Advan-

King Charles the Second's Design to destroy the Protestant Religion.

rage, while the Edge of those Laws were turn'd against Protestant Dissenters, and the Papists escap'd in a manner untouch'd; that the Test Act had little Effect; for the Papists, either by Dispensations obtain'd from Rome, submitted to those Tests, and held their Offices themselves, or those put in their Places were so favourable to the same Interests, that Popery itself had rather gain'd than lost ground since that Act."

And many other the like Articles, among which, the Prosecution of Henry Care was one, That because a Pamphlet came forth Weekly, call'd, The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome, exposing Popery as ridiculous to the People as it deserv'd, a new arbitrary Rule of Court was made in the King's Bench, rather like a Star-Chamber Court, in King Charles the First's Reign, than a Court of Law, that the same should not for the future be printed. You see the Tyranny of the arbitrary Courts suppress'd in the former Reign is reviv'd in this, and the Designs against

A. D. 1680. against our Religion and Liberty carry'd on in the Stuartine Line; yet Sir Lionel Jenkins was so simple as to recommend the Duke of York to the Succession purely because he was Brother to King Charles II. and Son to King Charles I. The Remonstrance, full of such intolerable Grievances, had no better Effect than such Remonstrances were wont to have since this Royal House began to rule these Realms, and the Carelessness of the Government amidst so much Disquiet and Danger, could not but augment the Heat that was in the House of Commons, who proceeded to the Trial of one of the Popish Lords, William Viscount Stafford, who on the 30th of November was brought before the Peers, then sitting for that purpose in Westminster-Hall. The Lord Chancellor Finch was made Lord High Steward on this occasion, and a Committee of the House of Commons were the Managers against him. They open'd the Cause with great Copiousness and Eloquence, they began with the Plot in general, and laid open the Malice, Wickedness and Horror of so dreadful, bloody, and hellish a Design. They strenuously insisted on the express positive Oaths of the Witnesses: Upon whom, says Echard, the credit of the Plot chiefly depended; false and stupid to a Prodigy! The learned Solicitor General Sir John Hawles writes, very little of the Truth of the Popish Plot depended on the Credit of Oates, Bedloe, or any other Person.

Lord Stafford's Trial.

The Managers expatiated upon Coleman's Letters, and others, Echard assures us, there was not a Snip of Paper besides those Letters, clearly proving the Design and Activity of the Writers: They press'd home the execrable Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey charg'd upon the Papists, as well by the Oaths of Self-acknowledg'd Partners in the Fact, as by a Letter from London to Tickshall, intimating this very Murder the third Day after 'twas committed. The Managers fully explain'd the Sham-Plots and Counter-Contrivances whereby the Papists would have suborn'd the King's Evidence, and turn'd all the Guilt upon his Majesty's most loyal Subjects. They urg'd the firing of the City, the burning the Navy, &c. And produced Witnesses to make the particular Charge against the Lord Stafford. Dugdale a Papist swore positively that the Lord Stafford was at a Meeting about the Beginning of September 1678, at Tickshall in Staffordshire with Lord Aston and others, and did in his presence give his full Consent to take away the King's Life, and introduce the Popish Religion. That on the 20th or 21st of September in the Forenoon the Lord Stafford sent for him to his Chamber whilst he was dressing, and turning out his Servants, offer'd him 500*l.* to take away the King's Life, saying, You shall have a free Pardon of all your Sins, and be sainted; for the King has been excommunicated, and is likewise a Traitor and Rebel, and an Enemy to Jesus Christ. Dr. Oates swore he saw several Letters, both in Spain and St. Omers sign'd Stafford; wherein his Lordship assur'd the Jesuits of his Fidelity and Zeal in promoting the Catholick Cause. That being in London in 1678, the Lord Stafford came to Father Fenwick's Chamber, and there in his Presence receiv'd a Commission from him to be Pay-Master-General of the Army: Upon which, his Lordship said, I must of necessity go down into the Country, to take account how Affairs stand there; and do not doubt but at my return Grove shall do the Business; adding, he has deceiv'd us a great while, speaking of the King, and we can bear no longer. The third Evidence was Turberville, to blacken whom, Echard says he was a profligate indigent Person. Turberville gave the Court an Account how he became indigent, he had disoblig'd his Friends by leaving his Fryar's Habit at Doway; and thereupon going into France in the Year 75, where he got acquainted with the Lord Stafford at Paris, and his Lordship propos'd to him a way both to retrieve his Credit with his Friends, and make himself happy; which was, by taking away the Life of the King, who was an Heretick, and a Rebel against God Almighty. Much the same with what he said to Dugdale; That when he took leave of him, his Lordship appointed him to meet him at London; but he soon after return'd into France, not being willing to undertake the Proposal, and was discountenanc'd by his Friends, and reduc'd to Poverty. When afterwards this Wretch was suborn'd to swear against Colledge, Echard says not a word of his Indigence, or his being a Scoundrel. The best Defence made by the Lord Stafford, was his charging the three Witnesses against him with Poverty, and his declaring in the Presence of God and his Angels, that he was innocent. The Witnesses to such a Crime were not likely to be Men of great Fortunes. His Lordship would not have offer'd a rich Man 500*l.* to kill the King, nor was it likely that any but profligate Persons would be thought Workmen for such Work.

The Managers for the Commons brought new Proofs of the Plot in general. One Smith swore he had heard Discourse at Rome of killing the King. An Irish Priest, who had been long in Spain, confirm'd many Particulars in Oates's Narrative, as we are told by my Lord of Sarum, and that the Lord Stafford said little in his Defence: And as to the Credit of the Witnesses, Sir William Jones made it very clear, that Dugdale and Turberville were good Evidences, and not at all discredited by any thing that was brought against them. The Trial was very august, and continu'd five Days; and when Judgment was to be given, 55 Peers pronounced him Guilty, and 21 not Guilty. Of the latter, 'tis said a noble Lord should say aloud, Not Guilty, upon my Honour: And softly to another, Guilty, upon my Conscience. Which, if true, makes the Evidence to be very clear, and that the Archdeacon's villifying it, shews more Zeal for the Cause than for the Truth. We read in Bishop Burnet's Memoirs, "Four of the Howards, his Kinmen, condemn'd him. Lord Arundel, afterwards Duke of Norfolk, tho' in Enmity with him, acquitted him. Duke Lauderdale condemn'd him. So did the Earl of Nottingham and Earl of Anglesey. The Lord Hallifax acquitted him. The Lord Chancellor, when he gave Judgment, made a Speech, in which he committed one great Indecency: for he said, Who can doubt any longer that London " was burnt by Papists, tho' there was not one burnt by Word in the whole Trial relating to it?" Bi- Papists, shop Burnet visited him after his Condemnation at his Request, and the Lord Stafford own'd to him, he could discover many things that were more material than any that were yet known, and for which the Duke would never forgive him: but upon his Examination before the Lords, he spoke only of the Endeavours of the Papists to get a Toleration, and that Lord Shaftesbury had undertaken to promote it. When he nam'd him, he was order'd to withdraw, and the Lords would hear no more from him. The Sentence against him being, that he should be hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd, the two Sheriffs, Alderman Cor- Sheriffs nish and Mr. Bethel, upon the King's changing the Execution to beheading, apply'd to the Parliament with these following Queries: 1. Whether the King, being neither Judge nor Party, can order the Execution? 2. Whether the Lords can award the Execution? 3. Whether the King

Application to the Commons.

A. D. 1680. can dispense with any Part of the Execution?
 4. If the King can dispense with some Part, why not All? Some were shock'd with these Queries, says Mr. Archdeacon; and Sir William Jones was for dropping them, lest the Parliament's making any opposition might prevent the Execution of the Lord Stafford.

The Lord Stafford executed.

On the 29th of September, he was brought to a Scaffold on Tower-Hill, where he made a Speech; in which, among other things, he said, I over, upon my Death and Salvation, That I never spoke one Word either to Oates or Turberville; and for Dugdale, I never spoke to him but about some trivial Matters, and was never alone with him. The Bishop of Salisbury writes, Many Proofs were brought that he was often in Lord Stafford's Company, of which many more Affidavits were made after that Lord's Death. Bishop Burnet informs us, That Turberville, when he was dying, sent for Mr. Hawes, Curate of St. Martin's, who found his Understanding and Memory no way affected by his Disease, and advis'd him to confess his Sins, and glorify God, tho' to his shame. Turberville, both in Discourse, and when he receiv'd the Sacrament, protested that he had sworn nothing but the Truth against Lord Stafford, and renounc'd the Mercies of God, and the Benefit of the Death of Christ, if he did not speak the plain and naked Truth, without any Reservation. Yet Echard hangs upon the Lord Stafford's denying he had ever seen Turberville. And so much has been said of Popish Declarations of Innocence on the Scaffold, or at the Gallows, that there's no need of further Reflection upon it.

I wonder the Reverend Historian omitted the Blazing Star, which appear'd about this time. The Star itself, as it was call'd, seem'd small, but the Tail or Stream of Light was of great Magnitude. It seem'd not much above the Horizon when first discover'd, but every Night afterwards it appear'd higher and higher in the beginning of the Night, and consequently setting later and later, its Lustre and Extent gradually decay'd, till it was no more seen. The Archdeacon lost a happy Occasion to apply this Comet to the Death of Lord Stafford, which he treats as a sort of Martyrdom for the Cause.

King's Speech.

On the 15th of December the King came to the Parliament, and made a Speech to both Houses, wherein, as he takes notice he had done before, he promises to concur with them in any Remedies for securing the Protestant Religion, which might consist with preserving the Succession in its due and legal Course of Descent. The Commons, in a long Answer to this Speech on the 18th of December, tell him, "That no Interruption of that Descent has been endeavour'd by them, except only the Descent upon the Person of the Duke of York; who, by the wicked Instruments of the Church of Rome, has been manifestly perverted to their Religion; that his Succession is utterly inconsistent with the Safety of his Majesty's Person, the Preservation of the Protestant Religion, and the Property, Peace, and Welfare of his Protestant Subjects." They also came to these Resolutions upon it.

Resolved, "That 'tis the Opinion of this House, that there is no Security or Safety for the Protestant Religion, the King's Life, or the well constituted and establish'd Government of this Kingdom, without passing a Bill for disabling James Duke of York to inherit the Imperial Crown of England and Ireland: And to rely upon any other Means or Remedies without such a Bill, is not only insufficient, but dangerous."

The House of Commons pass'd a Vote, That all Anticipations on any Branches of the Revenue are against Law, and that whosoever lent any Money upon those Anticipations, were publick Enemies to the Kingdom: for they look on the Revenue as a publick Treasure, that was to be kept clear of all Anticipations, and not as a private Estate that might be mortgag'd. They thought when all other Means of Supply, except by Parliament, were stopp'd, the King would certainly be brought to their Terms. They also pass'd a Vote for an Association, copy'd from Association that in Queen Elizabeth's Time, for the revenge-tion. ing the King's Death upon all Papists, if he should happen to be kill'd.

I have mention'd the Dutches of Portsmouth's falling in with the Majority of the House of Commons for the Exclusion Bill; and I must explain the Mystery of a French Papist's being against the Duke of York, who was a fast Friend to Popery and France. It was propos'd to her, that if she could bring the King to the Exclusion, and to some other popular Things, the Parliament would go next to prepare a Bill for securing the King's Person, in which should be a Clause, that the King might declare the Successor to the Crown, as had been done in Henry the VIIIth's Time. This would very much raise the King's Authority, and would be no Breach with the Prince of Orange, but would rather oblige him to a greater Dependance on the King. And if such an Act could be carry'd, she might prevail on the King to declare her Son his Successor. It was further suggested to her, that in order to the strengthening her Son's Interest, she might treat for a Match with the French King's natural Daughter. The Duke of Monmouth easily gave into this Scheme, as flattering himself that nobody would be prefer'd to him in the Succession by his Father. Thus were the Duke of Monmouth and Dutches of Portsmouth brought to an Agreement to carry on the Exclusion, tho' with different Views; and the Parliament engag'd in it with still another View, the Princess of Orange's Succession. The Dutches not only acted heartily in this matter, but she once drew the King to consent to it, if he might have had 800000 Pounds for it, which was afterwards brought down to 600000 Pounds. But the House of Commons were so jealous of the King, that the Managers durst not move for giving Money, till the Bill of Exclusion was pass'd, lest they should lose their Credit, and his Majesty would not trust them. So near, says the Bishop of Salisbury, was this Point brought to an Agreement, if the Duke of Montagu told me true. Welwood tells us, the French King outbid the Country Party in favour of the Duke of York, and by giving more Money, got the King to persist in the Opposition he gave to the Bill. When it was thrown out of the House of Lords, the King told his Brother, that the Dutches of Portsmouth did all by his Order, that so she might have Credit with the Party, and see into their Designs, which the Duke of York believing, or seeming to believe, he was easily reconcil'd with her.

The Lord Halifax press'd the House of Lords to go on the Limitations; and he began with one, That the Duke should be oblig'd to live the 500 Miles out of England, during the King's Life. The Earl of Essex mov'd, that an Association should be enter'd into to maintain whatever Limitations should be agreed upon, and that some cautionary Towns should be put into the hands of the Associators during the King's Life, to make them good after his Death, which the King look'd upon as a Deposing of himself.

The

A. D. 1680. The Earl of Shaftesbury and his Party laugh'd at all Expedients, and those that were propos'd carry'd so many Difficulties with them, that the Necessity of the Exclusion was daily more apparent to People of the least Penetration and Foresight, who had any Concern for the Religion and Liberty of their Country.

Tho' the Commons could not carry that Bill, they endeavour'd to supply the loss of it with some vigorous Votes: As, 1. For a Bill to banish all Papists. 2. Another, For the more effectual securing of the Meetings and Sitzings of Parliaments. 3. Another, For the Judges to hold their Places quam diu se bene gesserint. 4. Another, For uniting his Majesty's Protestant Subjects: And on a Debate of Freedom of Voting, and of the Corruption and Partiality occasion'd by Offices and Pensions, they Resolved, December the 30th, That no Member of this House shall accept of any Office or Place of Profit from the Crown, without the Leave of this House, nor any Promise of any such Office or Place of Profit, during such time as he shall continue a Member of the House.

Judges impeach'd. ON Wednesday the 5th of January, the Commons order'd an Impeachment against Sir Francis North, Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas; Sir William Scroggs, Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench; Sir Thomas Jones, one of the Justices of the same Bench; and Sir Richard Weston, one of the Barons of the Exchequer. And it is a melancholy Reflection, that in the former Reign, and this, the Crown never wanted a Bench of Bishops and a Bench of Judges to promote the Designs which were form'd against the Reform'd Religion, and the Liberties of England. The Lawyers must know better, or they knew not the Law; and the Bishops know otherwise, or they knew not the Gospel. Sir Francis North's Crime was, That he, as appear'd by the Confession of the Attorney General before the House, was advising and assisting in drawing up, and passing the Proclamations against tumultuous Petitions. There were a great many Complaints against Sir William Scroggs, and Sir Thomas Jones, which occasion'd many Resolutions of the House, and Votes against them. One of those Complaints was, that when the Grand-Jury which serv'd for the Hundred of Ossulston in the County of Middlesex, attended the King's-Bench with a Petition, which they desir'd the Court to present in their Name to his Majesty, for the Sitting of the Parliament, the Chief Justice Scroggs said he would dispatch them presently; that the Court took it ill to have a Petition offer'd to alter the King's Mind contrary to his Proclamation. Observe what sober Reasoning there is amongst them! 'Twas further urg'd against Scroggs, That when there were several Presentments against Papists, among which was the Bill against the Duke of York for not coming to Church, he and his Brother Judges discharg'd the Grand-Jury four Days before the End of the Term, which was never done before. The Parliament voted their doing it, Arbitrary, Illegal, and a High Misdemeanor, the 22d of November, several Days before the Impeachment was order'd. One of Baron Weston's great Crimes was, That in an extraordinary kind of Charge given the Affizes before at Kingston, he inveigh'd very much against Farel, Luther, Calvin and Zuinglius, condemning them as Authors of the Reformation, which was against their Princes Minds, and then adding to this purpose, Zuinglius set up his Fanaticisms, (the stupid Wretch mistakes Piety and Purity for the Dreams of distemper'd Brains,) and Calvin built on that blessed Foundation; and to speak truth, prodigious Impudence! All his Disciples are season'd with such a Sharpness, that it mostly concerns Magistrates to keep a strict Hand over them. Upon which, an ingenious Writer observes, "It was then the grand Artifice to represent All, who would not do what the Courtiers then would have them, as Fanaticks." Which Mr. Archdeacon has very happily endeavour'd to imitate. Weston proceeds, And now they are restless, amusing us with Fears, and nothing will serve them gainst the but a Parliament: For my part, I know no Representative of the Nation but the King. The last cited Author takes notice, None of his Kidney knew any other in those Days. Weston again, All Power centers in the King. 'Tis true, he does intrust it with his Ministers, but he is the sole Representative, and i'faith he has Wisdom enough to intrust it no more in these Men, who have given us such late Examples of their Wisdom and Faithfulness. Several Witnesses prov'd these Words upon him, some of whom put them immediately in writing: And it was Resolv'd, That the said Expressions in the said Charge given by the said Baron Weston, were a Scandal to the Reformation, in Derogation of the Rights and Privileges of Parliament, and tending to raise Discord between his Majesty and his Subjects." What sort of Churchmen and Bishops there were in those Days, we may see by Speech made in the House of Commons, in the Debate of another Message from his Majesty the Day before these Proceedings. I remember before the last Session of Parliament, there was a Council held at Lambeth, and there hatch'd a Bill against Popery. It was for the breeding of Children of a Popish Successor, which admitted the Thing, and it was call'd a Bill against Popery, but we call'd it the Popish Bill. I am for the Church of England, but not for such Churchmen as the late Bishop of St. Asaph, who, on his Death-bed could hardly forbear declaring himself, which his Epitaph did, Ora pro Anima, a Papist. Pray for the Soul, order'd to be written upon his Tomb.

Baron Weston and this Bishop shew us how our Church and Law-Benches were then fill'd: The former were the well known Dead Weight, the latter are well set out in their proper Colours by the following Speech in Parliament.

The two great Pillars of the Government are Speech and Parliaments and Juries. It is this gives us the Title of Free-born Englishmen; for my Notion of FREE-BORN ENGLISHMEN is this, that they are rul'd by Laws of their own making, and try'd by Men of the same Condition. The two great and undoubted Privileges of the People have been lately invaded by the Judges that now sit at Westminster. They have espous'd Proclamations against Law, they have discountenanc'd and oppos'd several legal Acts, that tended to the Sitting of this Honourable House; they have grasp'd the Legislative Power into their own hands, as in that Instance of Printing: the Parliament was considering that matter, but they in the Interim made their private Opinion to be Law, to supersede the Judgment of this House. They have discharg'd Juries on purpose to quell their Presentments, and shelter great Criminals from Justice; and when Juries have presented their Petitions for the sitting of the Parliament, they have in disdain thrown them at their feet, telling them, They would be no Messengers to carry such Petitions; and yet in a few days after, would have encourag'd all that would spit their Venom at the Constitution. They have serv'd an Ignorant and Arbitrary Faction, and been the Messengers of Abhorrences to the King. Rare Tools these,

A. D. 1681. these, to do the Persecuting Bishops Work, and to harraß and ruin Protestant Dissenters; and it had been well; if they had not dipp'd their Hands deep in the Blood of Protestant Churchmen a Year or two after. Another worthy Member spoke thus:

Speech about the Ministry. "His Majesty is inclos'd by a sort of Ministers, who endeavour to destroy the Constitution; and I hope to move against them before we rise; and tho' we have 'lost our Bill, we have not lost our Courage and Hearts."

Another, said to be the Lord Ruffel, on the Demand of Money for Tangier, by the Message of the 4th of January, spoke as follows:

Lord Ruffel's Speech against Popery and the Popish Duke. I'll never be for giving of Money to promote Popery and a Successor a publick Enemy to the Kingdom, and a Slave to the Pope. While he has Eleven to Seven in Council, and Sixty-four to Thirty-one in the House of Lords, we are not secure. If my own Father had been one of the Sixty-four, I should have voted him an Enemy to the King and Kingdom; and if we cannot live Protestants, I hope we shall die so. It is thought this Speech was one of the Provocations that hasten'd the Murther of this excellent and beloved Patriot, as soon as the Court could get Sheriffs and Juries that were fit for such Butchery.

Another Speech made the same Day, has something in it very extraordinary, and discovers a Secret, which further explains the unwarrantable Correspondences and Practices of the Ministers at this Juncture.

Speech about Tangier and Popery. I am of opinion that POPERY may be aim'd at by keeping Tangier, and our Councils are manag'd at Rome; from whence I saw a Letter from a Friend dated the 21st of October, the Day on which this Parliament met, with the Heads of the King's Speech in it, to this effect: "That his Majesty would command them not to meddle with the Succession, that he would keep Tangier to draw on Expences."

Such was King Charles the 2d's Government, such his Ministers, such his Bishops, such his Judges, such his Zeal for the Protestant Church of England, and such his Affection to the English Liberty. To prevent the Ruin of which, as far as in them lay, the Parliament voted on January the 7th, "That his Majesty in his last Message having assur'd this House of his Readiness to concur in all other means, but the altering the Course of Succession; this House doth declare, That until a Bill be likewise pass'd for the excluding the Duke of Tork, this House cannot give any Supply to his Majesty, without Danger to his Majesty's Person, extream Hazard to the Protestant Religion, and Unfaithfulness to those by whom this House is trusted.

Resolv'd, "That all Persons who advis'd his Majesty in his last Message to this House, to insist upon an Opinion against the Bill for excluding the Duke of Tork, have given pernicious Counsel to his Majesty, and are Promoters of Popery, and Enemies to the King and Kingdom:" And as such they name, George Earl of Hallifax.

Henry Marquis of Worcester.

Henry Earl of Clarendon.

Lewis Earl of Fewersham.

Laurence Hyde Esq;

Lords voted Enemies to the Kingdom.

Against whom they order'd Addresses to be presented to the King, to remove them from his Presence and Councils. Bishop Burnet tells us, Hyde spoke so vehemently to vindicate himself from the suspicion of Popery, that he cry'd in his Speech; and Sir William Jones, upon the score of old Friendship, got the Words relating to Popery to be struck out of the Address against him. The Commons also impeach'd that Eminent Orthodox Senator Mr. Edward Seymour, for Corruption and Male-Administration in the Office of Treasurer of the Navy, and order'd an Address to remove him from his Majesty's Council and Presence; but the Parliament was prorog'd before they could get it presented. Scroggs's Impeachment being sent to the Lords, they rejected it, alledging the Charge against him amounted not to High-Treason, as 'twas laid in that Impeachment. This was carry'd chiefly by the Earl of Danby's Party, and in favour to him.

The City of Bristol never wanted a Party in the worst of Times, to contribute as much as they could to what made them so bad as they were. One may guess at their Temper now, by Cunn and their chusing a Person of very small Fame, Sir Thompson Robert Cunn, to be their Representative, who, however, made himself famous by his Crime and his Punishment. He was question'd for saying, There was no Popish Plot, but a Presbyterian Plot, and the Expression is the lively Image of his Capacity. The House order'd him to receive their Censure upon his Knees at the Bar, to be expell'd, and committed to the Tower; and his Expulsion is said to be in so homely a Phrase as this from the Speaker, That the House shew'd him out.

Richard Thompson, Parson of St. Thomas's Church in Bristol, a noisy, insolent, ignorant Priest, I take the more liberty with him because I knew him, said also in a Sermon preach'd in the Church of St. Thomas, 30th of January 1679, There is no Popish Plot, but a Presbyterian Plot. He was a great Stickler against Petitions for the Sitting of the Parliament. Being sent for into custody, he was brought on his Knees in the House of Commons, and committed to Prison. He was examin'd very strictly, and gave the House of Commons so little Satisfaction in his Answers, that they order'd an Impeachment against him, but discharg'd his Commitment on his giving Security to answer the Charge against him when call'd upon. His Majesty, to shew how little he valu'd the Sentiments of the Representatives of the Nation, soon after made this Richard Thompson Dean of Bristol; Laurence Hyde, Earl of Rockester; Earl of Hallifax, Marquis of Hallifax; and the Marquis of Worcester, Duke of Beaufort. Nay, he so much affected to let the People see he acted in despight, that he advanc'd and favour'd every Man that had given offence to the Parliament, by betraying the Liberties of their Country. The House Resolv'd, "That whosoever shall hereafter lend, or cause to be lent, by way of Advance, any Money upon the Branches of the King's Revenue arising by Custom, Excise, or Hearth-Money, shall be adjudg'd to hinder the Sitting of Parliaments, and shall be responsible for the same in Parliament." And having notice that there would be a sudden Prorogation to hinder their perfecting the good Bills that were passing, and the bringing their good Votes into Bills, they, on the 10th of January, resolv'd, "That whosoever advis'd his Majesty to prorogue this Parliament to any other purpose, than in order to the passing of a Bill for the Exclusion of James Duke of Tork, is a Betrayer of the King, the Protestant Religion, and of the Kingdom of England, a Promoter of the French Interest, and a Pensioner to France."

They also Resolv'd, "That the Thanks of this House be given to the City of London, for their manifest Loyalty to the King; their Care, Charge and Vigilancy for the Preservation of his Majesty's Person, and of the Protestants Votes against ending Money.

A. D. 1681. "testant Religion." In this the House of Commons refer to two City Petitions; the one for the Sitting of the Parliament; the other, That the Parliament might sit till Protestantism was secur'd. The Commons Resolv'd, "That it is the Opinion of this House, that the Acts of Parliament made in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth and King James, against Popish Recusants, ought not to be extended against Protestant Dissenters. Resolv'd, That it is the Opinion of this House, that the Prosecution of Protestant Dissenters upon the Penal Laws is, at this time, grievous to the Subjects, a weakening the Protestant Interest, an Encouragement to Popery, and dangerous to the Peace of the Kingdom." One would think this Vote was occasion'd by an Apprehension of the Loss of the Bill for uniting his Majesty's Protestant Subjects, which was brought in and debated. In this Debate will be seen what solid Reasons the Enemies to Protestant Dissenters had, to justify their persecuting them. There are a sort of Men, said one of the Members, who will neither be advis'd nor over-ruled, but under the pretence of Conscience, break violently through all Laws whatsoever, to the great Disturbance both of Church and State; therefore I think it more convenient to have a Law for forcing the Dissenters to yield to the Church, and not to force the Church to yield to them. Echar'd is ashamed of the Man's Name, and well he may. If I could tell who he was, the Reader should know it, that his Memory might receive the homage that's due to so much Merit. He says the Dissenters will break every Act of Parliament in the Statute-Books, rather than they will go to Church; and tho' they might be banish'd, and in some cases hang'd, by the Statute 35 Elizabeth, yet he is for making more Laws to force the Dissenters to yield to the Common Prayer-Book, to the Surplice, the Cross in Baptism, to Godfathers and Godmothers, and to thirty or forty other such Articles which he calls the Church, and which is the Charm my Lord Bishop of Sarum speaks of. Another Member, who had as much Sense as the former, but not quite so much Courage, said, I am afraid, if once the Government begin to yield to Dissenters, it will be as in Forty One; when there were no Dissenters in England but Papists and Enthusiasts. Nothing will serve but an utter Subversion; he means, that to unite Protestants, is to subvert the Protestant Religion. The receiving of one thing will give occasion for demanding more; and it will be impossible to give them any satisfaction, without laying all open, and running into confusion. The Archdeacon printed all these Idiotisms, after the possibility of it had been experimented between 40 and 50 Years, and the Dissenters had receiv'd Satisfaction without the least Confusion imaginable. But the noble Cause is equal to the noble Defenders of it, who have generally been Men of the same size with these two worthy Senators for Capacity and Merit. Such Speeches as these could not be made without Answers in such a Place as St. Stephen's Chapel. One worthy Member said, Sir, this Bill is intended for the Preservation of the Church, and I am of opinion it is the best Bill that can be made in order thereto; our Circumstances consider'd, I think this is a very good time to try whether the Dissenters will be drawn with the Cords of Love or no, and the Bill will be very agreeable to that Christian Charity, which our Church professes; and I hope, that in the time of this imminent Danger, they will consider their own Safety, and the Safety of the Protestant Religion, and not longer keep on foot the unhappy Divisions among us, on which the Papists ground their Hopes: But rather seeing the Church so far condescend as to dispense with the Surplice; a very great Condescension truly, considering what a handsome and necessary thing it is, the same Gentleman expects, They will submit to the rest that is enjoind by Law, that so we may unite against the common Enemy. Another Member said, What real Love, Friendship, or Obedience can the Church expect from such Persons, as by the Execution of such Laws, may be forc'd to come to Church? How can they be depended on, or the Church be strengthen'd by them? You may prevent their Meetings, and force them either to come to Church, or pay Fines, or be imprison'd; but you cannot expect that their Opinions or Affections should be alter'd by such Proceedings, without which the Church can never be the stronger. Hith the Oxford Act, or that of the 35th of Queen Elizabeth, or any other against the Dissenters been executed in favour of the Church? Are not the Dissenters as many, if not more than ever? Is there any thing more visible, than that these Laws have been made use of to serve the Popish Interest, or as Engines rather for the State than the Church? When in the Year 1670, by the severe Execution of these Laws, all Meetings and Conventicles were prevented, and many Dissenters came to Church, did not the Toleration happen thereupon? And if this Toleration had been intended for the Advantage of the Protestant Religion, why were not the Churchmen, or Dissenters of any kind pleas'd with it? And if the Oxford Act, and other Laws against Dissenters, were projected in favour of the Protestant Religion, it was strange that they were so much promoted by Sir Thomas Clifford, Sir Solomon Swale, and Sir Roger Strickland, who have since all appear'd to be Papists?

Echar'd boasts, That tho' this Bill was committed it would not pass; but he does not tell us why. It was so drawn, that it did not please the Dissenters, whose Party in the House, according to Bishop Burnet, did not seem concerned to promote it; on the contrary, they neglected it.

The leading Men of that Party in the House of Commons, were

Mr. Boscawen. Sir Richard Temple.
Paul Foley Esq; Col. Birch.
Sir Nicholas Carew. Col. Titus.
Richard Hampden Esq; Sir Francis Winnington.
Sir John Maynard.

Nay, Sir Thomas Clarges and Mr. Finch spoke for this Uniting Bill; and it is said one of those Gentlemen made the following Speech: Mr. Speaker, "I would not open my Mouth in favour of this Bill, if I thought it would any ways prejudice the Church or Church-Government; but I believe it may have a quite contrary effect, and tend more for the Preservation and Safety of the Church and Church-Government, than any Bill whatsoever that could be contriv'd."

"The Presbyterians, Independents, and all other Dissenters, may be more in number than the Papists, and may be willing enough to have the Church Government alter'd, if not destroy'd; yet, being they cannot have any Succour from abroad, nor from the Government here at home, I cannot see any great danger of them. For it is not probable that they shall ever have a King of their Opinion, nor a Parliament by the Discovery they made of their Strength in the last Elections; for, according to the best Calculation I can make, they could not bring in above one in twenty; and therefore because they have not

"such bloody, desperate Principles as the Papists, and because we agree in Points of Faith, and so no such great danger from them as from the Papists, I think we have reason to conclude, that the Church is most in danger from the Papists, and that therefore we ought to take care of them in the first place; and we cannot do that by any way more likely to prove effectual, than by some such Bill as this; because, if it should have the Effect design'd, of bringing in many of the Dissenters into the Church, it would disappoint them of the great Hopes they have ground on our Divisions, and make the Church stronger, not only to oppose the Papists, but such Dissenters as may not come in. And if we should not have this Success, I do not understand it will any way weaken the Church Government."

Act of 35
peal'd.

I cannot reconcile two reverend Historians on this Subject. The compleat one says, the Majority of the House fell in heartily with this Bill; and Mr. Archdeacon thought it would not pass, which is not at all consistent with a Majority. 'Tis certain that it did not pass, and that another Act did, entitul'd, An Act to repeal the Statute of 35 of Elizabeth, as far as it related to Protestant Dissenters, against whom it had been severely executed, tho' the reverend Historians own it was apparently made against Popish Recusants. This charitable Bill was strenuously oppos'd in the House of Lords by the Bishops. However, the Temporal Lords carry'd it against them. And on the day of Prorogation, January 10, it ought to have been offer'd to the King; but the Clerk of the Crown, by the King's particular Order, according to Bishop Burnet, withdrew the Bill. His Lordship calls this Method indiscreet; but as most of the Methods of this Government did, it deserv'd a much harder Name; for it was very base to direct the scaling away an Act of Parliament, when there was not Courage enough to reject it, nor Honour enough to pass it. All the future cruel tyrannical Proceedings against Protestant Dissenters in the Spiritual and other Courts, was, in a great measure, supported by this vile Treachery, or rather Larceny. For had the repealing Act pass'd, it had taken away the Edge of the Laws against them, of which this was the most keen, as extending to Death in some Cases. The Commons having private notice, that they were to be prorogu'd, assembled early in the Morning, and before the Usher of the Black Rod came in, they resolv'd, That it is the Opinion of this House, that the Acts of Parliament made in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth and King James against Popish Recusants, ought not to be extended against Protestant Dissenters. After which the House of Commons were sent for up to the Lords, where his Majesty gave the Royal Assent to an Act about Irish Cattle; and another about burying in Woollen. And then the Lord Chancellor prorogu'd the Parliament to the 20th of January, but it never sat more.

The Bishop of Salisbury, as moderate as he was in his Principles, cannot help remembring, that the Vote against executing the Penal Laws on Dissenters, was thought a great Invasion of the Legislature, when one House pretended to suspend the Execution of Laws, which was to act like Dictators in the State; and instead of being a Kindness to the Nonconformists, rais'd a new Storm against them over all the Nation, insinuating they had brought the Storm on themselves, by endeavouring to provide a Shelter. The Author of the Vindication of the two last Parliaments, suppos'd to be Sir William Jones, the greatest Lawyer in England, speaks of this Matter with much more Reason and Judgment, in these Words, Is it a suspending an Act of Parliament, if the House of Commons declare a Law to be grievous and dangerous in their Opinion, before they set about the Repeal of it? And is there any ground to doubt, but that a Bill would have pass'd that House pursuant to this Vote, had it not been prevented by a Dissolution? Nor was there the least Direction or Signification to the Judges, contrary to Bishop Burnet's Insinuation. They meant that Courts and Juries should govern themselves by the Opinion they now gave; such Practices are laid to the Charge of the Court; and my Author adds, Judges ought not to break them in reverence to Votes, nor in respect to any Command from the King or Favourites; then we should have no more Letters from Secretaries of State to Judges sitting on the Bench; then we should have no more Proclamations, like that of the 14th of October 1662, forbidding the Execution of the Laws concerning the High Ways; nor that of the 10th of May 1672, dispensing with divers Clauses in the Acts of Parliament for Encrease of Shipping; nor any more Declarations, like that of the 15th of March 1672, suspending the Penal Laws in Matters Ecclesiastical. Tho' the Judges are sworn to execute all Laws, yet there is no Obligation upon any man to inform against another; and therefore, tho' the Ministers prevented the Repeal of those Laws, 'tis to be hop'd that this Vote will restrain Englishmen from prosecuting Protestants, when so wise and great a Body have declar'd the pernicious Effects of such a Prosecution. 'Tis most true, that in England no Law is abrogated by Desuetude, but 'tis no less true that there are many Laws still not executed, which are never executed, nor can be, without publick Detriment. The Judges know of many such dormant Laws, and yet they do not quicken the People to put them in execution, nor think themselves guilty of Perjury, that they do not. Such are the Laws for wearing Caps, for keeping Lent, those concerning Bows and Arrows, about Calves and Lambs, and many others. And those who vex Men by Informations on such antiquated Laws as the 35th Eliz. with respect to Dissenters, have been ever look'd upon as infamous. What then were all the persecuting Prelates, such as Gunning, Ward, Mew, &c. Hence it is that there are no Names remember'd with greater Detestation than those of Empson and Dudley, the whole Kingdom a-hor'd them as Monsters, and they were punish'd as Traytors.

Three Days after the Prorogation of the Parliament, the Lord Mayor, Sir Patience Ward, with a Court of Common Council, order'd a Petition to be drawn up to be presented to the King, praying, that the Parliament might sit at the Day appointed, January 20th, in order to try the Popish Lords in the Tower, to carry on the Impeachment against L. C. J. Scroggs, and settle the Nation; which Petition was order'd to be deliver'd that Night by the Lord Mayor, attended by the new Recorder, George Treby Esq; and certain Members of the Court of Aldermen and Common Council: But the King took no more notice of it, than he did of the other Petitions about the sitting of Parliaments; on the contrary, he dissolv'd them five Days after by Proclamation, in which he also declar'd his Intention to call another, to meet on the 21st of March at Oxford, in despite to the City of London. Against this ill-concerted Removal of the Parliament from the Metropolis of the Kingdom, to crowd them up in a Place which was equally inconvenient and disagreeable to them, several noble Lords drew up a Petition, representing to his

D. 1681. his Majesty, "The many Misfortunes attending the untimely Prorogations, Dissolutions, and Discontinuations of Parliaments of late, at a time when the whole Nation was in imminent Danger from Papists: And now at last, his Majesty had been prevail'd on to call another Parliament at Oxford, where neither Lords nor Commons could be in Safety; but would be daily expos'd to the Sword of the Papists, and their Adherents, of whom too many had crept into his Majesty's Guards. The Liberty of speaking according to their Consciences would be thereby destroy'd, and the Validity of their Acts and Proceedings left disputable. The Straitness of the Place no ways admitted of such a Concourse of Persons as now follow'd every Parliament, and the Witnesses which were necessary to give Evidence upon the Commons Impeachment, were unable to bear the Charges of such a Journey, and unwilling to trust themselves under the Protection of a Parliament, that was itself evidently under the Power of Guards and Soldiers." They say in the Close, The Premises consider'd, we your Majesty's Petitioners, out of just Abhorrence of such a dangerous and pernicious Counsel, which the Authors have not dar'd to avow, and the direful Apprehensions of the Calamities and Miseries that may ensue thereupon, do make it our most humble Prayer and Advice, that the Parliament may not sit at a Place where it cannot be able to act with that Freedom which is necessary, and especially to give unto their Acts and Proceedings that Authority which they ought to have among the People, and have ever had, unless impair'd by some Awe upon them, of which there wants not Precedents; and that your Majesty would be graciously pleas'd to order it to sit at Westminster, it being the usual Place, and where they may consult with Safety and Freedom. And your Petitioners shall ever pray, &c.

May it please your Majesty,

Earl of Essex's Speech to the King against it. "The Lords here present, together with divers other Peers, taking notice that by your late Proclamation your Majesty had declar'd an Intention of calling a Parliament at Oxford, and observing from History and Records how unfortunate many Assemblies have been, when call'd at a Place remote from the Capital City; as particularly the Congress in Henry II's Time at Clarendon; three several Parliaments at Oxford in Henry III's Time, and at Coventry in Henry VI's Time, with divers others, which prov'd very fatal to those Kings, and have been follow'd with great Mischief to the whole Kingdom: And considering the present Posture of Affairs, the many Jealousies and Discontents which are amongst the People, we have great cause to apprehend, that the Consequences of a Parliament now at Oxford, may be as fatal to your Majesty, and the Nation, as those others mention'd have been to the then reigning Kings. And therefore we do conceive that we cannot answer it to God, to your Majesty, or to the People, if we, being

"Peers of the Realm, should not, on so important an Occasion, humbly offer our Advice to your Majesty, that, if possible, your Majesty may be prevail'd with to alter this, as we apprehend, unseasonable Resolution. The Grounds and Reasons of our Opinion are contain'd in this our Petition, which we humbly present to your Majesty;" and which the King receiv'd with a Frown, as he knew well how to do when he was in an ill Humour; and his Majesty's Face seem'd to be well made for it.

A few Days before the King went to Oxford, Fitzharris, an Irish Papist, was taken up for framing a malicious treasonable Libel against the King, and his whole Family: He had met with one Everard, who pretended to make Discoveries; but it was in general Terms, and he descended not to so many Particulars as the Witnesses had done. Fitzharris and he had been acquainted in France, and on confidence of old Acquaintance, he shew'd him his Libel. He made an Appointment to come to Everard's Chamber, who thought he intended to trap him, and plac'd Witnesses to over-hear all that pass'd. Fitzharris left the Libel with him all writ with his own Hand. Everard went with the Paper and his Evidence, and inform'd against Fitzharris, who upon that was committed to Newgate the 28th of February. And seeing the Proof against him was like to be full, he said the Libel was drawn by Everard, and only copied by himself; but he had no sort of Proof to support this. Bishop Burnet proceeds, "Cornish the Sheriff going to see him, Fitzharris desir'd he would bring him a Justice of Peace, for he could make a great Discovery of the Plot, far beyond all that was yet known. Cornish, in the Simplicity of his Heart, went and acquainted the King with this, for which he was much blam'd; for it was said, by this means that Discovery might have been stop'd. But his going first with it to the Court prov'd afterwards a great Happiness to himself, and a great many others. The Secretaries and some Privy Counsellors were upon that sent to examine Fitzharris, to whom he gave a Relation of a Practice to kill the King in which the Duke was concerned, with many other Particulars, which were all a Fiction. The Secretaries came to him a second time to examine him farther; he boldly stood to all he had said, and desir'd that some Justice of the City might be brought to him. So Sir Robert Clayton and Sir George Treby went to him; and he made the same pretended Discovery to them over again, insinuating he was glad it was now in safe hands that would not stifle it. The King was highly offended at this, since it plainly shew'd a Distrust of his Ministers; and so Fitzharris was remov'd to the Tower, which the Court resolv'd to make the Prison for all Offenders till there should be Sheriffs chosen more at the King's devotion; yet the Deposition made to Clayton and Treby was in all points the same that he made to the Secretaries, so that there was no colour for the Pretence afterward put on this, as if they had practis'd on him." What then will the Reader say of the Honesty and Conscience of a reverend Historian, who affirms that they did practise on him. Sir Robert Clayton ask'd him what he could say to Godfrey's Murder; false Answer'd, something. Upon which Clayton reply'd, it may be you are in Confusion; recollect yourself. Sir George Treby kept him three Hours, press'd him about Godfrey's Death, and declar'd, unless he could speak to that Murder he could say nothing. Then saying something he had heard from others, he ask'd him if he could say no more.

A. D. 1681. He reply'd, is not this enough to save my Life? am I not Rogue enough? Hereupon the Recorder,

Sir George Treby, a vertuous and sober, as well as learned and judicious Gentleman, swore God's Zounds! it is Mr. Archdeacon who says it, what were you ever but a Rogue? Then he enter'd upon the Heads of the Examination, and told him, All this would not save his Life, unless he would speak to the Libel, which was a Court-Trick, and it was not for nothing that he had been so often seen at the Lady Portsmouth's. Bishop Burnet says there was not the least colour to pretend to such tampering; Fitzharris's Libel tended to excite the People to Rebellion against the King, whom it represented as a Tyrant and a Papist, and the Duke of York to be still worse, if possible. Notwithstanding the ill Success of the Meal-Tub Plot, the Faction compos'd of Papists and Tories resolv'd not to give over; and therefore in this second Contrivance, fram'd to bring the Protestant Party, moderate Churchmen and Dissenters, now call'd Whigs, into another Conspiracy: For this treasonable Libel was to be dispers'd by the Penny-Post among the chief Protestant Lords and Gentlemen, whose Houses and Persons were then to be search'd; and upon finding of the Libel they were to be apprehended, and proceeded against as Traytors. It is confess'd that the King gave Dangerfield Money before the Discovery of the Meal-Tub Treason, and now Everard swore positively, that the Court had a hand in it, and that the King had given Fitzharris Money. Sir William Waller, who was very active in discovering both Dangerfield's and Fitzharris's Treasons, said, when he acquainted the King with the apprehending of Fitzharris, his Majesty told him, he had done the greatest piece of Service he had ever done in his Life; but he was no sooner gone, than two Gentlemen told him the King said, he had broken his Measures, and he would have him taken off one way or other. Lord Conway, one of the Secretaries of State, own'd the giving of Fitzharris Money, but it was for some trifling Business; an Irish Papist to be closetted by the King, and to be rewarded by him, must needs be for a Trifle: Mrs. Wall, the Dutches of Portsmouth's useful Handmaid, marry'd afterwards to Sir Theophilus Oglethorpe, depos'd, that he had 250*l.* at once given him for that trifling Business. Is it not a Wonder, says a modern Historian, that after the Detection of two such monstrous and horrid Designs, Dangerfield's and Fitzharris's, any one should believe the Presbyterian Plot, which murder'd the greatest Patriots in Britain, Lord Russel, Col. Sidney, &c. It is very reasonably suspected, that the last mention'd Presbyterian Plot was a Branch of this of Fitzharris, and that the stifling the full Discovery of Fitzharris's made way for those Murders. The great Lawyer, Sir John Hawles, seems to be of that Opinion: I am apt to think if that Matter had been thoroughly look'd into, some Persons, afterwards Witnesses in the Lord Russel's, Col. Sidney's, and Mr. Hampden's Trials, had either never been produc'd, or had not been credited if produc'd; nor would my Lord of Essex's Throat have been cut, and my Lord Russel and Col. Sydney might have worn their Heads on their Shoulders to this day. The Oxford Parliament were for looking into the Matter thoroughly, and we shall presently see how they were prevented.

Now it was the Faction took into Pay the mercenary Pen of Heracitus Riden, who, says Edward, wrote in favour of the King and Court. It was a notable Paper, and fill'd with uncommon Wit and Humour, by which, as with a Rule, one may measure the Extent of his Understand- ing, and have a just Conception of the Delicacy of his Taste, there having never been publish'd a more scurrilous and impudent Libel against the Protestant Religion, the Liberties of the British Nation, and all sober Persons and Things. The same was done by the Libeller's Fellow-Labourer, Roger L'Estrange, of whom a Poet, then living, thus sung:

*When you return'd, you fell to work amain,
And took up your old scribbling Trade again.
Some serry Scandal on Dissenters thrown,
And viler Canting upon Forty-one;
You thought yourself the Buttress of the Crown.
Now for the Church of England you declare,
And wage with the Fanatics furious War.
Tho' the two lewd Diurnals you dispense, Alike are void of Reason, Truth and Sense.*

Again,

*While you at Sam's, like a grave Doctor sate,
Teaching the Minor Clergy how to prate,
Who lick'd your Spittle up, and then came down,
And shed the nasty Drivel o'er the Town.*

Which is a filthy, but a natural Image of what the Author would represent to us. For we read every where, that the Success of Heracitus Riden and L'Estrange's Papers, was among the Minor Clergy, and no wonder the reverend Historian brags of it.

In the mean time the Elections went on all over England, and in most Places the former Members were re-elected, or others chosen that were of the same Principles, both as to Church and State. The Election for London was at Guildhall, February 4. and the Choice fell upon Sir Robert Clayton, Sir Tho. Player, Tho. Pilkington Esq; and William Love Esq; the same Members as in the last Parliament; but it is a general Mistake, that there were few new Members in this Parliament; for there were near 220 new Members, tho' they were for the most part of the same Principles with the Majority of the last Parliament; and it shews what a disposition the People were generally in all over the Kingdom, to preserve their Religion and Liberties, tho' the Papists, the Minor Clergy above mention'd, the Court, their Creatures and Adherents, were then sapping the Foundations of the Constitution of England, and would in time have utterly destroy'd it, had not the Genius of Liberty exerted itself at the Revolution. A Member of this Oxford Parliament, told a Person of Honour, from whom I had it, that there were 200 Members in that House of Commons, which the King's Revenue could not bribe; and we shall presently see how handsomely his Majesty treated them. When the above mention'd four Citizens were chosen for London, a Paper was presented to them in the Name of the Common Hall, containing a Return of their most hearty Thanks for their faithful and most unwearied Endeavours in the two last Parliaments, to search into, and discover the Depth of the Plot, to preserve his Majesty's Royal Person, the Protestant Religion, and the well-establish'd Government of this Realm, to secure the Meeting and Sitting of frequent Parliaments, to assert our undoubted Rights of Petitioning, to promote the long wish'd-for Union of his Majesty's Protestant Subjects; to repeal the 35 Eliz. and the Corporation Act; and more especially for their Endeavours in promoting the Bill of Exclusion of James Duke of York. In fine, they conclude, that being confidently assured, that they the said Members for the City will never consent to the granting any Money-Supply, till they have effectually secur'd us against Popery and Arbitrary Power, they

The City thank the Earl of Essex and the other Lords. After this, another Paper was presented to the two Sheriffs, requesting them in the Name of all the said Citizens, then assembled in Common Hall, to return their grateful Acknowledgement to the Earl of Essex, and by him to the rest of the Lords, who presented the late Petition and Advice to his Majesty.

The like Papers of Address were presented to the Members chosen for Counties, Cities and Boroughs; and so zealous were the Freeholders and Electors all over the Kingdom, that, contrary to the old Custom of Parliament-Men treating the Country where they stood, now the Country in most Places treated them, or, at least, every Man bore his own Charges.

I pass over the Compliments paid to the King and Queen at their Arrival in Oxfordshire, and at Oxford, by the Lord Norreys, Lord Lieutenant of the County, who, a few Months after, very officiously assisted at the Trial of poor Colledge, by Bowel Mayor of Oxford, and by the Vice-Chancellor Dr. Halton, Provost of Queen's; which the King, Queen, and Court, were so well pleas'd with, that Mr. Archdeacon Echard tells us 'twas publish'd in print, That this University is no less renown'd abroad as well as at home for its Loyalty and Duty to his Majesty, than for its Learning and sound Religion; the Nonfence of which is pretty remarkable. Does Salamanca and the Sorbonne, Geneva and Leyden, admire the Renown of the University of Oxford for Soundness of Religion? The Presents they made the King and Queen were extremely acceptable. To the King they gave a large Oxford Bible; to the Queen, the Cuts of the History of the University. They came thither a Week before the Session of Parliament open'd. Many Members of the House of Commons, especially those of London, were attended with great Retinues, Friends, Dependents and Servants on horseback, not being without Apprehensions of some ill Design against them, by the King's persisting so obstinately to have them meet in that City.

Parliament meets at Oxford. On the 21st of March the Parliament met, the House of Lords in the Gallery at the publick Schools; the House of Commons in the Convocation-Room; to both whom, the compleat Historian says, his Majesty made a most gracious Speech, which began most graciously thus: My Lords and Gentlemen, "The unwarrantable Proceedings of the last House of Commons." As I observ'd in the Reign of King Charles I. that there seem'd to be a Fatality in all his Counsels, tending to Confusion and Destruction, so in the Counsels of this King there is something very much like it. For he and his Ministers knew very well that this Parliament would be rather more than less zealous in those very Proceedings, which he calls unwarrantable, than were the last. What a hopeful Beginning was this then! Bishop Burnet takes notice, that he severely reflected on the last Parliament. He propos'd Expedients instead of the Succession Bill, and desir'd Supplies for Tangier, and to support his Alliances, tho' he could not but be sensible that they would not give him a Penny without the Exclusion-Bill, instead of which he propos'd, that the Administration of the Government should remain in Protestant Hands. This was explain'd by Sir John Ernley and Sir Thomas Littleton, to be meant of a Prince Regent, with whom the regal Authority should be lodg'd during the Duke's Life. But before that Debate was enter'd upon, the House of Commons took up Business where the last Parliament left it; As a Bill against the Duke of York's Succession, another to repeal the Act of 35 Eliz. Preparations were to be made for the Prosecution against the impeach'd Lords in the Tower; and an Inquiry into the Affair of Fitzbarris. A Motion being made for printing the Votes, Sir Lionel Jenkins oppos'd it, as not consistent with the Gravity of the House, of which he was one of the gravest Members in Dr. Littleton's Sense of the word Grave. The major Vote pass'd for printing. Another Motion was made, to inquire into the Miscarriage of the last Bill, for repealing the Statute 35 of Elizabeth, which, said the Mover, I look upon as a Breach of the Constitution of the Government. The Debate being adjourn'd to the next Day, March 22, a worthy Member mov'd, that, That for the Preservation of the Protestant Religion, a Bill be brought in to prevent a Popish Successor, in particular against James Duke of York; and that it be the same Bill which pass'd the last Parliament. Sir Lionel Jenkins, who represented the University of Oxford, stood up, and said, I must give my Negative to this Motion, and my Reason why I do so is, because the King hath declar'd in his Speech, that as to the Point of altering the Succession, he cannot depart from what he has so often declar'd, the King has given his Vote against it, and therefore I must do so too. This is one of Echard's brisk Speakers, and the Member who seconded him, spoke every whit as briskly. The King's Speech gives us a Latitude for Expedients, and therefore we should not have the Bill any more put to the hazard of Rejection, but think of some Expedients. Broom Whorwood Esq; who represented the City of Oxford, said; *They who answer'd the King's Speech, must answer for it. The Words of the Speech are, If any other way can be found out, &c. I think those about the King have done enough to ruin him and us; but I would have the King see we are so far from putting him upon that stress, that we would help him out. I think that Speech they read to us, to have nothing of the King in it; he is a better Man, and a better Protestant, than to do it of himself, therefore I would not put on a Resolution, as flat and as short as that is in the King's Speech. The King has gone so far as this Resolution comes to in his Declaration about Dissenters formerly; and yet from the Reasons from hence he was perswaded to revoke it. If Persons have been so prevalent, as to put the King upon this Speech, let me see those Persons so forward in bringing the King into a Thing, to help him out; if they do not, I hope the King will lay the blame at their doors, and not at ours. Yet such was the Moderation of this great Assembly, notwithstanding their just Zeal for the Security of their Religion, Rights and Properties, they agreed, That in order to pay his Majesty all the Respect that might be, they would set apart a time to consider of Expedients; and accordingly they appointed Saturday the 26th, for the Debate of them.*

The next Day there was a Motion in the House of Commons, which was much taken notice of for the novelty of it: 'Twas to return Thanks to those Places, who had generously and without Expence chosen their Members; and the Members so freely elected, were order'd to send their particular Thanks to those that chose them. Then they proceeded to resume yesterday's Debate, upon the loss of the Bill for the Repeal of the Act of the 35th of Elizabeth. Upon which, Sir William Jones spoke thus: "This Matter Jones's deserves mature Consideration, whether in respect of the loss of the Bill, or the shaking about the very Constitution of Parliament. The stolen Bill, 35 Eliz."

A. D.
1681.

" Bill that is lost is of great Moment, and of great Service to the Country, and perhaps to their Lives in the time of a Popish Successor. Those Men that hinder'd the passing the Bill had a prospect of that, and if it be sent up again, we are like to meet with great Opposition. But be the Bill what it will, the Precedent is of the highest Consequence. The King has his Negative to all Bills, but I never knew that the Clerk of the Parliament had a Negative. No Man that knows Law or History but can tell, that to Bills grateful and popular, the King gives his Consent to them: But if this way be found out, that Bills shall be thrown by, it may be hereafter said, They were forgot and laid by, and we shall never know whether the King would pass them or no." If this be suffer'd, 'tis in vain to spend time here, and 'tis a Scandal to the English Name, that a Law pass'd by the Peers and Representatives of the Nation should be stolen out of the House of Lords, and the Thief remain unpunish'd. Antiquity has no Parallel to this Baseness, and the Theft is the more base and detestable, because by that means many Thousands of pious Protestants were ruin'd afterwards on the Pretence of the Statute 35 Eliz. which the Clerk of the Crown or Parliament stole away from among the Bills that were ready for the Royal Assent. The House of Commons next read the Information concerning Fitzharris's Treason, a Preparation for the Presbyterian Plot; and a Member of former Parliaments reported, how that one Hubert confess'd he had fir'd the City of London; upon which the House resolv'd to examine him next Morning: but before the House sat, Hubert was hang'd to prevent it. It was also remember'd, that there had been a Design to try the Popish Lords in the Tower by Indictment, to prevent which, the Commons exhibited general Impeachments against them so successfully, that the Lords were never try'd upon Indictments, and the Judges gave their Opinion that they could not. Upon which the House order'd an Impeachment against Fitzharris, and Sir Lionel Jenkins to carry it up; which he at first refus'd, saying, The sending me upon this Message reflects upon my Master, and do what you will with me, I will not go. The House took him immediately to task; and to prevent the ill Consequences of their Resentment, he submitted to their Order, some say, weeping, and carry'd the Impeachment to the House of Peers, who threw it out, Bishop Burnet says, upon a Pretence which the Earl of Nottingham, Lord Chancellor, furnish'd them with, that Edward III. had got some Commoners to be condemn'd by the Lords; of which, when the House of Commons complain'd, an Order was made that no such thing should be done for the future. But the Bishop proves his Earl to be in the wrong, for that related only to Proceedings at the King's Suit, and it could not be meant that an Impeachment from the Commons did not lie against a Commoner. The House the next Day ran high in their Debates upon it. Sir Thomas Littleton said, This was to have no further use of a Parliament, but to serve a Purpose. Another, Indictments were brought against the Lords in the Tower, yet that was no Impediment to their Impeachment in the Lords House; and the last Day of the last Sessions of Parliament, the Lords accepted an Impeachment against the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, and that this Denial of Justice by the Lords was greater than Scroggs's Denial of taking Presentments from the Grand Jury of Middlesex, by how much the Commons of Parliament are the great Inquest of the Nation. Another, This is a new Plot against the Protestants of which Fitzharris is accused; the Commons impeach him, and the Lords say, We will not hear it. If it were not for the Speech up-Lords, Fitzharris might have discover'd all the on it.

Fitzharris's Impeachment thrown out by the Lords.

Conspiracy, and the Protestant Religion might have been sav'd; wherefore I move that the denying this Impeachment, tends to the Subversion of the Constitution of the Parliament, and of the Protestant Religion. Sir William Jones did not only exclaim against the other House, but against the Bishops in particular, declaring, They had no Right to vote in this Case. Serjeant Maynard cry'd, Our All is at stake; and if we must not prosecute, Holland and Flanders must submit to the French, and they over-run all. Another spoke thus; This is a Confirmation of the Design to murder the King, and the Duke's consenting to destroy his own Brother; and therefore I move, "That if any Judge, Justice, or Jury proceed upon Fitzharris, and he be found guilty, that the House would declare him and them guilty of his Murder, and Be-trayers of the Rights of the Commons of England." To which was added, upon the Motion of Sir William Jones, "Or that any inferior Court shall proceed, &c." which was pass'd. The reason of this Vote was, that if Fitzharris was try'd upon an Indictment, he must have been try'd singly upon the Fact, whether he were guilty or not of the contriving and dispersing the Libel; whereas upon an Impeachment, the Commons might inquire into the whole Conspiracy, which would most certainly have involv'd the Court in the Guilt of it; and it is certain they would not otherwise have precipitated his Trial in an inferior Court as they did, nor would they have directed their Creatures in the House of Lords, among which were almost the whole Bench of Bishops, to have oppos'd the Impeachment on purpose to hinder an Inquiry into that dark Mystery of Iniquity, which not many Months after let out some of the best Blood in the Nation, which cry'd aloud for Vengeance on the Heads of those that were concern'd, and the righteous Vengeance of Heaven most apparently and terribly pursu'd them.

I have hinted that Sir John Ernley propos'd Sir Will. to the House the Expedient of a Regency: Up-Poultney. on which Sir William Poultney said, Consider what is a Regency; I never heard of it, but of a Prince in possession in Minority or Lunacy, and it has generally been very unfortunate: But to talk of a Regency in futuro, in Condition and Limitation of Time, I never heard of. This Expedient does not answer the King's Speech, nor your former Bill. They make the King but a Shadow, and they divide Person from Power, our Law will not endure it. The Person divided from the Power, both will be courted. The King leads you to consider Expedients, but such as will consist with the Safety and Dignity of Monarchy. This must be two Kings at the same time, one by Law, and another by Right. The former Bill has been under Consideration of all the People of England, and perhaps all the Protestants of Europe. All the Wits of Learned Men have made their Objections against it, yet notwithstanding all People are still of the same mind. And now we run upon the most misshapen Thing, which it may be two or three Years before we understand it, and we may expect to have an Operation of it nobody knows when. Mr. H. C. spoke for Expedients; "If the Exclusion of the Duke be the best way to preserve Religion, this House cannot do it alone. If we cannot have that best way, we are guilty to our Country if we take none. If a Man be sick, and so order'd
" that

A. D. 1681. "that nothing must be taken but by Direction of three Physicians, and two are for giving him the Jesuits Powder, and one against it, and he thinks he does the Duty of his Profession, but they all three not agreeing, must the Patient take nothing? And we are but one Part of the Legislative Power.—When Men press so fast, they may come late into their Inn by tiring their Horses. Let a grand Committee try Expedients, else 'tis not consultare, but dicere." Mr. J. S. said, in answer to the Simile of the three Physicians, If the Case be such, that the two, in the Judgment of the third, did offer nothing to the sick Man but what was mortal, he ought not to venture upon his own Disreputation in joining with them. Mr. T. B. said, Expedients have been mov'd for already, as the Jesuits Powder for an Ague, but our Disease is a Pleurisy, and we must let blood. Sir William Jones and Sir Francis Winnington were unmoveably for the Bill of Exclusion; and against two such Men, Mr. Archdeacon produces Mr. George Legg, who urg'd the Dangers of a Commonwealth, and told them a Story as much to the purpose, as if he had given them an Argument. "His Father being in Prison in the late Times, an eminent Man then in Power, in Discourse with him, said, I have oblig'd you, and if the King come in, as I believe he will, then think of me. Look to yourselves when you are in the Saddle again; if once you divide, adieu to Monarchy for ever." This must needs be some Man of Eminence, by his believing the King would come in again: He must believe also that Oliver would betray his Masters the Republick; that he would refuse to be King; That he would leave the Government to his Son Dick, and that his Son's Brethren and Uncles would turn him out of it; that the Army would restore the Parliament, and then pull them down again; that Monk would be too hard for Lambert and Fleetwood; that he would abjure all his Abjurations, intend to make himself Protector, but be put out of his Intentions by Sir Anthony Ashley Cooper; and when he could do nothing for himself, let in the King without making any Terms but for himself. Had any one of these Things not happen'd as it did, the King had died abroad, as his Brother the Duke of York did, and had had no better a Kingdom to leave behind him, than the Pretender is now in possession of. One Senator compar'd Expedients to Cucumbers; which, after they were well dress'd, were to be thrown away. Another said, It seems to me as if a Man that scorcht his Shins at the Fire, instead of removing himself farther off, should send for a Mason to remove the Chimney back. If I am to leap over a River, I had rather have no Staff than a broken one. I see no Remedy to save Religion, unless excluding the Duke. So the Bill was order'd to be brought in on Monday Morning, the next Day of meeting, which was the 28th of March, when it was again read, and Mr. Secretary Jenkins stood up, Sir Lionell says Mr. Archdeacon, and said, (not elegantly or wisely, but fearlessly,) what follows: No Bill was ever offer'd to the Parliament of the like nature, so much against the Justice of the Nation: It condemns a Man unheard, and by a Law made Ex post Facto. They excluded him after he had turn'd Papist. Would Mr. Secretary have had them exclude him before he turn'd Papist? Is it against the Justice of the Nation to provide for the Security of their Religion, Rights, Properties and Liberties? He fearlessly goes on, It is not only against the fundamental Justice, but against the Wisdom of the Nation: None but Fools are for Self-Preservation. Again, And will in- roduce a Change of Government. No great matter that, if it was for the better, and it could not well be for the worse. If the Duke will try to cut this Law with his Sword, he would have had the same Success as when he endeavour'd afterwards to cut the Abdicating Law with the Sword. If he overcome, he will have the same Power to set aside all Laws, both for Religion and Property, as he attempted afterwards, without overcoming. The Power will be in the hands of the Conqueror, and certainly he will change the Government. It is against Religion, (the Popish one it was against) and the Oaths of the Nation. Here Mr. Secretary began to be not quite so fearless as at first, saying, Possibly I am too tedious, and not willingly heard: if the Bill be against the Religion oblig'd by Oaths, against the Government, and the Wisdom of the Nation, I hope you will throw it out. Never did Man hope so, when he saw almost every body all round him impatient for the passing the Bill, and so little notice was taken of what he said, that Mr. T. B. spoke thus: Mr. Secretary has mov'd to throw out the Bill, and desir'd to be heard patiently, I find nobody seconds him, pray let him go on and second himself. They had no doubt a very mean Opinion of him, or they would not have heard any thing so contemptuously said of him, without taking some notice of it. The Bill was order'd a second Reading; and as they were resuming the Debate about Fitzharris, on a sudden the Usher of the Black-Rod commanded their Attendance in the House of Lords; where the King told them, He perceiv'd there were great Heats between the Lords and Commons, and their Beginnings had been such, as he could expect no good Success of this Parliament, and therefore thought fit to dissolve them; which the Lord Chancellor did accordingly, and King Charles never met a Parliament more.

Echard here begins a new Period, and he opens it with some idle Reflections, which are as much an Affront to common Sense as the present Constitution, and it is amazing that he should have the Confidence to make a Present of it to his late Majesty. He tells the World he's about to treat of the King's Success, after he had so rashly dissolv'd the Oxford Parliament with unusual Courage. He set up a more independent Administration; he acted more like an absolute Monarch; he resolv'd to exert his Authority, and to get Supplies by other than Parliamentary Methods; he was tired out with endless Stories of the Plot; he grew more tricking and artful in his Proceedings; and having satiated himself with Blood, grew more sanguinary in his Temper. This, and a great deal more of it, is what he calls his Majesty's Success in his Administration. The Ingenious Author of The History of standing Armies, describes his Success thus: "No Man could be employ'd in Church or State, till he had declar'd himself an open Enemy to our Constitution, by asserting despotick Power under that nonsensical Phrase of Passive Obedience, which was more preach'd up than all the Laws of God and Man. The Hellish, Popish Plot was stifled, prov'd since too true by fatal Experience; and in the room of it Protestant ones were forg'd, and Men trapann'd into others, as the Meal-Tub, Fitzharris, Ryehouse, Newmarket, and Black heath Plots; and by these Pretences, and the help of pack'd Juries and Judges, they butcher'd some of the best Men in England." This is what the reverend Historian calls his Majesty's Success, and when he comes to those very Butcheries, he gives his Verdict, and pronounces the bloody Sentence after those Juries and Judges. The abovemention'd ingenious Author proceeds; "They set immoderate Fines upon others, gave probable Suspicion of cutting the Lord Effex's Throat; and to finish our Destruction, they took away the Charters, as fast as they were able, of all the Corporations in England that would not chuse the Members that were prescrib'd them." How successful was this blessed King in his Attempt to destroy the Constitution! But the Archdeacon, who is extremely ignorant of the Causes and Springs of Action, and Counsels in these calamitous Times, mistook King Charles's Success for his Brother the Duke of York's: read the judicious Acherley. "The King declar'd, He would live on his own Revenues, and never more trouble Parliaments, who had trusted him with that Revenue. At this time commenc'd a new Æra, and an intire Alteration, in order to strike at the Root, and over-turn the Constitution; for the King dismiss'd himself in a manner from the Government, and delegated over the whole Administration into the hands of his Brother the Duke of York, who undertook to secure his own Succession, without giving the King any more Disturbance; and the careless King was glad of being eas'd of the trouble, and to stand by as unconcern'd at his Brother's Management of the Government, contenting himself to be attended at his Levees and in his Walks like a Duke, whilst the Duke was at his Levees and in his Walks attended like a King: insomuch that from this time, April 1, 1681, during the rest of King Charles's Reign, the Duke may be look'd upon as King in Potentia, except the Name. As soon as this was known, the Eagerness to exclude him chang'd into courting and magnifying of him, and into a manifest Coldness towards the King. You see what Success he had, all Applications were made to the Duke for Preferments in Church and State, he made the Bishops, and garbled the Judges, till he had made a Sett to his Mind; of whom, some of them acted more like furious Prosecutors than Judges."

I shall continue Echard's Success still farther, not only because it proves the Weakness of his Understanding, or of his Integrity, but because it also proves what I have all along intended, that the Stuartian Race were from the first to the last of them in a Conspiracy against the British Constitution Ecclesiastical and Civil. Dr. Welwood writes thus of it: "The Charters of the City of London and other Corporations stood in the way of an absolute Government, and it was resolv'd to break thro' this Barrier: in order to which, Quo Warranto's were brought against them, and in progress of time, they were either surrender'd or vacated by a Sett of Judges Pick'd out for that Purpose; and it was resolv'd thereby to make one of the Estates of Parliament depend entirely upon the Will and Nomination of the Prince. While these Quo Warranto's were going on, whole Peals of Anathema were rung out against those Patriots who had stood up for the Liberties of their Country in the preceding Parliaments, and it was look'd upon as a Crime against the State for any one to regret the approaching Fate of his Country; even the Holy Scriptures themselves were made a Stale for Arbitrary Power. This was a Time never to be forgotten, when Heaven itself was rank'd upon our Enemies side by some that pretended to expound its Will. In some places a new kind of Funeral Harangues came in fashion, our Laws, our Liberties, our Parliaments, our Native Rights were to be buried; but instead of dropping a Tear at their Funeral, full some Panegyrics were made upon their Murthers, and Curses denounc'd against those that would have retriev'd them from Destruction."

Bishop Burnet gives further Proof of the Design to enslave us, and all this laid together, says his Lordship, the whole look'd like an extravagant Fit of Madness; yet no Part of it was so unaccountable, as the high Strains to which the Universities, and most of the Clergy were carry'd. We shall have too much occasion to speak of this boasted Success of King Charles in the following Pages.

The King left Oxford the same Day he dissolv'd the Parliament, with an apparent Affectation of Hasten, as if he thought he was in danger there, and it was to countenance a Design form'd to prosecute a Presbyterian Plot, tho' Fitzharris was to be hang'd for contriving it; and King Charles did indeed carry on that Prosecution with great Success; for which, according to Echard, he gain'd more Authority and Reverence, and more Love and Affection than he had met with for several Years before, which he imputes chiefly to the Effects of a well-penn'd Declaration publish'd by him soon after he dissolv'd the Oxford Parliament; but as he knows little of the well or ill-penning of any such Piece, the Reader will not be prejudic'd by what he says against the Answer to it, which was first drawn up by Col. Algernon Sidney, then improv'd by the late Lord Somers, and last of all corrected by the very eminent Sir William Jones; in a Treatise entitled, A just and modest Vindication of the two last Parliaments, of which mention has been made. Echard affirms, he began by Art and Smoothness, Bishop Burnet, He reckon'd up all the hard things that had been done by three Parliaments; as the Vote not to lend Money, that against prosecuting Dissenters, &c. Tho' this Declaration is not quite so wordy as Lord Clarendon's and Lord Nottingham's Speeches; yet it is too redundant to be inserted intire, unless there had been more Sincerity in it. Enough of it will be seen by repeating a few Paragraphs of the Vindication, wherein there's more Law, Reason, and good Argument, than in all the Harangues and Declarations that the Court-Party had publish'd since the Restoration.

It prov'd, that by the Statutes of this Kingdom Parliaments should not be prorog'd or dissolv'd, till all the Petitions and Bills before them were answer'd and redress'd: That the Manner of dissolving the Oxford Parliament was unwarranted by the Precedent of former Times; That the King doth not act any considerable Act of Regal Power, till it be first debated and resolv'd in Council, and the Peers at Oxford were so wholly ignorant of the Counsel, that they never thought of a Dissolution till they heard it pronounc'd; yet the Dutchess of Mazarine publish'd the News at St. James's many Hours before it was done; for that not only the Dissolution, but the subsequent Declaration were both coin'd in a French Mint, no body questions, and it will appear still plainer, by what follows out of the Vindication.

Tho' to the Dishonour of our Country it appears, that some Englishmen were concern'd in the unhappy Advice of breaking the two last Parliaments, and setting up this pretended Defence of it; yet the Gallicisms which are found in the Paper, shew the Writer to have been of another Nation, or at least to have had his Thoughts so much taken up for the Interests of France, (whilst he was labouring this way to heighten and perpetuate the Differences between the King and the People) that he could " not express himself in any other Idiom than theirs; he would not otherwise have introduc'd the King saying, That it was a Matter extremely sensible to us, a Form of Speech peculiar to the French, and unknown to any other Nation. The Reader who understands that Language, will observe so many more of this kind, as will give him just Cause to doubt whether the whole Paper was not a Translation, and whether the English one, or that which was publish'd in French was the Original?

" Let us then no longer wonder that the Time of dissolving our Parliaments is known at Paris sooner than at London, since 'tis probable the Reasons now given for it, were formed there too. The Declaration was not communicated to the Privy-Council till Friday the 8th of April, when his Majesty, according to the late Method, did graciously declare to them his Pleasure, to set it forth without desiring from them any Advice in the Matter; but Monsieur Barillon, the French Ambassador, did not only read it to a Gentleman the 5th of April, but advised with him about it, and demanded his Opinion of it." Echard owns this, and sinks what comes after, "Which his Excellency will the better remember, because of the great Liberty which the Person took in ridiculing it to his Face."

Here the Vindicator modestly exclaims, Good God! to what a Condition is this Kingdom reduc'd, when the Ministers and Agents of the only Prince in the World, who can have Designs against us, or of whom we ought to be afraid, are not only made acquainted with the most secret Passages of State, but are made our chief Ministers too, and have the principal Conduct of our Affairs! As fully as this Declaration is answer'd in the before-cited Vindication, which the Bishop of Salisbury says was the best Paper that had been publish'd, writ with Spirit and true Judgment, Echard commends the Declaration as very popular. Saneroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, mov'd in Council that this French Memorial might be read in all Churches and Chappels; and the Minor Clergy executed the Order they receiv'd concerning it with singular Delectation. This Declaration rais'd over England a Humour of making Addresses to the King, returning him Thanks for it. There was an impartial Account of these Addresses publish'd at the Time when the Addressers were crowding to Court with them, and the Author sets us right in the Matter: "Should any in the List of the late Thanksgivers be hereafter found to have promoted Addresses with a Prospect of introducing either Tyranny or Popery, the Names and Pretences of Law and the Protestant Religion, which they have not only flourish'd their Papers with, but made his Majesty's Promise of preserving them the Grounds of their Acknowledgments, and the Foundation of the Tenders which they have made of their Lives and Fortunes, will entail an everlasting Infamy upon them. The Number of the Subscribers is not so considerable as to bear any Proportion to those that are against them." L'Estrange call'd them the Thirty to One, "For tho' a few busy People have made a great Noise and Buz in several Places of the Kingdom; yet all of them put together make not so great a Number, as we have seen not long since to one Petition for a Parliament; so that it is matter of Wonder, that the Government for its own Reputation hath not in some publick way prohibited and forbid them, and especially when it finds that after all the Neglect and Scorn which the Addressers are expos'd unto for their Paucity and Fewness, yet Addressers.

" they have not the Discretion to forbear and desist." The compleat Historian confesses they were procur'd by Solicitations from the Court, and their Solicitations produc'd a Cartload of Folly, Stupidity, Rustian, Impudence and Impertinence, too well known to need expatiating upon it. It is not strange that the Archdeacon flourishes on these Addresses, and particularly on that from Norwich, which he tells us reflected on the Exorbitancies of the late House of Commons, who, if Sir William Jones, the Lord Somers and Col. Sidney knew what belong'd to such things, committed no Exorbitancy. The Stuff-men of Norwich thank'd the King most solemnly for giving his two last Parliaments such timely Dissolutions. The Author of the impartial Account of Addresses, tells us, Most of the Clergy did not only interest themselves in countenancing, but were Sticklers for them, of whom Lord Halifax said pleasantly, The Petitioners for a Parliament spit in the King's Face, but the Addressers spit in his Mouth. Tho the Papers that were extorted or procur'd by Artifice from Counties, Cities and Boroughs were equally dull and foolish, bombast and impertinent; yet every Mortal that accompany'd them had the Honour to kiss his Majesty's Hand, and many of them were dubb'd, who had not wherewithal to pay the Fees of Knighthood.

John Dryden is now brought into the Archdeacon's History, for lashing a Pamphlet concerning his Majesty's Declaration in a Lampoon, wherein Mr. Bayes was pleas'd to say, The Commons may make Spaniels of the Lords, throw them a Man, and bid them go judge him, as we command a Dog to fetch and carry. He could not see that the Simile was Nonsense, but it was Impudence; and he has more than once mistaken that for Wit. He then extolls Heracitus Ridens once more, and writes another Panegyrick on that Hireling L'Estrange, against whom were many Writers, when they could get any one to print their Writings, which was not easily to be done; infomuch that it is said, Andrew Marvel, who had more Wit than Dryden, L'Estrange, Heracitus, and all of them, was forc'd to compose his own Pieces himself, and to work them off at a little Press, which he had contriv'd on purpose: For as another sweet Effect of Tyranny and arbitrary Power, the Writers, Printers and Publishers on the Side of the Country were put down and silenc'd, and Francis Smith, one of them, thrown into Newgate; while L'Estrange was suffer'd to insult the religious and wise Part of the Nation, to vilify the Reformation and the free Constitution of England, not only with Impunity, but with Reward, tho' there was really no more Wit than Truth in his Writings. In one of his Papers he prophesy'd indeed, as well he might, being let into the Secret of the intended Murders, if it should please God, said the prophane Hireling, to send us seasonable Sheriffs, and fair play for our Money, there are set on foot so many Titles in competition for the Gallows, that it would be a hard matter to settle their Claims, and say who should go first. What sort of Men he thinks would make seasonable Sheriffs we may discover by what he says elsewhere, Wilt thou set their Cornish and Bethel, their Pilkington and Shute, against our North and Rich, our Daniel and Dashwood? And in another place he says, A Citizen's Skull is but a thing to try the Temper of a Soldier's Sword upon.

This wretched Buffoonry does the Archdeacon mistake for Wit, and honour it with his Applause, on account of the Cause he is engag'd in; he also highly extolls Dryden for his Abalom and Achitophel, a lewd Satyr on the Lord Shaftesbury, and

A. D. 1681. and other noble Patriots, He knew not that Dryden's Character, as a Poet, is wearing, and that he is valu'd only for his Versification. I have repeated a Couplet or two of the Satyrs written by Mr. Marvel, and others of the Country Party, whose Humour and Wit were infinitely superior to Echard's, Heracitus, and Roger L'Estrange. Whoever has a mind to make the Comparison, need only turn to the four Volumes of State Poems. If the Archdeacon had as just Conceptions of Persons and Things as Bishop Burnet, he would not have mention'd so lewd a Versifier as Dryden without Animadversion. He was a Monster of Immodesty, says my Lord of Sarum, and a Monster of Impurity of all sorts. He fell upon the Church afterwards in his Hind and Panther, but the Reverend Historian forgives him for his falling upon the Presbyterians, when they were fallen upon by the Government, and the Priesthood preach'd more against them than against Drunkards and Adulterers, who were forgotten in the Fury of their Zeal. The Pulpits were every where defil'd with Railing and Invectives, with Reproaches and Curses. The Clergy deep in the per-secuting Business. Clergy, 'tis Bishop Burnet who says it, struck up to a higher Note with such Zeal for the Duke's Succession, as if a Popish King had been a Blessing from Heaven to be much long'd for by a Protestant Church. They likewise gave themselves such a Loose against Nonconformists, as if nothing was so formidable as that Party; so that in all their Sermons Popery was quite forgot, and the Force of their Zeal was turn'd almost wholly against Dissenters, who were now by Order from the Court to suffer Persecution. There was also a great Change made in the Commissions all over England, none were left either on the Bench, or in the Militia, that did not with Zeal go into the Humour of the Court; and such of the Clergy as would not engage in that Fury, which were not many, were cry'd out upon as Betrayers of the Church. I shall add other Instances of the Happiness of the Times, upon which Roger and Heracitus wasted so much Paper in dull Panegyrics, and Echard praises them for praising the Felicities of this felicitous Reign; I find them in the State Tracts. The Author is speaking of the Tories, whose Tools I have just mention'd. "As to their original Rise, 'tis cer-

Dr. Wetwood observes, About this time a certain Set of Men began a second time to adept into our Religion a Mahometan Principle, under the Names of Passive Obedience and Non-Resistance, which, since the Time of that Impostor, who first broach'd it, has been the Means to enslave a great part of the World. I could very much enlarge on this Subject, to prove that the tyrannical Proceedings of the Government in these bad Times, were much encourag'd by an immoral and illiterate Clergy, in hopes of Church-Preferments, which were liberally bestow'd on them, while the learned, pious and orthodox Divines were neglected and despis'd for their Charity and Moderation; such as Tillotson, Patrick, Fowler, Kidder, Meriton, Hall, Lloyd, Tens-son, Grove, Williams, and many others, Fathers and Doctors of our Church, which, by God's Blessing, has never wanted religious and worthy Ministers, to preach the Purity of the Christian Faith in opposition to Superstition and Persecution; such have been a very considerable Body of the Clergy since the Revolution, Men of Protestant and English Principles, who cannot be too much respected by English Men and Protestants.

I have been led into this Digression by Echard's ridiculous Encomiums on two wretched Scriblers, Betrayers of our Religion and Liberties, after the Dissolution of the Oxford Parliament. We have seen what honourable Times these were, and we must now see what Honours were distributed in them.

Heneage Lord Finch, Lord Chancellor, Earl of Nottingham.

Sir Francis Pemberton, Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, to give the better colour to Fitz-Harris's Trial; Pemberton being, till then, thought a Man of some Probity.

In Easter Term, a Bill of High Treason was pre-ferr'd against him to the Grand Jury of Middlesex, ris's Trial. Mr. Godfrey, Brother and Heir to Sir Edmund-bury Godfrey, being Foreman. They hesitated as to receiving of it, because he was impeach'd by the Commons; but the new Judge Pemberton and his Brother Judges remov'd that Hesitation, by declaring they might lawfully proceed. The Bill being found, Fitz-Harris pleaded the Impeachment, and that he could not be try'd by that Court. He had Counsel assign'd him, and considering who they were, he had the Advantage as to pleading; for Sir William Williams, Mr. Pollexfen, Sir Francis Winnington, and Mr. Wallop, had no hard Task to deal with Sir Robert Sawyer the Attorney-General, and Mr. Finch Solicitor-General; but the Court was determin'd, and notwithstanding the strong Arguments of Fitz-Harris's Counsel, and the weak Arguments of the King's, Pemberton, Jones and Raymond, gave their Opinion, that Fitz-Harris's Plea was insufficient; but gave no Reasons for it, which they ought to have done, as we are taught by the very learned Sir John Hawles in his Remarks on this Trial. Fitz-Harris then pleaded Not guilty; and having a Witness in Holland, he was not try'd till the 9th of June.

Very wickedly is this Trial introduc'd in the History we have so often animadverted upon. The Whigs took great pains in the making of a Jury; whereas the pains was taken by the Attorney-General Sawyer, who excepted against several

A. D. 1681. several of the Pannel without cause, and challeng'd John Kent, Giles Shute, Nathaniel Grant-ham, and others as no Freeholders, and his Challenge was allow'd by the Court. Tho' in the Lord Ruffel's Case the Court adjudg'd, that no Freehold was a good Challenge. The Proof of the Libel upon him was too plain to be contest-ed, and Fitz-Harris said he did it by order of his Superiors, the Lord Howard of Eserick joining with him in it. Nay, it was the general Report, that Lord Howard indited the Libel; but, as Bishop Burnet says, it was too meanly drawn to come from that Lord. Echard owns the Tories were for hanging him, and to that end the new Judge and his Brother Judges summ'd up the Evidence unfairly, to use Sir John Hawles's own Words, and he was convicted and condemn'd. The Archdeacon, who is Counsel against Fitz-Harris, produces one of the King's Concubines, and her Woman Mrs. Wall too, as Witnesses for the King, tho' call'd by the Prisoner. They deny'd what he chiefly wanted them to affirm, that they employ'd him in such Business. Now Wall's Evidence was likely to be good, she swore he was never admitted to the King; and the Lord Con-way swore he did speak with the King. Many other Hardships were put upon the Prisoner to take away his Life, and prevent the Discovery of the Contrivers of this Plot, among whom, no doubt, would have been found the Duke, if not the King; and even by the Confession of Mr. Archdeacon, Mrs. Fitz-Harris did, several Years after, aver to a Person of Worth, That the Business of the Libel was a Court-Trick, and the King was privy to it: yet does he expatiate on what Fitz-Harris confess'd to Hawkins the Tower Chaplain, of a Design of the Protestant Party to seize the King; that they had 60000 Men at command, at a short Warning. That the Bishops and Clergy, good Men at that time, were to be severely handled; that he and Haynes had several Meetings about it with the Lord Howard of Eserick, and a great deal more such bare-fac'd Falshood, which was put into the Mouth of this poor Wretch, and convey'd to the World by Hawkins, one of the meanest Creatures that ever wore a Cassock; yet Echard doctors him up, and tells us, when he publish'd Fitz-Harris's Confession, it was very surprising and provoking to those that had so much endeavour'd to save his Life, Which Confession, as Hawkins and he have worded it, is to me a convincing Proof, that the approaching Presbyterian Plot was founded on this of Fitz-Harris, or rather was only a Renewal of that very Plot which had been interrupted by Everard's Discovery. When an honest Man unwittingly falls into Error we pity him. But when a Man errs out of Malice we abhor him.

P. 504.

Parson Hawkins tampering with Fitz-Harris.

Now read what Bishop Burnet writes of the pretended Confession of Fitz-Harris to the Tower Chaplain, and then make a Judgment of the reverend Historian's Integrity and Capacity. "Hawkins, the Minister of the Tower took him, Fitz-Harris, into his Management, and prevail'd with him, the vile Suborner to deny all his former Discovery, but to lay it on Sir Robert Clayton, Sir George Treby, Alderman Cornish, and Sheriff Bethel, as a Subornation of theirs, tho' it was evident that was impossible to be true." Pray turn to Mr. Echard's History again, p. 631, 632, 633, and compare his Account of Fitz-Harris and his Confession with my Lord of Sarum's, who proceeds, "Yet at the same time, when he confess'd these Things to the Chaplain, he wrote Letters to his Wife, which I saw and read, in which he told her how he was practis'd upon

"with hopes of Life. He charg'd her to swear falsely against none; and yet, before he was led to Execution, he sign'd a new Paper, containing the former Charge of Subornation, and put it into Hawkins's hand. At Tyburn he referr'd all he had to say to that Paper, which was immediately publish'd; but the Falshood of it was so very notorious, that tho' it shew'd what a sort of Man Hawkins was, yet he was soon after rewarded for this with the Deanery of Chichester. But when the Court heard what Letters Fitz-Harris had writ to his Wife, they were confounded." On the contrary, Echard gives us to understand, that the World was surpris'd at the sight of Fitz-Harris's Paper, which was the subject Matter of Discourse amongst all People for a considerable time after; sweetly insinuating, that People believ'd he was suborn'd by Sir Robert Clayton, Sir George Treby, &c. whereas we are inform'd by the Bishop, "The Court sifted all further Discourse about him, and practis'd on Mrs. Fitz-Harris, by the Promise of a Pension, so far, that she deliver'd up her Husband's Letters to them; but so many had seen them before, that this base Practice turn'd much to the Reproach of all their Proceedings."

Fitz-Harris accus'd the Earl of Danby of being concern'd in the Death of Sir Edmondbury Godfrey; but there was Inconsistency in his Evidence. His Wife and her Maid accus'd the Lord Howard of Eserick of the Contrivance of the Libel, and he was committed to the Tower the 12th of June. A Bill of Indictment was deliver'd against him to the Grand Jury of Edmon-ton Hundred, who, not satisfy'd with the two Womens Evidence, was about to indorse it with an Ignoramus; but Ward, one of the Clerks of the Crown-Office, stole the Bill, for which they immediately deliver'd a Bill of Indictment against the said Ward to Offulton Grand Jury, for his high Misdemeanor. The latter presently found it, however, nothing more came of it.

Fitz-Harris being executed on the first of July, the Court no longer kept Measures with the Constitution, and a Scene of Tyranny and Blood was open'd to the Terror and Amazement of the whole Protestant World. They had no longer any Restraint upon them; They resolv'd to save themselves by the Destruction of all that oppos'd them; and Echard, who opens it, does it with this Flourish.

Fitz-Harris's Confessions to Hawkins, gave the King a fair Occasion of searching after a new sort of Plotters. What the Bishop of Salisbury calls impossible, he calls fair. Warrants were issu'd out, continues he, against several Offenders, Rouse, Haynes, White, and one Colledge, commonly call'd the Protestant Joyner, and especially the Earl of Shaftesbury, who were all sent to the Tower, Joyner and Earl, and all, for the greater Wonderment of the Matter. This was done two or three days after Fitz-Harris was hang'd, with whom suffer'd Oliver Plunket, the Irish Archbishop of Armagh. To condemn whom, says Echard, the Lord forgive him, several Witnesses were encourag'd to come over from Ireland, who now wanting Money, and likewise their Pardons, were forc'd to work hard to obtain both, and they were soon found to be proper Instruments for different kinds of Services; and, true it is, the Court took them into Pay as soon as they had done Plunket's Business. Echard goes on, Tho' the Accusation look'd Romantick, not to say malicious, yet the Witnesses were so perfect, and positive, that the Jury found him guilty of High Treason, and he was condemn'd and executed. We have observ'd that Orleans's ly-

A. D. King Libel is usher'd into the World by the Arch-1681. deacon's Recommendation, with his Name to it; that Jesuit affirms, Archbishop Plunket was put to death upon the false Imputations of the Enemies to his Religion; and his Recommender affirms, the Witnesses against him were profess'd Papists. You see what Agreement there is among them, and how can it be otherwise? Truth only is one, Falshood multiplies itself, and consequently cannot always be the same. To expiate for the Execution of Plunket, the Protestant Plot is hastily brought on the Stage, and Sacr-fices set apart, to appease the Manes of White-bread, Fenwick, Ireland, Gavan, Plunket, &c.
 Martyrs to Idolatry and Tyranny. The Court singled out Colledge, says Mr. Archdeacon, a pragmatical, saucy Fellow, who sung Songs against the King and his best Friends; as Scroggs and Jefferies, and North and Rich, and Sawyer and Hawkins. Colledge, 'tis true, had been more busy in the Prosecution of the Popish Plot, than he needed to have been; and it was Punishment enough for him that he lost so many Weeks Work by it. But Vengeance being to be taken for the Death of the Romish Priests and Jesuits, the Court resolv'd to make the Experiment on this Man, whom they had devoted to Slaughter, in remembrance of his Zeal against the Lord Stafford. A Bill of High Treason against him was deliver'd to the Grand Jury of London, of which, says the reverend and modest Historian, one Wilmore was Foreman. I knew that one Wilmore of his, an honest Citizen, Confectioner in Cannon-street, whose Word would have pass'd for Money and Evidence, where I question whether the Person that insults him would have had the like Success. He and his Jury were prepar'd for such Attacks, and at once threw out the Bill with an Ignoramus. We shall find, by and by, that they had good Reason so to do.
 Mr. Wilmore was, out of all course of Law, as the compleat Historian confesses, apprehended and examin'd before the Council, August 16, and sent to the Tower. He was afterwards forc'd to fly to Holland, and return'd not till after King James was forc'd to fly to France. The Court, to follow their Blow, immediately hurry'd him away to Oxford, where a wicked Jury was indeed prepar'd for such Attack, and very greedily took this poor Man's Blood upon them. Let us see who they were, who are to account for it at the grand Tribunal of eternal Judgment.

Is there any Title or Dignity, any Wealth or Revenue, that could make these Men easy under the Load of the Guilt of this Man's Murder, as the Legislature afterwards term'd it?
 Coke remembers one of the Judges in particular.

A. D. The Chief of these was Sir Francis North, a 1681. Man cut out to all Intents and Purposes for such Work; and, as if born to do it, his Father was a Committee-Man in all the late Troubles, against King Charles I. and his Grandfather, one of the Seven who condemn'd Archbishop Laud. 'Tis no matter who were the other Judges, for North was the Mouth of the Court.

The King's Counsel posted away after Colledge to Oxford with their Irish Witnesses, to prevail with the Grand Jury to find the Bill; insomuch that the Bill being found, one of them boasted at Court of his Service and cunning Management of the Matter. The same was done in Fitz-Harris's Case, those Mercenaries cajoling the Grand Jury for some hours in private.

The murdering Judges seem'd to act very graciously, in allowing the execrable West to be Counsel for Colledge, and Mr. Aaron Smith Solicitor; but then, to prevent his being the better for it, as soon as the Bill was found against him, they dispatch'd Muriel the Goaler, and Sewel the Messenger, to bring Colledge from the Castle to his Trial; and order'd those Villains to take away his Papers from him, containing Minutes of Instructions from his Counsellor and Solicitor, which they did, and carry'd Colledge's Papers to the King's Counsel, which Sir John Hawles affirms was unjustifiable, and the first time that ever a Prisoner had the Instructions for his Defence taken away from him. Colledge finding his Life so beset, said, It was a horrid Conspiracy, not only against his Life, but against all the Protestants in England; and Sir John adds, He prov'd a true Prophet. It seems there was Matter in his Papers for quashing the Indictment; and he hinted so much to the Court, as that the Indictment contain'd Crimes of a different Nature, as Treason and Misdemeanor, which Solicitor-General Hawles says, ought not to be join'd in one Indictment. He was ar-raign'd at 12 a-clock, the 17th of August, and brought to his Trial two hours after; the Charge was for High Treason, for conspiring to seize the King, which is evidently in consequence of Fitz-Harris's pretended Plot, and speaking certain treasonable Words; for having Libels, Pictures, Silk Armour, Pocket-Pistols, Horse-Pistols, and a Sword, which Dugdale swore. Smith depos'd, that Colledge shew'd him the terrible Pistols, saying, These are the Things which will destroy the pitiful Guards of old Rowley. One Stephens swore to the Picture call'd the Raree-Show in Colledge's Chamber; and Haynes, that he said the City had 100000 Men ready at an hour's Warning; and what is very extraordinary indeed, Mr. Masters made Oath, that he justify'd the Proceedings in 1641, which this King's first Parliament justify'd. Sir William Jennings did himself the honour to bear false Witness also against him, that after boxing with one Fitzgerald, who made Colledge's Nose bleed, he said, He hop'd to see a great deal more Blood shed for the Cause. For the Prisoner, one Hickman witness'd, he heard Haynes swear, Damn him, he car'd not what he swore, nor whom he swore against, for it was his Trade to get Money by swearing. Mrs. Hall depos'd, She heard Haynes own he was employ'd to put a Plot upon the Dissenters. Low witness'd, that he said, The Parliament were a Company of Rogues, for not giving the King Money, but he would help the King to Money enough out of the Phanaticks P-states. As to Smith's Evidence, one Blake depos'd, that Smith told him, Haynes's Discovery was a Sham-Plot, a Meat-Tub Plot. Balron swore,

A. D. 1681. D. swore, That Smith would have had him give Evidence against Sir John Brooks, that Sir John should say there would be cutting of Throats at Oxford, and that there was a Consult at Grantham, wherein it was resolv'd, That it was better to seize the King than to let him go: That he would have had him to be a Witness against Colledge, and told him what he should say, that they might not disagree in their Evidence: That he heard Haynes say he knew nothing of a Presbyterian Plot; but if he were to be an Evidence, he car'd not what he swore, but would swear any thing to get Money.

Mowbray depos'd, That Smith tempted him to be a Witness against Colledge, and was inquisitive to know what Discourse pass'd betwixt him, my Lord Fairfax, Sir John Hewly, and Mr. Stern on the Road: And now out comes the whole Secret of the pretended Presbyterian Plot. Mowbray solemnly swore, that Smith said, If the Parliament would not give the King Money, and flood on the Bill of Exclusion, it was Pretence enough to swear a Design to seize the King.

Everard swore, Smith told him he knew of no Presbyterian Plot, and said Justice Warcup, to his eternal Infamy, would have persuaded him to swear against some Lords a Presbyterian Plot, but he knew of none. Warcup was knighted for this Hellish Subornation. He said Haynes told him, Necessity had put him upon swearing contrary to what he had sworn formerly. Mr. Parkhurst and Mr. Symons depos'd, They had seen Arms at Colledge's in the Time of the last Parliament, so they could not be purchas'd for seizing the King at Oxford; and Tates swore Dugdale bespoke a Pistol of him, which he promis'd to give Colledge: Whom Tates commending as an honest Man, that stood up for the King and Government; Yes, says Dugdale, I believe he does, and I know nothing to the contrary. Several other Witnesses gave the like Evidence against the forsworn Wretches, whom Sawyer and the King's Counsel had play'd off before. Others bore Testimony to Colledge's Honesty and Conformity, that he was a good Churchman, and never went to a Conventicle that they knew of. Sir John Hawles proves the false swearing of every one of the Witnesses against Colledge still further than I have done, upbraids the Jury with giving a Verdict against their Consciences, and the unrighteous Judges with commending them for it. Hawles tells us, North acted disingenuously with the Prisoner, that he broke his Word with him in summing up the Evidence, that he summ'd it up unfairly, that he made a lame Excuse for not minding the Jury of what Colledge's Witnesses said, saying, he refer'd it to their Memory: whereas, I dare say, 'tis Sir John Hawles who speaks it, after about thirteen Hours Evidence, the Jury remember'd no more than that they were to find him guilty. Tho' this Villany, under colour of Justice, is not stamp'd with the Archdeacon's Authority so much as the Injustice he pretends was done the Popish Conspirators, yet he can't help abusing Colledge now he is under Condemnation. "His Execution was defer'd fourteen Days, till the 31st of August; during which time, in company he seem'd to be very little concern'd, but often had terrible Agonies when he was by himself," insinuating the Horrors of a guilty Conscience. Sir John Hawles tells us, One thing was very dishonestly insinuated, that he was a Papist, which was only to incense the Jury against him, and it had its effect: Whereas he declar'd at his Death, he died of the Church of England. Hawles gives us this account of it: The true reason of so long a Reprieve, was to see how the Nation would digest the matter, and whether the Man by the Terror of Death could be prevail'd upon to do an ill thing to save his Life, and become a Tool to destroy other Innocents; but when it was found that the People were quiet, and that he was not to be corrupted, his Execution was order'd; yet as a show of Mercy, his Quarters were permitted to be bury'd: a Favour he slighted, saying, I care not whether I am eaten up by Flies or Worms. A like brave Saying of his was just after Sentence, When am I to be executed? Sir John Hawles proceeds, "The same favour was shewn to Fitzharris; but the true Reason of both was, that they had a mind that the Trials and pretended Crimes for which Fitzharris and Colledge were condemn'd, should be forgotten, which would not be so soon done, if their Quarters were always expos'd to view. But tho' all People were quiet, yet there was great grumbling, and most honest Men were afraid; and the Constancy of Colledge at his Execution was such, that it made the most violent against him relent." Echard, who had the Confidence to dedicate his Book to his late Majesty, terms the unjust Execution of this honest Man, so prov'd to be at his Trial, a just Judgment of Almighty God upon him, for his endeavouring to bring the Lord Stafford to Justice. And now, continues he, the King seem'd to enjoy himself more than in some Years before, by being daily complemented with several Spits in the Mouth, as Lord Hallifax call'd the Addresses, flowing in, cries the Archdeacon, from all Parts of his Kingdom, from Attorneys, Tapiters, Bailiffs, Curates, Militia Men, and the like Fry, as is shewn at large in the before-mention'd Impartial Account of these Addresses.

Now also was Dr. Oates turn'd out of Whitehall, and his Pension taken from him. An Ecclesiastical Commission was granted to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, the Lord Hallifax, the Lord Hyde, and Mr. Edward Seymour, to dispose of all Church Preferments, which belong'd to the King's immediate Patronage. And about ten Days after Colledge was hang'd, his Majesty went to Newmarket, where he was soon attended by a numerous and solemn Appearance of the University of Cambridge, I take it from Mr. Archdeacon, at the head of which was the Vice-Chancellor Dr. Gower, Master of St. John's-College, who made a Speech to him; which being extremely academical, I leave where I found it in his History, and shall only insert some of the Beaux Endroits in it: That the seditious Endeavours of unreasonable Men had made it necessary to assert the antient Loyalty of the English Nation, and make the World sensible, that they, the Doctors, Masters, and Scholars of Cambridge, do not degenerate from those prime Glories of their Ancestors, Love and Allegiance to our Prince, be what he will, and who he will. He then tells the King, that if it had not been for God's Providence, and his Majesty's royal Care, in so seasonably checking the arbitrary and insolent Undertakings of factious and malicious Men, they would not have been content to vent the Venom of their Reproaches against those good University Men, but would have plunder'd and sequester'd them, would have violated their Chapels, rifled their Libraries, and empty'd their Colleges, as they did once. Then he tells his Majesty what they will believe and maintain; which was, that when his Brother the Duke of York came to be King, He would not derive his Title from the People, but from God; that to God only he would be accountable, that it belongs not to Subjects either to create or censure, but to honour and obey their Sovereign. Then comes some of that staring Nonsense which endeavours to reconcile the Unalterable with the Revolutionary Right, the Hereditary Right and the Ab-dication Right. Again, who comes to be our Sovereign by a fundamental hereditary Right of Succession, which no Religion, no Law, no Fault or Forfeiture can alter or diminish. He said a Truth after it, which makes some Atonement for this Falshood: We bring no Names and Seals, no Lives and Fortunes, which are at all worth your Majesty's acceptance. The King in answer to this Lofly Speech, said, He would constantly own the Church of England. Did he not make his Word good by dying a Papist? Be assur'd of this, (says he,) for I will be as good as my word. On the 20th of September the King and Queen went to Cambridge; the University Orator Mr. Billers spoke in Latin to the King, who always spoke and wrote in English; but to the Queen in English, as sup-posing she did not understand Latin, tho' she never pray'd to God in any other Language. They presented the King with a Protestant Bi-ble. They might as decently have given it to the Dutcheſs of Cleveland, and the Queen with Dugdale's View of the late Troubles of England; a Present I should not think too good for Mr. Arch-deacon himself, if he would please to accept of it. He is very copious in his Description of the Entertainment of the Royal Pair, and tells us it refounded thro' the whole Kingdom. The judi-cious and learned Lawyer Mr. Acherley explains to us, the virtuous Motives that produc'd this Harangue from the Vice-Chancellor of Cam-bridge.

Gower's Speech is the very Essence of these dangerous and detested Schemes. The Conspi-racy to take off the chief Protestant Lords and Gentlemen, being check'd by the honest Pro-ceedings of the Sheriffs, the Court resolv'd to use all their Arts and Strength to get the City of London into their hands, that such Juries might be pack'd as had no restraint of Conscience upon them, and whose Hearts were harden'd to go thro' the greatest Butcheries without Remorse. The sober Part of the City would have set aside Sir John Moor, an old canting Fanatick of so weak Parts, that even Jenkins could wheedle him out of his Religion and Principles; but he being the next Alderman to the Chair, and se-veral Dissenting Ministers being so far impos'd upon by his hypocritical Pretences, as to get Votes for him in their Congregations, he had the Majority of Sir John Shorter, and Moor was so sharpen'd by Opposition, that he aban-don'd himself his former Religion and Princi-ples to the Popish Faction. He began his he-traying of the Cause of his Country with drinking to one Dudley North, a Merchant, Brother to the Chief Justice, to entitle him to be Sheriff, which occasion'd a great Disorder in the City, as will be seen in the Sequel; but as yet the Shrievalty was in good hands, and when a Bill of Indictment of High Treason was prefer'd against the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Court found they had precipitated the Matter, and that there was not a seasonable Jury ready for them. That Lord, then call'd the Protestant Earl, was sent to the Tower in July, and there continu'd till the 24th of November; and had every thing to fear from the implacable Malice, and the merciless Rage of his wicked Enemies, who had brib'd perjurd Villains to swear Colledge out of his Life, and were now em-ploying them in the like diabolical Work to swear the Earl of Shaftesbury out of his. The Bishop of Salisbury says of the Ministry and Judges at this time, The Court intended to set the Witnesses to swear against the Protestant Party, which was plainly MURDER in them, who believ'd them false Witnesses, and yet made use of them to destroy others. Mr. Archdeacon vouches for them that they were true Witnesses, and that the not believing them rous'd the Indignation, and rais'd the highest Resentments of the greatest Part of the Nation. He could not have said it without want of Sense as well as Integrity. The Grand Jury impanel'd on this occasion were Gentlemen of such Note and Worth, that at the Names of them a whole Host of his Abhorrrers and Addressers vanish like Goblins at the Dawn of Day.

Edward Ivey, &c. before such a Jury as this, dence.
Men of great Parts, great Virtue and Fortune, who could not but abhor the Evidence, and detest or despise the Prosecutors? If the Earl of Shaftes-bury's Throat had been cut, as it is suspected the Earl of Essex's was, it had been a Complement to Justice; but to attempt to murder a Man by forms of Law, and the Testimonies of perjurd Criminals, was an Affront to it, which we shall hardly meet with in the worst of Times, if ever there were worse than these, the Reigns we are writing of, of which Coke says, and it is one of the best things he ever said, For near eighty Years these three Kings of the Scottish Race had been endeavouring to establish an arbitrary tyrannical Government. Charles the First exceeded his Fa-ther, and Charles II. imitates him; for as Charles I. did his illegal Acts by such Judges as he could get, so Charles II. in the Executions of Fitzharris and Colledge, would have the colour of Justice by form of Law, for which there was no Law; This plainly leaves the Blood of those Sacrifices on the Heads of the Court, the Judges, the Ju-ries: Upon which the righteous Vengeance of Heaven has been, and will be pour'd to the third and fourth Generation.

The Bishop of Salisbury gives this Account of the Proceedings against the Earl of Shaftesbury:

"His

A. D. 1681. " His Papers were seiz'd and search'd; nothing material was found among them, but a

" Draught of an Association, which was neither writ nor mark'd in any place with his hand."

Eckard avers there was something material found besides the Association, and that was a Book of the several Counties of England, rang'd in Alphabet, under the Heads of Worthy Men on the one side, and Men Worthy on the other: I leave it to the Reader to guess on which side his Lordship would have rang'd Mr. Archdeacon, who would have had this and the Association tack'd together to make High Treason of it. For he continues, It appear'd afterwards that under the Cypher of Men worthy was couch'd the Conceit of Men worthy to be hang'd; for which he would have had the Jury hang up the Earl of Shaftesbury. My Lord of Sarum tells us how the Earl came by this Association, and if so, there was nothing but the Alphabet left to hang him.

" When there was a Talk of an Association, as there was in Parliament some Months before,

" some had fram'd this Paper, and brought it to him, of which he always profess'd, that he re-member'd nothing at all: So it is probable, that, as is ordinary when any great Business is before the Parliament, that zealous Men are at the Doors with their several Draughts; this was one of these, cast carelessly by, and not thought on by him, when he had sent his more valuable Papers out of the way. There was likewise but one Witness that could swear to its being found there. The Witnesses against the Earl were examin'd in open Court, contrary to the usual Custom; they swore many incredible things: The Draught of the Association was also brought as a Proof of his Treason, tho' it was not laid in the Indictment, and " was prov'd only by one Witness." So the Solicitors and Witnesses would have had their Brains beaten out, had not the Protestant Sheriffs protected them, and been their Guard as far as the Savoy. Sir John Hawles gives many Reasons, Arguments and Authorities to justify those worthy Gentlemen in their just Verdict, to which

I refer, and shall only repeat what my Lord of Sarum writes on this occasion. " There was all

" this Summer strange practising with Witnesses to find more Matter against the Earl of Shaftesbury. Wilkinson, a Prisoner for Debt, who had been often with him, was dealt with to accuse him. The Court had found out two Solicitors to manage such Matters, Burton and

Graham, who were indeed fitter Men to have serv'd in a Court of Inquisition, than in a legal Government. It was known that Lord Shaftesbury was apt to talk very freely, and without Discretion; so the two Solicitors fought out all that had frequented his Company, and tried what they could draw from them, and they made great Promises to such as by swearing boldly would deserve them. In all this foul dealing the King himself was believ'd to be the chief Director, and Lord Halifax was thought deep in it." Wilkinson abovemention'd was tamper'd with, not only by the Lord Conway Secretary of State, but Coke says by the King himself, by the Lord Chancellor, the Chief Justice Pemberton, and other Court Lords; and Wilkinson having been promis'd Advancement, if he would swear against the Earl of Shaftesbury, he refus'd it, as having nothing to swear; the Lord Chancellor said, There are two Sorts of Advancements, and you are like to come to your Trial before the Lord Shaftesbury: for which, no doubt he has been rewarded according to his Works.

The Court having given the Word for it, the Addressers, a very ragged Regiment, box'd about Ignoramus Juries and Associations, in variety of dull, fulsome and insolent Papers, which being below Contempt, cannot be worthy Remembrance.

Four Days after the Ignoramus Verdict, the Earl of Shaftesbury was bail'd out of the Tower, his Bail being the Lord Russel, Mr. Montagu, afterwards Duke, Sir William Cowper, Father of the late Lord Chancellor Cowper, and Mr. Charlton. The Lord Howard of Esherick was also then bail'd, and the Court was so afraid of Rejoicings, that the Lord Mayor was order'd to take especial Care that there should be no Bonfires. However, the good People shew'd their Affection to the Earl and the Protestant Cause, by a Medal which was struck, and on which Eckard assures us Mr. Dryden made a very ingenious Poem; but as he's no better a Critick than he is an Historian, the Reader will not be misled by his Judgment.

THE Duke of York, who governs all, is made High Commissioner of Scotland, says

Coke, where at this time he is contriving the Destruction of the noble Earl of Argyle, whilst his Brother is doing that of my Lord Shaftesbury, P. 388.

and both act their Parts under the Veil of sacred Justice; in which, says he, the Duke seems more successful than his Brother. He refers to the intended Murder of my Lord Argyle, which is with him Success; and the two Brothers will indeed be thus successful till the Nation gets rid of them by Death and Abdication.

The Duke had some Excuse for exercising the Cruelty of his Nature by the rash and frantick Proceedings of some enthusiastick Cameronians, who insisted upon it, that the King by breaking the Covenant which he had thrice solemnly sworn, had forfeited his Right to the Crown, which they were so bold as to declare in a Paper fix'd to the Cross at Dumfries. The Guards were immediately hurry'd away to fall on these crazy Creatures, the Chief of whom was one Cameron, a Teacher among them, from whom they took their Name; and he making a vigorous Resistance was kill'd. Two others of their Teachers and Chiefs, Cargil and Hackstone, were taken. Hackstone, when brought before the Council, would not own their Authority, nor make any Answer to their Questions; he was so low by reason of his Wounds, that it was thought he would die in the Question, if tortur'd, so he was Burnet.

in a very summary way condemn'd to have both his Hands cut off, and then to be hang'd, which he suffer'd with a Constancy that amazed all People. He seem'd to be all the while in an Extasy, and insensible of what was done to him. When his Hands were cut off, he ask'd like one unconcern'd, if his Feet must be cut off too? And he had so strong a Heart, that notwithstanding all the Loss of Blood by his Wounds, and the cutting off his Hands; yet when he was hang'd up and his Heart cut out, it continu'd to palpitate for some time after it was on the Hangman's Knife. Cargil, and many others, Women as well as Men, were executed; and all suffer'd with so particular an Obstinacy, that tho' the Duke of York sent them the Offer of Pardon, if they would only say, God bless the King, they refus'd it with a kind of Scorn. One of the Women said very calmly, I am sure God will not bless him, and therefore I will not take God's Name in vain. Another said more sullenly, I will not worship that

Idol, nor acknowledge any other King but Christ; which she must be supposed to say, on the score

A. D. of the King's pretended Forfeiture by the Breach of his Oath.

On the 28th of July last the Duke held a Parliament, and pass'd an Act for the Security of the Protestant Religion. Echard is so very weak as to mention this seriously, tho' Bishop Burnet informs us, that it was not intended that this new Confirmation of old Statutes against Popery should have any Effect. The next Act was for the unalterable Succession of the Crown, which was only oppos'd by the Earl of Tweeddale, and that not with respect to the Duke, but to the Queen of Spain, the King and Duke's Niece.

A Member of this Parliament accus'd the Lord Halton, Lauderdale's Brother, of Perjury, on account of Mitchel's Business before mention'd. Halton swore there was no Promise of Life made; Mitchel, and his Letters to Lord Kincardin then produc'd, prov'd that there was; but the Duke of York stifled the Prosecution. The same he did concerning a Conspiracy against Lord Bargeny's Life, Witnesses being suborn'd, as he could very plainly prove, to swear he was in the Borthwell-Bridge Business, tho' he had many Proofs to the contrary, and no body believ'd he knew of it; but this also the Duke stifled, notwithstanding Bargeny was Nephew to Duke Hamilton.

The Test Act.

The Test Act, which was brought into this Scots Parliament, was more rigid, and more exalted the Prerogative above the Laws, than the baffled Test in 1675 in England, and the Sermons and Addresses of the Popish Faction in that Kingdom did. The Account given of the Lord Argyle's suffering for it, is so false in Mr. Archdeacon's History, that one would think he invented it, on purpose to exasperate the whole British Nation against the most noble House of Argyle, who have done and suffer'd as much for the Protestant Religion and Liberty, as any other honourable Family whatsoever in Great Britain. My Lord Argyle's main Objection to this vile Test, was the obligatory Part, not to endeavour any Alteration in the Government in Church and State. The Bishops were very zealous for the passing of this Test; but several weighty Reasons were given against it, as had been urg'd in the Parliament of England; however, it pass'd, and the Earl of Argyle being requir'd to take it, did it with this Explanation, That he did not intend to bind himself up by it from doing any thing in his Station, for the amending of any thing in Church or State, so far as was consistent with the Protestant Religion, and the Duty of a good Subject; and he took that as a part of his Oath. Having said this, he sat down at the Council-Table, and went next day to the Treasury-Chamber, where he was a Commissioner, and repeated the same Words. Some Enemies of his, and of his Religion and Principles, suggested to the Duke of York, who was very susceptible of such Suggestions, that great Advantage might be taken against him from those Words; so at the Treasury-Chamber he was desir'd to write them down, and give them to the Clerk, which he did, and was immediately sent Prisoner to Edinburgh Castle. The Reader has the full state of the Case before him, and when he has seen how it is misrepresented by Dr. Sprat and Mr. Echard, he will have pity on them, if he has any Christian Charity.

The Earl of Argyle explains the Test, and is imprisoned.

P. 519.

Echard begins his Abuse, with saying the Earl had, by many indirect Ways, attempted to hinder his Majesty's Service. This is so false, that Bishop Burnet assures us, Lord Argyle was of the Duke of Lauderdale's Party, of whom the King said, that whatever Lauderdale had done against the Scots, it was all for his Service, as has been observ'd already. The next Falsity is, that Argyle himself put the very Clause into the Test, against which himself excepted; if he stole this from Sprat, one may have from thence an Idea of the Falsities in that Doctor's History of the Rye-House Plot. The two Ecclesiastical Historians add, The Earl travell'd about the Country, to insinuate Prejudices against the Test, and dispers'd his Explanation. Now 'tis evident that he had no time to do it, he writ it down in the Treasury-Chamber, and was immediately clapt up in Prison. The two reverend Historians, Dr. Sprat Bishop of Rockester, and Mr. Echard Archdeacon of Stow, assert, That his Trial was according to the Laws of his Country; that it was full and equal; that he was found guilty of Treason by the Judges, and a Jury, not only of his Peers, but also several of them his own nearest Relations. That soon after Judgment, tho' the King had no thought of taking his Life, yet he took the first Opportunity to make his Escape, not daring to venture on the King's Mercy; which will be found to be every Word false, by comparing it with what my Lord Bishop of Sarum writes upon it: "Lockhart pleaded three hours for him, and shew'd so manifestly, that his Words had no sort of Criminality, much less of Treason in them, that if his Cause had not been judged before his Trial, no harm could have come to him." You remember Echard asserted the Trial to be fair and equal. The Bishop again: "The Court that was to judge the Point of Law, consisted of a Justice General, the Justice Clerk, and of five Judges. The Justice General does not vote, unless the Court is equally divided. One of the Judges was deaf, and so old, that he could not sit all the while the Trial lasted, but went home, and to Bed; the other four were equally divided, so that the old Judge was sent for, and he turn'd it against Lord Argyle. The Jury was only to find the Fact prov'd; but yet they were officious, and found it Treason. No Sentence in our Age was more universally cry'd out on than this. All People spoke of it, and of the Duke that drove it on, with Horror." Now Sprat and Echard affirm it was a fair and equal Trial, and speak of it, and of the Duke that drove it on, with infinite delight, and would make us believe there was no harm intended against him; but he was so guilty, that he durst not trust to the King's MERCY, but made his Escape. Bishop Burnet speaks quite otherwise; "Lord Argyle was made believe that the Duke intended to proceed to Execution. Some more of the Guards were order'd to come to Edinburgh. Rooms were also fitted for him in the common Goal, to which Peers use to be remov'd a few days before their Execution. And a Person of Quality affirm'd to him, on his Honour, that he heard one, who was in great Favour, say to the Duke, It must be done. It is certain many of the Scottish Nobility did believe it was intended he should die, and upon these Reasons Lord Argyle made his Escape. This business made the Duke look'd upon as one that would prove a terrible Master when All should come into his hands." You have heard how successful the Duke was in Scotland, and must now hear a little more of it from my Lord of Sarum; "He had promis'd to redress all the Merchants Grievances, with relation to Trade, to gain their Concurrence in Parliament; but as soon as that was over, all his Promises were forgotten; the Accusations of Perjury were stifled by him; and all the Complaints of the great " great Abuse Lord Halton was guilty of in the Employments of the Coin, ended in turning him out, and obliging him to compound for his Pardon, by paying 20000 Pounds to two of the Duke's Creatures; so that all the Reparation the Kingdom had for the Oppression of so many Years, and so many Acts of Injustice, was, that two new Oppressors had a share of the Spoils, who went into the same Track, or rather invented new Methods of Oppression. The Bishops made their Court to the Duke with so much Zeal, that they wrote a Letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, to be communicated to the rest of the English Bishops, setting forth, in a very high Strain, his Affection to the Church." Nay, so very high was the Strain, that the Duke of York, as much as he had been us'd to Flattery from those Men, could not but despise it, 'twas so abject and indecent. He made Gordon, now Earl of Aberdeen, Chancellor, and Queensberry Lord Treasurer; and having Leave given him to come to Court, he waited on the King at Newmarket, March 3d, and obtain'd the King's Permission to live again at Court; but having left his Dutcheß in Scotland big with Child, he return'd thither again in May. The Gloucester Frigate that carry'd him, struck on a Bank of Sand; the Duke got into a Boat, and, as we read in Bishop Burnet's History, took care of his Dogs and some unknown Persons, who were taken from that earnest Care of his to be his Priests. The Long-Boat went off with very few in her, tho' she might have carry'd off above 80 more than she did. One hundred and fifty Persons perish'd, some of them Men of great Quality: But the Duke took no notice of this cruel Neglect, which was laid chiefly to Legg's Charge. The Bishop has been very much vilify'd for telling this Story by the Popish Faction and their Abettors, one of whom, Zachary Gray, charg'd him with Falshood in it at the same time that himself publish'd a Libel full of the most impudent Falshoods. I have since met with a further Proof of that cruel Neglect, I had it from a Man of Honour, who had it from one Flower, a Musician, the only Man of the Duke's Band that could play on the Lute. He was one of those whom the Duke left in the Ship, and jumping into the Sea, he swam after the Long-Boat; he sunk twice, and when he rose the third time, caught hold of a piece of the Wreck, which drove towards the Long-Boat; when he came near it, the Boat's Crew were going to knock him on the head, but the Duke cry'd out, Hold, take him in, he's a Fidler. However, he afterwards turn'd him out of his Band, because he would not turn Papist. He was receiv'd into the Family of the Gentleman, from whom I receiv'd my Information, and declar'd to him, That the Duke of York took only his Dogs and his Priests aboard the Pinnace. Flower was restor'd to his Place after the Revolution.

The Duke in danger at Sea.

Ireland.

The Kingdom of Ireland liv'd in great Tranquillity under the Duke of Ormond, who began to be sensible of the King and the Duke's Intention to change the Government in Church and State, and set up Popery and Arbitrary Power. He was extremely solicitous to settle the Militia of Ireland, and order'd their Watching equal with the Army. By his good Administration, the English Interest in Ireland became of greater Value than ever, insomuch that an Irish Lord swore, He believ'd Jesus Christ was a Protestant, for that nothing prosper'd on the side of the Catholics, who, however, gave not over their Intrigues. Sheridan was with the Duke in Scotland, from whence he wrote over private Encouragement to the Popish Party, and kept them still in heart. The Duke of Ormond endeavour'd to have a Parliament in Ireland, and succeeded so far, as to obtain a Grant, in pursuance of which, a Bill drawn by the Lord Lieutenant and Council, was sent over to England: But the Duke of York's Interest obstructed it, and 'tis suppos'd his first Journey from Scotland was to put a stop to the Duke of Ormond's Design; and the Irish were so confident he would do it before it was done, that they stuck not to affirm, they were well assur'd there would be no Parliament whilst King Charles liv'd. Nay, they would frequently discourse with that Liberty and Boldness, as if the Duke of York had been actually seated on the Throne, upon a presumption he would speedily ascend it. Thus we see that the three Kingdoms were in the Duke's hands, some Years before the Scepter was his by the Death of his Brother, till when, and during his own dreaded Reign, the Protestants of England, Scotland and Ireland groan'd under the most intolerable Tyranny; the Instruments he made use of, being the most insolent as well as the most infamous that could be pick'd out among the three Nations. Ireland had continu'd for two or three Years in much quiet, before and after the Duke went to Scotland, when, on a sudden, a Stratagem was set on foot, laid as deep as Hell, says my Author, and yet seemingly for the Advantage of the English. In the Settlement of Ireland there were overplus or conceal'd Lands, said to be in possession of divers of the English, but in truth, much more in that of the Irish. Now to insure the Titles of the English from future Discoveries, as was pretended, a Court of Grace was erected, where all that would come, had the Opportunity of putting in their Claims; and upon proving their Possession, and compounding with the Commissioners for Payment of such a Sum as they thought fit to impose upon them, they had new Patents granted them. This Policy had its intended Effect, many Persons came in, and considerable Sums were rais'd: But this Court was soon found out to be a Snare to the English; the Design being to make a narrow Inspection into all Mens Titles, and thereby discover what Advantage might be deriv'd from it. For by the Act of Settlement, all the forfeited Lands in Ireland were only vested in the King, as a Trustee, for the use of the Soldiers and Adventurers, and could be no way dispos'd of, but according to the Intent of that Act; and the King's Patent could not alter it, as was pretended to be done by this Court of Grace, which was set up by the Duke of York's Interest, contrary to Law, and therefore his Faction did not appear in it openly, but transacted it by the Dutcheß of Portsmouth, who got a great deal of Money out of it by Fines.

Duke of York governs all.

The main Agent in it was one W—th, who, some time before bought a Judge's Place in the Exchequer for 800 Pounds. He call'd himself a Protestant; and to make this Poison go down the more easy, the Pill was gilded. Most of the Judges were made Commissioners, and had part of the Fines. The Lawyers and Attorneys got Money by the Court, and purchas'd Estates, to the ruin of the former Possessors. My Author adds, " In several Designs of the Papists; they acted by Protestant Tools. No Man was to pass a Patent for Fair, Market, Mannor, &c. without passing his Estate thro' this Court; whereas by the Act of Settlement, all Persons had liberty, for the Improvement of the Country, to pass Patents for them, provided they were not within three Miles one of another. A sad thing, continues he, that Eng" lishmen,

A. D. 1682. " lishmen and Protestants should, by base and unworthy Compliances, become such servile Instruments to the Advancement of the Popish Cause."

The Duke of Ormond perceiving, by the Tendency of these Affairs, that the Romish Design was agitated with great Earnestness, he with much difficulty obtain'd leave to go for England in 1683. He left his Son the Earl of Arran Lord Deputy. Upon his Arrival at Court, he a second time attempts a Parliament, but ineffectually; upon which he return'd to Ireland with a heavy Heart, as he himself declar'd to a Person of great Quality in that Kingdom. He had Instructions to regiment the Army, and to do some other things that were Preparatives to what follow'd soon after the Duke of York's Accession to the Crown.

The Difficulties the Court of England met with, in taking off Protestant Lords and Gentlemen by Forms of Law, while there were honest Sheriffs and Juries, made them undertake the greatest Invasion of the People's Rights that ever had been heard of since the great Charter was sign'd at Runmead. Echard is so simple as to own the King's Design, by bringing Quo Warranto's against the Charter of London, and the Charters of other Cities and corporate Towns all over the Kingdom. He resolv'd to find Expedients against the London Juries, and to alter the Methods of electing Sheriffs. Till that was done, the Course of Justice was regular; but as soon as the Court had got Sheriffs and Juries to their mind, they set their Judges to work, who with ready Hand prepar'd the Knife to murder the noble Sacrifices which they offer'd to the Manes of the Popish Traytors, who were executed for the Popish Plot.

One Cradock, a pragmatical Mercer in Pater-noster-Row, was su'd in an Action of Scandalum Magnatum by the Earl of Shaftesbury; but the Judges refus'd to try the Cause by a London Jury, tho' 'twas laid in London, and the Earl was not willing to trust it to a pack'd Country Jury, such as that of Kent, who found Mr. Wilmore, Foreman of Colledge's Ignoramus Jury, guilty of Kidnapping a Boy to Jamaica, without going from the Bar, says Echard; and adds, So much Difference there was between a Country and City Jury, between those wealthy and worthy Citizens, who gave an Ignoramus to Lord Shaftesbury's Indictment, and a Parcel of Kentish Clowns, cull'd out of that County to do this Job for the Ministry. Echard had seen, or might have seen, what Sir John Hawles says of the impudent Injustice and Illegality of the Process against Mr. Wilmore; and yet he bestows such Eulogy on the Teomen of Kent, for finding him guilty about the End of May. He informs us the Judges reprimanded the Sheriffs for not returning the Writ de Homine Replegiando brought against Wilmore Elongatus est. Sir John Hawles, who knew more Law than all those Mercenaries, says, the Sheriffs would have return'd on the Writ, that the Boy went abroad by his own Agreement and Consent with Mr. Wilmore; and the Judges said, if they did not return replegiando, they would lay the two Sheriffs by the Heels: and as to the Withernam the reverend Author mentions, probably without knowing what it means, Sir John tells us, It was not Law, and that Mr. Wilmore and the Nation had great Injustice done them; for it was quickly seen what the Mischief of that Judgment was, and therefore it was endeavour'd to be reform'd by an Act of King and Council afterwards. I say first, it is lawful for a Master to covenant with a Servant to serve him beyond Sea. In the next place, it is lawful for a Master to send a Servant beyond Sea, according to such Agreement; which he very learnedly proves to be according to Law, and adds, It is not an Argument for disallowing the Sheriffs first Return, that the Person sent beyond Sea was a Child not capable of making such a Contract, tho' I believe if the matter were look'd into, he was of age so to do. Notwithstanding all this sound Law, and much more of it in Hawles's Remarks, does the Archdeacon intimate, Wilmore had been indicted in the City for the said Crime of Boy-stealing; mark the Malice and Virulence! But the Grand Jury there found the Bill Ignoramus; for which, and for clearing Mr. Harris the Bookseller, whom the Court caus'd to be indicted for publishing a Treatise against Popery and Arbitrary Power, which Echard terms a scandalous Libel, he sets forth the Necessity of the King's Quo Warranto's taking away Charters. But Sir John Hawles's ranto's gives us the true Reason for it, which, if he lives why issu'd to read, I am so tender to him, as to hope it will be with Shame and Confusion, he having pleaded the Necessity and Justice of seizing the Rights and Privileges of Englishmen founded on these Charters. "Notwithstanding all these Hardships on Juries, says Sir John, the Court saw plainly it was impossible to procure any Bills of Indictment for High Treason, much less any Person to be convicted on the like Evidence, except in London, where are some of the best, as well as the worst Men in the Nation; and even there it was not to be done, as long as the Juries were sensible and honest Men." Don't you remember how Mr. Archdeacon boasted of the Difference between Kentish Men and Citizens of London? "And that would be as long as the Election of Sheriffs was in the Citizens; and to the honour of the City it was seen, that they chose only honest Men to be Sheriffs, and that when they saw the publick Safety depend on honest Officers, tho' at other times they had rather pay a Fine than undergo the Charges and Trouble of that Office; yet at that time no Man legally chosen refus'd to stand, tho' they were reproach'd and punish'd for it: and if Mr. Box refus'd, it was because he would not join with North, who was impos'd upon the City; for which reason, it was resolv'd to take from the City the Right of chusing Sheriffs."

The Court could not help shewing their dislike to the Choice last Year, when, as Sir John Hawles informs us, honest Men were chosen, in so much that Sir George Treby the Recorder, and the two Sheriffs, Mr. Pilkington and Mr. Shute, being sent to invite the King to Dinner last Lord Mayor's Day, his Majesty descended so low from his Imperial Character, as to say, Mr. Recorder, an Invitation from my Lord Mayor and the City is very acceptable to me; and to shew that it is so, notwithstanding that it is brought me by Messengers that are so unwelcome to me as these two Sheriffs are, I accept it. If a private Gentleman had said as much to other Gentlemen, coming with such an Invitation, in his own House, I question whether well-bred People would not have taken it to be an Offence to Good-Manners.

I have but little Room or Inclination to dwell on small Events, which are more Biographical than Historical; but I think I must remember, after the Compleat Historian, that his Majesty made a Knight of John Knight Esq; one of the Sheriffs of Bristol, for his adherence to the Church, and of George Vernon Esq; of Farnham. That he gave some Bucks to the London Prentices, who did also adhere to the Church, and issu'd

His Majesty knighted also Thomas Deerham Esq; his Resident with the great Duke of Tuscany, and Christopher Buckle Esq; of Surrey. He made the Duke of Grafton, whom he order'd to be one of the Stewards at the City-Prentices Feast, Colonel of his First Regiment of Foot-Guards. Sir George Carteret, eldest Son to Sir Philip Carteret, was created a Baron of England, by the Name of Baron Carteret of Hawnes, in the County of Bedford. And about the same time last Summer, his Highness the Prince of Orange visited his Uncles in England; where he made a short stay of a few Days only. Some time after, Sunday February 12, a barbarous Assassination was committed on the Person of Thomas Thynne Esq; who passing the Pall-mall in his Coach, was set upon by three Men on Horse-back; one of which discharg'd a Musketoon into the Coach, and mortally wounded him, four Bullets entering his Body. The Assassins were one Vratz, a German Captain; Borotski, a Polander; and John Sterne, who were set on by Count Coningmark, a Rival of Mr. Thynne's in his Pretences to the Lady Elizabeth Piercy, Daughter and Heir to the great Earl of Northumberland; tho' no body had so good a Right to pretend to her as Mr. Thynne, who was her wedded, tho' not bedded Husband. To extenuate this barbarous Act, Mr. Archdeacon insinuates, that Mr. Thynne, after he had refus'd two Challenges from Coningmark, sent six Men to France to assassinate that Count there, and that it was a Judgment upon Thynne for his treacherous Practices to another Lady; which he tells us out of the Scandalous Chronicle, much more scurrilous and false than any of our Secret Histories.

Mr. Thynne assassinated.

The Assassins hang'd.

The Reader will not wonder at this gross Partiality, when he is told that Mr. Thynne was zealous for the Protestant Interest, and the Bill of Exclusion; that he abhor'd persecuting Dissenters, and on all occasions asserted the Liberty of his Country.

Coningmark ran away, and was taken in disguise at Gravesend by Gibbons, a Servant of the Duke of Monmouth's, who, 'tis said, was in the Coach when his Friend Mr. Thynne was shot, and to whose Friendship and Diligence was owing the quick Apprehension of the Assassins, who were try'd, condemn'd, and hang'd in the Pall-mall. Sterne and Borotski were very penitent; but Vratz said at the Gallows, God has a greater Favour for Gentlemen, than to require Punctilio's of Humility at their hands; and it is absurd to think, that so many thousand Gentlemen in the World, that stood upon their Honour and Reputation so much as he, should be for ever damn'd, because they could not stoop to things that would spoil the Figure they made in the world. It is miraculous that a Man of such religious Sentiments as these, and so good a Catholick, should not come off as well as Coningmark; who having rid the Court of an Opposer, Directions were given that the Judges should be favourable; as Sir John Hawles assures us they were, and gives several Instances of it, closing his Remarks thus: Vratz being the next greatest Offender, was honourably interr'd; and Sterne and Borotski, who were the least Offenders in that Matter, were hang'd in Chains. It was somewhat like New-England Law, remember'd by Hudibras, of hanging an useless innocent Weaver for an useful guilty Cobler.

Echard prints many of the Addressers that were presented the King against the Association, Ignoramus's, &c. especially one from the Artillery Company in Bristol, who shew'd that they could write no better than they could fight. He then inserts a Speech of Dr. Coya, Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge to the Duke of York, to which he tells us, his Royal Highness was pleas'd to return this Answer. I will ever stand by the Church of England as by Law establish'd, which the Reverend Historian would have sunk, if he had a true Notion of the Baseness, as well as Sin of breaking a Man's Word. The University, in compliment to his Royal Highness, bridge turn'd out their Chancellor the Duke of Monmouth, and chose in his place Monk's Son Christopher Duke of Albemarle, who was just as well qualify'd to be their Chancellor, as his Father was to be their Representative in Parliament, if good Sense and Learning were Qualifications necessary to protect or represent that most famous Nursery. But by what follows, neither of them seem to be then of the Growth of that Place; for that venerable Body were so foolish or mad, as to burn the Duke of Monmouth's Picture, which not long before they had begg'd of his Grace. This shameless Act of Ingratitude was finely lash'd in a Satyr written upon the Vice-Chancellor and Doctors, by George Stepney Esq; who serv'd King William so long and so laudably in several foreign Negotiations. It began thus:

They burn the Duke of Monmouth in Effigie.

*Yes, fickle Cambridge, Perkins found this true,
Both from your Rabble, and your Doctors too;
With what Applause you once receiv'd his Grace,
And begg'd a Copy of his God-like Face:
But when the sage Vice-Chancellor was sure
Th' Original in Limbo lay secure,
As greasy as himself, he sends a Lictor,
To vent his loyal Malice on the Picture.
The Beadle's Wife, &c.*

The Duke of York before he return'd to Scotland, was advis'd by his Faction to aim at Popularity; and as one step towards it, he din'd with the Artillery Company at Merchant-Taylors Hall, where his Hand was kiss'd by great Numbers of Citizens, who crowded to have that Honour, and where-ever he went the Rabble were excited to make a Noise, as if he had been the People's Darling: But as his Courtship of them was awkward and affected, so their Acclamations were forc'd and unnatural. He had not one engaging Quality; he was haughty, sullen, severe, tenacious of his Money, and careless of his Promises. But the Addressers set up an Idol, which they worship'd as the Priests of Baal did their God, to his Confusion, and their own Destruction. The Duke of York staid about a Fortnight only in Scotland, and then return'd by Sea to England with his Dutchess and the Princess Anne, his second Daughter. Mr. Archdeacon waits upon him in all Progresses with as much Joy and Ceremony, as if he had been the Protector of the Protestant Religion, and the Champion of English Liberty; tho' he allows that he was the cause of future Severities and Irregularities, and would have put the King still upon

A. D. 1682. more of them, which once extorted this Rebuke from him; Brother, I am resolv'd never to travel again, you may do so, if you please: and so he did, and never more saw his injur'd Country.

Dissenters severely handed.

Dr. Calamy,
p. 356.

It was now that the drunken Justices, and their Band-Dogs the Informers were let loose upon Protestant Dissenters. The King, who pretended to be desirous to keep his sacred Word, given them at Breda for Liberty of Conscience, now suffer'd his Brother to press the most rigorous Execution of the new Laws, and of the Statute 35 Eliz. against them, in defiance of the Votes of Parliament in their favour: Nay, several zealous Protestants, who had been most active against the Papists, were try'd by mercenary Judges, with pack'd Juries, upon Irish Evidence. Orders and Directions were sent from the King and Council-Board to suppress all Meetings of Protestant Dissenters, which was very officiously forwarded by the Middlesex Justices at Hickes's Hall, by the Justices in Southwark, and some Aldermen of the City; such as Pritchard, Raymond, Sheldon, Davies, &c. Many Ministers were imprison'd, and they and their Hearers impoverish'd by exorbitant Fines. The Reverend and Learned Mr. Baxter was hal'd out of his Bed, sick as he was, and had been thrown into Jail upon the Corporation-Act, besides a Warrant against him for 195 Pounds, had not that eminent Physician Dr. Thomas Cox accidentally come by; and seeing him in the hands of Ruffians, forc'd him into his House again, while he went to five Justices of the Peace and took his Oath, that Mr. Baxter could not go to Prison, without danger of Death. However, the Justices would not favour him, till they had consulted the King, who consented that his Imprisonment should for that time be forborn, that he might die at home. Mr. Baxter had been one of his first Chaplains after his Restoration, in which he was more instrumental than perhaps every one of the Bishops, who so insulted him at the Savoy Conference. The Ruffians executed their Warrant, distrain'd the Books and Goods in the House, tho' he made it appear they were none of his, and they sold even the Bed which he lay sick upon. All which was done without his having the least notice of any Accusation, or receiving any Summons to appear and answer for himself, or ever seeing the Justices or Accusers. He was afterwards in constant danger of new Seizures, and at last was forc'd to leave his House, and retire into private Lodgings. Dr. Annesley and several other Divines had their Goods distrain'd for latent Convictions. Others were imprison'd upon the Corporation Act, while others were worry'd in the Spiritual Courts. Warrants were sign'd for Distresses in one Parish only to the Value of 1400 Pounds, and one of them for 500 Pounds. The Reverend Mr. Vincent was try'd at Surrey Sessions, upon the 35th of Eliz. and cast. Two hundred Warrants were issu'd out for Distresses upon Uxbridge and the Neighbourhood. The pious and eminent Dr. Bates, one of the most learned and polite Writers of the Age, was distrain'd upon. The Jayls all over England were fill'd with the same sort of Offenders for Conscience sake only. Here you might see a lewd Herd of Informers, probably with a roaring Justice at their Head, haling away religious conscientious Persons, Women as well as Men, to the common Prison. There another Band of them loaden with the Plunder of their Houses and Barns, and driving away their Cattle for not coming to Church, and for going to a Protestant Meeting. I have been an Eye-Witness of these impious and cruel Practices, and the Impression is still too strong upon my Mind to tell even this little with Patience. These are A. D. 1682. this King's Successes, these his Triumphs, which produce such Exultation in the Pulpit and out of it, in Sermons and Addresses; the latter were stuff'd with most hearty and humble Thanks for securing a Popish Successor to reign over our Protestant Church, for persecuting and ruining our dissenting Brethren, for establishing Principles of Tyranny and Slavery, if Tyrants and Slaves are capable of Principles; and now, says Echard, his Majesty rul'd with more Independency. He means nothing, if he does not mean with less Regard to that Religion, and those Laws which he had sworn to defend. One cannot question but when the Duke of York came last from Scotland, the Resolution was taken, not only to harass, oppress and ruin Protestant Dissenters, but also to strike such Terror into Protestant Churchmen, as should induce them to give up all their Rights and Privileges, for fear of giving Offence to the two Popish Brothers, the King and the Duke of York; but as that could not be done while there were honest Sheriffs, those Princes resolv'd at any rate to get others, such as would not stick at any Butchery, which they should be put upon; accordingly they pitch'd on Dudley North, of whom they were sure, and ventur'd to name Mr. Box, of whom they were not sure. These Box and two Citizens they caus'd to be put up for Sheriffs North of London and Middlesex, in opposition to two Sheriffs worthy and wealthy Merchants, Mr. Papillon and Mr. Dubois. Some time before the Election Sir John Moor drank to North at the Bridge-House Feast, and by drinking to him, chose him Sheriff according to ancient Custom, says the honest Echard; Historian. Bishop Burnet on the contrary tells us, "The Right was to be determin'd by the Charter, which granted the Election of the Sheriffs to the Citizens of London; and whatever Customs had crept in among them, the Right still lay where the Charter had lodg'd it, among the Citizens; but the Court was resolv'd to carry this Point: The Common Hall alledg'd, that the Right of chusing both Sheriffs was in them; and the old Sheriffs put it according to custom to a Poll, and it was visible that the much greater Number was against the Lord Mayor." Now tho' there was no manner of occasion for unfair Dealing, by those that had a visible Majority; yet, says Echard, several Names of those who poll'd for North and Box were refus'd to be enter'd, and several Names of those that poll'd on the other side were enter'd, tho' the Persons were not present. The Fallshood of this is not to be conceiv'd, but by imagining Contraries; and this Violence, continues he, occasion'd the Mayor's adjourning the Court by Proclamation three Days to the 27th of June, which he had no Right to do; for as the Bishop of Sarum tells us, "The Sheriffs were always understood to be the Officers of that Court, so the adjourning it belong'd to them; yet the Mayor adjourn'd the Court, which the Sheriffs said he had no Power to do, and so went on with their Poll." The Reader will observe that the Poll is carry'd on regularly, and without Disturbance from any body but the Mayor. Echard's Representation is directly contrary, the Lord Mayor was thrown down upon his Knees, and in great danger. My Lord of Sarum assures us, there was no Disorder in the whole Progress of the Matter. When I charge the Archdeacon with Falsity, is there not a shorter Term for it in our Language? but the Purity and Delicacy of History will not admit of it. The King, who had nothing at all to do in this Affair, takes it upon himself, and sends for the Lord Mayor, Court of Aldermen and Sheriffs. I have fully related

A. D. 1682. related the Matter, and Echard says, the Matter being fully examin'd by King and Council, the two Sheriffs were committed to the Tower, by a Warrant sign'd by twenty-four Privy Counsellors. Why did he not name them? why did he not let Posterity know who were the Men that so basely betray'd their Country, by sacrificing the Rights and Privileges of its great and renown'd Metropolis, to the Resentment of two ill-advised Princes, Enemies to our Religion and Liberty. The Council also order'd a Prosecution against Mr. Pilkington and Mr. Shute, the Sheriffs, and Alderman Cornish, for the late enormous Riot. The Privy Councils at Moscow and Morocco did not countenance Tyranny more daringly than those twenty-four Counsellors did. There was no Riot at all, 'twas the Sheriffs Right to adjourn the Court: The Bishop of Salisbury tells us, the Mayor's Party carried themselves with great Insolence, the Sheriffs with more Temper than could be expected from so great a Body, who thought their Rights invaded. Yet Mr. Archdeacon takes great Comfort in the illegal Imprisonment of those two worthy Magistrates, and goes on with the Story as fairly as he began it. The Sheriffs being bail'd out of the Tower, met at the Common Hall the fifth of July, the Lord Mayor adjourn'd it to the seventh of July, and then further to the fourteenth of July, which, as we have seen, he had no Right to do: However the King interpos'd again, and sent an Order of Council to the Lord Mayor, to stand by antient Customs, meaning the Mayor's chusing the Sheriff by giving him a Cup of Sack: This Order being a Violation of their Charter, the Citizens after it was read, cry'd, read the Statute of 16 Car. I. Chap. x. against such Orders of Council, which yet Mr. Archdeacon informs us was impertinent; and indeed Law was at this time Impertinence. So the Lord Mayor, continues he, declar'd Mr. North duely elected, and that he would poll for the other three; for in obedience to the illegal Order of Council, he stood by North, as having drunk to him. North was so hated on his own, and his Brother's account, that unless the Mayor could chuse him by a Bumper, he was never like to be a Sheriff of London; but those four and twenty Counsellors could not have pitch'd upon a Tool fitter for their cruel Purposes, and the Mayor stood to it that he was fairly chosen by himself, but poll'd again for Box, as the two Sheriffs did for Papillon and Dubois, and Mr. Echard affirms Box was duely elected by a Majority of Votes in the Mayor's Book, upon which, the good Man declar'd North and Box Sheriffs. Bishop Burnet's Account is again contrary, The Mayor resolv'd to take another Poll, to which none should be admitted, but those who were contented to vote only for one, and to approve his Nomination for the other; and it was resolv'd that his Poll should be that by which the Business should be settled; and tho' the Sheriffs Poll exceeded his by many Hundreds, yet Order was given to return those on the Mayor's Poll, and that they should be sworn. Mr. Box was too honest a Man to countenance such Injustice and Violence, and refus'd to stand with North, who Sir John Hawles says, was impos'd on the City, and for that Reason Box refus'd to join with him; but they afterwards found out a sort of a Woodmonger, or Timber-Man in Southwark, Peter Rich, who made no scruple of joining with North, or any one the Court pleas'd to couple him with. Now Echard again, as false as before, The Lord Mayor call'd a Common Hall on the 19th of September, and propos'd the electing another Sheriff in the room of Mr. Box; but the Party of the old Sheriffs insisted on their first Election, as they had good reason to do, it being legal and peaceable. Mr. Archdeacon affirms, The Lord Mayor being steady and resolute went on in the Election, and by the Majority of his Party Peter Rich Esq; was chosen; and to shew us how considerable a Person he was, he informs us he was a Lieutenant-Colonel of the Trained Bands. The Truth is, there was no Election at all. Moor the Mayor, without any Proclamation made as usual, as we are told by Bishop Burnet, took the Vote of one in a Corner near him, who nam'd Rich, which was applauded by about thirty more; upon this it was said that Rich was chosen without any Contradiction, and so North and Rich were return'd and sworn. Echard again, Whereupon the Lord Mayor return'd to his gally de-House in Triumph, and Heraclitus totally laid down his satirical Pen after 18 Months use of it in a sort of Triumph, tho' there hardly was ever a more wretched Scribler, and his Satyr was no better, either for Language or Wit, than you may every day hear from the Fishery at Billingsgate. I could very easily prove this, but I shall never be able to bring myself to make a Critique on the Wit and Humour of a Faction, who were such Fools as to part with their Religion and Liberties for a few good Looks and good Words from the King and his Brother, or who rather, like Esau, were selling their Birth-right for a Mess of Pottage. Moor had not yet done all the Business the Court had cut out for him, Apostates and Renegades never think they can do enough to convince the World of their Apostacy, and Moor undertook to give them a Mayor as well as two Sheriffs, and in this Contest Mr. Archdeacon is no fairer than in the other: The Whig Party muster'd all their Strength to chuse a Lord Mayor; sure it is, the Tory Party muster'd a great deal more than their Strength. The Tories put up Sir William Pritchard, a Man of a mean Trade and Character, otherwise than as he was an Alderman, and very much bigotted to what Sir George Jefferies, and Sir Dudley North call'd the Church. The Whigs were for Sir Thomas Gould, or Alderman Cornish. Mr. Echard is pleas'd to confess that these two had the Majority at the first Appearance; but upon a long Scrutiny, and thorough Examination, says he, it was found that a great Number had appear'd for them, who were not legally intitled to Voices. What follows has a pretty deal of Stupidity in it, for he casts up the Voices himself.

Sir William Pritchard 2138
Sir Thomas Gould 2124

So that his great Number is by his own Account reduced to 14, but even that too is shamefully false. My Lord of Sarum, "The Poll was clos'd when the Court thought they had the Majority; but upon casting it up, it appear'd they had lost it, so they fell to canvass it, and they made such Exceptions to those on the other side, that they discounted as many Voices as gave them the Majority. This was also manag'd in so gross a manner, which Echard calls a thorough Examination, that it was visible the Court was resolv'd to have the Government of the City in their own Hands; but because they would not be at this Trouble, nor run this Hazard every Year, it was resolv'd that the Charter of the City must either be given up, or be adjudg'd to the King". Mr. Echard is insensible of these tyrannical Proceedings, and of the Designs the Court was carrying on by 'em, and with great Coldness and Indifference only tells us, a Quo Warranto was determin'd to issue against the City of London.

A. D.
1682.

The Lord Mayor and the two Sheriffs being entirely to the good Liking of the Popish Faction, and the Court sure of Juries, his Royal Highness the Duke of York presents himself first on this terrible Stage, and brings an Action of Scandalum Magnatum against Alderman Pilking-ton for Words spoken by him, as if he had said the Duke fir'd London. Tulse and Hooker, two Aldermen, fully prov'd the Words, if you will believe Mr. Echard; but he conceals the Evidence of Sir Patience Ward, who was by when it was pretended the Words were said, and depos'd, that to the best of his Remembrance Pilking-ton said not those Words, for which, because the Jury found Pilking-ton guilty, they try'd Ward for Perjury, and such another Jury convicting him of it, the Court intended to have put the late Lord Mayor in the Pillory had he not gone out of the way. Sawyer, the Attorney General, tho' as Bishop Burnet says he was a dull Man, and truly there were the dullest Tools then set to work that ever scandaliz'd a Government, was as active as his Dulness would let him be in these Prosecutions, and in those also that follow'd, which let out the noblest Blood in the Nation. Alderman Pilking-ton had refus'd to go to Whitehall with Moor and Pritchard, and Tulse and Hooker, and the rest of them that waited on the Duke with some nauseous Compliments, at his Return from Scotland, and he being now oblig'd to render himself a Prisoner in Discharge of his Bail, North got himself to be return'd Alderman of his Ward. The pack'd Jury, contrary to the Salvo Contentemento in Magna Charta, gave the Duke of York 100,000*l.* Damages. The pleasurable Part of the History is, that the Duke liv'd long enough to account for these things, and to taste of that Misery which he brought upon others.

Alderman Pilking-ton fin'd against Law.

The Earl of Shaftesbury could not but foresee that such Doings about Sheriffs were to prepare for the Tragedies that the Court were bent upon acting, so he prudently remov'd to Holland, and resided at Amsterdam, but did not long survive his Removal, nor was it long before the sage Lord Mayor Pritchard put out an Order against burning the Pope, and making Bonfires on Queen Elizabeth's Day. A Whig News-Paper, call'd the Weekly Intelligence was prohibited, and all Hawkers silenc'd. Ill Governments, like Hearknurs, never hear Good of themselves, and 'tis no wonder they are for stopping People's Mouths by all the ways they can think of, by Executions, Prohibitions, by Cruelty, Oppression and Terror. The Foreign News admits of no History. The Crown of England was in a degree of Contempt abroad not to be remember'd without Indignation, while at home it was terrible to all true Englishmen. However there were two new Ambassadors this Year from beyond Sea, one from the King of Fez, the other from the King of Bantam, and surely the Subjects of those two Monarchs were not at that time less happy than the Subjects of the King of Britain.

Unjust Elections of Common Council-Men.

At the latter End of the Year the Popish Cabal employ'd all their Instruments; the illegal Lord Mayor, and the illegal Sheriffs, the Aldermen of that Faction, and others in the City, to get a Common Council of no more Honour than the Mayor and his Sheriffs. Bishop Burnet informs us, much Injustice was complain'd of in many Wards of the City, both in the Poll, and in the Returns. In order to the disabling of Dissenters from voting, the Bishop and Clergy were press'd by the Court to prosecute them in the Church Courts, that so they might excommunicate them, which some corrupt Lawyers thought would render them incapable to vote, tho' other Lawyers were very positively of another Opinion: However this Point was not carry'd, and the King was displeas'd; the Majority of the new Common-Council being as averse to the Surrender of their Charter as the last was. My Lord Bishop charges Sir Lionel Jenkins with indirect Practices in these Transactions, tho' his Capacity did not enable him to do as much Mischief as he wou'd. His Lordship adds, that tho' he understood nothing, yet he had so much credit with the High Church Party, that he was of great use to the King and the Duke.

A. D.
1682.

When we liv'd in the Reigns after the Revolution, and saw the Streams of Honour running pure from the Fountain, when Patriots were prefer'd to high Stations and Titles, and the Favourites of the Kings and Queens were Favourites of the People, 'twas with wonderful Delight that they heard of Honours and Promotions; but I question whether the Reader's Appetite will be so keen for the following Paragraph, copy'd from two Reverend Historians: As thus, out of Echard, "With a great Flood of distinguishing Favours, cheap and acceptable, at the beginning of December his Majesty was pleas'd to grant

"To Thomas Lord Windsor, Governor of the Town and Garrison of Kingston upon Hull, the Name and Stile of Earl of Plymouth."

"To Sir Thomas Thynne, the Name and Stile of Baron Thynne of Warmister, and Viscount Weymouth."

"To Col. George Legg, the Name and Stile of Baron of Dartmouth."

The Lord Townshend was created Viscount Townshend; and Col. John Churchill, Lord Churchill of Aymouth in Scotland. The two last Names illustrious in our late Histories.

The Lord Norreys was made Earl of Abington; Sir John Bennet, Lord Ossulston; Comiers Lord Darcy, Earl of Holderness; James Duke of Ormond in Ireland, a Duke of England; the Duke of Hamilton, a Knight of the Garter; the Earl of Arundel, Governor of Windsor-Castle.

Edward Viscount Campden was created Earl of Gainsborough; George Earl of Hallifax, Marquis of Hallifax; and the Earl of Sunderland was restor'd to the Office of Secretary of State; Lord Conway was the other Secretary, as his Father had been before him, and so unfit for the Station, that King James was wont to say, he had a Secretary who could not write; nor had there since been an unsitter Person in that high Station, unless that dull one Sir Lionel Jenkins, Conway or this Lord Conway, his Son, who was so ignorant, that his Province being the North, when one of the Foreign Ministers talk'd to him of the Circles of Germany, it amaz'd him, he could not imagine what Circles had to do with Affairs of State. But he was a good Churchman, in the reverend Historian's Acceptation of the Word; and so also was Laurence Hyde, now Earl of Rocheſter, whose Probity may be guess'd Rocheſter at, by this Instance out of Bishop Burnet: "Lord Hallifax and Lord Hyde fell to be in an open War, and were both much hated, at which I am not at all surpris'd; Men can never be belov'd by the Country whose Interest they betray, by promoting Slavery and Persecution." Lord Hallifax charg'd Hyde of Bribery, He that will betray the Country, will surely betray the King, when he can get by it: "For having farm'd a Branch of the Revenue much lower than had been proffer'd for it, Lord Hallifax acquainted the King first with it, and he desir'd Lord Rocheſter himself to

"ex-

A. D. 1682. "examine into it, he being inclin'd to think it rather an Abuse put upon him, than Corruption in himself; but he saw Lord Rochester was cold in the Matter, and, instead of prosecuting any for it, protected all concern'd in it." Lord Halifax laid the Complaint before the King in Council; and, to convince the King how ill a Bargain he had made, the Complainers offer'd, if he would break it, to give him 40000 Pounds more than he was to have for it from the Farmers. The Bishop says again, Rochester was much hated, but the Dutcheſs of Portsmouth protected him, and he protected the High Church Party. He afterwards wrote a Prefatory Dedication to Clarendon's History, so renown'd for its Veracity and Impartiality 1683.

A. D. 1683. About the beginning of this Year, Sir Francis North was made Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal, on the Death of the Earl of Nottingham, of whose Capacity Bishop Burnet seems to have had as mean an Opinion as of North's Honesty. "North had not the Virtues of his Predecessor, but he had Parts far beyond him." They "were turn'd to Craft." A rare Man to make a Lord-Keeper! "So that whereas the former seem'd to mean well, even when he did ill; this North was believ'd to mean ill, even when he did well." He had a deep hand in the Murder of Colledge; and now the sacred Scale of Justice is put into it, and how he held it we may conjecture from this Instance. Mr. Robert Mayor of Oxford, a pious Churchman, who had devoted his Estate to charitable Uses, gave, by his last Will, 600*l.* to be distributed by Mr. Baxter to sixty poor ejected Ministers, adding, That he did it not because they were Non-conformists but because many such were pious and poor. The mercenary Sawyer Attorney-General sued for it in the Chancery, and North the Keeper gave it all to the King. It was paid into Chancery by North's Order, and it lay there till King William so happily ascended the Throne, when the Commissioners of the Great Seal restor'd it to the Use for which it was intended by the Deceas'd; and Mr. Baxter dispos'd of it accordingly. The Baseness and Wickedness of this Attempt of Sawyer's are not to be parallel'd in Christian History.

Mr. Mayor's Will defeated.

Cal. 361.

A Persecution.

The poor persecuted Dissenters were every where flying from, or suffering under the Rage of their Persecutors. 'Twas bad enough in London, but worse still in the Country, where the most brutal Wretches were made Justices and Constables, purposely to carry on that wicked Work, which was the main Business of the Spiritual Courts, still the Detestation of all sober People. Many who were taken at Protestant Meetings, were convicted as Rioters, and fin'd 10 Pounds apiece, and some religious young Men and young Women were sent to Bridewell, to beat Hemp with Whores and Thieves. And now, says Echard, the State of the Nation seem'd to have been in a more quiet and calm Condition than ever since the breaking out of the Popish Plot. The Whig Party being forc'd to give way to the Tory more apparently than for several Years before, the Struggles and Contrivances of the declining Party were either more feeble or more clandestine; insinuating the damnable Sham-Plots that the Court were inventing to destroy the Nonconformists. The Duke of Monmouth and his Party were entering into secret and desperate Methods; he will have his Share of the innocent and noble Blood that is about to be spilt. The Duke of Monmouth was, it is true, now very popular, he had the Eyes and Hearts of all good Protestants and good Englishmen; but he had not Genius enough to make the best Use of them. Mr. Archdeacon tells us, that his Race-Horse winning the Prize in France, added to his Fame, as it did to Mr. Bernard Howard's, that his Coach was permitted to come within the Louvre; of so great Importance are his Incidents, when he is not abusing Protestant Dissenters, or printing nonsensical Addresses, such as that from the Middle-Temple, deliver'd by two Knights, as poor as ever were the old Knights Templers; Sir Thomas Montgomery, who went afterwards to Barbadoes, and Sir Humphry Mackworth, who was afterwards branded for a Cheat by a Vote of the House of Commons. The King also made a Knight of Dudley North; and the Archdeacon tells us, the King dubb'd him in gratitude to the City, because Sir John Moor was thank'd for his good Administration in imposing North on them as a Sheriff by a shameful Trick, as Sir John Hawles calls it.

A. D. 1683.

The King having made the Earls of Huntington and Peterborough Privy-Counsellors, went to Newmarket, March the 16th, and six days after a terrible Fire suddenly broke out, which consum'd about half of the Town. His Majesty remov'd his Residence to another House, but the Wind pursu'd him thither, conducted, says Echard, by an invisible Power, and, in a moment, it became as untenantable as the other, which oblig'd the King and Court to return to London sooner than they intended; and the Historian, with a foul Mouth and false Heart, adds, The providential Fire, thus do they blaspheme in their Invectives, defeated and prevented a black House Conspiracy form'd against him and his Brother. Plot. Dr. Welwood writes of that and the other Sham-Plots about this time: "The Shatter'd Remains of English Liberty were then attack'd on every side, and some of the noblest Blood in the Nation was offer'd up a Sacrifice to the Manes of Popish Martyrs; Swearing came into fashion, and an Evidence-Office was erected in Whitehall. But whereas the Witnesses for the Popish Plot were brow-beaten and discourag'd, those for the Protestant Plot were highly encouraged; and, instead of Judges and Juries that might boggle at half Evidence, as it fell out in the Prosecution of the former, Care was taken in this to pick out such as should stick at nothing to serve a Turn." Mr. Coke explains this hellish Imposture still further, "The Court set three Plots on foot; The Rye-Plot, to kill the King and the Duke as they came from Newmarket. A Plot to seize the Guards; and the Blackheath Plot. In all these Plots, for ought I can find, the Fox is the Finder. My Lord Howard and Rumsey in that of the Guards; Lee and Goodenough in that of Blackheath; Keeling and West in that of Rye-House; Lee was set to trap Rouse and Barker in the Blackheath Plot; Rumbald, at whose House it is said the Rye-House Plot was to be acted, upon his Death deny'd he ever knew of any." And tho' Rumbald was a Protestant, and probably a Republican, his dying Words will certainly have more weight with the Reader than Mr. Echard's. Some time after the King's Return to London, Mr. Broom the Coroner arrested the Lord Mayor Pritchard, North the pretended Sheriff, and some persecuting Aldermen, and carry'd them Prisoners to Skinners-Hall, in an Action upon the Case, at the Suit of Mr. Papillon and Mr. Dubois, the legal Sheriffs of the City. But the Faction got one Fletcher, a Sergeant of the Poultry Compter, to arrest Broom in an Action of 400 Pounds Debt upon Bond, and to carry him to Prison; upon which, Pritchard,

The Common Council very formally disclaim'd the Mayor's Arrest, because the Writ ran in the Name of the Citizens of London. They also turn'd Mr. Broom out of his Place. The Court took quick Vengeance against the Party that had thus insulted their best Friends, and under pretence of a Riot, committed by the most sober Citizens of London, which Riot was only a peaceable Poll for their Sheriffs, they caus'd an Information to be exhibited against

Who were fin'd in the above mention'd Sums, May the 8th. Echard vows and protests that the Lord Mayor's Right to adjourn the Common Hall, was fully prov'd; tho' my Lord of Sarum affirms the adjourning the Common Hall always belong'd to the Sheriffs; and that Riot was made out to the full, tho' his Lordship asserts, There was no Disorder in the whole Progress of the Matter. Several of the injur'd Gentlemen were Protestant Dissenters, which probably he thinks sufficient for him to injure them again in his History. And now, continues he, the City appear'd more loyal and obsequious. Loyalty to good Kings and Queens, such as King William, Queen Mary, Queen Anne, King George, and his present Majesty, is at once a Duty and a Pleasure. But what is meant by Loyalty to such Kings as Charles and James the Second, while they were breaking down all the Barriers of our Religion and Liberty? Do not they understand a tame Submission to the Yoke of Slavery, Spiritual and Temporal, under which the miserable People of England now heavily groan'd?

The reverend Historian informs us, that the Scaffolds in Westminster-Hall were now a ken down, and a Statue of King Charles I. now set up at the Royal Exchange, with an Inscription, which begins with a Quibble, Eikon Basilike. But if the Statue was no more a Picture of the King than Eikon Basilike, the Book written by Dr. Gauden was his Portraiture, that Nich is the worst fill'd of any in the Exchange.

Mr. Acherley informs us, that the Duke of Tork, in pursuance of the Scheme laid down by the Popish Cabal, got a Quo Warranto brought against the City of London, whereby the King requir'd them to shew by what Right they claim'd to be a Corporation. The Breaches which the Attorney-General Sawyer, that bot, dull Man, as Bishop Burnet calls him, assign'd as Causes to forfeit their Being as a Corporation were, that they had made an Address to the King for the Sitting of the Parliament; and that they had rais'd the Rents of their Wharfs and Ware-houses, which they had themselves built. Had there been any Shame in Sawyer's or the Solicitor-General's Faces, they could not have held up their Heads while such Nonsense was reading, as a pretence to take away the Rights and Privileges of that Capital A. D. of the British Empire, and the great Empo- 1682.

rium of the World. I shall not enter into the Detail of the Merits of the Cause. Sawyer and Finch pleaded as well as they could against those very learned and eminent Lawyers Pollexfen and Treby, afterwards Lord Chief Justices of the King's-Bench and Common-Pleas. There needs but a small Portion of Knowledge to satisfy one, that Englishmen may very lawfully petition the King for the Sitting of Parliaments; and that People may set what Rent they please on their Lands and Tenements. Sawyer's first Argument was false in fact, according to Mr. Acherley, That the City had impos'd Taxes by By-Laws; whereas the By-Law was not to impose new Taxes, but to reduce their antient and uncertain Tolls to a reasonable Certainty. And when the particular Breaches came to be argu'd upon, Sawyer and Finch, according to Mr. Acherley, seem'd to fail; and Sir George Treby and Mr. Pollexfen prov'd, That the Tolls in the Markets for Stallage and other Conveniences, provided at the City's Charges, were due by Law. The judicious Lawyer observes, "It appear'd afterwards that this pretence of a breach of Trust to make a Forfeiture was merely specious; for, after the King had obtain'd Judgment against the City, his Majesty himself, by those commission'd under him, exacted and collected the same Rates for the Tolls, which the City had by their Act of Common-Council ascertain'd. When the Breach, touching the City's Petition, came to be argu'd, the King's Counsel seem'd to lay the whole Stress upon Clamour only, without any real Substance." The Counsel for the City prov'd, That the Constitution and the Law of the Land had given Subjects a Right of petitioning, and of Access to the supreme Governor, to represent to him their Grievances, which were the Dangers arising from the Popish Plot. The Facts recited in the Petition were unquestionably true, and even confess'd by the King's Counsel. The Arguments for the City were, by Standersby, deem'd a sufficient Defence, but no Defence would be heard; and the Judges, without giving Reasons, gave a Capital Judgment, That the City's Franchise should be seiz'd into the King's hand. This Judgment was before agreed on, and it was admitted by all Sides to be the same thing as to dissolve them. Accordingly the King acted, as if their Being was extinguish'd, for he nominated and appointed the Mayor, Sheriffs and Aldermen. But when the Rage and Oppression of these Times were remov'd, continues the learned Lawyer, this unjust Seizure of the Charter was by Act of Parliament condemn'd as an illegal Proceeding, and made void, and consequently Injustice, Cruelty and Folly were charg'd upon the Prosecution. The Prosecutors were Sawyer and Finch, and especially upon that enormous Breach of the Constitution and the Law of the Land, whereby the Right of Petitioning was infring'd, and the Essence of the Legislature attempted. The Mayor, the Sheriffs, Tulse and such Aldermen, with some of the Common-Council, made a slavish Submission to this tyrannical Judgment. And Echard, who has told this Story with much Satisfaction, tells us, The City was restor'd upon it; the King only reserving to himself the Approbation of the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, Recorder, Common Sergeant, Town Clerk, Coroner, Steward of Southwark, &c. The Citizens were now so corrupted by Court-Flattery, or intimidated by Court-Cruelty, that when it was put to the Vote in Common-Council to agree or not agree to the above bove mention'd Submission, it was carry'd in the Affirmative by a small Majority. Having dispatch'd this Tale, he goes upon another every whit as unjust, but more bloody and terrible; for having secur'd Judges, Sheriffs and Juries, they bring their Hangman upon the Stage, and begin the Carnage, as Mr. Acherley very justly terms it. Yet Eckard, with Front erect, and Heart harden'd against all Remorse and Compassion for his bleeding Country, and her bleeding Patriots, opens the dreadful Scene with Applause, and introduces those bloody Butcheries as solemnly, as if that innocent Blood, which cry'd long and aloud for Vengeance, and was at last aveng'd, had only been a Peace-offering to free and impartial Justice. He is so foolish as to own he takes his Information from what the Government printed of it: that is, he took the Vindication of the following Murders from the Murtherers themselves. He adds, and from the Confession of the Sufferers. False to a Prodigy! For Rumbald declar'd at his death, that he never knew or heard of any Design to kill the King; nor was there the least step taken towards that Part of the Plot which was call'd Presbyterian, as an Instance of the King's Gratitude to those that restor'd him, who were all Presbyterians, however they were as unlucky in this Sham-Plot, as in Dangerfield's, and pick'd out most of their Plotters among Churchmen; as the Duke of Monmouth, Earl of Shaftesbury, Earl of Essex, Lord Russel, Sir Thomas Armstrong, Lord Howard, &c.

A. D.

Ryehouse Sham-Plot.

The Archdeacon copies the Romanes written by Sprat, who wrote a tedious fulsome Panegyric upon Cromwel, as did also South, but South's Conscience could not go Sprat's Lengths; for when King Charles II. desir'd him to write the Fable of the Ryehouse-Plot, which his Majesty call'd a History, South, after he had read all the Papers the King had to shew him, refus'd the Work, saying, Those Papers were all Copies, and no legal Proof, and unless his Majesty had better Evidence, he would not meddle with it, as Dr. Prideaux late Dean of Norwich told a Gentleman of that City, from whom I had it. Sprat however undertook it, Evidence or no Evidence, and Eckard has copied him in all the Variety of Untruths, from one end of the pretended Narrative to the other. And as in Dangerfield's Plot, the Roll of Generals and Officers was the most considerable Part, so here too is a Roll produc'd.

Who, says the Reverend Historian, had undertaken to reform the Church and State: a stupid Jest of his, as if John Rouse and the Lord Russel, or William Hone and the Earl of Essex, could have enter'd into League for carrying on such a wild Business. He would have us believe that the State, involv'd in the Confusion and Guilt of so many Acts of Tyranny and Injustice, needed no Reform; and what a Compliment then has he made the Church by coupling them thus together? I do not doubt but those Acts of Injustice and Tyranny occasion'd much warm Discourse, and perhaps some crude Schemes of Ways and Means to preserve the Protestant Religion and English Liberty against the Invasions of the King and his Brother: such as the keeping up a publick Spirit, and securing an Interest, if the King should find himself under a Necessity of calling a Parliament: But that an Assassination and an Insurrection were determin'd by the Lords, Gentlemen, and others before-mention'd in concert, is as incredible as that the Pretender owes his Birth to a Bribe, which the Dutchess of Modena gave our Lady of Loretto.

A. D.

I am apt to believe, that the Bishop of Salisbury himself makes the most of this Plot in his Account of it; and it is laid thick upon the Earl of Shaftesbury, for whom his Lordship seems to have no good liking.

"The Lord Shaftesbury had been making use of the Heat the City was in, during the Contest about the Sheriffs, and thought they might have created great Disturbance; and he believ'd the first appearance of the least Disorder, would have prevail'd on the King to yield every thing. The Duke of Monmouth, who understood what a Rabble was, and what Troops were, look'd on this as a mad exposing of themselves."

See Eckard: The Duke of Monmouth promis'd to rise in some remote County, and give a Diversion to the King's Troops.

The Bishop again: "The Earl of Essex and the Lord Russel were of the Duke of Monmouth's Mind; so Lord Shaftesbury seeing they could not be engag'd into Action, flew out against them." But their Friends made up the matter as well as they could; and to perfect the Reconciliation, the Duke of Monmouth consented to meet Lord Shaftesbury at Mr. Shepherd's the Merchant's House in Abchurch-Lane, now well known by the Name of Pontack's. The Night before this Appointment, Lord Russel came to Town on the account of his Uncle's Illness. Eckard says, 'twas on account of the rising. The Duke of Monmouth went to Lord Russel and told him of that Appointment, desiring he would go thither with him; to which his Lordship consented, the rather because he intended to taste some of that Merchant's Wine. At night they went with Lord Grey and Sir Thomas Armstrong. When they came, they found none there but Rumsey and Ferguson, two of Lord Shaftesbury's Tools, whom he employ'd. The Marquis of Winchester is not nam'd in the Bishop's History, nor in Eckard's and the common Writers: But he came to Shepherd's House, and looking thro' the Key-hole, saw Rumsey there, so he went away again, and would not be seen with him. The Duke of Monmouth and the other Lords seeing no better Company than Ferguson and Rumsey, resolv'd to go back immediately. But Lord Russel call'd for a Taste of the Wines, and while they were bringing it up to him, Rumsey and Armstrong fell into a Discourse of surprizing the Guards, as a thing practicable, not expedient, and much less agreed upon: For when Rumsey endeavour'd to shew how

P. 686.

A. D. 1683. how it might be done, Armstrong, who had commanded them, shew'd him his Mistakes. Bishop Burnet adds, This was no Consultation about what was to be done, but only about what might have been done. Lord Russel spoke nothing upon the Subject; but as soon as he had tasted his Wines, they went away. And here is the utmost Extent of the Presbyterian Plot: Which the Jesuit Orleans says is told by Bishop Sprat from authentick Memoirs; so that we find the Jesuit and the Archdeacon's Histories of it have the same Authority. I would enter into the Detail of Echard's History, if there had been the least show of Truth, or even Probability in any Part of it: For tho' it is very probable that some of the inferior Persons before-mention'd as Plotters, might at their Meetings have talk'd of Guards and Risings, and seizing old Rowley, to oblige him to turn off the Duke of York, and save the Nation that Trouble; yet that the treasonable Words Sprat, and Orleans and he speak of, as expressing a Design to kill the two Brothers, were so spoken, is incredible beyond any boyish Romance, as that Rumbald should bid Ferguson consecrate the Blunderbuss with which he was to shoot them. We will rise, tho' we have nothing to fight with but our Claws:

P. 679.

That the Lord Russel and the Earl of Essex were to rob the Goldsmiths Shops in Lombard-street; that to murder the King, was to keep the Commandments; that the killing him, was too good for the Papists to be concern'd in it; and that these sober Presbyterians, Independents and Baptists, as well as moderate and virtuous Churchmen, toasted Confusion to the King and his Brother over their Cups: With these absurd, barefac'd and devilish Falshoods are the History of this Plot amplify'd and decorated. And all things being in a readiness to begin the Carnage, the Persons intended for Sacrifice being in hold, and the illegal Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, and Aldermen having prepar'd the way for it by a monstrous Address, Captain Thomas Walcot was brought to trial July 12th, before the Chief Justice Saunders. Mr. Echard is not ashamed to name him, and other Judges: The Witnesses against him were Rumsley, Keeling, Bourne, and West. Among these, West swore, That Walcot ask'd him whether he would have a Commission under him, for he was to have a Regiment of Horse. Rumsley swore, That Walcot was to attack the Guards, while others attack'd the King at Ryehouse. Bourne depos'd, That Walcot propos'd to kill Keeling as well as the King, because he had discover'd them. Walcot in his Defence flatly deny'd every word of the Ryehouse-Plot. And tho' Echard tells us, that Jenkins had a Letter from Walcot, wherein he offer'd to make a further Discovery, Walcot alledg'd, that what he had promis'd to discover, he had only heard from Ferguson. He confess'd he had been told of a Design amongst several great Lords and Gentlemen, for asserting Liberties and Properties. The King's honest Counsel said, it was High-Treason to hear talk of a Design to assert Liberties and Properties; and so the Jury in a very short time brought him in guilty of High-Treason, he being one of the Persons resolv'd on before-hand, as Sir John Hawles observes.

Convicted.

Hone try'd.

The same Day was try'd William Hone, the Joiner. At this Tryal, Sir Nicholas Butler, the Anabaptist-Quack, made some time after a Privy-Counsellor, swore, Hone was the very Man who projected the taking off the King and Duke with Cross-Bows from Bow-Steeple, of which he had given the King Information. This is the same Story we have already told. Sir Robert Southwel went to Bow-Steeple to find out the Plotter, and did indeed find a Rule under a Carpenter's Great-Coat, which he thought had been a Blunderbuss; and groping for it under the Man's Coat, had like to have been taken up for a Pick-Pocket. And so the Case appear'd so plain, says Echard, that the Jury found him guilty of High-Treason, without going from the Bar.

A. D. 1683.

And convicted.

I must here pause a little, for the Remainder of this Day's bloody Work cannot but give one the Pain of a violent Struggle between Decency and Indignation. History rejects all intemperate Thoughts and Expressions; but how can one see one of the most noble, most virtuous, most innocent, and most belov'd Lords that ever liv'd, brought a Prisoner before Judges too infamous to be remember'd, but that Remembrance with Horror is part of the Punishment of their Guilt; and it is with this View that I name the wretched Accomplices in this Murder.

The whole Management of this Trial was with much Art, according to Echard; which is false, for the impious Prosecutors defy'd the very Forms of Law, and in the most daring Outrage against Justice, harangu'd and rail'd this Great, this Good Man to death. Sir John Hawles's Remarks on Lord Russel's Trial, prove him to be as much murder'd, as Sir Edmundbury Godfrey was: The Reasons and Proofs are as plain as Argument and Evidence can make a thing; but being of some length, I must refer to them, and repeat what that judicious Lawyer Mr. Acherley writes of it. "As to Lord Russel, the Treason charg'd on him was a Conspiracy to compass the death of the King; but the Proof of the Overt-Fact of that Treason was, That Lord Russel walk'd in a Room in Shepherd's House tasting Wine, when treasonable Discourses and Consultations pass'd at a Table in that Room between two other Men, Rumsley and Ferguson: But none of the Witnesses could say, That Lord Russel did by any Overt-Fact, either in speaking or consenting to, or approving, or abetting those Proceedings or Discourses, or so much as that he heard what pass'd, but only that he might hear. This Evidence might have been sufficient to prove Misprision of Treason, but not High-Treason; however to reach this Great Man's Blood, in revenge for his carrying up the Bill of Exclusion, the Prosecutors Sawyer and Finch confounded the very Species of Treasons, and all Distinctions

A. D. 1683. " between High-Treason and Misprision of Treason. And the Judges, who pretended to be of Counsel for the Prisoner in Matters of Law, did not inform the Jury of that Distinction; and so this Great Man was, by a PACK'D Jury, compos'd of Tradesmen, who had no Freeholds in London where this Lord was try'd, convicted, condemn'd by the Court, and by the King's Warrant executed." For which he will most certainly have his Reward, and so will all the perjurd Accomplices in this most horrid Murder. The King saw the virtuous and lovely Lady Russel weeping at his Feet, imploring but a short Reprieve of a few Weeks for her condemn'd Lord, with dry Eyes and a stony Heart, tho' she was the Daughter of the Earl of Southampton, the best Friend he ever had in his Life.

Earl of
murder'd.

We must not omit an Accident which happen'd at the Lord Russel's Trial, tho' I do not think the Jury was influenc'd by it, as is said by some sober Writers, as well as by Echard; which is, that News being brought to the Court that the Earl of Essex had cut his Throat in the Tower, the King's Counsel dwelt much upon it as a Proof of the Plot. I am satisfy'd the Judges and Jury were determin'd, and they matter'd not Proofs or Circumstances to reach this Great Man's Blood. And as to the Earl of Essex's cutting his own Throat, 'tis an Insult on People's Understandings to require belief of it, as the Archdeacon does, without any regard to his own. What Sir John Hawles says of the Murder of the Earl of Essex, is enough to satisfy any reasonable Man. " My Lord of Essex was kill'd, or to be kill'd that Morning. They were sensible the Evidence against my Lord Russel was very defective, and that Accident was to help it out, &c." Mr. Coke speaks of it thus: " Whether my Lord of Essex kill'd himself, or was to be kill'd, I must observe, the King and his Brother were both in the Tower when the Act was done; and immediately notice was sent to the Old-Baily, that in the worst sense use might be made of it by the King's Counsel Savoyer and Finch, against my Lord Russel. The Blaze of the Earl's having murder'd himself, had its design'd Effect upon my Lord Russel's Trial. The next Step was to satisfy the Nation the Earl murder'd himself; and to this purpose the Coroner's Inquest must necessarily sit, and give their Verdict: But so the Business was order'd, that before the Jury was impannell'd, the Earl's Body was taken out of the Closet, where 'twas pretended he murder'd himself, and strip'd of his Clothes, which were carry'd away, and the Closet wash'd; and when one of the Jury insist'd upon seeing my Lord's Clothes in which he died, the Coroner was sent for into another Room; and upon his return told the Jury, it was my Lord's Body, not his Clothes they were to sit upon. The Jury being inclin'd to make a stricter Inquisition than the Coroner would have them do, mov'd for an Adjournment, to give my Lord's Relations notice, that if they had any thing to say on my Lord's behalf, they might do it." 'Twas answer'd, The King has sent for the Inquisition, and will not rise from the Council-Board till it is brought. Let us add what the Bishop of Salisbury says of it, at least as much of it as agrees with a Relation of this Matter by a Gentleman who examin'd the Boy and Girl very strictly at the time when their Discovery was first talk'd of. He told me what the Bishop tells us: A Boy and a Girl did report, that they heard great Crying in the Earl's Lodgings, and that they saw a bloody Razor flung out at Window, which was taken up by a Woman that came out of the House where he was lodg'd. These Children reported this confidently that very Day when they went to their several Homes, they were both about ten or twelve Years old. The Boy went backward and forward in his Story, sometimes affirming it, and at other times denying it; but his Father had an Office in the Custom-House, so it was thought he prevail'd with him to deny it, but the Girl stood firmly to her Story. The Simplicity of the Children inclin'd many to believe it. And how could any one disbelieve it that heard them tell their Story after knowing to what wicked end the Murder was committed? We close this Tragedy with the Account Foreigners give of it, L'on apostrophe des Gens de neant pour etre temoins d'une Conspiration Protestante qu'on forgea, pour laquelle my Lord Russel, Col. Algernoon Sidney, & l'Alderman Cornish, furent executez, le Comte d'Essex fut egorge a la Tour, &c. They suborn'd some of the Scum of the People to be Witnesses of a Protestant Plot which they forg'd, and for which my Lord Russel, Col. Sidney, and Alderman Cornish were executed, and the Earl of Essex's Throat was cut. Echard, to clear the King and his Brother of this tragical Incident, says there gradually rose many scandalous Reports, which is false; for the Story of the Boy and Girl did not rise gradually. My Lord of Sarum assures us it rose immediately, that very Day, as soon as the Children got home. As to the noble Family's not prosecuting the Matter, 'tis plain they could hope for no Success against the Persons concern'd in the Murder; if they were not too high for Prosecution, they were sure to be protected, and the Family was not sure of Evidence sufficient to convict them, or of a Jury if they could have got Evidence; and to stir in such a Business without being able to go thro' with it, would have been fatal to those who already lay too much at the Mercy of a merciless Court.

The Lord Russel was with great difficulty persuaded to make a sort of Submission to the two Brothers, who were implacably set against him. He offer'd in case of Pardon to live abroad, and never more to concern himself in the Affairs of England; but they were both deaf as the Winds in a Tempest, and the Duke of York descended so low in his Revenge, as to desire that this innocent Lord might be executed before his own Door in Bloomsbury Square, an Insult the King himself could not consent to. The brave and generous Lord Cavendish offer'd two ways to rescue him, the one was to change Clothes with him, and to remain in Prison, while my Lord Russel made his Escape; the other was for a choice Party of Horse to attack the Guard, as the Coach pass'd by the Street turning into Smithfield; while another Party did the same on the Old Bailey Side, to take my Lord out, and mounting him on a Horse, make off with him; which it was suppos'd the People would have facilitated. But Lord Russel would hear of neither of them; nor by any means consent that his Friends should risk their own Lives to save his; but submitting himself patiently to his Fate, he prepar'd to receive the dreadful Stroke with the Meekness as well as the Innocence of a Lamb. Bishop Burnet attended him, after he was condemn'd, in Prison, and afterwards to the Scaffold, and gives this Account of his Christian and Heroical Behaviour. " The last Week of his Life he was shut up all the Mornings, as he himself desired; about Noon I came to him, and staid with him till Night, all the while he express'd a very Christian Temper, without Sharpness or Re"sentment, Vanity, or Affectation; his whole Behaviour look'd like a Triumph over Death. Upon some Occasions, as at Table, or when his Friends came to see him, he was decently cheerful; I was by him when the Sheriffs came to shew him the Warrant for his Execution; he read it with Indifference, and when they were gone he told me, it was not decent to be merry with such a Matter, otherwise he was near telling Rich (who, tho' he was now of the other side, yet had been a Member of the House of Commons, and had voted for the Exclusion) that they should never sit together in that House any more to vote for the Bill of Exclusion. The Day before his Death he fell a bleeding at the Nose. Upon that he said to me pleasantly, I shall not now let Blood to divert this, that will be done to-morrow. At Night it rain'd hard, and he said, such a Rain to-morrow will spoil a great Show, which is a dull thing in a rainy Day. He said the Sins of his Youth lay heavy upon him, but he hop'd God had forgiven them, for he was sure he had forsaken them, and for many Years he had walk'd before God with a sincere Heart. If in his publick Actings he had committed Errors, they were only the Errors of his Understanding, for he had no private Ends, nor ill Designs of his own in them. He was still of Opinion that the King was limited by Law, and that when he broke thro' those Limits, his Subjects might defend themselves, and restrain him; he thought a violent Death was a very desirable way of ending one's Life; it was only to be exposed, to be a little gazed at, and to suffer the Pain of one Minute, which he was confident was not equal to the Pain of drawing a Tooth. He said he felt none of those Transports that some good People felt, but he had a full Calm in his Mind, no Palpitation at Heart, nor trembling at the Thoughts of Death. He was much concern'd at the Cloud that seem'd to be now over his Country, but he hop'd his Death should do more Service than his Life could have done. Tillotson was oft with him the last Week. We thought Resistance in the Condition we were then in was not lawful. He said he had not Leisure to enter into Discourses of Politicks, but he thought a Government limited by Law was only a Name, if the Subjects might not maintain those Limitations by Force, otherwise all was at the Discretion of the Prince; that was contrary to all the Notions he had liv'd in of our Government, but he said there was nothing among them but the Embrios of things that were never like to have any Effect, and that were now quite dissolv'd. And there you have the Sum and Substance of the Presbyterian Plot.

And at the Place of Execution.His last Paper.

A Scaffold being erected in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, the Lord Russel was carry'd to the Place of Sacrifice, Saturday the 11th of July, attended by Dr. Tillotson and Dr. Burnet, who assisted him in his Devotions to the last Moment of Life. His Lordship declar'd there, in the Words of a dying Man, that he knew nothing of a Plot against the King's Person or Government. The same he attested in the Paper he left with the Sheriff, That he had never any Design of changing the Government, and would have suffer'd any Extremity rather than have consented to any Design to take away the King's Life, that he dy'd innocent of the Crime he stood condemn'd for; and he repeated again, as I never had any Design against the King's Life, or the Life of any Man whatsoever, so I never was in any Contrivance of altering the Government. In the Letter he wrote to the King he protested he was innocent as to all Designs against his Person or Government. He said on the Scaffold, he imputed his present Sufferings to his being earnest for the Exclusion Bill. He forgave his Enemies, and charg'd his Friends to think of no Revenge, he concluded from the Heats that were in choosing Sheriffs that Matter would end as it now did. How stupidly wicked must North and Rich look at that just Reproach! He added, I am not surpris'd to find it fall upon myself, and wish it may end in me. Killing by Forms of Law is the worst sort of Murder. After these dying Words of such an illustrious Martyr for the Protestant Religion, with what Indignation must the Reader find his sincere Assertions term'd enormous Falshoods, as Sprat wickedly calls them, in which he is faithfully copied by Echard, who adds, Most were ready to think 'twas drawn up with more Art than was agreeable to his Lordship's known Simplicity and Sincerity, therefore others were suspected to have the wording of it. How do Echard and Sprat labour to murder his pious Memory, as their Judges and Jury murder'd his Person? Bishop Burnet says of it, He was three days employ'd for some time in the Morning, to write out his Speech. He order'd four Copies to be made of it, all which he sign'd; and Bishop Burnet offered to take his Oath, that the Speech was pen'd by Lord Russel, when he was afterwards examin'd before the King and Council. After Lord Russel had deliver'd his Paper to the Sheriff, he pray'd by himself, then Dr. Tillotson pray'd with him. After that he pray'd again by himself. He then undress'd, and laid his Head on the Block, without the least Change of Countenance, and it was cut off at two Strokes.

I am in too much concern to reflect further on his Lordship's Sufferings; and I doubt not the Reader will do it sufficiently, especially on that impious Suggestion in the Archdeacon's History, that his Death was a Judgment upon him for his irritating after the Blood of others. The day before Lord Russel was beheaded, Captain Walcot, Mr. Hone, and Mr. Rouse, were hang'd, drawn and quarter'd at Tyburn, for the Plot. Bishop Burnet says, Walcot, at his death, deny'd the whole Business of the Rye-house Plot, which proves it to be a devilish Invention of West's; for Walcot, according to Echard, was to have been a chief Agent in it; and the Bishop says, it made West appear so black, the Court could make no more use of him. Hone was a sort of Madman fitter for Bedlam than a Trial, Rouse deny'd he was ever in any Design against the King's Life. These Men dying as they did, continues the Bishop, was such a Disgrace to the Witnesses, that the Court saw it was not fit to make any further use of them. Echard affirms, that the belief of the Plot was now general, and that the Discovery of it shew'd the Necessity of Passive Obedience, which he says to justify that Mass of Nonsense and Impudence heap'd together in the detestable Decree now made at Oxford, July 21, wherein that University declar'd Mr. Baxter and Mr. Jenkins to be impious and heretical; Dr. Decree. Owen and Mr. Samuel Johnson to be blasphemous and infamous, and Revolution Principles to be damnable Doctrines. Their Books were also to be burnt in the publick Court of the Schools; but their damnable Decree was burnt afterwards by the hands of the common Hangman. However, the reverend Historian extols it as an acceptable Present to the King, as well as the Cartloads of nonsensical Addressies, with which his royal Ears were dinn'd; and, to add to the general Exultation, when there was not a sensible,

The Historian is so foolish, as to commend the Papists for singing Mass, and having some extraordinary Idolatry on the Thanksgiving-Day. Upon the 28th of September, the Princess Anne was marry'd to George Prince of Denmark; and six days after the King seiz'd the Franchises of the City of London, and turn'd out the Lord-Mayor Sir William Pritchard, to turn him in again by his Commission. These other Changes were also made.

The Lord-Mayor drank to Peter Daniel, and he was made Sheriff, being a Man of as mean Parts as Fortune. The other Sheriff was Sir Samuel Dashwood, but a seasonable Man. Sir Henry Tulse had a Commission from the King to be Lord-Mayor, as long as the King pleas'd. So that all Things, says Echard, seem'd now to be in a quiet easy Condition, only the Rabble fell upon the Dutch Ambassador's Coach, and dangerously wounded his Lady, probably because she was a Presbyterian. Echard thinks the Court was too dilatory in the Prosecution of the Plot; but Bishop Burnet assures us, "Great pains were taken to find out more Witnesses. Pardons and Rewards were offer'd very freely; but none came in, which made it evident nothing was well laid or brought so near Execution as the Witnesses had depos'd; otherwise People would have been crowding in for Pardons. All People were apprehensive of very black Designs." Echard just now told us the Exultation was general, "when they saw Jefferies made Lord Chief Justice, who was scandalously vicious, and was drunk every day; besides a Drunkenness of Rury in his Temper, that look'd like Enthusiasm, he did not consider the Decencies of his Post. Nor did he so much as affect to seem impartial, as became a Judge, but run out upon all Occasions into Declarations that did not become the Bar, much less the Bench. He was not learned in his Profession; and his Eloquence, tho' viciously copious, yet was neither correct nor agreeable. Pemberton was turn'd out of the Common-Pleas, and Jones put in his Place; and Jefferies had three Judges join'd with him in the King's Bench, fit to sit by him."

Jefferies a Scoundrel.

We must now say something of the Duke of Monmouth, who had absconded ever since the Proclamation for apprehending the accus'd Persons, and design'd to engage in the Spanish Service. The Marquis of Hallifax seeing Matters run so much further than he apprehended, thought nothing would stop that so effectually, as the bringing the Duke of Monmouth again into Favour. The Duke wrote several Letters to the King, penn'd with an extraordinary Force, according to Bishop Burnet. The Lord Hallifax drew them all. The King was mollify'd by them, and resolv'd to forgive and forget every thing in case the Duke would confess the Plot, which he refus'd to do. The King promis'd that no use should be made of it; but he insisted upon it, that the Duke should tell the whole Truth of the Matter. Upon which Monmouth consented to satisfy the King, and confess'd some things in general, the Embrio's, as Lord Russel term'd them. The Duke of Monmouth could not be brought to make any other Submission to the Duke of York than to ask his Pardon in the way of Compliment. Lord Hallifax press'd him earnestly, upon his first Appearance, to be silent, and for a while to bear the Censures of the Town. The King spoke nothing of the Reconciliation to the Duke of York, till the day before it was to be done. He was much struck with it; yet the Duke's Creatures in the Cabinet-Council mov'd that for Form-sake Monmouth should be for some days put in the Tower. The King cut that off, by saying he had promis'd to pardon him. The Duke of Monmouth, as was agreed, made an humble Confession of his Offences in general Words to the King, and a Compliment to the Duke, begging that he would intercede with his Majesty to pardon him. The King receiv'd the Duke of Monmouth with a Fondness, which confounded all the Duke's Party. He us'd him more tenderly than he had done formerly. The Duke of York put on an outward Appearance of being very well pleas'd with it. The King said next day, that James, for so he call'd him, had confirm'd all that Howard had sworn, which being carry'd to the Duke of Monmouth, he deny'd that he had ever said any such thing, adding, that Lord Howard was a Liar and a Rogue, which his Friends reported about Town, and the next Gazette mention'd the King had pardon'd him, upon his confessing the late Plot. The Marquis of Hallifax press'd the Duke of Monmouth to pass this over, and to impute it to the Importunity of his Enemies, and to the King's Baseness, but he could not prevail. The Duke of Monmouth had too much Honour to countenance a pretended Confession of a pretended Plot; yet he said little till his Pardon was pass'd, and then he openly deny'd he had made the Confession mention'd in the Gazette, which was a plain Contradiction to what the King had said. Some were brought by the Duke of York to the King, who confirm'd they had heard the Duke of Monmouth say, He had not confess'd the Plot. Upon which the King order'd him to give a Confession of it under his hand. Lord Hallifax endeavour'd to persuade him to it, and at last prevail'd with him to write a Letter to that purpose, which he carry'd to the King, and the King was satisfy'd. But the Duke of Monmouth reflecting on what he had done, thought it a base thing. Tho' this was no Evidence, yet he was apprehensive it might have Influence on Juries, to make them believe every thing that might be sworn by other Witnesses, when, from his Confession, they were possess'd with a general Belief of the Plot. So he went, full of Uneasiness to the King, and desir'd he might have his Letter again in the Terms of an Agony like Despair. The King gave it back, but press'd him vehemently to comply with his Desire; and, among other things, the Duke of Monmouth said, the King us'd this Expression, If you do not yield in this you will ruin me, plainly intimating, Without you confirm Howard's Evidence, I shall be charg'd Reconcil'd to the King.

Duke of Monmouth

A. D. 1683. banish'd. charg'd with the Blood of the noble Persons that have been, and will be murder'd upon it. The Duke of Monmouth remain'd firm; so the King forbid him the Court, and a few days after he went to Holland, where he appear'd publickly, and was treated by the Prince of Orange with a very particular Respect.

Prince of Orange's Discourse with King Charles. We have mention'd that Prince's short Tour into England after the Oxford Parliament. Bishop Burnet tells us, He had then much private Discourse with his Majesty at Windsor. The King assur'd him he would keep Things quiet, and not give way to the Duke's Eagerness as long as he liv'd. He added, I am confident, whenever the Duke shall come to reign, he will be so restless and violent, that he cannot hold it four Years to an end. The King shew'd the Prince one of his Seals, and told him, that whatever he might write to him, if the Letter was not seal'd with that Seal, he was to look on it as only drawn from him by Importunity. The King wrote some terrible Letters against the Countenance he gave to the Duke of Monmouth, but they not being seal'd with that Seal, the Prince infer'd the King had a mind he should keep him about him, and use him well.

Col. Sidney try'd. All things being prepar'd, says Echard, on the 21st of November came on the Trial of Col. Algernon Sidney, Brother to the late Earls of Leicester and Rumney. This noble Person was murder'd after the same manner as Lord Russel had been, by Forms of Law. Sir John Hawles demonstrates it in several Instances, and by several Arguments, to which I refer. But Mr. Acherley's Remarks being less known, I shall make use of them. The Murderers were as fol-

The Treason charg'd on Colonel Sidney, was for compassing and imagining the Death of the King; and the Overt-Fact of the Treason was, That Sidney did compose and write a Libel, wherein he asserted thus: The Power originally in the People of England is delegated to the Parliament. He, innuendo King Charles, is subject to the Law of God, as he is a Man; to the People that makes him a King, as he is a King, &c. The Indictment did not alledge one word of publishing the Libel. The Proof of it was made by one Witness only, who, by a Warrant from a Secretary of State, broke open Sidney's Study, and found there this Libel; and then as to his writing it, that could not be prov'd but by Similitude of Hands. Let us repeat Finch the Solicitor's Argument after Acherley, because it worry'd this Great Man to death, and brought the Guilt of his innocent Blood on the Head of the Pleader. The Solicitor said, "That the Matter of this Libel, and the wri-

A. D. 1683. ting of it, was an imagining how to compass the Death of King Charles II. and the writing "it was an Overt-Fact of that Treason and that Scribere est Agere. He urg'd with Vehemence, That imagining the Death of the King is a Fact of the Mind, and is Treason even while that Fact remains covert in the Mind, altho' no such Treason can be punish'd, because there is no way to prove that Covert-Fact. But when once there is an Overt-Fact, that is, any thing that does manifest and prove that Covert-Fact of the Mind, the Law takes hold of it, and punishes it as High-Treason." What is there in the World that a Man can set such a Value on, as to think it equivalent to the Guilt of such a Speech? I might have said to the Nonsense and Impudence; but a Person may be impudent and nonsensical, without being criminal. And what Crime can be greater, than to murder Law as well as Reason, to take away the Life of a noble and virtuous Gentleman? And it is remarkable, that Finch, or Sawyer, or both of them shew'd they were very capable of Nonsense by the Passage they pick'd out of Sidney's Book, to put into their Indictment, which happen'd to have that Infirmary, tho' their Heads were not clear enough to find it out.

Mr. Acherley tells us, as to that Clause which says, That a King is subject to the People that makes him a King, in as much as he is a King, Sidney insisted that the Clause was Nonsense; for to say that a People should make a King, or supreme Governor to govern them, and yet to say, That he must be subject to, or govern'd by them, was a senseless Contradiction in itself, and of no force, and ought to be treated as such.

Col. Sidney defended the first Sentence, That the Power originally in the People was delegated to the Parliament, with so much Strength of Reason and Eloquence, that none but a parcel of such perjur'd mercenary Wretches, Judges, Counsel and Jury, could have heard him without Admiration and Conviction.

He said, the Assertion was evident; for the Col. Sidney Parliament consisted of the King, Lords, and defends the Commons, and whatsoever Power was in the Peo-Constitu- ple, if they ever had any, was doubtless delegation. ted to the Parliament; or however, if it were questionable, that Position was no more than what was written in the Law of England, for by the Statute 25 Henry VIII. cap. 21. it is declared, That this Nation is free from any Man's Laws but such only as had been devis'd by the People, and originally ordain'd and establish'd by their Consent; which Consent of the People could not be given but by their Representatives, to whom they had delegated their Power to give it in Parliament. And further, that this Position was prov'd by the common Form of Acts of Parliament, which runs thus: Be it enacted, or made a Law, by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the Consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the Authority of the same, i. e. the same Parliament of which the King is a Part: for the word Authority naturally imports a derivative Power proceeding from some Original. And as to the Commons, their Authority is visibly and literally deriv'd from their Constituents the People, who elect and empower them: For the original Writ of Summons, and the Law or Constitution, require the People to elect and empower their Representatives to do such things in Parliament, as shall be requisite to be done touching the State of the Kingdom, and to pay them Fees for their Service. As to the King and the Lords, their Authority must therefore necessarily

A. D. rily be deriv'd from the same Constitution, and the Law of the Land: for to derive one Part of Joint-Authority from one Original, and another Part of that Joint-Authority from another Original, is not conceivable.

There is much more in Acherley of Col. Sidney's Defence, equally reasonable and nervous, but it was thrown away on a prostituted hireling Court, and a PACK'D Jury, as the Learned Lawyer terms them.

Col. Sidney's Book was an Answer to Filmer's Patriarcha; by which the latter asserted the Divine Right of Monarchy upon the eldest Son's succeeding to the Authority of the Father. Bishop Burnet tells us, Filmer's Patriarcha was so poorly writ, that it was strange Sidney bestow'd so much pains in answering it. The only Witness against Sidney as to the Plot, was Lord Howard; and the Earl of Clare, the Earl of Anglesey, Dr. Burnet, Mr. Howard, and others depos'd, That the Lord Howard had told them, as he did with Asseverations, that he knew of no Plot: but he was poor, Col. Sidney us'd to lend him Money, and the Court having brib'd him to take a false Oath against his Benefactor, all Objections to his Evidence were over-born by the Court. Mr. Blake a Draper swore, That he having ask'd Howard when he was to have his Pardon, the latter reply'd, Not till the Drudgery of swearing is over. Howard came to Sidney's House and assur'd his Servants, there was nothing against their Master, desiring them to bring his Goods to his own House; and Sidney shew'd how improbable it was, that Howard, who could not raise five Men, and had not five Shillings to pay them, a fit Tool for the Court to work with, should be taken into such Consultations. The execrable Jefferies often interrupted Col. Sidney with Rudeness to put him in a Passion, to which he was subject. The Jury did the Business for which they were pack'd, and brought in the Colonel guilty. Four or five Days after he received Sentence of Death, and the shameless and worthless Withens, one of the Judges, gave him the Lye in open Court, which he bore patiently. Sidney sent to the Lord Hallifax, who was his Nephew by Marriage, to shew a Paper he had drawn to the King. It contain'd the Hardships he had suffer'd, and an Appeal to his Majesty: upon which that Monster Jefferies said, either Sidney must die, or I must die. His Execution was respited for three Weeks, the Trial being universally cry'd out on as a Piece of most enormous Injustice. When he saw the Warrant for his Execution, he express'd no Concern at it. He told the Sheriffs Daniel and Dashwood, who brought it, he would not expostulate upon any thing on his own account, for the World was now nothing to him; but he desir'd they would consider how guilty they were of his Blood, who had not return'd a Fair Jury, but one Pack'd, and as they were directed by the King's Solicitor Finch. He added, I speak this to you not for my own sake, but for your sake. At which, one of the Sheriffs burst out into Tears, probably Dashwood, for Daniel's Heart and Head were not capable of such Emotions. He was brought to the Scaffold on Tower-Hill the 7th of December, and deliver'd the Sheriffs a written Paper. He excus'd his not speaking, saying, This is an Age which makes Truth pass for Treason. He pray'd that the Nation might be preserv'd from Idolatry and Tyranny, and rejoic'd that he suffer'd for the Old Cause, in which he was so early engag'd. Echard says of it, It was so enthusiastic and shocking, that his Death was much less pity'd and lamented. And Bishop Burnet says, These last Words furnish'd much

Col. Sidney condemn'd.

On the last Day of Michaelmas-Term, the Lord Brandon Gerrard, John Hampden Esq; Mr. Booth, John Trenchard Esq; Mr. Charlton, and Major Wildman, who had been imprison'd for the Plot, were bail'd, there being but one Witness against them, but Mr. Hampden had Notice of Tryal next Term. The King's Counsel dropt the Treason, and he was then found guilty of a high Misdemeanor, for which the Judges fin'd him 40000 Pounds. They also fin'd Laurence Braddon 2000 l. for endeavouring to find out the Earl of Essex's Murder; the Reverend Mr. Samuel Johnson 500 Marks, for writing Julian the Apostate; and Sir Samuel Barnardiston 10000 Pounds for being the Foreman of Shaftesbury's Jury, tho' the Pretence was for writing News into the Country, which the Court did not like. Sawyer, who, as Coke observes, took Money with both Hands, fish'd for these unjust Causes, and was never without a Jury to give him a Verdict. Fez and Turkey were desirable Countries for Englishmen, to dwell in at this Juncture, when the Learned Lawyer makes, Acherley. this Exclamation: Oh Constitution! into what a Degree of Contempt and Weakness, and into what an abject Degree of Slavery wast thou and thy Constituents sunk and fallen! as if thou hadst no Existence but what proceeded from one part of thy own Institution, and that too dependent on his Will and Pleasure, &c.

Honours and Preferments might now be crowded into the end of this Year's History, but that of the House of Stuart was not written for such Purposes. HAVING pass'd with the Reader thro' so many Fields of Blood, so many Scenes of Cruelty and Oppression, one might hope for a cleaner Road to the End of our Journey; but the Paths are still the same, and if they are not quite so bloody, they are as difficult and dangerous. William Wright Esq; one of the Aldermen of Oxford, having defended the Privileges of that City, when the brib'd Majority of that Corporation offer'd to deliver them up, was in April thrown into Jail, and not let out under 30000 Pounds Bail. Mr. Langley Curtis the Publisher was fin'd 500 Pounds, and order'd to stand in the Pillory, for printing a Pamphlet call'd the Lord Ruffel's Ghost. Mr. Cavdron, Steward to the Earl of Clare, was fin'd 100 Pounds, and order'd to stand in the Pillory, for speaking something against this excellent Government. William Sacheverell Esq; George Gregory Esq; Charles Hutchinson Esq; all of Nottingham, and about 18 other Persons, were found guilty of a Riot, for opposing the Surrender of the Charter of that Town. The Duke of Tork su'd John Dutton Colt Esq; of Herefordshire, in an Action of Scandalum Magnatum, for saying the Duke was a Papist, &c. and the Jury gave that bigotted Papist 100000 Pounds Damages. Samuel Packer, Deputy to Richard Goodenough when he was Under-Sheriff of London and Middlesex, was fin'd 50 Marks, and order'd to stand in the Pillory, for publishing something which Jefferies call'd a scandalous Libel. And Mr. Francis Smith before-mention'd, was fin'd 500 Pounds, and order'd to stand in the Pillory for publishing the Raree-Show. But these Prosecutions were little Amusements to keep the Judges and Juries in play, till some more agreeable Business offer'd, and more Blood was to be spilt. In the two next Murders the Judges took it all upon themselves, and would not give the Sheriffs the trouble to impanel Juries.

hang'd.*

The first whom they deliver'd to the Hangman was Mr. James Holloway, Citizen and Linen-Draper of Bristol; who being nam'd among the rest of the Plotters, and knowing that little Mercy or Justice was to be expected from the Court and their Creatures, transported himself to the Leward-Islands, where he was seiz'd, and from thence sent in Chains to England under an Outlawry for Treason. The Attorney General offer'd him a Trial, if he desir'd it; but he was prevail'd on by the hope of a Pardon, to submit, and confess all he knew; which was, that he and two more had undertaken to manage a Design for seizing on Bristol, but he said they had never made any progress in it. He said also at the Meetings at London, Rumsey and West were often talking of Lopping, and he did not believe that above five Persons approv'd of it. Echard very falsely avers, he confirm'd most of the Particulars that had been open'd at the Trials of the Persons executed: For here he says, there were only three Persons acquainted with the Rising in the West, and only five with the Ryehouse-Plot, and even of those five, Holloway names Rumbald and his Brother to be two: Whereas Bishop Burnet informs us, Rumbald at his Death deny'd the Truth of that pretended Plot, tho' he own'd West and Rumsey had talk'd of Lopping, but nothing was either laid, or so much as resolv'd on. Holloway was thought by the Court not to have spoken all he knew, but the

A. D. 1684. Man's Conscience was not of their make, and he would not have ly'd before God to have sav'd a thousand Lives. My Lord of Sarum tells it thus: "So since what he had acknowledg'd made himself guilty of enough to hang him, he was executed, and died with a firm Constancy. He shew'd great Presence of Mind; he observ'd the Partiality that was evident in managing this Plot, different from what had appear'd in managing the Popish-Plot. The same Men who were call'd Rogues when they swore against Papists, were look'd on as honest Men when they turn'd their Evidence against Protestants. In all his Answers to the Sheriffs Daniel and Dashwood, who at the Place of Execution troubled him with many impertinent Questions, he answer'd them with so much Life, and yet with so much Temper, that it appear'd he was no ordinary Man. His Speech was suppress'd for some Days, but it broke out at last. In it he express'd a deep Sense of Religion. His Prayer was an excellent Composure. The Credit of the Rye-Plot receiv'd a great Blow by his Confession. All that Discourse about an Insurrection, in which the Day was said to be set, appear'd now to be a Fiction." Echard again very falsely affirms, he declar'd his Belief of the Plot, and that he was concern'd in it. Whereas he declar'd, they had never made any Progress in the Insurrection, and that the Rye-Plot was only Talk, well describ'd by Bishop Burnet. So that it was plain, after all the story they had made of the Plot, it had gone no farther, than that a Company of inconsiderable Persons were framing Schemes among themselves that were never like to come to any thing, and that Rumsey and West had push'd on the Design of the Assassination, to which tho' few agreed, yet too many were so foolish as not to discover it.

They are not yet fatiated with Slaughter and Blood; as yet the Manes of Coleman, Green, Berry, Hill, Plunket, and the five Jesuits are not appeas'd: And Sir Thomas Armstrong being bought of the Scout at Leyden in Holland, by Sir Thomas Armstrong King Charles's Envoy, was sent to London, and executed June the 20th, some time after the Execution of Holloway, without the Formality of a Trial. And I can't but say, I am better pleas'd with this, than with any of the other Murders committed by Judges and Juries, because the Law is not so much mock'd, tho' Justice is as much injur'd. Echard opens this tragical Scene with telling us, he was an ungovernable Gentleman, that the King had been very kind to him, and therefore he must expect no favour; that the Judges had nothing to do, but to appoint Execution. Which is false, if Sir John Hawles the Learned Solicitor-General knew any thing of the matter. And he assures us, that no outlaw'd Person ever was deny'd his Trial; and it was the only Pretence to hang Sir Thomas Armstrong, that he was outlaw'd for Treason. He says, It was Injustice to deny the Favour or Right of a Trial to Sir Thomas Armstrong, which was never deny'd any Person before nor since; and if there was any doubt in the Case, as it cannot be deny'd there was, the Outlawry ought to have been wav'd. It was a vain and unjust Reason, and only intended to incense the King, assign'd by the Attorney Sawyer, that the Prisoner was one who was actually engag'd to go, upon the King's hasty coming to Town, to destroy him by the way; whereas the Prisoner offer'd to prove his Innocence in that and other Matters, and even that Objection against him was an Invention of the Attorney Sawyer for any thing appears, but that it was re-

A. D. 1684. resolv'd to stop at nothing. Fitzharris and Colledge had hard Measure, and their Quarters were bury'd, but Sir Thomas Armstrong's were expos'd, tho' the Proceedings against him were equally as unjustifiable as in the other two Cases. Echard places those Quarters with particular Pleasure, "His Head was set up on Westminster-Hall between those of Cromwell and Bradshaw, one of his Quarters upon Temple-Bar, two others at Aldersgate and Aldgate, and the fourth was said to be sent down to Stafford, for which Town he had been a Burgess in Parliament." And because the Reader may not think I accuse the Popish Faction and their Abettors, when I observe that these Sacrifices were made to the Manes of the Priests and Jesuits who suffer'd for Oates's Plot, see what Echard says on the Execution of Armstrong: "He was executed on Friday the 20th of June, which was observ'd to be the same Day of the same Month, and the same Day of the Week, on which the five Jesuits were executed in the same manner, at the same Place, just five Years before." Does not this insinuate that his Death was an Effect of divine Vengeance for the Execution of the Popish Plotters? Sir Thomas asserted very positively, and upon his Death, That he never had any Design against the King's Life. What then did Sawyer deserve for that false Suggestion mention'd by Hawles? The Archdeacon tells us how kind the King had been to Armstrong, but would not tell us that Sir Thomas was Nephew by Marriage to the Earl of Clarendon, and that was Merit enough to entitle him to Justice.

Scotland. The Proceedings against Conventicles in Scotland were carry'd on by the Earl of Aberdeen Lord Chancellor, and the Duke of Queensbury Lord Treasurer, with the utmost Severity, which drove the People into Church indeed, but out of Religion; for Bishop Burnet informs us the Enemies to all Godliness observing the Ill-Nature on the one side, and the Timorousness on the other, pleas'd themselves in censuring them both, and by this means an impious atheistical Leaven began to corrupt most of the younger Sort, and the Beginnings of it were reckon'd from the Duke's Stay among them, and from his Court.

Duke of York corrupts Scotland. One Home was condemn'd and executed for being at Bothwell-Bridge; the Evidence was his Kinsman, who swore falsely against him, and there was no other Witness; great Applications were made to the Duke of York for saving his Life, but, says Bishop Burnet, he was not born under a pardoning Planet. Mr. Weir of Blake-wood, Steward to the Marquis of Dowglaf, was condemn'd to be hang'd for entertaining a Person who was only suspected of having been at Bothwell-Bridge, but the Marquis obtain'd a Reprieve for him. The Tyranny was now become so intolerable in Scotland, that the Lord Cardross, and several Persons of Quality, with great Numbers of other People of the Presbyterians resolv'd to remove to Carolina, to which end Agents were sent to London, to treat with the Patentees of that Colony, and those Agents falling into Conversation with some Malecontents, several Scottish Gentlemen were brought into the Rye and the Presbyterian Plots, and clap'd up in Prison, as the Earl of Tarras, who had marry'd the Dutchess of Monmouth's eldest Sister, the eminent Mr. Baillie of Jerviswood, and others. Mr. Baillie after twenty Months inhuman Treatment in Prison, both in England and Scotland, was condemn'd and executed, when his blood-thirsty Prosecutors were afraid he would die under it. He deny'd any Plot against the King, Duke, or Government; and my Lord of Sarum says, The only Excuse that was ever pretended for this infamous Prosecution was, that they were sure he was guilty.

What a Part the Duke of York acted in these Prosecutions, especially when he was in Scotland, appears by what follows out of Burnet. "When any are struck in the Boots it is done in the Presence of the Council, and upon that occasion almost all offer to run away, the Sight is so dreadful, that without an Order restraining such a Number to stay, the Board would be forsaken; but the Duke while he had been in Scotland was so far from withdrawing, that he look'd on all the while with an unmov'd Indifference, and with an Attention, as if he had been to look on some curious Experiment; this gave a terrible Idea of him to all that observ'd it, as of a Man that had no Bowels nor Humanity in him." This is the Prince of whom Echard says, The Morning of his Reign seem'd every way to promise a serene and happy Season.

The Duke of Ormond kept things in pretty good Order in Ireland, but he could not hinder the Papiests encreasing in Strength and Interest, by the Countenance and Encouragement they had from the Court, as is thus related by Bishop Burnet.

The Earl of Clancarty dying, left his Lady Guardian of his Children, it was one of the noblest and richest Families of the Irish Nation, which had always been Papiests, but the Lady was a Protestant; and she being afraid to trust the Education of her Son to Ireland, tho' in Protestant Hands, considering the Danger he might be in from his Kindred of that Religion, brought him over to Oxford, and put him into the Hands of Dr. Fell Bishop of Oxford, and Dean of Christ's-Church, where she reckon'd he would be safe. Lord Clancarty had an Uncle Col. Maccarty, who both to pervert his Nephew, and make his own Court, got the King to write to the Bishop of Oxford to let the young Lord come up, and see the Diversions of the Town in the Christmas Time, to which the Bishop did too easily consent: When he came to Town they marry'd him to one of the Lord Sunderland's Daughters, so he broke thro' all his Education, and soon after turn'd Papiest. Dr. King, Archbishop of Dublin, informs us, that to shew the Sincerity of his Conversion he murder'd a Protestant Butcher at Mayallo, by tossing him in a Blanket. My Lord of Sarum proceeds, "Thus the King suffer'd himself to be made an Instrument in one of the greatest of Crimes, the taking an Infant out of the hand of a Guardian, and marrying him secretly, against which the Laws of all Nations have taken Care to provide very effectually."

At the latter end of this Reign the Earl of Rochester obtain'd by the Duke's means to be nam'd Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The King seem'd to be so uneasy with him, that he was glad to send him away from the Court; and to mortify him, resolv'd to put a General over the Army in Ireland, which us'd to be a Branch of the Lord Lieutenant's Commission. Lord Rochester said he could not be answerable for the Peace of the Kingdom, if the Army was not in a Dependence upon him, which had no Effect on the King, who seem'd to be the more pleas'd with it, because it affected him so much. Col. Maccarty above-mention'd was to have a Regiment in the Irish Army, and Lord Halifax expostulated that Matter with the King, who told Maccarty every word Lord Halifax said, and the Irishman expostulated the Matter with Halifax; which sufficiently proves the Countenance and En-

P. 22. We do not expect to find Matters mend in England, and if we stop'd here to consider what a despicable Figure this once brave and renown'd Nation made in Europe at this time, it will require a good deal of Patience to preserve Decency towards the two Princes that were the occasion of it. If Foreign Affairs could have awaken'd the King, Bishop Burnet says it, the French did enough this Summer in order to it, by bombarding and attacking the beautiful City of Genoa very unjustly and unreasonably; such an Assault King-warr'd that look'd liker the Violence of a Robber than the Attack of one that would observe Forms in his Conquests, ought to have provok'd all Princes, especially such as were powerful at Sea, to have join'd against a Prince, who by these Practices was become the common Enemy of Mankind; but we were now pursuing other Designs, from which it was resolv'd that nothing from beyond Sea should divert us.

Tyrannical Acts.

Mr. Roswell.

However mean and contemptible we look'd abroad, the two Royal Brothers, for the Duke had now more of the Government than the King, were as terrible to the three Nations, as if they had conquer'd and enslav'd them, which is hinted by the Archdeacon: The City of London seem'd in effect subdu'd, and was forc'd to submit to the King's Pleasure. Dr. Oates had been long in Disgrace at Court, his Lodging, his Guard, and a great Part of his Pension were taken from him, and on the tenth of May he was publickly arrested at the Amsterdam Coffee-House in an Action of Scandalum Magnarum, at the Suit of the Duke of York for calling him Traitor. He was hurry'd away to Wood-street Counter, and suffering Judgment to pass by default in Trinity Term, the Jury gave the Duke 100,000*l.* Damage. On May the sixth a Trial was had at Guildhall before Jefferies, upon an Action brought by Sir William Pritchard late Lord Mayor of London against Mr. Papillon and Mr. Dubois for arresting him, and another seasonable Jury gave Pritchard 10,000*l.* Damages. Mr. Elias Best was fin'd 1000*l.* and order'd to stand thrice in the Pillory for speaking against Poverty and Arbitrary Power. Oates's two Men, Dalby and Nicholson, were also convicted of speaking something like it, and punish'd accordingly. Mr. Builer of Northamptonshire was prosecuted for presenting and reading to the last Representatives of that County, Michael Fleetwood Esq; and John Park Esq; an Address from the Freeholders, for which he was fin'd 500 Marks; and to mingle some Blood with these pecuniary Punishments, two innocent Men, Mr. Roswell a Presbyterian Minister, and Mr. Hayes a Banker were try'd for High Treason. Take the Account of Mr. Roswell's Tryal from Dr. Calamy.

On the 23d of September Mr. Thomas Roswell, who was Minister of a dissenting Congregation in Redriff was imprison'd in the Gatehouse at Westminster by a Warrant from Jefferies for High Treason. A Bill was found against him at the Quarter Sessions at Kingston in Surrey, upon which he was arraign'd October the 15th, and try'd November the 18th following at the King's Bench Bar by a Surrey Jury, before Jefferies and three other Judges sit to sit by him, Withens, Holloway, Walcor. The High Treason, as laid in the Indictment, and sworn by the Witnesses, was, that in a Sermon which he preach'd September the 14th he said these Words, That the People, meaning the Subjects of our Sovereign

A. D. 1684. Lord the King, make a flocking to our said Sovereign Lord the King, upon Pretence of healing the King's Evil, which he, meaning our said Sovereign Lord the King, could not do; but that we, meaning himself, and other traitorous Persons, are Priests and Prophets, that by our Prayers can heal the Dolours and Grievs of the People. We, meaning the Subjects of our said Sovereign Lord the King, have had two wicked Kings, meaning the most serene Charles the First, late King of England, and our said Sovereign Lord the King that now is, whom we can resemble to no other Person but to the most wicked Jeroboam; and that if they, meaning the said evil disposed Persons, then and there so as aforesaid with him unlawfully assembled and gathered together, would stand to their Principles, he, meaning himself, did not fear but they, meaning himself and the said evil disposed Persons, would overcome their Enemies, meaning our said Sovereign Lord the King and his Subjects, as in former Times, with Rams Horns, broken Platters, and a Stone in a Sling. The Witnesses were three Women, who swore to the Words as they stand without the Innuendo's; the Trial lasted about seven Hours, Mr. Roswell made a most full and clear Defence of himself, very modestly, yet strenuously vindicating his Innocence to the Satisfaction of those that were present, and so as to gain the Applause of many Gentlemen of the Long Robe. The Jury however, after they had been out about half an Hour, brought him in guilty. The Women who were the Witnesses were infamous Persons, laden with the Guilt of many Perjuries, which had been easily prov'd upon them all before the trial, could Justice have been had, but they were screen'd by the Recorder Jenour, who was the Person that laid the whole Scheme of the Business, and patch'd up the Indictment in Terms suited to his known Abilities, says the Doctor very modestly. For it is no Breach of good Manners to say of such a Tool, that none but such a Blockhead could have drawn such an Indictment, and none but a worse Wretch still would have prosecuted a Minister of the Gospel even to Death upon such a Charge, and such Evidence. The Impudence of the Judges, Prosecutors, and Jury in this Case is without Example. There is not the least Possibility in the World that the thing could be true. Mr. Roswell propos'd at his Trial to put the whole upon this Issue, he would pronounce a Period as long as that which the Evidences had sworn, with his usual Tone of Voice with which he preached, and then leave it to them to repeat it if they could. Bishop Burnet tells us, "As for the Sermon in which the Witnesses swore, he deliver'd those Words, he shew'd what his Text was, which the Witnesses could not remember, as they remember'd nothing else in his Sermon besides the Words they had depos'd, That Text, and his Sermon upon it, had no relation to any such Matter, several Witnesses who heard the Sermon, and some who writ it in Short-hand declar'd he said no such Words, nor any thing to that Purpose; he offer'd his own Notes to prove this further, but no regard was had to them. The Women could not prove by any Circumstance that they were at his Meeting, or that any Person saw them there on that Day; the Words they swore against him were so gross, that it was not to be imagin'd that any Man in his Wits would express himself so, were he ever so wickedly set before a mix'd Assembly; yet the Blood-hound Jefferies urg'd the Matter with his ordinary Vehemence, he laid it for a Foundation that all Preaching in Conven-

His Lordship adds, There was a shameful Rejoycing upon this. It was thought now Conventicles would be all suppressed by it, since any Person, who would witness that treasonable Words were deliver'd at them, would be believ'd, how improbable soever. Further, I set down all this Defence more particularly, that it may appear what a Spirit was in that Time, when a Verdict could be brought in upon such Evidence, and against such a Defence. This Affair, foul as it is, is surr'd over by the compleat Historian and the Archdeacon. The former does not give us a hint of the Injustice of the Sentence; and the latter takes occasion to extol his Majesty's Grace in not suffering the Sentence to be executed, tho' in so doing he had committed Murder. Such of the Witnesses as could be met with, were afterwards convicted of Perjury; and Smith the chief Witness was pillory'd before the Exchange. Sir John Talbot, who was present at the Trial, represented to King Charles the State of the Case, and the King order'd Jefferies to find an Evafion, upon which Counsel was assign'd Mr. Roswell, and Mr. Pollexfen, Mr. Wallop and Mr. Bampffield pleaded to the Insufficiency of the Indictment in Arrest of Judgment; but the Matter was cut shorter by a Pardon. Jefferies, still on a Blood-scent, caus'd one Mr. Hayes, a Banker in London, to be prosecuted for High Treason because there was found a Letter writ by him in Armstrong's Pocket, directed to another Name, which was suppos'd to be a feign'd one. 'Twas a Letter of Credit on Hayes's Correspondent in Holland. Much pains was taken on Hayes, both by Persuasion and Threatning, to induce him to make Discoveries, the Court imagining there was a Joint-Purse to supply the English Refugees in Holland; and if they could know who were Monmouth's Friends, they would attain them all, or at least fine them all severely. Hayes would or could confess nothing, so he was try'd for High-Treason, in abetting a Man that was out-law'd for it; he made a strong Defence, as well he might do, Armstrong's Name or Concern in the Credit no where appearing. He was a Banker, and examin'd into no Persons Concerns that gave him Money for Credit or Bills. Jefferies, says Bishop Burnet, press'd the Jury in his impetuous way, to find him guilty of High-Treason, for the King's Life and Safety depended upon it; so that if they did it not, they expos'd the King to a new Rye-Plot, with other Extravagancies with which his Fury prompted him; but a Jury of Merchants could not be wrought up to this Pitch, so he was acquitted, which mortify'd the Court a little; for they had reckon'd, that now Juries were only to be a Point of Form in a Trial, and that they were always to find Bills as they were directed.

About this time a young Gentleman happening to be in Company of two Gentlemen more, when a Quarrel rose, Swords were drawn, and one kill'd; he and the other surviving Gentleman were indicted upon it, tho' 'twas not certain by whose hand the Deceas'd fell. But the young Gentleman being a Son of one of the Knights of Shires, who petition'd for a Parliament, he was threaten'd with the Rigour of the Law if he did not confess, and promis'd a Pardon if he did, so he pleaded guilty, and was condemn'd. Instead of a Pardon he was told he must pay 16000 l. or suffer Execution. Accordingly the Money was paid, 8000 Pounds to the King, and 8000 Pounds to two Favourite Ladies. Lord Bishop of Sarum reflects upon it thus: "It is a very ill thing for Princes to suffer themselves to be prevail'd on by Importunity, to pardon Blood which cries for Vengeance, a terrible Reflection for this Court and their Creatures!" Yet an Easiness to Importunity is a Feebleness of Good Nature, and so is in itself less criminal; but it is a monstrous perverting of Justice, and a destroying the chief End of Government, which is the Preservation of the People, when their Blood is set to Sale, and that not as a Compensation to the Family of the Person murder'd, but to the Prince himself, and some who are in favour with him upon unworthy accounts."

Tho' such Cruelty was exercis'd towards the Protestants, there was found Clemency for the Papists and their Abettors. The Lord Petre, one of the Popish Lords imprison'd in the Tower for the Popish Plot, died there, and the Lord Arundel of Warder, the Lord Bellasis, and Lord Powis were let out upon Bail, as was also the Earl of Tyrone out of the Gate-house. None of the Judges, till Jefferies was prefer'd to the King's-Bench, would venture to bail them, even Saunders, otherwise Tool enough, refus'd it. But Jefferies made no difficulty, nor of discharging the Earl of Danby upon Bail. The Duke of Beaufort, and Earl of Peterborough, taking the Advantage of such Judges and Juries, brought their Actions of Scandalum Magnatum against those who had spoken some bold Truths of them, and had vast Sums given them for Damages.

William Williams Esq; Speaker of the last two Parliaments, having licens'd the Votes which had in them Matters of Scandal relating to some Lords, an Information was brought against him, and he upon it demurr'd to the Jurisdiction of the Court; but he was over-ru'd, and fin'd 10000 Pounds. This was drawn on by the Popish and Tory Faction, to cut off the Thoughts of another Parliament. The reverend Historians, the compleat one, and Echard, inform us, that Sir Lionel Jenkins, one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, had long pray'd his Majesty to permit him to resign that Place, and that his Majesty was at last pleas'd to grant it, tho' with much Unwillingness, because of the great Satisfaction his Majesty always had in his Services. This Man, who had really no Merit but his readiness to do dirty Work, has the good Word of these Men, on account of his implacable Malice to Protestant Dissenters, and Protestant Patriots. Bishop Burnet speaks of his being turn'd out, thus: "Jenkins had now done all the Drudgery the Court had occasion for from him; and being capable to serve them in nothing else, he was dismiss'd from being Secretary, and Godolphin, one of the Commissioners of the Treasury, succeeded him. The Earl of Rochester hoped to be made Treasurer, tho' the whole Court hated him, and the Treasury was therefore continu'd in Commission, notwithstanding the Duke of York and Dutchess of Portsmouth, like Patron, like Patroness, were for giving the white Staff to Rochester." Mr. Godolphin was made a Lord, and first Commissioner of the Treasury. The Earl of Radnor was remov'd from his Place of President of the Council, and Lord Rochester put in his Place, which being a Post superior in Rank, but much inferior both in Advantage and Credit, Lord Halifax said, He had heard of many kick'd down Stairs, but never of any that was kick'd up Stairs before. The Earl of Middleton, Son to him who govern'd Scotland, was made

A. D. 1684. made Secretary of State. Bishop Burnet tells us, he had not much Religion, and truly much was not wanted, considering what Company he was to keep at Court, where even some of the Bishops could not be said to have any to spare. Sir Thomas Thynne and North the pretended Sheriff of London, were put into the Treasury Commission, and it was to secure a Seat for his Brother at that Board, that the Lord-Keeper North labour'd so hard to keep the white Staff from Rochester, whom Lord Halifax oppos'd vigorously, insomuch that he complain'd in Council, that there were many Rasures in the Treasury-Books, out of which several Leaves were cut; and he mov'd the King to go to the Treasury-Chamber, that the Books might be laid before him, and he might be Judge of the Matter upon sight: so the King nam'd next Monday, and it was then expected that the Earl of Rochester would be turn'd out of all, if not sent to the Tower. A Message was dispatch'd to Mr. May, a great Favourite of the King's, but a great Enemy to his Counsels, to come immediately from Windsor to London, that he might be there on the Monday, which it was expected would prove a critical Day; and it prov'd to be so indeed, tho' in a different way, as we shall observe in the Sequel.

And Com-

Treasury.

Among other Honours and Preferments, the compleat Historians tell us, The King, without any farther Scruple; made his good Brother Lord High Admiral of England, and restor'd him to his Seat at the Council-Table. The Earl of Murray and Earl of Middleton were also made Privy-Counsellors, and the following Persons Knights.

Simon Taylor and John Turner Esqs; two Aldermen of Lynn-Regis; Dr. Weatherley, Capt. John Clark of London, Mr. Edmund Warcup of Oxfordshire, William Creagh and Henry Brabant of Newcastle upon Tyne.

John Drummond Esq; was made a Privy-Counsellor, and William Bridgman Philip Musgrave Esqs; Clerks of the Council, and Sir Robert Wright Sergeant at Law, one of the Barons of the Exchequer. These things were not done all in one day, but all within the Year, and a Journal of them is exactly recorded in the compleat History, being a Copy of the Gazette.

Bishop Burnet tells us of some Ecclesiastical Preferments, as of the Translation of Dr. Peter Mew, Bishop of Bath and Wells, to Winchester, on the death of Dr. Morley. He adds, Mew had been a Captain during the Wars, and had been Middleton's Secretary, when he was sent to command the Insurrection, which the Highlanders attempted to make for the King in Scotland. After that he came into Orders, tho' he knew very little of Divinity, or of any other Learning, and was weak to a childish degree, yet Obsequiousness and Zeal without Knowledge, and I might add, without Virtue, rais'd him, by several Steps, to this great See. I knew him, and could say a great deal more of him, but I do not think it is worth the while. His Successor at Bath and Wells was Dr. Ken, of whom Dr. Burnet: "He was a Man of "an ascetick Life, too hot and sudden. He had an edifying way of preaching, more apt to move the Passions than to instruct. The Papists hoped, that by him a great Progress might be made in gaining, or at least deluding the Clergy;" who, in his own Diocese, idoliz'd him, without knowing any thing of this his true Character. Persecution, the greatest Fury that Hell ever produc'd, rag'd all this while against Protestant Dissenters, and none more forward in promoting that inhuman Work, than the last mention'd Bishop Ken and his Clergy. The Prosecution of the Dissenters was carried very high that Year, says my Lord of Sarum: "They were not only proceeded against for going to Meetings, but for not going to Church, and for not receiving the Sacrament. The Laws made against Papists, with respect to these Particulars, being now apply'd to them." Some of the pious Ministers sunk under the Severity of their Persecutors, and particularly Mr. Jenkins, who hazarded his Life for this King before the Restoration, did now die in Newgate but a few days before him. There also died Mr. Bampfield and Mr. Ralphson, and the King himself follow'd soon after, to give an account of all these things at that Bar, where the whole Race of Mankind are accountable.

tion.

Some short time before the King's last Sickness and Death, there was certainly a Scheme forming by him, to make himself easy for the rest of his Life, which he was over-heard to say by a Gentleman, who told it me. The King had given him two Spanish Plays, call'd Ne pudefer, or It cannot be, for him to give them an English Cast in one. Three Acts and more were finish'd, before the King was taken ill, and his Majesty oblig'd the Author to bring it to him, Scene by Scene, as he wrote it. The Courtiers knowing what his Errand was at Whitehall, made his way easy to the King's Cabinet, to which he once approach'd so near, that he could hear the King say distinctly, Brother, you may travel if you will, I am resolv'd to make myself easy for the rest of my Life. At which Words the Door opening, the Author made off, and the Duke of York pass'd hastily by him as in a Passion. This Play is the famous Sir Courty Nice, which the King highly approv'd of, only he said it wanted a little more of what Collier calls Smut in his View of the Stage. The Poet told me this so often, and was so little given to romancing in such things, that I see no reason to disbelieve him.

Mr. C.

intended new Scheme.

The Bishop of Salisbury gives us a hint of this Scheme. "There was at this time a new Scheme form'd, that very probably would for ever have broken the King and the Duke; but how it was laid, was so great a Secret, that it could not be penetrated. The Duke of Monmouth came over secretly, and tho' he did not see the King, yet he went back very well pleas'd with his Journey. Mr. May told Bishop Burnet, He knew by the King's way things were not quite ripe. That with which they were to begin was, the sending the Duke of York to Scotland. And it was generally thought, that if the two Brothers should be once parted, they would never meet again. The King spoke to the Duke concerning his going to Scotland; he answer'd, There's no occasion for it. The King reply'd, Either you must go, or I will go myself thither. The King was observ'd to be colder and more reserv'd to the Duke than ordinary; but what was still under all this, was a deep Secret."

The King had parted with so much of his Power to the Duke, that he had not enough left to recover it again, without the assistance of the Duke of Monmouth's Party, which, in opposition to the Papists, consisted of the best part of the Kingdom, tho' not many of them were dispos'd to favour his Succession. The Papists were in haste to have a Popish King, who was bigotted to their Idolatry, and would put all to the Venture to re-establish it. They saw plainly, if there was a Breach between the King and the

A. D. 1684. the Duke, they had no other Hope left. Things could not be carry'd so secretly in a Court, where the Duke of York had so many Spies, but they must have some Knowledge of it; and if the Critical Day was set for the opening of the new Scheme, 'tis no wonder the King was taken sick to death on that very day, as the Bishop of Salisbury informs us; and from what he says of that Death, there is no room left to doubt that he was not poison'd, of which more when we have further prov'd, that King's Intention to recall the Duke of Monmouth; to prevent which, the Papists would, doubtless, have sacrific'd what and whomsoever lay in their way. I impute this Resolution of the King's to his Timoroufness and Indolence, as well as to his Understanding, which was much better than his Brother's. He knew that the Infatuation the Nation lay under by the Practices and Preachments of the minor Clergy, would vanish on the first Allarm they took against Popery, and when ever they rous'd out of the present Lethargy, brought on them by the Delusion of Ken and such Prelates, they would call for a strict Reckoning for the noble and innocent Blood which had been spilt, and the Invasions that had been made on the Constitution, and the Duke of York and his Emiffaries would certainly be made to feel the Weight of an injur'd Peoples Displeasure. This Foresight, his Fears in consequence of it, and his Love of Ease and Pleasure, prevail'd over the little Religion he had, which was Popery, and made him resolve to put his new Scheme in execution, and that made the Papists resolve to put it out of his power. I think this is plain, but it will appear still more plain by what follows.

When the Duke of Monmouth was taken after the Fight at Sedgemoor, there was found about him a Pocket-Book, wherein were written several Passages concerning his last Reconciliation with the King, at the close of it is an Account of the Design to recall him. I shall insert the Letter entire.

" November 25, I render'd myself. At night 29, the King, could not dissemble his Satisfaction, press'd my Hand, which I remember not he did before, except when I return'd from the French Service. 29, the King, acted his Part well, and I too. 39, the Duke, and D. seem'd not ill pleas'd.

" 26 November, 29, the King, took me aside, and falling upon the Business of L. R. Lord Ruffel, said he inclin'd to have saved him, but was forc'd to it, otherwise he must have broke with 39, the Duke; Bid me think no more on't. Coming home L. told me he fear'd 39, the Duke, began to smell out 29's Carriage to me. That—said to 39 that Morning, that all that was done was but sham.

" 27. Several told me of the Storm that was brewing. Rumsey was with 39, and was seen to come out crying, that he must accuse a Man he lov'd.

" December 19. A Letter from 29, bidding me stay till I heard from him.

" January 5. I receiv'd a Letter from L. mark'd by 29 in the Margin, to trust entirely to 10, and that in February I should certainly have Leave to return. That Matters were concerted towards it, and that 39 had no Suspicion notwithstanding of my Reception here.

" Feb. 3. A Letter from L. that my Business was almost as well as done, but must be so sudden, as not to leave room for 39's Party to counterplot. That it is probable he would chuse Scotland rather than Flanders or this Country, which was all one to 29.

" 16. The sad News of his Death by L. A. D. " O cruel Fate!" 1684.

As it was almost impossible for the Duke's Party not to smell out this Design, so 'twas impossible for them to prevent it by any other way than the King's Death. And Sheffield, late Duke of Buckingham, gives one good ground to believe he was poison'd, at the end of his Character. " I would not say any thing on so sad a Subject, if I did not think that Silence itself would in such a Case signify too much; and therefore as an impartial Writer, I am oblig'd to observe, that the most knowing, and the most discerning of all his Physicians, did not only believe him poison'd, but thought himself so too for having declar'd his Opinion a little too boldly."

The Dutcheß of Portsmouth coming to England in the Year 1689, talk'd as if the King had been poison'd, as was affirm'd by Anthony Henly Esq; of the Grange in Hampshire, a Gentleman of great Honour and Wit, who had the following Relation from the Dutcheß herself. " She said she was always pressing the King to make both himself and his People easy, and to come to a full Agreement with his Parliament; and he was come to a final Resolution of sending away his Brother, and calling a Parliament, which was to be executed the next day after he fell into that Fit of which he died. She was let into the Secret, and spoke of it to no Person but her Confessor. But the Confessor, she believ'd, told it to some, who seeing what was to follow, took that wicked Course to prevent it." My Lord of Sarum reports, that some of the Dutcheß's own Servants gave him the Poison, suppos'd to be convey'd in poison'd Snuff; for so many of the small Veins of the Brain were burst, that the Brain was in great Disorder.

If any one has the curiosity to see what can be started in objection to such Evidence, he will find the most made of it in Welwood's Memoirs, whose Reasons have just so much Weight as an Ounce would have against a Pound, especially after the additional Weight of our Evidence is put into the Poison-Scale.

On Sunday, the first of February, he eat little all day, and had an unquiet Night. In the Morning Doctor, afterwards Sir Edmund King, a Physician and Chymist, came, as he had been order'd, to wait on him. All the King's Discourse to him was so broken, that he could not understand what he meant. And the Doctor concluded he was under some great Disorder either in his Mind or in his Body: Amaz'd at this, he went out, and meeting with Lord Peterborough, told him the King was in a strange Humour, for he did not speak one word of Sense. Lord Peterborough desir'd he would go in again to the Bed-chamber, which he did, and he was scarce come in, when the King, who seem'd all the while to be in great Confusion, fell down, all of a sudden in a Fit like an Apoplexy; he look'd black, and his Eyes turn'd in his Head. The Physician, who had been formerly an eminent Surgeon, said, It was impossible to save the King's Life, if one Minute was lost, so he would rather venture on the Rigour of the Law, than leave the King to perish. Accordingly he let him blood; the King came out of that Fit. The Physicians approving of what Dr. King had done, the Council order'd him 1000 Pounds; but King James never took care to see it paid. Tho' the Fit was over, yet the Effects of it hung still upon his Majesty, and he was much oppress'd; and the Physicians apprehending another Fit, gave him over:

The

A. D. 1684. the Bishops came to him, Archbishop Sancroft, the Bishop of London, and Bishop Ken, and all spoke to him as the occasion requir'd, but he took no notice of that or them, which was imputed to an Insensibility, of which, says Bishop Burnet, "Too visible an Instance appear'd, since

"Lady Portsmouth sat in the Bed, taking care of him, as a Wife of a Husband." Mr. Archdeacon assures us, the pious Nonjuring Bishop Ken was so far from suffering the Dutcheſs of Portsmouth to sit in the Bed, that he would not let her stay in the Room. He prevail'd with his Majesty to have her remov'd. The pious Bishop Ken again induc'd his Majesty to send for her Majesty, and he asking Pardon of her, had the Satisfaction of her particular Forgiveness. Bishop Burnet affirms, He said nothing of the Queen. On Thursday a second Fit return'd, and then the Physicians told the Duke, that the King was not like to live a day to an end; so Father Huddleston was sent for to do the Priest's Work in the Popish way. He gave the King the Host, and the Wafer sticking in his Throat, the Earl of Feversham call'd for Water to wash it down. Bishop Ken press'd him to receive the Sacrament according to the Church of England; he made him no Answer. However, Ken gave him Absolution: for which, says my Lord of Sarum, he was blam'd, since the King express'd no sense of Sorrow for his past Life. It was thought to be a Prostitution of the Peace of the Church, to give it to one, who, after a Life led as the King's had been, seem'd harden'd against every thing that could be said to him. Ken was also censur'd for another piece of Indecency, He presented the Duke of Richmond, Lady Portsmouth's Son, to be blest by the King. Upon which some that were in the Room cry'd out, The King is our common Father, and they all kneel'd down for his Blessing, which he gave them. But in what a Condition he was to bless, or to be blest'd, appears by what Bishop Burnet says: "He recommended Lady Portsmouth to the Duke of York, over and over again. He said he had always lov'd her, and he lov'd her now to the last, and besought his Brother, in as melting Words as he could fetch out, to be very kind to her and to her Son. He recommended his other Children to him, and concluded, Let not poor Nelly starve, meaning Mrs. Gwyn." He continued in the Agony till Friday 11 a-clock in the Forenoon, Feb. 6, 1684-5, and then died, in the 54th Year of his Age, after he had reign'd 24 Years, 8 Months and 9 Days, reckoning from the Restauration; and from the Death of his Father, 36 Years and 8 Days.

The Bishop of Salisbury adds, There were many apparent Instances of his being poison'd; for tho' the first Access look'd like an Apoplexy, yet it was plain in the Progress of it, that it was no Apoplexy. "When his Body was open'd, the Physicians who view'd it were, as it were led by those who might suspect the Truth, to look upon the Parts that were certainly found. But both Lower and Needham, two famous Physicians, told the Bishop, they plainly discern'd two or three blue Spots on the out-side of the Stomach. Needham call'd twice to have it open'd, but the Surgeons seem'd not to hear him. And when he mov'd it the second time, he, as he told Bishop Burnet, heard Lower say to one that stood next to him, Needham will undo us by calling thus to have the Stomach open'd, for he may see they will not do it. They were diverted to look on something else, and when they return'd to look upon the Stomach, it was carry'd away,

"so that it was never view'd." Thus did Foreigners speak of it, Ce fut dans ce temps que Charles mourut apres trois jours de maladie non sans soupçon que l'on eut contribue a sa mort. At that time dy'd Charles II. of a Sickness which held him three Days, not without suspicion that his Death had been help'd forward. Echard after having seen some of these strong Proofs, is so supercilious as to say, After the best and strictest Enquiries, we never could enter far enough into those dark Recesses, as to make any just Discovery. But our Inquiries have had better Success, and no Fact can be better prov'd by Historical Evidence, than King Charles's being poison'd is in this. The Duke of Buckingham and Bishop Burnet clear his Brother King James of the Guilt of it, which I cannot do; for tho' it is granted that he was not an Accomplice in the Murder of his Brother, yet he could not but know more than is said here of his being poison'd; and his making no Inquisition after his Brother's Blood, brings him in for a sufficient Share of the Guilt of it, unless it can be imagin'd that he never heard of any of the Circumstances here related, and of the Care which was taken, that the Physicians Lower and Needham should not examine the suspected Parts at the Dissection; nor ever heard that Dr. Short, one of his own Religion, declar'd, not only that the late King was poison'd, but that he himself was also poison'd for declaring it. Echard and all of them expatiate on the general Sorrow for the Death of this King, and their Panegyricks follow him to the Grave, purely on account of his breaking his Oath with the Scots Presbyterians, in his abjuring the Covenant, and his breaking his Word and Promise with the English Presbyterians in the stinging Acts against them: For otherwise what good Quality had he to deserve the Eulogies of Protestant Divines? As to the Earl of Mulgrave's, afterwards Duke of Buckingham, Character of him, I have a word or two to say to it presently. Echard, who on all such Occasions runs away with the common Vogue, takes that Lord to be a great Wit, and a great Orator, as well as a great Man, and has therefore printed that Character: And I have nothing to object against his good Opinion of the Lord Mulgrave in this place, but I have some Objections to his Lordship's Characteristicks, when I have observ'd after Mr. Acherley, why it was that the People were so sorrowful at his Death: "The immediate Prospect of the Duke of York's Succession added to the King's Life a vast Value, in regard his Life was believ'd to be the only Barrier against the immediate Entrance of Popery." Again; "And now the time was come that King Charles must taste the Fruit of his own Incredulity, and the Nation the Fruit of that Interruption he gave to the Parliament's making Provision, and a Defence to preserve to him his Life, and to the Kingdom Safety from Popery and Slavery: For the Popish-Plot was executed on him, and he perished on the 6th of February 1684; by violent Means, and Popery and Slavery with his Successor rushed in upon the Nation."

"It was wonderful, considering this King's Breach of the Triple-Alliance, and his Treatment of his Parliaments for ten Years together, his artful and even obstinate evading the making necessary Alliances and Wars, and other Provisions to defend the Nation against the excessive Power of France and the just Fears of Popery; I say, 'tis wonderful that this Reign pass'd without Tumults, and even

The Learned Lawyer might have added, and considering too his throwing 2 or 3000 pious worthy Ministers out of their Churches into common Jails, and his suffering the very Scum of his Kingdom Ecclesiasticks and Layicks, to harrafs, oppress, and ruin the most sober and industrious of his Subjects for Conscience sake: And his causing the Lord Russel, Colonel Sidney, and so many innocent Persons to be murder'd under pretence of the Forms of Law; considering also his vicious Life and Conversation, his Contempt of all Religion, his Profusion on some Occasions, and his Sordidness on others: I say again, It is wonderful that his Reign pass'd without Tumults, and even a general Revolt. Echard and the other Reverend and Compleat Historian represent this very Reign, as Halcyon Days, and a second Golden Age.

Earl of Mulgrave's Character of King Charles II. examin'd.

The Earl of Mulgrave, afterwards Duke of Buckingham, begins his Character of King Charles with his Religion, which he thinks was Deism; and in praise of it adds, which is vulgarly, tho' unjustly, accounted none at all. This Opinion very much confirms that of his own Deism, express'd in the Epitaph he wrote for himself. A Man who lives in defiance of all Christian Principles, may well be reckon'd of any Religion rather than of the Christian: and so far it may be justly said King Charles was a Deist, as not being a true Christian in his Practices; but most sure it is, that he was a Papist: and that the Libertinism of Deism agreeing very well with Popery, his Lordship chose rather to make him of his own Religion, than of his Brother the Duke of York's. Again, He threw himself into the Arms of a Roman Catholic Party, being tired out with the bold Oppositions in Parliament. We have prov'd and it is known that he was a Papist before the Restoration, and consequently this fine Argument is left extremely naked. The Papists are so remarkable for their Loyalty, witness the Reigns of Henry VIII. Edward VI. Queen Elizabeth; Witness the Gun-Powder-Treason Plot in King James's Reign, the Rebellion in Ireland in the Reign of King Charles I. Father White's Vindication of Oliver Cromwel, &c. He was surely inclin'd to Justice; witness the many Instances which are given of it in the Administration of Scotland: Witness again the Deaths of the Lord Russel, Colonel Sidney, Sir Thomas Armstrong, &c. in England; but his Lordship's Reason for it is more merry than convincing. He shew'd his Love of Justice, by his Injustice to the Nation in sticking so close to his Brother's Succession. I am weary of it, and shall only add that part of the Panegyrick, which one would take Lord Mulgrave to be the most competent Judge of, it relating to Wit: He was witty in all Conversations, and telling a Story so well, that not out of Flattery, but for the Pleasure of hearing it, we used to seem ignorant of what he had repeated to us ten times before. Quite contrary to this, Bishop Burnet informs us, He went over his Stories so often and so copiously, that all those who had been accusom'd to them grew weary of them, and when he enter'd on them they usually withdrew. Nay, his Story-telling occasion'd this Repartee from Wilmot Earl of Rochester; I wonder to see a Man have so good a Memory as to repeat the same Story without losing the same Circumstances, and yet not remember he had told it to the same Persons the very Day before. Lord Mulgrave, He was of a merciful Disposition. Bishop Burnet, He seem'd to have no Bowels, or Tendernefs in his Nature. Enough sure to shew what the Earl of Mulgrave's Character of him is, as finely as it is introduc'd by the Archdeacon, drawn by the ingenious Pen of the Earl of Mulgrave, a Person of sufficient Skill and Acquaintance. One might be very pleasant with both of them upon it, but it is not a place for it: I shall conclude all concerning this Prince with the Character given of him by the several Parties in England, copy'd from the Introduction to Lord Mulgrave's Character of him.

A. D. 1684.

Printed by Baldwin 1696. The Papists Character of King Charles.

"The Roman Catholics cannot deny his many good Offices to them and their Church; yet they accuse him of Cowardice and Diffimulation, as having play'd fast and loose with them, and they were therefore impatient to have his Brother on the Throne.

"The high-flown Churchmen did mightily admire him, Mr. Archdeacon knows whom the Author means perfectly well, because he re-stor'd them to their ancient Dignities, and made them Lords Paramount to all other Parties; so that they would neither see any of his Faults when he was alive, nor will they hear of them now he's dead, for the persecuting Acts he pass'd in their favour.

"The Cavaliers were some of them very well pleas'd, and others of them as highly disgusted with his Conduct, according as he answer'd or disappointed their Expectations. And it was very observable, that his Cousin Prince Rupert the Cavalier-General, with many of those who had fought for his Father, did at last grow dissatisfy'd with his Administration.

The Cavaliers Character of him.

"The Tories ador'd him for advancing the Prerogative, and giving them the Ascendant over the Whigs, whom they prosecuted for their Lives, Reputations and Estates.

Whigs Character of him.

"The Whigs, tho' many of them had a Personal Esteem for him, were never contented with his Administration, and generally entertain'd this Character of him: That he gave himself up to all sensual Pleasures without Controul, and was irreconcilable to any who interrupted his Lusts. That he debauch'd the Nation more in its Manners, than ever any other King did before him. That he squander'd away the ancient Revenues of the Crown, which were esteem'd sacred, and left such a Debt upon it as was never before heard of. That he prostituted his Majesty, by being a Pensioner to France, and advanc'd the Power of that Monarch to the endangering of the Liberties of Europe. That he imbroil'd his own Subjects in intestine Feuds, and did so vitiate all publick Offices both sacred, civil, and military with Bribery and Corruption, as it will be hard to reform them. That he was ungrateful to the Nation for their Loyalty and the incredible Sums which they pour'd upon him. That he lessen'd the Reputation and Strength of the Kingdom, over-turn'd the Laws, and invaded the Properties of his Subjects.

"The Dissenters again scarcely afford him one good word, but attribute all the Corruption of our Morals to the ill Conduct of his Reign and his own bad Example. They charge him with advancing the Interest of the Church of Rome, and as having been an open Fautor of Hobbesism, Deism, &c. They charge him also with the greatest Perjuries that ever were heard of; as the Breach of the Solemn League and Covenant, and his Declaration from Bre-da. They complain of his having weaken'd the Protestant Interest in the Nation, by setting one Party of Protestants to destroy the other, and exposing all Piety and Seriousness to Ridicule. They upbraid his Memory with his Whoredoms, which has so much infected the Youth of the Nation, and is attended by such dismal Consequences."

King pro-

His Speech.

MR. Archdeacon begins this Reign with a very false flattering Character of the King, which is easily prov'd, by comparing it with Bishop Burnet's, and it will be found to agree with the Bishop's, as his Account of the King's being proclaim'd agrees with my Lord of Sarum's. Echard, The Proclamation was read and solemniz'd in all the most usual Places in the City of London; all People began now to wipe their Eyes, and to dry up those Tears they had so plentifully shed; and all Heats and Prejudices against the late Duke of York seem'd to have been lost and swallow'd up amidst the loud Acclamations of the People. Bishop Burnet, "The Proclamation was a heavy Solemnity, few Tears were shed for the former, nor were there any Shouts of Joy for the present King; a dead Silence follow'd it thro' the Streets." The Archdeacon's History of King James's Reign, is all much of a piece with this for Sincerity and Truth. When the Privy-Counsellors return'd from proclaiming him, he made a Speech to them, That he was resolved to defend and maintain the Church of England, and to preserve the Government in Church and State as establish'd by Law: Which, says Echard, gave great Satisfaction. And, says Bishop Burnet, "The Pulpits of England were full of it, and of Thanksgivings for it. It was magnify'd as a Security far greater than any that Laws could give. The common Phrase was, We have now the Word of a King, and a Word never yet broken." He had broken his Word to God in abjuring the Protestant Religion, in which he was baptized and bred; yet Echard will have it, the strict Observance of his Faith acquir'd him the Title of James the Just, the Beauty of which is only in the jingling of the Initials. I shall not dwell much on Matters in this Reign, the Remembrance of which I still keep with Abhorrence. Hints only must do for Facts, that there may be the more room for Reflections.

The King was proclaim'd at Edinburgh and Dublin, as he had been at London. All Officers were by Proclamation continu'd in their Offices: And then comes the Archdeacon's pompous Account of the Funeral of the late King, of which, and of his Corpse, I beg leave to repeat some things after the Bishop of Salisbury, to shew the Gratitude and Piety of James the Just. He did not lie in State, no Mourning was given, and the Expence of it was not equal to what an ordinary and Corpse.

A. D. 1685. nary Nobleman's Funeral will rise to. Many upon this said, that he deserv'd better from his Brother, than to be thus ungratefully treated.

King James ungrateful to him. Fulsome Addresses were every Day, and almost every Hour of the Day, presented to the new Monarch; two of them were very remarkable ones, that from the Middle Temple thank'd his Majesty for taking the Customs contrary to Law,

He seizes the Customs. It was presented by that upright Person Sir Humphry Mackworth, Son of Col. Mackworth, who shut the Gates of Shrewsbury against the late King, and Mr. Bartholomew Shower, Brother to Mr. John Shower, the noted dissenting Minister.

Addresses. The other most remarkable Address came from the University of Oxford, who promis'd to obey the King without Limitations or Restrictions; but Thanks be to Heaven, they were not as good as their word. The King's Promise pass'd for a thing so sacred, that they were look'd on as ill bred who put in their Address our Religion establish'd by Law, which look'd like a Tie on the King to maintain it, whereas the Style of the more courtly was to put all our Security upon the King's Promise. The Clergy of London added a Word to this in their Address, Our Religion establish'd by Law, dearer to us than our Lives. This had such an Insinuation in it as made it very unacceptable; some follow'd their Example, but this was mark'd to be remember'd against those that had so menacing a Form.

The reverend Clergy of London began early to bear their Testimony against the Advances which Popery was making; but the Country Clergy of the minor Orders continu'd their Rage against Protestant Dissenters, which made them blind to any Danger from the Papists. Soon after the late King's Death, the new King caus'd Hudleston the Priest to declare and publish that his Brother King Charles dy'd a Papist, and had receiv'd the extreme Unction, Eucharist, and all the Popish Viaticums. There were also found in his strong Box two Papers, which King James and the Duke of Ormond witness'd were the King's own Hand-writing. The noble Argument was to prove the Necessity of an infallible visible Church-Guide, which could be no other than the Church of Rome, which is handled as merrily as in Mouffe Montagu's Answer to Bay's Hind and Panther, as for the Nonsense, tho' the Air is more grave and solemn: The King publish'd them himself, as if his pious Brother had written them by his own Study, tho' the Imposture appear'd plainly by the Quotations out of Scripture, which Bishop Burnet assures us he never read, but to make a Jest of it; all who knew him did without any sort of doubting conclude that he never compos'd them. This is James the Just, who deals so treacherously with the Memory of his Brother; this is the King of his Word. The second Sunday after he came to the Throne, he, to the Surprise of the whole Court, went openly to Mass, and sent Caryl to Rome with Letters to the Pope, but without a Character.

The Earl of Rockester was made Lord Treasurer. This is the same Earl of whom the Marquis of Hallifax complain'd, that there were Rasures and Leaves cut out in the Treasury-Books when he was in that Employment, as Commissioner, before. The Earl of Clarendon his Brother was made Lord Privy Seal. The Bishop adds, Rockester on his Advancement became so violent and boisterous, that the whole Court join'd with the Queen, Mary of Modena, to support the Earl of Sunderland as a proper Ballance to him; accordingly he was made Secretary of State, Lord Godolphin was made Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, the Marquis of Hallifax President of the Council.

The Duke of Ormond Lord Steward of the Household.

The Lord Viscount Newport Treasurer.

The Lord Maynard Comptroller.

Henry Savil Esq; Vicechamberlain.

Henry Bulkeley Esq; Master of the Household.

Sir Stephen Fox,

Sir William Boreman,

The Duke of Beaufort Lord President of Wales,

Thomas Vernon of London Esq; Marmaduke

Dayrel Esq; And a Scandal to all Chivalry,

Roger L'Estrange, were made Knights.

Echard defiles his History again with the Merit of this Knighthood, In Consideration of his eminent and unshaken Loyalty to the Crown in all Extremities, and as a Mark of singular Satisfaction his Majesty has in his present, as well as past Services, with repeated Declarations of his royal Grace and Bounty towards him. The very Wretch this, of whom the Lord L— said in the House of Peers, He's one of the greatest Villains upon Earth, a Rogue beyond my Skill to delineate, he deserves, of all Men, to be hang'd, and I believe I shall live to see that be his Fate. Indeed never Villain was so often so near the Gallows as he, and yet so often escap'd it.

One cannot without Mirth read what Echard tells us about this King and his Queen's Coronation on the Day of St. George for England, April 23. Of the Beauty of the Spectacle of a beautiful Queen, and of the Medals that were struck upon the King's Victories and Trophies, and of the Crown's tottering on the King's Head; insomuch, that the Honourable Henry Sidney Esq; Brother to Col. Sidney, in whose Murder the Duke of York was so much concern'd, once kept it from falling off, saying, This is not the first time that our Family have supported the Crown. The Coronation Oath was now alter'd by Archbishop Sancroft, as it had been done by Archbishop Laud for this King's Father. I say it notwithstanding I have Echard before me, who pretends to prove that Laud made no such Alteration, and his Proof is that King Charles the First refused it, and that as to King James II. 'twas only an Aspersion thrown upon him by Sir Robert Atkins, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, in an eloquent Speech he made to Sir William Ashurst, Lord Mayor of London, when he was in that Court; and then having put his own Credit into the Scale against the Lord Chief Baron, he makes this bold but senseless Reflection, Only we may say thus much, that when a known Fal- State Tracts 1 join'd with a great Improbability, the latter may as well be suppos'd to be a Mistake as the former is without Doubt and Question. What a Head he has! because the one Assertion is not true, supposing it as he asserts, therefore the other is false.

The Parliament met in Scotland the 28th of March, and I shall insert a Passage or two of the King's Letter, to shew the Delicacy of Thought and Expression. I am resolv'd to maintain my Power in its greatest Lustre, that I may be the better enabled to defend your Religion against phanatical Contrivances, Murderers, and Assassins. Whoever has a mind to see the Duke of Scots Parliaments Queensbury the Lord Commissioner's Speech, or the Lord Chancellor's the Earl of Pertb, may find them in the Archdeacon's Book, as also the Parliament's Address, promising to extirpate all Fanaticism: And an Act anent That all such Persons as being cited in Cases of High Treason, Field or House Conventicles, or Church Irregularities, shall refuse to give Testimony, shall be liable to be punish'd, as guilty of those Crimes re- P. 756 spectively,

A. D. 1685. respectively, in which they refus'd to be Witnesses. Thus, says Echard, all things appear'd calm and quiet in Scotland.

An Historian must have more Temper than I boast of, to read the Archdeacon's Relation of Oates's Trial, without wishing him some Part of his Punishment; for tho' he was not butcher'd as Colledge was, yet the Infernal Cruelties that were unjustly inflicted on him, I am about to prove they were Unjust as well as Infernal, make a Man to reflect with Horror on a Writer that could speak of them with Applause; and indeed it is very great Pity that other Notice has not, or cannot be taken of it. This Man, says he, who had been call'd a Doctor of Divinity, and the Saviour of the Nation, was now look'd upon as a vile wretched Cheat; his Conviction did sensibly strike at the Credit of the Popish Plot; he was ty'd to a Cart, where he made hideous Bel-lorings, and swooned several Times with the Greatness of the Anguish; the second Day he was not able to go or stand, he was then dragg'd upon a Sledge, where he became a dismal Spectacle to the People. To this Echard adds something which shews the great Delight he took in it, who could better judge of his Punishment than his Crimes. The infamous L'Estrange said Oates was scandalously drunk, and that was the Reason he could not stand, and Echard copies him. I am sure the Reader will have need of all his Patience on this occasion. The Perjury pretended to be prov'd upon Oates was twofold, for swearing to the Consult April the 24th, when the St. Omers Boys swore he was in their College; and again that Ireland was in Town between the 8th and 12th of August, whereas in Truth, quoth Echard, he was at that Time, and for several Days before and after in Staffordshire. I have elsewhere prov'd this to be as false as ever any thing came from the Father of Falshood, to which I must add another Proof, that Oates was in Town the 24th of April was prov'd by Sir Richard Barker, Mr. Walker a Minister, Mr. Page, Mr. Clay a Romish Priest, Mrs. Mayo, Sarah Ives, Mr. Smith, Oates's Schoolmaster, and Butler, Sir Richard Barker's Coachman.

That Ireland was in Town between the 8th and 12th of August was sworn by Sarah Payne; and Mr. Jenison hearing Ireland deny'd his being then in Town, when the other knew that he was, it so disgusted him at a Religion that allow'd lying with a Man's last Words, that he who was before a Papist turn'd Protestant, and declar'd it upon Oath at Lord Stafford's Trial, which he confirm'd when he was dying. Of these Things, Hints have been already given, what follows is new Evidence.

One Mr. Hinton, a Goldsmith in Lombard-street, was Ireland's Cashier: and Mr. Hinton going out of Town between the 8th and 12th of August 1678. met Ireland at or about Barnet, coming from London, when Ireland told him he had extraordinary occasion for Money, urging Hinton to go back with him; but Hinton said his Man could do Ireland's Business as well as himself, and his Affairs would not permit him to go back. Mr. Coke ask'd Mr. Hinton the Truth of this, to which he evaded giving a direct Answer; but it is enter'd in Hinton's Cash-Book, paid to Mr. Ireland's own Hands, whereas the other Entries are paid to his Order; and Mr. Hinton's Man offer'd to swear he paid those Moneys to Ireland himself. Hinton afterwards failing, a Commission of Bankrupt was sued against him, and his Books of Account were deliver'd, and kept at Vernon's Coffee-House behind the Exchange, where any one might have seen the Entry paid to Ireland himself. Mr. Coke adds,

A. D. 1685. I am sure Hinton was in Court to have testify'd this at Oates's Trial, but was terrify'd from it for fear of being undone.

Echard, on the Evidence of Popish perjur'd Wretches, and contrary to all this, repeats again, He who was stil'd the Saviour of the Nation, was now treated as the most vile and profligate Impostor. The infamous Jefferies, carefully copied by him, told the Jury, There does not remain the least Doubt but that Oates is the blackest and most perjur'd Villain that ever appear'd upon the Face of the Earth; he would have excepted himself, if his Impudence had not been equal to his Villainy. Sir John Holt, Sir Henry Pollexfen, Lords Chief Justices, Sir Robert Atkins Lord Chief Baron, with six Judges more, being all that were then in the House of Lords, unanimously declar'd to their Lordships, May the 25th 1689. That the Judgments against Oates were contrary to Law and antient Practice, and therefore erroneous, and ought to be revers'd; instead of which, Echard tells us, The Lords could not be prevail'd on to blanch his Reputation, it is all the Wit he has, or restore him to the Capacity of being an Evidence; but he would not tell us that

The Duke of Bolton, The Lord Wharton, Lords for Oates.
The Earl of Macclesfield, The Lord Grey,
The Earl of Bridgewater, The Lord Cornwallis,
The Earl of Bolingbroke, The Lord Herbert,
The Earl of Stamford, The Lord Valigban,
The Earl of Bath, The Lord Eure,
The Earl of Oxford,

were for blanching his Reputation, and among other Reasons had these: "Because the said Judgments are barbarously inhuman and unchristian, and there is no Precedent to warrant the Punishment of whipping, and committing to Prison for Life, for the Crime of Perjury, which yet were but one Part of the Punishments inflicted upon him, because the principal Matters upon which these Indictments were founded, were the Points objected against Mr. Oates's Testimony in several Trials, in which he was allow'd to be a good and credible Witness, tho' testify'd against him by most of the same Persons who witness'd against him upon these two Indictments, &c."

In the Punishment of Mr. Thomas Dangerfield there was the same diabolical Cruelty as in Oates's Case; 'twas for writing and publishing that very Narrative, which was printed by Order of the House of Commons. The Court will be brought to a Reckoning for these things before we have done with them, so we may spare Reflection. The compleat Historian, who was a greater Dignitary than even Mr. Archdeacon, writes thus of Dangerfield, In his Return from Tyburn towards Newgate after his whipping, being in a Coach he had reproachful Words given him by one Robert Francis, a virulent Papist, and was run by him into the Eye with a Tuck at the End of a Cane, of which he dy'd soon after. Francis 'Tis true Francis was hang'd for it, but Echard hang'd for it. does what he can to blanch his Reputation; instead of a virulent Papist, he attests, he was an obedient Son of the Church of England; instead of a Tuck at the End of a Cane, he says 'twas a small Bamboe, and a Stroak over the Eye; but he is forc'd to correct that, and own 'twas into the Eye, because it affected his Brain. Bishop Burnet calls Francis a brutal Student of the Law, instead of which the Archdeacon says, he led a quiet inoffensive Life. 'Tis very plain that this Action was very grateful to him, or he would not have falsify'd the Story in favour of such a Villain as Francis.

A. D.
1685.

About the same time, the latter end of May, the pious, reverend, learned and eminent Mr. Richard Baxter was brought to a Trial on an Information against him in the King's Bench before that detestable Monster Jefferies, for whose Infamy there is nothing in the Dregs of Language too foul. He was thrown into Jail the 28th of February, and kept there till the 30th of May, when he was brought to the King's Bench Bar, accompany'd by Sir Henry Ashurst. His Counsel having before mov'd for Time, Jefferies cry'd out in a Fury, I will not give him a Minute's time more to save his Life. We have had to do with other sorts of Persons, but now we have a Saint to deal with, and I know how to deal with Saints as well as Sinners; yonder stands Oates in the Pillory, and he says he suffers for the Truth, and so says Baxter; but if Baxter did but stand on the other side of the Pillory with him, I would say two of the greatest Rogues and Rascals in the Kingdom stood there. The Cerberus! Jefferies no sooner came into Court, than he sat down with great Indignation in his Face. A short Cause being call'd and try'd, the Clerk began to read the Title of another. *You Blockhead you, cries Jefferies, the next Cause is between Richard Baxter and the King. The Passages mention'd in the Information were pick'd out of Mr. Baxter's Paraphrase on the New Testament by Roger L'Estrange. And as we read in Dr. Calamy, a certain noted Clergyman put into the hands of his Enemies some Accusations out of Romans 13, as against the King, to touch his Life, but no use was made of them. The great Charge was, that in these several Passages he reflected on the Prelates of the Church of England, and so was guilty of Sedition, &c. The King's Counsel open'd the Information at large, with its Aggravations. Mr. Wallop, Mr. Williams, Mr. Rotheram, Mr. Phipps, and Mr. Atwood were Mr. Baxter's Counsel, and had been feed by Sir Henry Ashurst. Mr. Wallop said, "I conceive the Matter depending being a Point of Doctrine, it ought to be refer'd to the Bishop his Ordinary: But if not, I humbly conceive the Doctrine is innocent and justifiable, setting aside the Innuendo's, for which there is no colour, there being no Antecedent to refer to: i.e. no Bishop or Clergy of the Church of England nam'd. The Book accus'd, i.e. the Comment on the New Testament, contains many eternal Truths, but they who drew the Information are the Libellers, in applying to the Prelates of the Church of England those severe things which were written concerning some Prelates, who deserv'd the Characters which he gave. My Lord, I humbly conceive the Bishops Mr. Baxter speaks of, as your Lordship, if you have read Church-History, must confess, were the Plagues of the Church and of the World." Jefferies then interrupted him thus, Mr. Wallop, I observe you are in all these dirty Causes; and were it not for you, Gentlemen of the Long Robe, who should have more Wit and Honesty, that support and hold up these factious Knaves by the Chin, we should not be at the Pass we are. "My Lord, says Mr. Wallop, "I humbly conceive, that the Passages accus'd are natural Deductions from the Text." You humbly conceive, says Jefferies; and I humbly conceive, swear him, swear him. Mr. Wallop, Under Favour I am Counsel for the Defendant; and if I understand either Latin or English, the Information now brought against Mr. Baxter, upon such a slight Ground, is a greater Reflection upon the Church of England, than any thing contain'd in the Book he's accus'd for. Jefferies cut him short,*

Mr. Baxter's Trial.

*Sometimes you humbly conceive, and sometimes you are very positive: you talk of your Skill in Church-History, and of your understanding Latin and English; I think I understand something of them as well as you; but, in short, must tell you, That if you don't understand your Duty better, I shall teach it you. Upon which Mr. Wallop sat down. Mr. Rotheram urg'd, That if Mr. Baxter's Book had sharp Reflections upon the Church of Rome by Name, but spake well of the Prelates of the Church of England, it was to be presum'd, that the sharp Reflections were intended only against the Prelates of the Church of Rome. Jefferies said, *Baxter is an Enemy to the Name and Thing, the Office and Persons of Bishops. Mr. Rotheram added, Mr. Baxter frequently attends Divine Service, goes to the Sacrament, and persuades others to do so too, as is certainly and publicly known, and has in the very Book so charg'd, spoken very moderately and honourably of the Bishops of the Church of England. Mr. Baxter spoke, My Lord, I have been so moderate, with respect to the Church of England, that I have incur'd the Censure of many of the Dissenters upon that account. Baxter for Bishops, cries Jefferies, That's a merry Conceit indeed! Turn to it, turn to it. Mr. Rotheram turn'd to a Place, where 'tis said, That great Respect is due to those truly call'd to be Bishops amongst us, or to that purpose. Ay, says Jefferies, This is your Presbyterian Cant, truly call'd to be Bishops; that is, himself and such Rascals call'd to be Bishops of Kidderminster, and other such Places, Bishops set apart by such factious, sniveling Presbyterians as himself. A Kidderminster Bishop he means, according to the Saying of a late learned Author, and every Parish shall maintain a Tithe-Pig Metropolitan. Mr. Baxter beginning to speak again, Jefferies said, "Richard, Richard, dost thou think we'll hear thee poison the Court, &c. Richard, thou art an old Fellow, an old Knave; thou hast written Books enough to load a Cart, every one as full of Sedition, I might say of Treason, as an Egg is full of Meat. The dull Beast! Hadst thou been whipp'd out of thy writing Trade forty Years ago, it had been happy. Thou pretendest to be a Preacher of the Gospel of Peace; and thou hast one foot in the Grave, 'tis time for thee to begin to think what account thou intendest to give. But leave thee to thyself, and I see thou'lt go on as thou hast begun. I know thou hast a mighty Party, and I see a great many of the Brotherhood in Corners waiting to see what will become of their mighty Don, and a Doctor of the Party, looking to Dr. Bates, at your Elbow; but by the Grace of Almighty God, I'll crush you all." Mr. Rotheram sitting down, Mr. Atwood began to shew, that not one of the Passages mention'd in the Information ought to be strain'd to that Sense, which was put upon them by the Innuendo's; they being natural when taken in a milder Sense. Nor could any one of them be apply'd to the Prelates of the Church of England, without a very forc'd Construction. To evidence this, he would have read some of the Texts; but Jefferies cry'd out, You shan't draw me into a Conventicle with your Annotations, nor your sniveling Parson neither. My Lord, says Atwood, "I conceive this to be expressly within Roswell's Case, lately before your Lordship." *You conceive, cries Jefferies, you conceive amiss. Mr. Atwood went on, "My Lord, that I may use the best Authority, permit me to repeat your Lordship's own Words in that Case." No, you shan't,

A. D.
1685.

A. D. 1685. shan't, says Jefferies, you need not speak, for you are an Author already, tho' you speak and write impertinently. Says Arwood, "I can't help that, my Lord, if my Talent be no better; but it is my Duty to do my best for my Client." Then Jefferies bellow'd against Arwood's Writings; and Arwood justify'd what he had written to be in Defence of the English Constitution, declaring he had never disown'd any thing he had written. Jefferies, several times, order'd him to sit down, but he still went on, saying, "My Lord, I have a Matter of Law to offer for my Client, &c. he cited several Cases wherein it had been adjudged, That Words ought to be taken in the milder Sense, and not to be strain'd by Immuendo's." Well, cries Jefferies, when he had done, you have had your Say. Mr. Williams and Mr. Phipps said nothing, for they saw 'twas to no purpose. At length Mr. Baxter himself said, "My Lord, I think I can easily answer all that is laid to my Charge, and I shall do it briefly; the Sum is contain'd in those few Papers, to which I shall add a little by Testimony." But he would not hear a Word, and proceeded to direct the Jury in a long railing Harangue, which would have been a Scandal to Whitechapel Court, where this Brute was once a bawling, starving Petty-Fogger. 'Tis notoriously known, there has been a Design to ruin the King and the Nation, the old Game has been renew'd, and this has been the main Incendiary. He is as modest now as can be. But Time was, when no Man was so ready at, Bind your Kings in Chains, and your Nobles in Fetters of Iron; and to your Tents, O Israel. Gentlemen, for God's sake, don't let us be gull'd twice in an Age, &c. He told the Jury in the Conclusion, That if they in their Consciences believ'd he meant the Bishops and Clergy of the Church of England, in the Passages which the Information refer'd to, they must find him guilty, and he could mean no Man else; if not, they must find him not guilty. When he had done, Mr. Baxter said, Does your Lordship think any Jury will pretend to pass a Verdict on me upon such a Trial? I'll warrant you, Mr. Baxter, said he, don't you trouble yourself about that. The Jury immediately laid their Heads together at the Bar, and found him guilty. As he was going away, Mr. Baxter told Jefferies, A Predecessor of yours had other Thoughts of me. Jefferies reply'd, There is not an honest Man in England but what takes you for a great Knave. He had subpoena'd several Clergymen, who were in Court, but were of no use to him, thro' the Rage of the wicked unjust Judge. The Trial being over, Sir Henry Ashurst led Mr. Baxter thro' the Crowd, and convey'd him away in his Coach. On the 29th of June Judgment was given against him to pay 500 Marks, and to lie in Goal till he paid it. Echard says, in excuse of this Injustice and Violence, There were Reasons and Provocations for it, to punish an innocent Man.

Mr. Baxter found guilty.

And find 500 Marks

The King not a King of his Word.

A Parliament call'd

We have seen how Echard magnifies King James for being a King of his Word, James the Just. Was the following Instance out of Bishop Burnet a Proof of it? Some days after his coming to the Crown, he promis'd the Queen and his Priests, that he would see his Concubine Mrs. Sidley no more: This just Monarch living in a Course of Adultery with Sir Charles Sidley's Daughter, whom he had debauch'd. Orders were sent to Mrs. Sidley to leave her Lodgings in Whitehall, yet he still continu'd a secret Commerce with her.

The King having summon'd a Parliament to meet the 19th of May, the Archdeacon introduces it with an account of the Elections, which is, to Astonishment, full of Falshood. "Peoples Minds were fill'd with Expectations and Longings for the Meeting of the Parliament, and the Fate of the Nation seem'd to depend on that Assembly, which was to support it in this difficult Juncture. In order to this grand Business, the Elections were generally carry'd on and compleated with the most uncommon Coolness, Discretion and Unanimity; and notwithstanding the unjustifiable modelling so many Corporations since the last Parliament, there never was a House of Commons more able and more industrious in preserving the Happiness of the King, the Nation and the Church." 'Tis for the sake of the last, directly contrary to Truth, he gives us this Account of the Elections. Now read Bishop Burnet: "All Arts were us'd to manage Elections, so that the King should have a Parliament to his mind. Complaints came up from all the Parts of England of the Injustice and Violence us'd in Elections, beyond what had ever been practis'd in former Times; and this was so universal over the whole Nation, that no Corner of it was neglected. In the new Charters that had been granted, the Election of the Members was taken out of the hands of the Inhabitants, and restrain'd to the Corporation-Men, all those being left out, who were not acceptable to the Court. In some Boroughs they could not find a number of Men to be depended on, so the neighbouring Gentlemen were made the Corporation-Men; and, in some of them, Persons of other Counties, not so much as known in the Borough, were nam'd. This was practis'd in the most avow'd manner in Cornewal by the Earl of Bath, who put the Officers of the Guards Names in almost all the Charters of that County, which sending up forty-four Members, they were for the most part so chosen, that the King was sure of their Votes on all Occasions. Echard again, "It consisted, for the most part, of the richest and wisest Men of the Kingdom." Bishop Burnet again, "They were neither Men of Parts nor Estates." Echard, "There were 55 of noble Families, 95 Barons, 96 Knights; the rest were commonly Gentlemen of the best Interest, Credit and Knowledge in their Countries." Bishop Burnet, "Having neither Riches nor Parts, there was no hope left, either of working on their Understandings, or of making them see their Interest. This gave all thinking Men a melancholy Prospect. England now seem'd lost, unless some happy Accident should save it. All People saw the way for packing a Parliament. Further, as to Echard's carrying the Elections with uncommon Coolness, Discretion and Unanimity, see what as good a Churchman as himself, Sir Edward Seymour said in a Speech about the Petitions. "The Complaints of the Irregularities in Elections are so great, that many doubt whether this is a true Representative of the Nation or not? Little Equity is expected upon Petitions, where so many are too guilty to judge justly and impartially. It concerns us to look to these." Coke says, The King told the Members, such as they were. And again, The Parliament of King James, if it be worthy to be call'd so; yet does Mr. Archdeacon give a List of fifty or sixty of them, as a Sample of their Wisdom; as Robert Brady, M. D. Parliament-Man for Cambridge; Sir Lionel Jenkins, Parliament Man for Oxford; Sir Roger L'Estrange, Sir Peter Rich, Sir William Pritchard, Sir John Moor, Mr. Theophilus

The King's Speech to them was much the same as that he had made to the Privy-Council, only he requir'd them to settle the Customs and temporary Excise upon him, but he had taken both before they gave them, and call'd them by that Title, His Revenue. And this Parliament, if they were worthy to be call'd a Parliament, says Coke, being made to his hand, he might do and say to them what he pleas'd. Which he did, assuming the same Airs as a Boris, or an Abdelmelek would have done on the same occasion, if there had ever been a Parliament at Morocco or Moscow, and probably the Senators would have been just such another Representative. Sir John Trevor was chosen Speaker, the same who was afterwards expell'd the House of Commons for Bribery. The King told them in his Speech, he had heard of Argyle's landing in Scotland, and that he would take care the Rebellion should meet with the Reward it deserv'd. The Commons thank'd the King for his most gracious Speech, and immediately order'd a Bill of his Revenue to be brought in by Mr. Finch, who distinguish'd himself at Lord Russel's Trial by scribere est agere, and some People call'd him so ever after. This Money-Bill increas'd the Revenue to above two Millions a Year, according to Echard, whose Informations were very imperfect. His Revenue was much more. The Customs alone were 800000 Pounds a Year, and the other Branches of his Revenue amounted to 1600000 Pounds a Year, which with his own Revenue as Duke of Tork, being 150000 Pounds per Ann. rose the whole annual Receipt to 2550000 Pounds a Year, three times as much as ever any King of England had before Charles II. The House of Lords order'd the Impeachments against the Earl of Tyrone, the Earl of Danby, the Earl of Powis, the Lord Arundel of Wardour, and the Lord Bellasis, to be annull'd, four Lords only dissenting, the Earls of Radnor, Anglesea, Clare and Stramford. There was also a Bill brought into the House of Peers, to reverse the Attainder of the Lord Stafford; against which the Earls of Anglesea and Radnor and other Peers protested, and gave so good Reasons for it, that 'tis strange it should ever have past through that House to the House of Commons, as Echard tells us it did. But Bishop Burnet informs us, It stuck with the Lords, and would not go down.

The House of Commons, if, as Coke says, they deserve to be so call'd, were readier to give Money than the King to ask it; and to make the most of such an Assembly, the Courtiers projected many Laws to ruin all that oppos'd their Designs. The most important of these was, an Act declaring Treasons during this Reign, by which Words were made to be Treason, and the Clause was so drawn, that any thing said to disparage the King's Person or Government, was made Treason, within which, every thing said to the Dishonour of the King's Religion, would have been comprehended, as Judges and Juries were then modell'd. This was chiefly oppos'd by Sergeant Maynard, who, in a very grave Speech, laid open the Inconvenience of making Words Treason, and what he said made some Impression. But it is thought, if the Duke of Monmouth's landing had not shorten'd the Session, that and every thing else, which the Courtiers were projecting, would have pass'd. Never was greater Harmony, says Echard, between the King and the People; never were more fair Promises on one side, nor greater Generosity on the other. A slavish Submission to the imperious Commands of an arbitrary Prince, he calls Harmony; a vile Profusion of the Nation's Treasure, without the least Appearance of Necessity or Reason, he calls Generosity; and all for the sake of this odious Vote, May the 27th, That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, to desire him to issue forth his Royal Proclamation, to cause the Penal Laws to be put in Execution against Dissenters from the Church of England. As long as there is any such Faction alive, so long are they sure of his Applause, and this King will have his best Word. Let him do what he will with every one and every thing else, provided Persecution has still her Claws on Protestant Dissenters. Bishop Burnet saw what this fatal Agreement between King James and his pack'd Parliament would come to, and tells us, 'twas happy for England that they sat no longer in the first Sessions; for the King doing every thing to provoke a Protestant and Free Parliament, even this Parliament grew at last a little resty.

But while they were in extasy for the Blessings they expected from him, they gave him new Duties on Sugars and Tobacco, which he said he would only make Trial of, and if he found them injurious to his Plantations, he would not take them; contrary to which, this King of his Word, had perpetual Complaints from the Plantations, that those Duties would ruin them, yet he made use of that Money as long as he had a Penny of the publick Treasure to receive. Of this I am my self a Witness, and know as much of the Matter as any other Person can.

Having mention'd the Earl of Argyle's being in Scotland, I shall observe, that his Lordship had offer'd to join with any powerful Body that would appear in Scotland or England against the Tyranny of the Times, two Years before this, if he could be advanc'd 8000 Pounds, and 1000 Horse were sent to Scotland; but as all Motions of that kind were Embrio's, so nothing came of it; and King Charles II. met with his Death from those very hands that murder'd his Protestant Subjects for conspiring it, as was pretended.

The King's great Revenue.

A. D.
1685.And the Duke of Mon-mouth's in England.

My Lord Argyle remain'd quiet in Friesland, and came not to reside at Amsterdam till after King James's Accession to the Throne, where he met with his Countrymen, who lay conceal'd there. The chief of them were the Lord Melville, Sir Patrick Hume, and Sir John Cockran. A rich zealous Widow having furnish'd him with 10000 Pounds, he laid it out in Arms and Ammunition, which was dexterously manag'd by one that traded to Venice, as intended for the Service of that Republick. The Lord Argyle and Sir Patrick Hume had some difference about the Place of landing in Scotland, which was made up by the Duke of Monmouth, who would gladly have gone to Scotland with them; but the Earl of Argyle was willing to keep that Command himself, and that the Duke of Monmouth should make a Diversion in England, for which he had made no Preparations. On his Father's Death he retir'd to Brussels, the Prince of Orange supplying him with Money. Lord Grey, and Lady Henrietta Wentworth, who was desperately in Love with him, follow'd him thither. The Lady, as well as the Duke, fancy'd that he being marry'd to his Dutchesse before he was of Age capable of a free Consent, the Marriage was null; so they liv'd together, and thought they did not break any Commandment. So apt is Passion to misguide Reason and Virtue! Major Wade and Ferguson press'd the Duke of Monmouth to land in England, so did Mr. Fletcher of Saltounie in Scotland, a Man of great Parts and Virtues; who not liking Lord Argyle's Scheme, resolv'd to run Fortunes with the Duke of Monmouth, who was flatter'd by the English Refugees, that all the West of England would be for him; which he was the more easily induc'd to believe, because when he was there in his Progress four or five Years before, Multitudes of People crowd'd from all Parts to welcome him, and follow'd him with Acclamations of Joy. His Counsellors reckon'd there would be no fighting, but that the Guards and others who adher'd to the King, would melt to nothing before him. They fancy'd the City of London would be in such a Disposition to revolt, that if he should land in the West, the King would be in great Perplexity. He could not have two Armies, and his fear of Tumults near his Person, would oblige him to keep such a Force about him, that he would not be able to send any against Monmouth; so they reckon'd he would have time to form an Army, and in a little while be in a Condition to seek out the King, and fight him on equal Terms. The Duke of Monmouth himself, and Mr. Fletcher thought they were in no Condition to make such an Attempt, for want of Money and Officers, and an Interest secur'd in the Country; but Lord Grey said Henry VII. landed with a smaller Number, and succeeded. Colonel Danvers gave them great Hopes of a Rising in or about London, and promis'd a Body of no less than 5000 Horse, and Horsemen were certainly engaged to be ready at an Hour's warning. Major Wade seem'd sure of Bristol; Mr. Dore of Limington, afterwards Col. Dore, was in the Secret, to act in those Parts either by rising or securing a Retreat upon occasion. All which Considerations turn'd the Duke's Head to those desperate Counsels, and pawning his Jewels, he bought Arms, which were put aboard a Ship freighted for Spain.

The Lord Argyle was first ready, and May 2d set sail from the Vlye in Holland with three small Ships, which arriv'd at Orkney in three Days. He sent out a Boat to get Intelligence, and to take Prisoners, which serv'd only to give Intelligence where he was himself; thence he sail'd round to the West Highlands, and landed at a Place call'd Dunstanfuge, a Castle of his own, which he garrison'd. He found at his Landing that the early Notice the Council had of his Designs had spoil'd his whole Scheme, for they had summon'd all the Gentlemen of his Country to Edinburgh, yet he got near 3000 Men about him; and if with these he had immediately gone over to the Western Counties of Air and Renfrew, he might have given the Government much Trouble, but he linger'd too long, hoping still to have brought more of his Highlanders together; but all the Country being call'd out against him, he cross'd an Arm of the Sea, and landed in the Isle of Bute, where he waited still for the coming in of the Highlanders. His Lordship left his Arms in a Castle, with such a Guard as he could spare, but they were routed by a Party of the King's Forces, and with this the Bishop of Sarum says, he lost both Heart and Hopes. He gave every thing for gone, put himself into a Disguise, and had almost escap'd, but he was taken. A Body of Gentlemen that had follow'd him forc'd their Way thro' the Enemy; the rest, which was the greater Part, fell into his hands, as Sir John Cockran, Mr. John Ayloffe, and Mr. Richard Rumbald the Maltster; these two last were Englishmen, and yet rather chose to go with Argyle to Scotland, than with Monmouth to England. I believe out of some Resentment of the Duke's Behaviour on his Reconciliation with his Father, or because they thought Lord Argyle a Republican. The latter express'd even a cheerful Calm under all his Misfortunes, he justify'd all he had done, for he said he was unjustly attainted, which had dissolv'd his Allegiance, and therefore 'twas Justice to himself and his Family to endeavour to recover what was so wrongfully taken from him; he complain'd of the Duke of Monmouth much, for delaying his coming so long after him, and for assuming the Name of King, both which he said were contrary to their Agreement at parting. Thus, says Bishop Burnet, he died pittied by all, except Mr. Archdeacon Echard, who, as if he had been the Dispenser of the tremendous Judgments of the Almighty, pours down Vengeance upon him in this foolish as well as impious Observation; That the late Earl of Argyle was taken in the same Month of the Year, in the same Week of the Month, in the same Hour of the Day, and was carry'd thro' the same Gate with the Marquis of Montrose, to display the retaliating Justice of Heaven. Lord Argyle was beheaded the 30th of June.

Colonel Ayloffe had a mind to prevent the Insolence and Barbarity of his Enemies, who, he was sure, would not spare him, tho' he was the Lord Chancellor Clarendon's Nephew. My Lord of Salisbury tells us, that having got a Penknife into his Hands, he gave himself several Stabs, and thinking he was certainly a dead Man, he loose cry'd out, Now I defy my Enemies. His Lordship proceeds:

"Rumbald was he that dwelt in Ryehouse, where it was pretended the Plot was laid for murdering the late King and present King." Echard affirms, it was not a pretended, but a true Plot. Rumbald deny'd the Truth of that Conspiracy at the Place of Execution; but said, He did not believe that God had made the greater Part of Mankind with Saddles on their Backs and Bridles in their Mouths, and some few boot'd and spurr'd to ride the rest.

Colonel Ayloffe was brought to London, the King examin'd him, and could draw nothing from him but one severe Repartee. He being fullen, and refusing to discover any thing, the King

His Saying.

1685. King said to him, Mr. Ayloff, you know it is in my power to pardon you, therefore say what may deserve it. He answer'd, Tho' it is in your power, yet it is not in your Nature to pardon. Sir John Cockran's Father, the Earl of Dundonald, brib'd the popish Priests, and for 15000 Pounds got his Son's Pardon.

The Business was over in Scotland before it began in England; for the Duke of Monmouth sail'd not from Holland till the 24th of May, and met with such bad Weather and Winds, that he was 19 Days at Sea. He had with him one Man of War, and two Tenders, aboard which were Arms for about 5000 Men, Horse and Foot. He had also with him about 100 Officers and Gentlemen, and on the 11th of June he came into the Cobb at Lyme in Dorsetshire. As soon as he and his Men were landed, he commanded Silence, fell upon his Knees, and implor'd the Protection of Heaven in a short Prayer. Then drawing his Sword, he led his Men up into the Town, where he muster'd his little Company, and set up his Standard. Being ask'd whom they were for, they declared for the Protestant Religion. The chief Persons who accompany'd the Duke were, Lord Grey, a German Count, Colonel Holmes, Colonel Matthews, Colonel Foulks, Sir Joseph Tyley, Major Perrot, Major Wade, Captain Annesley, Dr. Temple, Dr. Oliver, Dr. Gaylard, &c. The two Hewlings, Mr. Speak, Mr. Bettiscomb, Mr. Jenkins, Col. Joshua Churchill, and others came in to him after his Landing.

Duke of Monmouth's Expedition.

He publish'd his Declaration, which was long, and ill penn'd, supposed to be drawn by Fergusson. It charged the King with the burning of London, the Popish-Plot, Sir Edmond-bury Godfrey's Murder, the Earl of Essex's Death, with poisoning his Brother, and many more Crimes. It set forth, that the King's Religion made him incapable of the Crown, that three subsequent Houses of Commons had voted his Exclusion. It further charg'd him with the taking away the old Charters, and all the tyrannical Acts of the last Reign. The Elections of the present Parliament were exclaim'd against, and the People appeal'd to when met in a free Parliament. This Declaration brought in great Numbers of the middling and ordinary sort of People, who soon wanted more Arms than he had for them. Above 14000 Men tender'd their Service to him before he went from Lyme, and about 6000 of them were regimented, tho' not compleatly arm'd.

I do not think it is worth while to copy Echard's Account of the Parliament's Usage of the Duke of Monmouth, as soon as the King had told them he was landed. The News was brought to London by Thorold Mayor of Lyme, and Doffel a Custom-House Officer, who were both examin'd in the House of Commons, who voted to stand by King James, and to attain the Duke. The Bill was dispatch'd in less than two Days by the Commons; and being sent up to the Lords by Sir John Fenwick, who was afterwards executed for High-Treason, it was read in that House three times in one Day. The Commons also address'd the King to give 5000 Pounds to any one who would assassinate the Duke of Monmouth, which they call'd bringing of him dead or alive. And on a small Hint from him, that this Tumult would put him to some Charge, they without hesitation gave him 400000 Pounds to beat Monmouth, who had not 400000 Pence in his military Chest. On the 2d of July, all the various Kinds of Money-Bills having been pass'd, the Parliament was adjourn'd to the 4th of August.

Echard, whose Manuscripts are just such Authenticks as that about Oliver Cromwell and the Devil, brags of one of Fergusson's relating to the Duke of Monmouth's Proceedings in the West; and he makes Fergusson tell us, that one of the Duke's Followers, who accompany'd him from Holland, was kill'd soon after their landing by another, whom he does not name, who was also one of his Companions, and who indeed was Mr. Fletcher of Saltoune; but the Man he kill'd was one of Taunton, or the Neighbourhood, who brought a great Body of Men from thence to join the Duke. The manner of it was thus: Fletcher The Duke design'd to give Fletcher the joint Command of the Horse with the Lord Grey, who was order'd out towards Bridport with a select Party of Foot to observe the Militia of Dorsetshire. Fletcher not yet furnish'd with a Horse, took the Taunton Man's without asking him leave, he being not in the way, and Fletcher thought that all things were to be in common amongst them which could advance the Service. When Fletcher return'd from the Enterprize he was sent upon, the Owner of the Horse, a rough ill-bred Man, reproach'd him in very injurious Terms for taking his Horse without asking his leave. Mr. Fletcher, who was naturally hasty and passionate, bore this longer than could have been expected from one of his Temper; but the other persisting in giving him foul Language, and offering a Switch or a Cane, Saltoune discharg'd a Pistol at him, and shot him dead. It was not possible for the Duke of Monmouth to keep Fletcher about him after this, without disgusting and losing the Country People, who were coming in a Body to demand Justice; so he advis'd him to go aboard a Ship that was bound for Spain. Fergusson in Echard's Manuscript says, The Gentleman kill'd the Man with a Pistol he snatch'd into his Hand for no other end, but to preserve himself from being caned by the Person whom he shot. Fergusson makes this unhappy Accident to be after Lord Grey's Retreat from Bridport. Bishop Burnet, who probably had the Adventure from Saltoune, makes it before it, when Grey was sent out with a small Party, and coming near some Militia, ran away at sight of them, but his Men stood. Lord Grey brought a false Alarm, which was soon found to be so; for the Men whom he had abandon'd came back in good order, after a warm Skirmish with the Enemy, whom they forc'd into Bridport, and kill'd several of them; as Captain Courtney Crocker of Devonshire, and Mr. Strangerways of Dorsetshire. The Duke of Monmouth, after Grey's cowardly Behaviour, saying to Colonel Matthews, What shall I do with him? Matthews reply'd, There is not a General in Europe that would ask such a Question but yourself, intimating that the least he deserv'd, was to have had his Command taken from him.

A. D. 1685.

Four days after he landed, the Duke march'd to Axminster in Devonshire, four Miles from Lyme. Christopher Monk, Duke of Albemarle, Son of General Monk, and Dr. Clarges's Sister, if the Evidence in the Trial of the Case between Bath and Montagu Temp. William III. was not true, had then with him about 4000 Militia Men of the County of Devon, and intended to quarter in the same Town that Night: But the Duke enter'd the Place before him with part of his Army, lin'd the Hedges, planted his four little Field-Pieces, and prepar'd for an Engagement, Monk being superiour to him in number. Instead of which, Duke Christopher march'd off in great Disorder and Confusion. It was a false step that the Duke took,

A. D. 1685. in not pursuing that Run-away; for he had certainly made himself Master of Exeter, and of most of the Arms of those Militia Men, who were no Enemies to his Cause; but he was of opinion not to fight till his Men were a little better disciplin'd.

Duke of Monmouth proclaim'd King.

Ferguson a Traytor.

The Jesuit Orleans's lying Book recommended by Echard, Ork. p. 277, 280.

On the 18th of June he arriv'd at the great and populous Town of Taunton, where he was received with such general Exultation, that one would have thought the People's Wits were flown away in the flights of their Joy. The Houses and Doors were adorned with green Boughs, Herbs and Flowers, and there was hardly a Hat to be seen without a Green Bough, the Mark of Distinction used by the Duke's Men. The next day 20 young Gentlewomen, with Colours ready made at the Charge of the Townsmen, presented them, says Echard, to his Grace with particular Solemnity. The Captain their Schoolmistress, went before them with a naked Sword in one hand, and a small curious Bible in the other, which she also presented with a short acceptable Speech. In answer to which, the Duke said, with an Air of great Satisfaction, I come now into the Field with a Design to defend the Truths contain'd in that Book, and to seal it with my Blood, if there is occasion for it. Here he was prevail'd with by evil Counsellors to assume the Title of King. I have been assured by Persons who were with him, and in his Confidence, that he never thought of it till after he landed, and was put upon it by that Arch-Traytor and Villain Ferguson, whose treasonable Practices since may very well make us suspect he was a Spy on him, and a secret Agent for the King. It is certain he had given his Word to the Earl of Argyle, Colonel Holmes and others, that he would pretend to no more than to act as General of the Forces that should join him against James Duke of York. He renew'd this Promise at Lyme to Mr. Lark the Baptist Minister there, who took the Command of a Troop of his Horse, and to the Republicans who came in to him, and who were the major Part of his Followers. The malicious Turn the Jesuit Orleans gives the Prince of Orange's Zeal on this occasion, shews us how much his Memoirs are the more authentick for their being given him by King James; which is, that the Duke of Monmouth having broken his Word with the Prince of Orange, and proclaim'd himself King, that Prince immediately dispatch'd Mr. Bentinck to King James to offer him his Service, both with his Person and all his Forces. I desire the Reader to remember that Orleans's Book is recommended by Echard, who says of him, he writes like a Man, true in History. Orleans affirms the Duke of Monmouth had promis'd to inthronize the Prince of Orange; and upon his hearing the Duke had caus'd himself to be proclaim'd King, he dispatch'd Bentinck, &c. Now the Duke was proclaim'd King at Taunton the 20th of June, according to Echard, and it was on the 20th of June that Bentinck had his Audience at Whitehall; so that it was impossible for the Prince of Orange to hear the Duke of Monmouth had proclaim'd himself King, till many Days after King James had refus'd to accept Assistance from his Son-in-law.

At Taunton the Duke (as King) publish'd three Proclamations, one treating King James as he had been treated by him, setting a Price on his Head. Another, declaring the Parliament of England a seditious Assembly. The third proclaim'd the Duke of Albemarle a Traytor. I have seen the Copy of a Summons he sent that High-born Prince, as Dursey call'd him, to surrender; but Duke Christopher defy'd his Summons, and wrote him a Letter, in which he told Monmouth, he had better have let his Rebellion alone. A. D. 1685.

Here the Reverend Historian is so supercilious as to question the Truth of what I have said, in the Secret History, of Monmouth's summoning the Lord Churchill, who lay at Chard with some regular Troops, Sir William Portman's Regiment of Somersetshire Militia, and a Regiment of Devonshire Militia. Tho' he deserves no such Compliance from me, yet to gratify him, I here let him know, that Mr. Henry Evans the Messenger, whom probably he has heard of, was then at Chard on a Message to Lord Churchill; that he saw the Duke's Summons, and Lord Churchill's making a Jest of it. This Lord harra's'd the Duke's Army more than all the rest of the King's Forces, which were indeed commanded by very sorry Generals, as the Prince of Orange observ'd to King James by Mr. Bentinck.

What Wonders Albemarle perform'd with the Devonshire Trainbands, have been seen already. The Duke of Beaufort commanded the Gloucestershire Militia at Bristol. The Duke of Somerset Part of the Militia of that County at Bath. The Earl of Pembroke the Wiltshire Trainbands at Chippenham: but all those Militia Men were no more to be depended on, than those of Somersetshire, whose red and yellow Liveries were the Ornament of the Duke of Monmouth's Army. A Regiment of Somersetshire Militia advancing to join those of Devon, and oppose the Duke of Monmouth's marching eastward, had no sooner enter'd a narrow Lane in their way, than observing the Mouths of 2 or 3 hollow Trees unluckily pointed to their Front, they immediately turn'd tail, and fled every Man to his own Home, except such as staid for the Duke of Monmouth's coming, and then went in to him.

The Duke, after he was proclaim'd King at Taunton, march'd to Bridgewater, eight Miles distant. He had then with him the greatest Number of Men that ever were for him together, near 6000 tolerably well arm'd. He was proclaim'd in this Town at the High Cross by the Mayor Mr. Alexander Popham, and his Brethren in their Formalities. Here his Declaration was read, and the Inhabitants with a sort of Emulation who should do most, sent all kinds of Provisions to the Soldiery in a rude sort of Camp in Castlefield near the Town, where six Regiments of Foot appear'd, distinguish'd by their Colours, and had the Face of an Army. He had then about 1000 Horse, Mares, Geldings and Colts, a Life-Guard of 40 young Men well mounted and arm'd, and maintain'd at their own Charge. Out of his Horse were pick'd two very good Troops, commanded by Captain Herwling, and Captain .... The Duke's Quarters were in the Castle, where King Charles II. and King James II. at several times had also their Quarters. Here he rais'd more voluntary Contributions than in any other place, by the Management of Mr. Roger Hoar, Mr. William Coleman, and other Inhabitants, great Friends and great Sufferers for this Cause, a very unaccountable one indeed at that time. From hence the Duke march'd to Glastonbury, and thence to Wells, where he was again proclaim'd King, and his Declaration again read. He was now advis'd to take to Mendip-Hills, and march directly to Bristol. I have a Contempt for the IF's in the History of the Rebellion, and the Archdeacon's History, because these IF's are the Foundation of their noble Fabricks: But IF he had been prevail'd with by Maj. Wade, Mr. Row, and the Bristol Men to have attack'd that

A. D. 1685. that City, the most important in England next to London, there is very great reason to believe he would have carry'd it; for there was a Conspiracy form'd in the City to receive him, and on a false Alarm only of his approach, a Ship was set on fire in the River, to draw the Militia that way, while his Friends admitted him. Bishop Burnet condemns his Conduct in neglecting Bristol, where he would have found much Wealth, and have gain'd some Reputation. The Duke's Soldiers thinking some of the Cathedral Men at Wells a little too impertinent, were somewhat free with their Appurtenances, which I think was all the Damage done by them. It seems the Duke, while he was in Holland, had thoughts of possessing himself of Bristol, or he would not have order'd a Vessel, aboard which he had a good Quantity of Arms, to have sail'd round Land up the Severn Channel to meet him there, which Vessel was intercepted by one of the King's Men of War, Capt. Trevanion Commander. Another ill Step.

From Wells the Duke march'd towards Bath, came in sight of, and summon'd it, but receiv'd an Answer of Defiance; so he halted at Cainsham, in the Road between Bristol and Bath, as well to refresh his Men, as to consider what to do. Here his Men were alarm'd by a Party of the King's under the Lord Newburgh, who advanc'd to Cainsham-Bridge, and were receiv'd with so much Gallantry by Monmouth's Officers and Soldiers, that they retir'd with loss, tho' they gave out that they had a Victory. From Cainsham the Duke, still too diffident of Success at Bristol, wheel'd about to Philippsorton, in expectation of Desertion from the several Bodies of Militia of Gloucestershire, Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Berkshire, who were certainly well inclin'd towards him; and I have heard some of their Officers declare, that they believ'd most of those Trainbands would have gone in to him, if they had had an Opportunity; sure I am, many of them wish'd him heartily well. At Philippsorton his Forlorn was attack'd by the King's Troops under the Duke of Grafton, who advancing to a Lane where the Duke of Monmouth's Men had planted one of his Cannon, lost several Troopers, and escap'd himself with difficulty. The Lord Newburgh was mortally wounded in this Action, as were several other Persons of Distinction. From hence the Duke of Monmouth march'd to the large Town of From, where he was receiv'd with loud Acclamations of Applause and Joy universal and unaffected. Here also he was proclaim'd King, and receiv'd the unwelcome and unexpected News of the Defeat of the Earl of Argyle; a very great Balk to him, which gave a sudden Damp to his Hopes, and put him upon another ill Step most fatal to his Enterprize: And that was to return to Bridgewater, and there expect the King's Forces, who hasten'd their March after him, and shut him up in that Town Saturday the 4th of July. Preparations, such as they were, had been made by the Duke of Monmouth's Men, to stand the Enemy's Attack. One Silver, an Inhabitant of the Place, Brother to Captain Silver Master-Gunner of England, invented a Machine, which would discharge many Barrels of Musquets at once. These were to be play'd at several Passes instead of Cannon; but the Noise of great Guns, and the Terror of Bombs, soon oblig'd the Duke to concert other Methods: and a Council of War being held, it was resolv'd to attack the King's Troops in their Camp on Weston-Moor, three Miles from Bridgewater. Their Cavalry lay in Weston, and their Artillery defended the Pass in the direct-Road to Bridgewater. Sunday about three a-clock in the Afternoon, the Duke of Monmouth, the Lord Grey, and the chief Officers went up into the Tower of Bridgewater Church, to take a View of the King's Camp in the Moor by the help of Perspective Glasses; and the Duke observing that Lord Dunbarton's Regiment of Foot Guards, which he had once been Colonel of, and by which he had been once extremely belov'd, were posted on that Side of the Camp that was propos'd to be attack'd, he express'd some Concern at it, saying, I know these Men will fight, and if I had them I would not doubt of Success.

The King's General the Earl of Feversham, and the King's Soldiers were very remiss, and the Country People, who heartily hated them, gave the Duke of Monmouth Information of it, who said, We shall have no more to do, than to lock up the Stable-Doors, and seize the Troopers in their Beds. About seven a-clock the Drums beat in Bridgewater for a Rendezvous in the Castle-Field, and several Meetings were privately held, where the Officers went to Prayers for a Blessing on their Undertaking; some of them praying in red Coats and Jack-Boots, a Sight that had not been seen in England before since the Restoration. After the Army was put in a proper Disposition, Orders were given for a March, without beat of Drum. About eleven a-clock at Night, I saw the Duke of Monmouth ride out, attended by his Life-Guard of Horse; and tho' then but a Boy, observ'd an Alteration in his Look, which I did not like; for not being able to judge of the Goodness or Badness of his Cause, I ran down with the Stream, and was one of its Well-wishers. All his Soldiers were forbid to fire a Pistol till they enter'd the Enemy's Camp. Their Guide Benjamin Newton, who promised to lead them thither a By-way, conducted them thro' Chedsey, to a Place where the Royne or Ditch, behind which the King's Troops were encamp'd, was fordable: And tho' Newton knew the Way, and every Inch of the Way, by Day or by Night, as well as it was possible for a Man to know it, and tho' he lov'd the Duke of Monmouth as well as it was possible for a Man to love him; yet such was his Concern on that important Occasion, that it confounded him, and he led the Monmouthians above the Ford: which otherwise would have open'd a Way for them into the Enemy's Camp, where the Soldiers were asleep in their Tents, and might have been cut to pieces by the Scythemen, of which the Duke had 500, and the Terror of the Weapon added to the Slaughter and Horror of the Night, would have given the rest of the Duke's Forces an easy Victory, as far as the Reason of a Thing can carry it without Experience. Captain Hucker of Taunton having receiv'd some Disgust, on account, as was said, of the Duke's refusing to make him Governour of that Town, tho' he could not spare him Men for a Garrison, fir'd a Pistol, while the Monmouthians were looking out for the Ford, which gave the Alarm to Dunbarton's Regiment, who put themselves into as good Order as they could to receive their Enemies. Monmouth's Men got over the Ditch with some difficulty, fell furiously on the King's Forces, took two Pieces of Cannon, and turn'd them on Dunbarton's and other Troops, which put the latter into disorder. The Alarm reach'd Weston, where Feversham Weston was safe a-bed, and made not so much haste in-Fight. to the Field, as to forget setting his Cravat-string at a little paltry Looking-Glass in one of the Cottages. Monmouth's Men began the Engagement with a Volley of Shot and Shouts; and their first Fire so confounded their Enemies, that that those who were nearest Weston ran into the Town; those who were in Weston ran to Middeley, and thro' that Place above a Mile from the Moor; so that had the Duke's Horse, or even the two Troops he had sent with Capt. Hewling to Minehead for Cannon, made any Opposition to the King's Cavalry, the Rout had been entire; for never did Infantry perform better than the Duke's did. Echard makes the Advantage the King's Horse had over Monmouth's owing to the Activity of Oglethorpe, a silly piece of Flattery on an insolent Bravo, who had no other Advantage over them than what was owing to the badness of the Enemies Troops, commanded by the Lord Grey, who could not get the Horse into a right Posture for fighting, most of them would hardly stand fire, and those consequently disorder'd the rest; upon which Grey rode up to the Duke, crying, All is lost, and it is time for you to shift for yourself. His Grace was then charging at the head of his Foot, with his wonted Gallantry, and the Stand they made was very extraordinary and promising, but his Carriages, with the Ammunition, drawing towards the Moor, met some of Grey's Horse upon the scamper, and these telling the Carters the Duke's Army was routed, the latter drew away their Carriages with the Ammunition in them, and stopt not till they got to Ware and Axebridge, 12 Miles off, where they or the Country People plunder'd them. In the mean time the King's Forces rally'd, and Merb, Bishop of Winchester, who was fitter for a Bombardier than a Bishop, I knew him well, and can say a great deal more of him, but I omit it out of Veneration to his Order, very officiously put his Coach-horses to the Artillery that was planted in the direct Road from Weston to Bridgewater, and causing those Guns to be drawn down against the Duke's Foot, the latter were gall'd by it extremely, yet still they stood their Ground, crying out, Ammunition, Ammunition, for the Lord's sake Ammunition, which not coming, and the Duke and Grey being gone with the Horse, the Foot fled after them, and the King's Horse pursuing them, kill'd twice as many as were slain in the Fight. I was upon the Spot before the Dead were buried, and, young as I was, observ'd the Slain to be more on the King's Part than on the Duke's, as they were distinguish'd to the Person who carry'd me thither, by one of the King's Soldiers; that Person was a Papist, and I was therefore put under his Protection, and he acted very generously and kindly on that Occasion. For after the Defeat, every body expected military Execution, except such as were of the Popish and Tory Factions. About 4 a-clock Monday Morning, the Run-aways began to come into Bridgewater, and I saw many of them so wounded, that I wonder'd how they could reach so far; one Fellow, particularly, had scarce lain himself down on a Bulk, when he dy'd away of his Wounds. Not above 300 of the Duke's Men were kill'd in the Action, and about 400 of the King's. Of the Duke's, as many were taken Prisoners as the King's Officers could find Places to confine them in. The chief were, Col. Holmes, Major Perrot, Capt Madders of Crookern; one Williams, a Domestic of the Duke's who had his Master's Cloak, and 200 Guineas, and Captain Adlam, who had about 100 broad Pieces quilted in his Buffcoat. He was so mortally wounded, that he could not have surviv'd it; but Feverham would not trust to that, so he order'd him to be hang'd the next day, and he was the first whom he hung up in Chains on the Moor between Weston and Bridgewater, where was a Range of Gibbets so decorated to a good length. The Duke of Monmouth, with about 30 Horse, made off on the Gallop, and by 5 a-clock in the Morning was 20 Miles from the Moor. Dr. Oliver, late Physician of Greenwich Hospital, was one of his Company, and the best mounted of any of them. He rode up to the Duke, and said, Sir, This is the farthest you can go, without throwing yourself into the hands of your Enemies, who are waiting for you all over the Country Eastward. No body has yet heard of our ill Success in these Parts, let us turn off to the Sea Coast over-against Wales, seize one of the Passage-Boats at Uphill, and get over to the other side, where I know you have Friends, among whom you will be safe till you can retire elsewhere. I had this from the Doctor himself. The Duke inclin'd to hearken to him; but the Lord Grey check'd Oliver for offering to give such foolish Advice, as he call'd it, and the Duke going away with him, God bless you, Sir, said the Doctor, with Tears in his Eyes, I shall never see you more, so setting Spurs to his Horse, he rode off to Bristol, about 12 Miles from that Place, and coming there some time before News came of the Duke of Monmouth's Defeat, he found means to get into the City, and into a Friend's House, who knew nothing of his having engag'd with the Duke, where he lay so long conceal'd, that he return'd to London in Company of Judge Jefferies's Clerk, to whom his Friend, who was a rank Tory, recommended him.

The Duke of Monmouth's Fate afterwards, is too well known to need enlarging upon. The Lord Grey was taken at Holbridge in Dorsetshire, and the Duke of Monmouth at Ringwood, Duke of not far off, by some Troopers of Lord Lumley's Mon-Horse. He made a Submission to the King, mouth taken and beheaded. who insulted him in the Audience he gave him, at the Desire of Queen Dowager. He repented afterwards that he had shewn such Meanness, and prepar'd himself for Death with a Firmness of Soul worthy the Character of a Hero, which he had justly acquir'd. He was beheaded on Tower-Hill, the 15th of July, after 3 or 4 Strokes; The Executioner, who, it is said, wish'd him well, once threw down the Ax, crying, I cannot do it. He was very much teaz'd at his Death by Turner Bishop of Ely, and Ken Bishop of Bath and Wells, who told him, He could not be a Protestant of the Church of England, unless he own'd the Doctrine of the Oxford Decree. Their Words were the Point of Non-resistance; but that was not the only thing in which they did very ill, to use Bishop Burnet's Words. Dr. Tenison's manner of treating him was more Christian-like and persuasive; he left those Points, in which he saw he could not convince him, to his own Conscience, and turn'd to other Things fit to be laid before a dying Man. The King refus'd to grant him a day longer on his earnest Request, tho' upon what account is not known. His last Words were, I repent of all my Sins in general, Duke's last of the Blood spilt on my account, and I fear Speech. the ill Consequence of my Enterprize. I die in the Faith of this, that God will work a Deliverance for his People, and then will be discover'd the great, horrid, and scarcely to be parallel'd Villanies our Enemies have been guilty of; adding, you see my Case is desperate, yet know I die a MARTYR for the People; the very Words of his Grandfather King Charles the First, at his Execution.

Bishop Burnet informs us how the Lord Grey Lord Grey escap'd. "He had a great Estate, that by his pardon'd. "Death was to go to his Brother Ralph Grey West.

"Grey Esq; whom the Court look'd on with an ill Eye, so they resolv'd to preserve him till he should be brought to compound for his Life. The Earl of Rochester had 16000 Pounds of him; others had smaller Shares." He was also oblig'd to tell all he knew; and the Lord Brandon Gerard, and Mr. John Hampden, were prosecuted on his Evidence.

From the Character of this King, one might have expected every thing that was sanguinary and cruel. The Bishop writes, "The Army was kept for some time in the Western Counties, where both Officers and Soldiers liv'd as in an Enemy's Country, and treated all who were believ'd to be ill affected to the King, with great Rudeness and Violence. Kirk, who had commanded long in Tangier, was become so savage by the Neighbourhood of the Moors there, that some days after the Battle he order'd several Prisoners to be hang'd up at Taunton, without so much as the Form of Law, he and his Company looking on from an Entertainment they were at; at every new Health another Prisoner was hang'd up; and they were so brutal, that observing the shaking of the Legs of those whom they had hang'd, it was said among them they were dancing, and upon that Musick was call'd for. This was both so illegal and inhuman, that it might have been expected some notice would have been taken of it; but Kirk was only chid for it, and that for Form-sake only." Col. Foulks, who was with the Duke of Monmouth, and afterwards commanded a Regiment in King William's Service, upbraiding Kirk with his Cruelty, he protested his Commission went further, and that he had put a Restraint on the Power and the Instructions which were given him; and tho' it is not to be attributed to his Humanity, but to his Avarice, 'tis certain many Persons escap'd by his pretended Pardons, which he sold for 20, 30, and 40 l. a piece; and tho' they were not good in Law, yet they gave those that bought them time to settle their Affairs and get to London, Holland, and other Places of Shelter. One thing must be remember'd of this Kirk, which shews he was apprehensive that King James would make such an ill Use of his Victory, as to occasion a more successful Attempt against him in a few Years. For when he took Leave of a Gentleman, Mr. Harvey of the Castle in Bridgewater, who had been very civil to him, he shook him by the Hand, and said, I believe it will not be long before I see you again; and by his Motions gave him to understand it would not be on the same side.

The Campaign was finish'd by Jefferies and four other Judges, supported by some Troops of Horse, and these Judges were still more cruel and merciless than Kirk, Ogleshorpe, or any of the Officers. Bishop Burnet tells us, "Jefferies's Behaviour was beyond any thing that was ever heard of in a civiliz'd Nation; he was perpetually either drunk or in a Rage, liker a Fury than the Zeal of a Judge. He requir'd the Prisoners to plead guilty; and in that case he gave them some hope of Favour if they gave him no trouble; otherwise, he told them, he would execute the Letter of the Law upon them in its utmost Severity. This made many plead guilty, who had a great Defence to make in Law. But he shew'd no Mercy, he order'd a great many to be hang'd up immediately, without also wing them a Minute's time to say their Prayers. He hang'd in several Places about six hundred Persons. The Impieties with which he treated them, and his Behaviour towards some of the Nobility and Gentry that were well affected, but came and pleaded in favour of some Prisoners, would have amaz'd one if done by a Bashaw in Turkey."

Lord Ralph Starvel, tho' a staunch Abhorrer, was so shock'd at the Report of his Cruelty and Brutality, that he would not see him, tho' then in the Zenith of his Grandeur; and Jefferies, in Resentment, order'd Col. Bovey of Taunton to be hang'd at Coltholstone, a Parish which belong'd to Lord Starvel, contrary to that Lord's good Liking, tho' Bovey had been one of the Sequestrators of that and other Estates of the Starvels. I have said that the Jesuit Orleans's Revolutions of England, notwithstanding the Recommendation of Mr. Archdeacon Echard, is a Book full of Lyes, and I am about to give another Proof of it. The French Priest is speaking of Jefferies's bloody Assizes, The King was inform'd of those Disorders too late; but as soon as it came to his Ears, he express'd his Displeasure, and tho' the Services perform'd by those that were accus'd, prevail'd with him to spare them, he, as far as in him lay, made amends for their Injustice. The Father of Lyes never told a greater. Read my Lord of Sarum, "The King had a particular Account of all Jefferies's Proceedings writ to him every day. He took pleasure to relate them in the Drawing-Room to Foreign Ministers, and at his Table, calling it Jefferies's Campaign, speaking of all he had done in a Style that neither became the Majesty nor the Mercifulness of a King. Dyckvelt was at that time in England, one of the Ambassadors whom the States had sent to congratulate the King's coming to the Crown. He told me, that the King talk'd so often of these Things in his hearing, that he wonder'd to see him break out into those Indelicacies; and, upon Jefferies's coming back, he was created a Baron and Peer of England; which is all the Amends King James made for his Injustice. Echard has inoculated this false Assertion of Orleans's into his own History.

I shall refer for the main of Jefferies's bloody Assizes to a Book so call'd, which, for the most part, is fairly tho' poorly writ. The Villain began his Villany, I beg the Reader to bear with this Language, when I am upon such Subjects, at Winchester, where he try'd Mrs. Alicia Lisle, Lady Lisle Widow of John Lisle Esq; Commissioner of the Great Seal, so often already mention'd, whom the Cavaliers assassinated in Switzerland. Sunday Night, after the Action in Weston Moor, Mr. Hicks, a dissenting Minister, Brother to the Nonjuror Dr. Hicks, once Dean of Worcester, came to Mrs. Lisle's House in Hampshire, with Mr. Nelthorpe in his Company. She knew Mr. Hicks, and treated him very civilly, not asking from whence he came; but Hicks told what brought him thither, for he and Nelthorpe had been with Monmouth, upon which he went out of the Room immediately, and order'd her chief Servant to send an Information concerning them to the next Justice of Peace, and in the mean while to suffer them to make an Escape. But before this could be done, a Party came about the House, and took both them and her for harbouring them. Jefferies resolv'd to make a Sacrifice of her, and obtain'd of the King a Promise that he would not pardon her, which the King own'd to the Earl of Feversham, when he, upon the Offer of 1000 Pounds if he could obtain her Pardon, went and begg'd it. No legal Proof was brought at her Trial, that she knew they were Rebels. The Names of the Persons found in her House were in no Proclamation, so

Jefferies affirm'd to the Jury upon his Honour, Monstrum Horrendum! That the Persons had confess'd they had been with the Duke of Monmouth. This was to turn Witness against her, after which he ought not to have judg'd in the Matter. And tho' it was insisted on as a Point of Law, that till the Persons found in her House were convicted, she could not be found guilty, yet Jefferies charg'd the Jury in a most violent manner, to bring her in guilty. All the Audience was strangely affected with so unusual Behaviour in a Judge, only the Person most concern'd, the Lady herself, who was then past Seventy, was so little mov'd at it, that she fell asleep. The Jury brought her in Not Guilty; but the execrable Judge, in great Fury, sent them out again, yet they brought her in a second time Not Guilty. Then he seem'd, as in a Transport of Rage, threatening them with an Attaint of Treason. Thus, overcome with Fear, they at the third time brought her in Guilty. The King, he has had his Reward, shew'd no other Favour, but that he chang'd the Sentence from burning to beheading. She dy'd with great Constancy of Mind, and express'd a Joy that she suffer'd for an Act of Charity and Piety. The chief of the Prisoners, whom Jefferies butcher'd, were, Col. Holmes, Christopher Bettiscomb Esq; Charles Speke Esq; Mr. Benjamin Hewling, Mr. William Hewling, Col. Bover, Capt. Madders, Col. Annesley, Capt. Larke, Mr. Matthew Bragg, Capt. John Hucker. Mr. Roger Hoar is put down in the List printed in the Bloody Assizes, but he was repriev'd a few hours before the time set for Execution, and was afterwards a Member of several Parliaments. Mr. Hicks the Minister was hang'd at Glasstonbury; and Echard prints his Speech, because he fancy'd there's a Word or two in it in favour of his darling Doctrine of Passive Obedience. It is not warrantable for any Subject to resist lawful Sovereigns. Did he ever meet with a Mortal so stupid or so mad, as to think it lawful to resist Princes governing by the Laws they had sworn to maintain? Hicks the quondam Dean being spoken to in his Brother's behalf, said, He would not speak for a Fanatick, tho' he had been Chaplain to one of the greatest Fanaticks in the World, Duke Lauderdale.

Lord-Keeper North's Death and Character.

Before Jefferies had shut up his Slaughtery-houses in the West, died the Lord-Keeper North, a crafty designing Man, says my Lord of Sarum: "He had no mind to part with the Great Seal, yet he saw he could not hold it. An Appeal against a Decree of his had been brought before the Lords in the former Sessions, and it was not only revers'd with many severe Reflections on him that made it; but the Earl of Nottingham, who hated him, because he had endeavour'd to detract from his Father's Memory, had got together so many Instances of his ill Administration of Justice, that he expos'd him severely for it; and it was believ'd that gave the Crisis to the Uneasiness and Distraction of Mind he was labouring under." He languish'd for some time, and died despis'd and ill thought of by the whole Nation. The Seal was kept for Jefferies, and given to him at his Return from the Field of Blood and Bribery, for he glutted his Avarice as well as his Cruelty, taking between 14 and 15000 Pounds of Edmund Prideaux Esq; of Ford-Abbey in Somersetshire, to stop a Prosecution, with which Money he bought a Manor, I think, in Leicestershire; but be it where it will, 'tis no more in his Name, which dy'd with his Son, except as much of it as lives in the Infamy of the Father.

Generally despis'd and ill thought of.

Sir Thomas Jones, who was made Chief Justice in his place, shew'd immediately that he was his most worthy Successor, and initiated himself in the same bloody Rites.

On the 13th of October, Alderman Cornish was on a sudden taken up for High-Treason, Cornish while he was following his Merchandize in great Security and Innocence; and on the 19th of October he was indicted at the Old Bailey.

Of these Kensey the Sheriff, Rawlinson the Foreman, and Clowdesley, were Tavern-Men. Sir John Hawles has so learnedly set forth the Injustice and Cruelty of this Gentleman's Treatment; that I must refer to his Remarks, and add what Bishop Burnet tells us of it. "Good-enough, who had been Under-Sheriff of London when Cornish was Sheriff, offer'd to swear against Cornish, and that Rumsey had not discover'd all he knew. So Rumsey, to save himself, join'd with Goodenough to swear Cornish guilty of that for which the Lord Russel had suffer'd; and this was driven on so fast, that Cornish was seiz'd on, try'd and executed within the Week. If he had got a little time, the Falshood of the Evidence would have been prov'd from Rumsey's former Disposition, which appear'd so clearly soon after Cornish's Death, that his Estate was restor'd to his Family, and the Witnesses were lodg'd in remote Prisons for their Lives. Mr. Cornish, at his Death, asserted his Innocence with great Vehemence, and with some acrimony complain'd of the Methods taken to destroy him. Upon which it was given out, that he died in a Fit of Fury: But Pen, the Quaker, who saw the Execution, said, that there appear'd nothing but a just Indignation that Innocence might very naturally give. He adries. ded, the King was much to be pitied, who was hurry'd into all this effusion of Blood by Jefferies's impetuous and cruel Temper." But what says my Lord of Sarum? If his own Inclinations had not been bias'd that way, and if his Priests had not thought it the Interest of their Party to let that BUTCHER loose, by which so many Men that were like to oppose them, were put out of the way; it is not to be imagin'd there would have been such a Run of barbarous Cruelty.

This Murder, in Defiance of eternal Justice, and the dreadful Vengeance of Heaven, does Echard impute to Cornish's concerning himself so much about hanging instead of beheading the Lord Stafford. He will have it to be a Judgment, a Retaliation from Heaven. Pray God the dreadful Judgments he has call'd down on so many innocent Persons, be not retaliated on his own Soul.

About

A. D. 1685. About the same time, Mrs. Elizabeth Gaunt, a Widow in or near Wapping, was brought to a Trial. Bishop Burnet's Account of it is the best. She was a Baptist, who spent a great part of her time in Acts of Charity, visiting the Jays, and looking after the Poor of what Persuasion soever they were. One of Monmouth's Men, James Burton, found her out, and she harbour'd him in her House till she might have an Opportunity to send him abroad. He went about in the Night, and having heard that the King should say, He would sooner pardon the Rebels than those that harbour'd them, he, by an unheard of Baseness, went and deliver'd himself, and accus'd her that harbour'd him. There was no Witness to prove that she knew the Person she harbour'd was a Rebel, but the Rebel himself; yet the Judge charg'd the Jury to bring her in guilty; which they did, and she was condemn'd and burnt. She died with a Constancy even to a Cheerfulness, which struck all that saw it. She said, Charity was a part of her Religion as well as Faith, and she only fed an Enemy. So she hoped she had her Reward with him for whose sake she did this service, how unworthy soever the Person was that made so ill a Return for it. She rejoic'd that God had honour'd her to be the first that suffer'd by Fire in this Reign, and that her Suffering was a Martyrdom for that Religion which was all Love. Mr. Pen told the Bishop of Salisbury he saw her die. She laid the Straw about her for her burning speedily, and behav'd herself in such a manner, that all the Spectators melted into Tears. Such indeed was the Behaviour of all that suffer'd at this time. "Most of them, according to Bishop Burnet, express'd such a calm Firmness at their Death, and such a Zeal for their Religion, which they believ'd was then in danger, that it made great Impressions on the Spectators." But is so far from making any Impression on Echard, Their Behaviour was strange, says he. I am not at all surpriz'd at it, that such pious Sentiments as Mrs. Gaunt's are strange things to him. Their Words in their dying Speeches were shocking to the King's Party. The Words of the murder'd innocent Persons were shocking to their Murderers, very likely indeed!

Mr. Fernly, Col. Ayloff, and Mr. Nelthorp executed. One Mr. John Fernly was hang'd at Tyburn for harbouring the same James Burton. Now also were hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, Colonel Ayloff and Richard Nelthorp Esq; before-mention'd; the latter before Gray's-Inn-Gate in Holborn, the former before the Temple-Gate in Fleet-street. All which bloody and barbarous Executions gave a general Horror, to use my Lord of Sarum's Words, to the Body of the Nation, and it let all People see what might be expected from a Reign that seem'd to delight in Blood. Some of the fairest of the Tories began to relent a little, and to think they had trusted too much, and gone too far. The King had rais'd new Regiments, and given Commissions to Papists. 'Tis no matter for all this, "King James's Affairs, according to the Archdeacon, seem'd now in the greatest Height and Splendor, and to promise a firm and settled Felicity. The late dangerous Storms appeas'd," &c."

A Proclamation was publish'd against George Speke Esq; Francis Charlton Esq; John Wildman Esq; and John Trenchard Esq; who all kept out of the way. John Speke Esq; Son of George Speke of Whatlackington in the County of Somerset, who had been with the Duke of Monmouth, made his escape beyond Sea, and spent this Reign of Tyranny in Travel. The Lord Brandon Gerrard was try'd for High-Treason at the King's-Bench Bar, convicted and condemn'd. John Hampden Esq; expecting no Favour, says Echard, pleaded guilty. Says Bishop Burnet, "He was told he must expect no Favour, unless he would plead guilty; which he did, and begg'd his Life with a Meanness which gave his Spirits such a Depression and Disorder, that he could never quite master it, and in conclusion hurry'd him on to cut his own Throat."

England is now an Aceldema, the Country for 60 Miles together, from Bristol to Exeter, had a new and terrible sort of Sign-Posts and Signs, Gibbets, and Heads and Quarters of its slaughter'd Inhabitants. Every Soul was sunk in Anguish and Terror, sighing by day and by night for Deliverance, but shut out of all Hope by Despair.

On the 6th of November the Parliament met, and the King made a Speech to them. He told them how happy his Forces had been in reducing a dangerous Rebellion, in which it had appear'd how weak and insignificant the Militia was, and therefore he saw the Necessity of keeping up an Army for all their Security. He had put some in Commission, of whose Loyalty he was well assur'd, and they had serv'd him so well, that he would not put that Affront on them and on himself to turn them out. Thus he fell upon the two most exceptionable Points, a Standing Army, and a Violation of the Test-Act. There were some Debates in the House of Lords about thanking the King for his Speech. It was press'd by the Courtiers as a piece of Respect that was always paid. The Earl of Devonshire said, he was for giving Thanks, because the King had spoken out so plainly. The Courtiers carry'd it, and the King was thank'd after a rate.

The Earl of Middleton mov'd in the House of Commons for an Increase of Forces, which was warmly oppos'd by the Country Party. However, they voted a Supply, but rejected the Words towards the Support of the additional Forces, and order'd a Bill to be brought in to make the Militia useful. Yet the Spirit of Slavery prevail'd still so much amongst them, that they gave the King 700000 Pounds, hoping it would have made way for their Address against his dispensing with the Laws in favour of Popish Officers. The King told them he did not expect it from them; but however they proceeded on their part, he would be steady in all his Promises, and be just to his Word. On the Report of the King's Answer, even this House of Commons was struck dumb with Indignation; Fear and Resentment shut up every Mouth for a while: And when John Coke Esq; Burgess for Derby, said, He hop'd they were all true Englishmen, and not to be frighted out of their Duty by a few hard Words, he was immediately sent to the Tower. When the House of Lords began to debate the King's Speech, they were told, that by giving thanks for it, they had precluded themselves from finding fault with any part of it. The Lords Hallifax, Nottingham, and Mordaunt oppos'd this; so did the Bishop of London, who spoke often not only his own Sense, but the Sense of the whole Bench of Bishops, who at last began to awake out of their Lethargy, to look about them, and see the Torrent of Popery and Slavery threatening to break in upon them. Jefferies began to argue with his rough manner, but he was soon taken down; it appearing, says Bishop Burnet, "That how furiously soever he rav'd on the Bench, yet where others might speak with him on equal Terms, he was a "very

A. D. 1685. "very contemptible Man, and he receiv'd as much Mortification as such a brutal Man as he was capable of."

Earl of Stamford petitions the Lords.

The Earl of Stamford, who had been committed to the Tower for High-Treason in July last, had been deny'd Pen, Ink, and Paper, petition'd the Lords that he might be heard in Parliament. He was brought to their Bar November the 17th, where he complain'd of his long and strict Confinement. The House of Peers order'd that he should have Pen, Ink, and Paper, and be try'd in Westminster-Hall the first of December; before which time the Parliament was prorogu'd, and the Earl accepted of the King's general Pardon. Lord Delamere presenting the like Petition to that most Honourable House, setting forth that he had lain a Prisoner in the Tower ever since the 26th of July for High-Treason, the Lords were told by Jefferies, that Preparations were making for the Trial of that Lord, and if he was not try'd accordingly, he might be bail'd. But try'd he was, and Jefferies was Lord High Steward on that Occasion. There was one Witness only to prove he intended a Rising in Cheshire; and that Witness Saxon was so profligate a Rascal, and so inconsistent in his Evidence, that the Lords acquitted the Lord Delamere, tho' it was believ'd there was something true in the main of what he swore. Bishop Burnet speaks again of Mr. Finch the Solicitor-General; "Pursuant to the Doctrine he had maintain'd in former Trials, he made a violent Declamation, to prove that one Witness, with presumption, was sufficient to convict one of High-Treason: but 't signify'd nothing, he had been continu'd in his Employment only to lay the Load of this Judgment on him, and he acted his part with his usual Vehemence."

Lord Delamere try'd and acquitted.

Finch Solicitor-General his Behaviour.

The Pardon before-mention'd had so many Exceptions and Intricacies in it, that it was hardly worth accepting, and seem'd rather design'd to betray People, than to save them. Among others was excepted John Webber Gent. the present Town-Clerk of Bridgwater, which I mention for that he is still living, about 45 Years after, and tho' excepted, was very far from deserving it for his Affection to the Duke of Monmouth or his Cause. The Court was so unmerciful, that they excepted the poor Girls of Taunton, who gave Monmouth Colours, out of their pretended Pardon; and every one of them was forc'd to pay as much Money as would have been a good Portion to each, for particular Pardons. This Money, and a great deal more, was said to be for the Maids of Honour; whose Agent Brent the Popish Lawyer, had an Under-Agent one Crane of Bridgwater, and 'tis suppos'd that both of them paid themselves very bountifully out of the Money which was rais'd by this means; some Instances of which are within my Knowledge.

1686.

A. D. 1686.

WE have mention'd the Prorogation of the Parliament in November last, and when it was to have met again, February 10th, 'twas prorogu'd to the 10th of May, then to the 22d of November, then to the 15th of February, and then to the 28th of April 1687; but they never met more, and it had been well for England, if they never had had a Being. The King resolv'd to have no Parliament, till he could be sure of a Majority to take off the Penal Laws and Test, that he might destroy the Church of England, and establish a Tyranny over Men's Bodies and Souls. He could not accomplish these things without getting the remainder of Parliament dissolv'd.

the Charters into his hands, and modelling Corporations; in which, he employ'd those vile Wretches Brent, Graham, and Burton; which Graham, a starving Pettyfogger of Clifford's-Inn, he impos'd as a Burgess on the Borough of Windsor, in Eckard's Wife and Rich Parliament: which like a sudden Storm blew over impetuously, made great waste, and was no more heard of. While there was an Appearance of Courts of Justice, and the Forms of Law, there must be Judges; and to bring them to his Lute, the King closetted those that then sat in Westminster-Hall, to bargain with them for their Seats, which they were to keep only on condition they would sell him their Consciences, and declare for his Power of dispensing with those Laws of which they were the Dispensers. He began with Sir Thomas Jones, who, stain'd as he was with the Blood of Cornish, could not bring himself to lye so all at once to God, the King, and the Kingdom, as to declare that the King's Will was the Law. Jones said plainly, I cannot do it. The King reply'd, I will have twelve Judges of my Opinion. Jones reply'd, Possibly you may find twelve Judges of your Opinion, but you will scarce find twelve Lawyers to be so. His ill Success with this and other Judges, made him turn out the Tools which he had hitherto work'd with, to take away the Lives and Properties of the best Men in the Kingdom, and put other Tools still more wicked and more worthless in their Places; which was done against Easter-Term, April 21.

Their Motto was Deus, Rex, Lex. The King before he Law.

The latter, Christopher Milton, was an unworthy Brother of the great Poet John Milton. He starv'd by his Practice, and to mend his Market, turn'd Papist. He was one of the dullest Fellows that ever appear'd with a Bar-Gown upon his Back in Westminster-Hall. But being of the King's Religion, a Phrase now us'd at Court and elsewhere, he was thought fit to be made a Popish Knight and a Judge, as was soon after Richard Alibone of Gray's-Inn Esq; And on July 17, the Earl of Powis, the Lord Arundel of Warwick, the Lord Bellasis, the Lord Dover, and Richard Talbot, now made Earl of Tyrconnel, all rank Papists, were sworn of the Privy-Council.

The Courts in Westminster-Hall being so well fill'd, Work is soon found for them. Miles Prance, Evi-

A. D. 1686. Evidence against Green, Berry, and Hill, who murder'd Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, was indicted for Perjury, having been persuaded to plead guilty, and Sentence was formally pass'd on him as against Oates, but it was never executed. This Farce over, the next Prosecution to the same Tendency was against Mr. Samuel Johnson, who had the Courage to write an Address to the English Protestants in King James's Army; for which he was try'd and condemn'd, as Prance had been, to be whipp'd from Newgate to Tyburn, and the Sentence was executed upon him with a Barbarity exceeding any thing we read of Pagan Tormentors. Such were the Effects of the King's Religion and his Temper. Crew Bishop of Durham, Sprat Bishop of Rockester, White Bishop of Peterborough, perform'd the Drudgery of degrading this Reverend and Learned Divine; and Crew and Sprat drudg'd on as long as they hop'd to get, or to save themselves by it.

Mr. Edward Whitaker was fin'd a thousand Marks for justifying the Parliament of Forty-One, which was justify'd by the Parliament of 1660.

George Speke Esq; before-mention'd, was fin'd two thousand Marks for assisting his Friend Mr. Trenchard, afterwards Secretary of State, in making his escape.

I shall not enlarge on the Arguments for and against the King's dispensing Power, which chang'd the Constitution from a limited to an unlimited Monarchy, from a Free Government to a Tyranny; for the Lesson we learnt at the Revolution, and the restoring of the Constitution at that time, have made all Arguments for dispensing Power absurd and ridiculous: but that the Reader may have one clear View of it in a few Words, I will state the Case after Mr. Acherley.

The King's future Steps were gaz'd at as so many Emanations of his arbitrary Will, until the Measures of his Misgovernment became full; for the King avowedly departed from the known Laws, and assumed a Power above them, making his Will his Law in Government.

He then speaks of his making Father Petre and the Popish Lords Privy-Counsellors, and the Popish Lawyers Judges. To enable the Judges and Privy-Counsellors to execute those Offices and Places, the King granted them Dispensations and Powers to break the Laws, which made them incapable to hold those Places and Offices, and also incapacitated all Military as well as Civil Officers. The common Doctrine industriously spread at Court was, That the King's Power to dispense with, i.e. to unmake and vary the Laws was Law, meaning the Imperial or Civil Law; for it must be own'd, that by that Law, in Countries where it presides, the King is the sole Legislator, and has in him the whole Power to make new Laws, and to alter old ones, there being no difference between the Power that makes the New, and the Power that alters the Old. The Law itself hath enacted the Incapacity of the Officer to hold and enjoy the Office, and the Penalty impos'd on the Person who presum'd to hold or execute an Office, of which he was made incapable, contrary to this Law; therefore the Penalty is but part of the Law.

Wherefore to have this dispensing Power pass for Law, King James did as the King his Father had before done in the Business of Ship-Money. Is not this another Proof of the Design of the Stuartine Princes to introduce Arbitrary Government, which is what I took upon me to prove?

Further, the King in the same manner irregularly and preposterously engag'd the Judges to prejudge the Case, and agree the Judgment, that the King might by Law dispense with, that is, alter and unmake all the Penal Laws; which Opinion was subscrib'd by all the twelve Judges, except Sir Thomas Street, one of the Judges of the Common-Pleas: And in order to establish this Dispensing Power, as a standing Rule of Law to bind all Men, a mock Cause was fram'd for one Godden a Coachman, against his Master Sir Edward Hales, a Popish Colonel, wherein Godden brought his Action of Debt upon the Test-Act, for the Penalty of 500*l.* as a Forfeiture for the Colonel's holding his Office without qualifying himself by receiving the Sacrament. To which Action, Sir Edward pleaded the King's Dispensation under the Great Seal of England. Hales had deny'd his Apostacy to Dr. Burnet, and upon his now denying his Denial, the Doctor says, I was led from thence to see there was no Credit to be given to Papists, where their Church or Religion was concern'd. Further, "When Hales's Trial was to be brought on, the Judges were secretly ask'd their Opinions, and such as were not clear to judge as the Court directed were turn'd out: and upon two or three Canvassings, the Half of them were dismiss'd, and others of more pliable and obedient Understandings were put in their Places. Some of these, as Milton, and Alibone, and Holloway, and Heath, &c. were weak and ignorant to a Scandal." Even Sir Edward Herbert Chief Justice, was but an indifferent Lawyer. The Counsel for Godden the Coachman were feed on purpose to expose and betray his Cause. This is a most melancholy Consideration, that Gentlemen of so generous and useful a Profession should be prevail'd with to sacrifice their Learning, their Honour and Understanding to the Pleasure of the Court. And tho' the Bench of Judges, and the Inns of Court, since the Revolution, have for the most part been fill'd with excellent and upright Judges, with able and worthy Counsellors; yet when I daily see some of the same Profession affecting to distinguish themselves in factious dirty Causes, I am not without Fears, that whenever a Ministry have bad Work to do, they will never want Instruments. After a few senseless and cold Arguments on both sides, Judgment was given for the Defendant Hales. Upon which Mr. Acherley writes thus: "The Wildness of Judges the Judges Positions for the King's Dispensing give is for Dispensing Power. Power need not be expos'd in worse Colours than the mercenary Resolutions themselves do expose them: For if the giving this Judgment, and the Reasons on which it was founded, were not High-Treason, in endeavouring to alter and subvert the fundamental Form of this Government, which the Constitution had made unalterable, then there never was any such Endeavour, nor can be, neither hath Britain any Constitution or any Laws to be subverted, but such Laws only as depend on the King's Will." And now after all Eckard's Panegyricks on this King, his Royal Virtues and Qualities, does he at last drop him in some measure, and own, That by the Breath of a few of his mercenary Judges in effect, the Laws of England were basely given up at once into the Power and Will of the King. A Truth which is extorted from him by his Resentment of the King's putting a stop to all Persecution of Dissenters, and dealing a little roughly with the Church of England. Let not any one think I judge uncharitably, for I have prov'd, that from the beginning of that Persecution to the end of it,

A. D. 1686. it, he has been in a continual Rapture in Contemplation of the Blessings of the Government under King Charles and King James. But now the latter, tho' with a very ill Design, is about to do a very good Act, and take off the Persecutors, who had been worrying the Protestant-Nonconformists, the King and Court have few good Words from him, and in him dwells the Spirit of his Party. He tells us the Clergy of the Church of England, who wrote against Popery, gain'd immortal Honour with their Pens, while the Protestant Dissenters of all kinds appear'd to the World almost like unconcern'd Spectators. And Bishop Burnet here misrepresents them also; The Clergy began generally to preach against Popery, which the Dissenters did not. Dr. Nichols is as severe as Echard in this Charge against the Nonconformists, which is thus animadverted upon by Dr. Calamy. "It should be consider'd, that the Dissenters had written against the Romanists very freely before, and had the less reason to do it at this time; that they did not find their People so much in danger, as many that were educated in the Church of England; that both in City and Country they preach'd with great Freedom against Popery, which shew'd that if they wrote less against it than others, it did not arise from Fear; that many of them thought it not so proper to take this Work out of the hands of the Divines of the Church of England, who not only did it well, but who were in duty bound to do the more in opposition to the common Danger, because they had done so much to hasten and occasion it; and who so visibly improv'd in Light, and in the Largeness of their Notions, by being necessitated to support some Principles in these Debates, which they had slighted before, and seem'd willing to discard." Again, "Several of the Dissenters did at that time attempt to publish some Tracts against Popery, but met with Discouragement when they sent them to the Press, because they came from such as were not of the Church of England, who seem'd desirous to engross the Management of this Controversy at this time wholly to themselves. This actually was the case as to some Treatises then written by Nonconformists. And it need not seem strange if this, being generally known, should hinder others from making the like Attempts." It must be remember'd that even when the common Enemy was threatening common Ruin, the Dissenters were prosecuted in the wonted manner. Their Meetings were frequently disturb'd both in City and Country. Fines were levy'd upon them. The Informers broke in upon Mr. Fleetwood, Sir John Hartop, and others at Stoke-Newington to levy Distresses 6 or 7000 l. upon them by virtue of the Stinging Acts. Many were excommunicated, and had Capias's issu'd out against them. Dr. Calamy does justice to the Church of England Clergy in the following Words: A noble Set of Controversial Writings were now publish'd by the Divines of the Church of England, against the Errors of the Church of Rome; and it must be own'd they signaliz'd themselves, and gain'd immortal Honour by their Performances. It would be base and ungrateful not to do Homage to the Memory of those illustrious Champions for the Protestant Religion, Tillotson and Sharp, afterwards Archbishops of Canterbury and York; Patrick, Stillingfleet, Williams, afterwards Bishops of Ely, Worcester, and Chichester; Tennison, the late Archbishop of Canterbury: To the great Names of Sherlock, Clagget, Gee, Whitby; and tho' Atterbury deserted the Protestant Cause afterwards, and lives now in Banishment, he at that time A. D. bore his Testimony against Popery; so did 1686. Hooper, late Bishop of Bath and Wells; Aldrich, Dean of Christ-Church; Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury; Fowler of Gloucester; and in a very particular manner, his Grace Dr. Wake, the present Archbishop of Canterbury. These Reverend and Learned Fathers and Doctors of the Protestant Church of England were esteem'd, belov'd, and reverenc'd at home and abroad, as the Bulwarks of the Protestant Religion, and their Names and Memories are still precious in the Minds of all good Protestants and good Englishmen. These Divines, and others of their Christian and Charitable Principles and Practices, and their Adherents, are what we always do, and always shall understand to be the Church of England; and for those who abuse that Name, abetting Superstition, Persecution and Arbitrary Power, we never look upon them as true Sons of our Protestant Church, and have treated and shall treat them accordingly. Tho' Dr. South did before Dr. South and after this behave with great Bitterness and Indecency towards our Protestant Brethren, and waste many Jokes and Puns upon them in and out of the Pulpit, he now prov'd a good Churchman in the true Acceptation of the Word. He boldly oppos'd the Progress of Popery; and being offer'd the Bishoprick of Chester, he refus'd to accept of it, when he understood it was expected he should thank Father Petre for it, who recommended him to the King.

Happy had it been for England, if the common Interest of Religion and Liberty had then so united the Hearts of both Churchmen and Dissenters, that all odious Distinctions had been laid aside for ever; and there had no other Emulation remain'd among us, but who should be the best Christians and the best Subjects to the Kings and Queens, King James's Successors, who had a just Claim to our Active Obedience, and then Passive became Nonsense.

Mr. Acherley informs us, That King James exceeded the Proceedings of his Royal Father, by erecting a High Commission-Court in April, but the Commission was not open'd till August. This was in direct defiance of the Acts of Parliament by which that Power was abolish'd; and by that Commission he brought the People under more Pressures from this new-erected Court, than they had suffer'd under the old one before its Suppression.

The Commissioners were,
George Lord Jefferies, Lord-Chancellor.
Laurence Hyde, Earl of Rocheſter, Lord-Treasurer.
Robert Earl of Sunderland, Lord-President of the Council.
Nathaniel Lord Bishop of Durham.
Thomas Lord-Bishop of Rocheſter.
John Earl of Mulgrave.
Sir Edward Herbert, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.
Dr. Thomas Cartwright, Lord-Bishop of Chester.
Sir Robert Wright, Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench.
Sir Thomas Jenour, Recorder of London.

The Archbishop of Canterbury was nam'd in the Commission, but he refus'd to act. The Bishop of Durham was lifted up with the Honour done him: His Name would now be recorded in History. And it was such a Consideration that made Erostratus set fire to the Temple of Ephesus. Sprat, Bishop of Rocheſter, was flatter'd with the Hopes of succeeding Dr.

Dolben

A. D. 1686. Dolben in the See of York. This was unquestionably an Attempt to subvert the Constitution of the Church of England, and to lay waste all its Fences against Popery. For, according to Acherley, the King observing that the Protestant Clergy were at last roused, and courageously met and from the Pulpit engag'd the Torrent of Popery, his Majesty sent out his Order by way of a Letter, directed to the Bishops, prohibiting the Clergy to preach on controverted Points of Religion, as his Predecessor and Pattern the Popish Queen Mary had done before. The King resolv'd to proceed severely against those who offended against this Order; and the Storm fell first on Dr. Sharp, the learned and pious Rector of St. Giles, who receiv'd, one day, as he was coming out of the Pulpit, a Paper sent him, as he believ'd, by a Priest, containing a sort of Challenge upon some Points of Controversy touch'd by him in some of his Sermons. Upon this he, not knowing to whom he should send an Answer, preach'd an Answer to it in a Sermon. And after he had confuted it, he concluded, shewing how unreasonable it was for Protestants to change their Religion on such Grounds. This was carry'd to Court, and represented as a Reflection on the King for changing on those Grounds. The Information as to the Words pretended to be spoken, was false; but without enquiring into that, the Earl of Sunderland sent an Order to the Bishop of London, in the King's Name, to suspend Dr. Sharp immediately, and then to examine the Matter. The Bishop said, he had no power to proceed in such a summary way: But if an Accusation was regularly brought into his Court, he would proceed to such a Censure as could be warranted by the Ecclesiastical Law; yet he would, in the mean time, do what was in his power, and desire Sharp to abstain from officiating, till the Matter should be better understood. He wrote thus to Lord Sunderland, and sent it by Dr. Sharp, who also behav'd with great Submission, but it had no effect. The King being resolv'd that the Bishop of London should be proceeded against, for not obeying his Orders, which, according to Law, could not be obey'd; he was cited to appear before the High Commission-Court, and many Persons of Quality accompany'd him, as Sir Francis Compton, Sir Thomas Clarges, Sir John Lowther of Lancashire, Sir John Nicholas, &c. which gave new Offence. Jefferies treated him in that brutal way that was now become natural to him. The Bishop said, Here was a new Court, of which he knew nothing, so he desir'd a Copy of their Commission. Jefferies cry'd, You may see it in every Coffee-house. He had some days allow'd him to prepare for his Defence, in which time he secretly endeavour'd, by any decent Submission, to have the Matter compromis'd; but that being in vain, he excepted to the Authority of the Court, as being not only founded on no Law, but contrary to the express Words of the Statute that put down the High Commission: but it was intimated, that if he should insist upon that, it would draw a much heavier Indignation on him. He then urg'd as before, that he could not censure Dr. Sharp without a Process, than which nothing can be plainer, according to Law, Reason, and the constant Practice of Ecclesiastical Courts. However, Jefferies and his Brother Judges proceeded to Sentence of Suspension; three of them were at first against it, the Earl of Rockester, the Bishop of Rockester, and Lord Chief Justice Herbert, so that the Sentence could not pass, unless one of those three were brought over. The King spoke of it roundly to the Earl of Rockester, who was so anxious about the Church's Danger, and so zealous for its Grandeur, Riches and Power, when he put the Dedication to his Father the Earl of Clarendon's History: But now, says my Lord of Sarum, Seeing he must either concur in the Sentence, or part with the white Staff, he yielded; and my Lord of London was suspended ex Officio. Nor were Crew Bishop of Durham, Sprat Bishop of Rockester, and White Bishop of Peterborough, ashamed to enter upon his Office. But Bishop Burnet assures us, His Clergy, for all the Suspension, were really more govern'd by the secret Intimations of his Pleasure, than they had been by his Authority before. Having struck this bold Stroke, the Court was willing to see how it would be born with before they struck another; so Dr. Sharp was admitted to offer a general Petition, importing how sorry he was to find himself under the King's Displeasure, upon which, and a gentle Reprimand, he was suffer'd to return to the Exercise of his Function. Six Months after the Suspension, in February the next Year, the Bishop of London petition'd to have it taken off; but making no Acknowledgment of any Fault, it lay still upon him tho' there were no further Proceedings in it.

An Accident happen'd at this time, which gave the Queen great Offence, and put the Priests much out of Countenance. The King continu'd to go still to Mrs. Sidley, and she gain'd so much on him, that at last she prevail'd to be made Countess of Dorchester. As soon as the Queen heard of this, she gave order to bring all the Priests that were admitted to a particular Confidence into her Closet, and when she had them about her, she sent to desire the King to come and speak to her; when he came, he was surpriz'd to see such a Company there, but much more when they fell all on their Knees before him; and the Queen broke out into a bitter Mourning for this new Honour, which they expected would be follow'd with the setting her up openly as Mistress. The Queen was then in an ill Habit of Body, and had an Illness which, as was thought, would end in a Consumption. It was believ'd her Sickness was of such a nature, that it gave a melancholy Prospect that, if she should live, she could have no Children. The Priests told the King, a Blemish in his Life blasted their Designs; and the more it appear'd, and the longer it continu'd, the more ineffectual all their Endeavours would prove. The King was mov'd, and out of Countenance for what he had done; but to quiet them all, he promised to see the Lady no more. He indeed sent her to Ireland, but she return'd after a short Stay, and his ill Commerce with her was still continu'd.

About this time Samuel Parker, already mention'd, was made Bishop of Oxford; he had been so rigid a Fanatick, that he refus'd Concomity a good while after the Restoration. His Father was a thorow-pac'd Independent Republican and Sequestrator; and he himself, without one Episcopal Qualification, was a Scandal to that Holy Order. All the Bishops of this King's making were of the same Merit, as if he intended to bring the Church into Disgrace by the Characters of her Governors.

The Dispensing Power being a Point gain'd, a Toleration was forthwith granted to all sorts of Dissenters, but the Papists had the chief Benefit of it, they being not only tolerated, but caress'd, advanc'd and enrich'd. The free and open Exercise of their Religion was set up every where, and Jesuits Schools and Seminaries erected, not only in London, but also in the most considerable Towns in the Kingdom. A. D. Church of England, says Echard, had now a precarious Title to the National Church, and began to see the impending Dangers, which so great a Part of that Body shut their Eyes against in the days of Abhorring and Addressing. Romish Candidates had already swallow'd up Ecclesiastical Preferments and Dignities in their Hopes and Expectations. Four Popish Bishops were publicly consecrated in the Royal Chapel, and dispatch'd into the Country under the Title of Vicars Apostolical, to exercise their Episcopal Functions in their respective Dioceses. Monks and Fryars appear'd in their Habits at Whitehall and St. James's, and made no scruple to tell the Protestants, They hop'd, in a little time, to walk in Procession thro' Cheap-side. A mighty Harvest of new Converts was now expected; and that Labourers might not be wanting, whole Flocks of Priests and Regulars were sent from beyond Sea to reap it. But what sort of Missionaries they were, will be seen by this account of them in Bishop Burnet's History.

Popery flourishes.

The Ignorance of Popish Priests.

Ridicul'd by the Earl of Middleton.

Kirk's Repartee.

Duke of Norfolk's.

Earl of Salisbury turns.

Earl of Rochester refuses.

The Earl of Middleton had married into a Popish Family, and probably by that Interest had been prefer'd to be Secretary of State. He was a Man of Parts and Generosity, but of loose Principles in Religion. A Priest being sent to instruct him, he began with Transubstantiation, of which he said he would convince him immediately, saying, You believe the Trinity. Middleton stopp'd him, and said, Who told you so? At which he seem'd amaz'd. The Earl told him, he expected he should convince him of his Belief, but not question him of his own; with this the Priest was so disorder'd, that he could proceed no farther.

The Earl of Mulgrave Lord Chamberlain, was apt to comply in every thing that he thought might be acceptable; for he went with the King to Mass, and kneel'd at it; and being look'd on as indifferent to all Religions, the Priests made an Attack on him. He heard them gravely arguing for Transubstantiation, telling them he was willing to receive Instruction. He had taken much pains to bring himself to believe in God, who made the World, and all Men in it. But it must not be an ordinary Force of Argument that could make him believe, that Man was quits with God, and made God again. Kirk was also spoken to, to change his Religion, and reply'd briskly, I am already pre-engag'd, for I promis'd the King of Morocco, that if ever I chang'd my Religion, I would turn Mahometan. One day the King gave the Duke of Norfolk the Sword of State to carry before him to Chapel, and he stood at the door, upon which the King said to him, My Lord, your Father would have gone further. To which the Duke answer'd, Your Majesty's Father was the better Man, and he would not have gone so far.

The Earl of Salisbury was gain'd over by the King or his Priests; but his Character does no Credit to neither them nor their Religion, otherwise than as he was a Nobleman.

The Earl of Rochester had more pains taken with him, tho' all was to no purpose. The King himself spoke to him, and desir'd he would suffer himself to be instructed in Religion. He answer'd, He was fully satisfy'd about it. But the King still pressing him to hear his Priests, he said, he desir'd then to have some of the English Clergy present, to which the King consented, only he excepted to Dr. Tillotson and Dr. Stillingfleet. Lord Rochester told him, He would take those who should happen to be in waiting, for the Forms of the Chapel were still kept up, and Dr. Patrick and Dr. Jane were the Men.

Bishop Burnet tells us, his Ill-Willers had another Story. He had notice given him that he would shortly lose the white Staff, upon which his Lady, who was then sick, wrote to the Queen, and begg'd she would honour her so far, as to come and let her have some Discourse with her. The Queen came, and staid above two hours. Lady Rochester complain'd of the ill Offices that were done them. The Queen said, All the Protestants are now turning against us, and we know not how we can trust any of them; upon which the Lady said, My Lord is not so wedded to any Opinion, as not to be ready to be better instructed. And it was said, that this gave the Rise to the King's proposing a Conference. The Earl deny'd he knew any thing of it: And his Lady died not long after. It was said further, That the day before the Conference, he had an Advertisement from a sure hand, that nothing he could do would maintain him in his Place; and that the King had engag'd himself to put the Treasury in Commission, and bring some of the Popish Lords into it. The Popish Priests Gifford and Godden began the Conference; and when they had done, the Earl said, If you have nothing stronger to urge, I will not trouble those learned Gentlemen to say any thing, for I am sure I can answer all I have heard; and so he did, with much Life and Warmth, not without Scorn, saying, Are these Grounds to persuade Men to change their Religion? This he urg'd over and over again with great Vehemence. The King seeing in what Temper he was, broke off the Conference, charging all that were present to say nothing of it: But he took from him the white Staff, allowing him 4000 Pounds a Year for Life; and besides the 16000 Pounds out of Lord Grey's Estate, he had another Grant valu'd at 20000 Pounds. In the Treasury were put John Lord Bellasis, Sidney Lord Godolphin, Henry Lord Dover, Sir John Ernle Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Sir Stephen Fox. Henry Lord Arundel of Wardour was made Lord Privy-Seal in the room of the Earl of Clarendon, about the end of December. King James, who was more forward to restore Popery in England, than even the Pope himself would have had him to have been, sends now a formal Embassy to Innocent XI. who did not approve of his Counsels, as being in an Interest, which he hated, that of France. The Person pitch'd on for this Embassy was Roger Palmer, whose Wife King Charles took away from him, and in exchange for her made him Earl of Castle-

At length he was advis'd to come to Threats, and to give out that he would be gone, since he could not have an opportunity to treat with his Holiness about the Business he came for. Innocent was so little concern'd at the Ambassador's Resentment, that when he was told of it, he answer'd with his ordinary Coldness, Well, let him go, and tell him, it were fit he rise early in the Morning, that he may rest himself at Noon; for in this Country 'tis dangerous travelling in the heat of the day. He could only obtain of the Pope two trifling Requests, which could hardly have been deny'd to an ordinary Courier; the one was, A Licence for the Marechal d'Humieres's Daughter to marry her Uncle; the other was, A Dispensation of the Jesuits to Father Petre, to enjoy a Bishoprick. The want of which was the reason that the Archbishoprick of York was kept vacant so long. Welwood is mistaken here, for he also got a Cardinal's Cap for Rinaldo of Este, the Queen's Uncle. The English Jesuits at Rome were at a great Expence of Money, Flattery, Fustian and Painting to entertain the English Ambassador. I shall only repeat one Latin Distich, as a Sample of the rest, and a Prophecy of the Success of the Dutchess of Modena's Negotiation with the Lady of Loretto.

Castlemain's going to Rome was High-Treason by Law, and Jefferies himself was uneasy at it. The Pope probably had the greater Disliking to Castlemain, because it was thought he was a Jesuit, and Innocent hated that Order. He was unhappy in every Step of his Embassy. He disputed with a nice sort of Affectation every Punctilio of the Ceremonial. Welwood is also mistaken as to the Coughing Fits; for Castlemain had an Audience of the Pope, after his Conferences with Cardinal Cibo, then Cardinal Patron, whom he press'd much to put an end to the Differences between Innocent XI. and Lewis XIV. in the Matter of the Franchises, that it might appear that the Pope had a due Regard to a King who had extirpated Heresy, and to another King who was endeavouring to bring other Kingdoms into the Sheepfold. What must the World say, if two such Kings, like whom, no Ages had produc'd any, should be neglected and ill us'd at Rome for some Punctilio's? He added, That if these Matters were settled, and if the Pope would enter into Concert with them, they would set about the destroying Heresy, and would begin with the Dutch, upon whom, he said, they would fall without any Declaration of War, treating them as a Company of Rebels and Pirates, who had not a Right as Free-States and Princes have, to a formal Denunciation of War. Cibo was amaz'd at this, and gave notice of it to the Imperial Cardinals; they sent it to the Emperor, and he signify'd it to the Prince of Orange, which, doubtless, put the States General and the Prince of Orange upon concerting Measures for their Preservation. And it is said that Mr. Sidney, afterwards Earl of Rumney, being then at Rome, was admitted to several Audiences in the Pope's Closet, when Castlemain could hardly procure one in the Hall of Audience. Sidney had no publick Character, but was entrusted by the Prince of Orange with some Secrets to be communicated to the Pope; and some People have fancy'd, that even the Revolution was one of them; but perhaps that's too visionary. The Ambassador seeing his Remonstrances to Cibo were ineffectual, demanded the above-mention'd Audience of his Holiness, to whom he lamented the little Regard that was had to two such great Kings. He reflected on the Pope, as shewing more Zeal about Temporal Concerns than Spiritual, which, he said, gave great Scandal to all Christendom. He concluded, that since he saw the Intercessions made in his Master's Name were so little consider'd, he would make haste home. To which the Pope only said, Lei e padrone, He might do as he pleas'd: But he sent one after the Ambassador as he was withdrawing, to let him know how much he was offended with his Discourses; that he receiv'd no such Treatment from any Person; and that the Ambassador was to expect no other private Audience. Cardinal Howard did what he could to soften Matters; but Castlemain was so entirely in the hands of the Jesuits, that he had little regard to any thing the Cardinal suggested to him.

In the mean time the King and his Priests were indefatigable in their Endeavours to make Converts, among whom 'tis reported the Earl of Sunderland was one; he certainly went assiduously to the Popish Chapel, and perform'd his Cringes with more than ordinary Ceremony; but I do not find he was formally reconcil'd, as the Cant then was; and Father Petre, after he had extoll'd the Earl's Obedience at a Meeting of the Jesuits, added, It is necessary for him as yet to appear a Protestant, for weighty Reasons of State. The King caus'd his Army to encamp this Summer on Hounslow-Heath, where a Chapel was erected at his Head Quarters, and Mass publicly said there every day, but so few went to it, and those few were treated by the rest with so much Scorn, that it was not easy to bear it. 'Twas visible such an Army was not to be trusted in any Quarrel, in which Religion was concern'd, so a Resolution was form'd to make Recruits in Ireland. This Stranding Army consisted of 15000 Horse, Foot and Dragoons, which number was increas'd afterwards; and besides the few Popish Officers mention'd by Orleans, and copy'd by Echard, as Berwick, Dunbarton, Dover, Montgomery, Hamilton and Sackville, were commanded by Sarsfield, Lutterel, Gage, Peterborough, Carne, Butler, Wackop, Forbes, Mac Ellicut, Douglas and Bouchan, all Popish Officers, with many others of the same Stamp.

At this time a great Discovery was made of the Intentions of the Court by the Jesuits of Liege, who, in a Letter they wrote to their Brethren at Friburgh in Switzerland, gave them a long Account of the Affairs of England. They told them the King was receiv'd into a Communion of the Merits of their Order; that he express'd great Joy at his becoming a Son of the Society, and profess'd he was as much concern'd in all their Interests as in his own. He wish'd they could furnish him with many Priests, to assist him in the Conversion of the Nation, which he was resolv'd to bring about, or to die a MARTYR in endeavouring it; and that he would rather suffer Death for carrying on that Work, than live ever so long and happy without attempting it. He said, he must make haste in it, otherwise, if he should die before he had accomplished it, he would leave them worse than he found them. They added, among many Particulars, That when one of them kneel'd down to kiss his Hand, he took him up, and said, Since you are a Priest, I ought rather a Son of

A. D. 1686. to kneel to you and kiss your hand; and when another of them was lamenting that his next Heir was an Heretick, he said, God would pro- vide an Heir; another Fore-runner of the Pre- tender. The Jesuits of Friburgh shew'd the Letter about; one of the Ministers, on whom they were taking some pains, and of whom they had some hopes, had got a sight of it, and obtain'd Leave to take a Copy of it, pretending he would make good use of it, and he sent it to Mr. Heidegger, the famous Professor of Divinity at Zurich, whose Son is the famous Professor of Opera's and Masquerades at London.
 Other Copies of it were sent both from Geneva and Switzerland. One of these came to Dyck- velt the Dutch Ambassador, who told King
James of it; and that his Priests were full of Designs and Hopes, which gave Jealousies that could not be easily remov'd. The King read the Letter, and promis'd to let him see 'twas an Imposture invented to make him more odious; but he never spoke of it to him afterwards, from whence Dyckvelt concluded the Letter was no Forgery.

The King being very intent upon having the Penal Laws and Tests repeal'd, declar'd, that none should serve him but those who would vote for it. He ask'd the Marquis of Hallifax if he would do so, and the Marquis frankly re-ply'd, Never; adding, He thought the keeping up those Laws was necessary even for the King's Service, since the Nation trusted so much to them, that the publick Quiet was chiefly preserv'd by that means. The King said, Tho' I will never forget past Services, yet since you cannot be pre- vail'd on in that particular, I am resolv'd to about the have all of a piece; so he was turn'd out, and Lord Sunderland made President of the Council, keeping still his Place of Secretary of State.

When Archbishop Sancroft had receiv'd Articles from some Bishops against Carrwright and Parker, two new nominated Prelates, he promis'd Dr. Lloyd, Bishop of St. Asaph, that he would not consecrate them, till he had ex-amin'd the Truth of the Articles; but being afraid of a Premunire, he did it without such Examination.

The Deanery of Christ Church in Oxford was given to one Massej, a new Convert, tho' he had neither the Gravity, the Learning, nor the Age, suitable to such a Dignity. Not long after this, the President of Magdalen College died, and the King sent the Fellows a Mandamus, requiring them to choose one Farmer, an ignorant, vicious Person, who had no other Merit than his Apostacy, and turning Papist. Mandamus Letters had no legal Authority in them; but all the great Preferments of the Church being in the King's disposal, those who pretended to Favour, were not apt to refuse his Recommendation, lest that should afterwards be remember'd to their prejudice. But now since it was visible in what Channel Favour was like to run, less regard was had to such a Letter; and the Fellows of that House chose the reverend and worthy Dr.

Hough, one of their Body, who was in all respects a statutable Man. They carry'd their Election according to their Statutes, to the Bishop of Winchester their Visitor, who con-firm'd it, which was a legal Settlement of that Matter, but the Court highly resented it. Bishop Burnet writes, "It was much observed, that this University, that had asserted
 " the King's Prerogative in the highest Strains " of the most abject Flattery possible, both in " their Addresses, and in a wild Decree they " had made three Years before this, in which " they had laid together a Set of such high-

" flown Maxims, as must establish an uncon-" trouable Tyranny, should be the first Body of " the Nation that should feel the Effects of it
 " most sensibly." The Cause was brought before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; the Fellows were first ask'd why they had not chosen Farmer, in Obedience to the King's Letter?
 They answer'd by offering a List of many just Exceptions against him, the Subject was fruitful, and the Scandals he had given were very publick. The Court was asham'd of him, and insisted no more on him; but they said the House ought to have shewn more Respect to the King's Letter, than to have proceeded to a Choice in Contempt of it. The Ecclesiastical Commission declar'd the Election of Dr. Hough null, and put the House under Suspension.
 Then Parker Bishop of Oxford was recommended by the King, and the Fellows were commanded to proceed to a new Election in his favour. They excus'd themselves, since they were bound by their Oaths to maintain their Statutes; and having made a legal Election, legally confirm'd, they could not proceed to a new Choice, College Preferments being Free-Holds could only be judg'd in a Court of Record.
 The King in his Progress next Year came to Ox- ford, sent for the Fellows, and order'd them to go presently and chuse Parker for their President in a Strain of Language ill suited to the Majesty of a crown'd Head; for he spoke to them very coarsely, and in a very angry Tone, yet it had no Effect upon them; They insisted still on their Oaths, tho' with a Humility and Submission, which they hop'd would have molli-fy'd him; and they continuing thus firm, a subaltern Commission was sent from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to finish the Matter. Bishop Carrwright was the Head of this Commission, Sir Charles Hedges the King's Advocate to manage it. Carrwright acted in so rough a manner, that it shew'd he was resolv'd to sacrifice all things to the King's Pleasure. Bishop Bur- net says, " 'Twas an afflicting thing, which
 " seem'd to have a peculiar Character of Indig-
 " nity in it, that this first Act of Violence, com" mitted against the legal Possessions of the " Church, was executed by one Bishop, and
 " done in favour of another."

The new President was turn'd out, and because he would not deliver the Keys of the House, the Doors were broken open, and Parker forcibly put in Possession. The Fellows were requir'd to make their Submission, to ask Pardon for what was past, and to accept of the Bishop for their President; they still pleaded their Oaths, and were all turn'd out, except two that submitted. The Nation as well as the University look'd on all this with a just Indignation. It was thought an open Piece of Robbery and Burglary, when Men authoriz'd by no legal Commission came, and by Force turn'd Men out of their Possession and Freehold.
 It agreed ill with this King of his Word's Professions so often repeated to maintain the Church of England, as by Law establish'd; for this struck at the whole Estate, and all the Temporalities of the Church, and could not but inflame the Church Party and the Clergy. From this Time the Messages to the Prince of Orange were very pressing, all the pretended Notions of Passive-Obedience and Non-Resistance were universally exploded, recanted and renounc'd, even by the Bishops, the Priests and Deacons, by the two Universities, by even the Addressers and Abhor-rers; those Doctrines which Echard said were so necessary, are now disown'd and detested.
 The King gave himself great Liberties in Discourse

Persecution

Charles
the Second's
Time.

Ferry White collected the Names of 60,000 Persons, who were prosecuted on a religious Account, from the Restoration to the Revolution, 5000 of whom died in Prison, he told Lord Dorset that King James offer'd him 1000 Guineas for the List, as far as he had carry'd it in his Time, to expose the Church, but Ferry would not part with it.

Cam-

Cambridge had some time before this felt the Weight of the King's Displeasure. He sent his Mandamus to order F. Francis, an ignorant Benedictine Monk, to be receiv'd a Master of Arts, as a Way to let Monks into the Degrees of the University. The Mandamus was refus'd with great Unanimity and Firmness, which the Court had not expected from them. New and repeated Orders full of severe Threatnings in case of Disobedience were sent to them. Some feeble or false Men of the University try'd to compound the Matter by granting this Degree to F. Francis, but enacting at the same time that it should not be a Precedent for any other of the like nature. This was not given way to, and the Vice-Chancellor Dr. Peachel was summon'd before the Ecclesiastical Commission to answer this Contempt. Bishop Burnet observes, He was a very weak Man, and made a poor Defence, and it was no small Reflection to that great Body, that their chief Magistrate was so little able to assert their Privileges, or to justify their Proceedings. Echard takes no notice of this, and indeed he's very cautious of letting us be acquainted with any of the Foibles of either of our Universities, or any of their Doctors. Jefferies treated Peachel with great Contempt, and the Court turning him out of his Place, the University chose Dr. Balderston, Master of Emanuel College, Vice-Chancellor; who in his Speech which he made of course on his Election, promis'd that during his Magistracy neither Religion, nor the Rights of that Body should suffer by his means.

The King was not contented with invading the Rights and Properties of those Seminaries of Learning, he endeavour'd to break in upon the Charities of generous Founders of Hospitals, and the Charter-House at London being the greatest Endowment in Europe for the Uses intended by the Founder, an Attempt was made against his Statutes, in favour of Andrew Popham a Papist, whom he recommended for an Out-Pensioner's Place in Sutton's Hospital, by a Letter dated the 17th of December this Year; which Letter was not deliver'd to the Master, the celebrated Dr. Burnet, Author of the Theory of the Earth, but to the Register at his House in the City, who came not to acquaint the Master with the Contents of it, but sent Andrew Popham to him to be admitted with a Certificate in the usual Form. The Master ask'd Popham where his Letter of Nomination was, and to whom it was directed? He said it was directed to the Governors of the Hospital, and he had left it in the Register's hands. The Master told him if it was directed to the Governors, it must be delivered to them before he could act upon it; and so telling him when there would be a Meeting of the Governors, he dismiss'd him without Admission. The Meeting was about a Month after, Popham appear'd, and his Business was heard. The King's Letter being read, Jefferies Lord Chancellor presently mov'd that they should immediately, without any Debate, proceed to vote whether Andrew Popham should be admitted or no according to the King's Letter; and it was put upon the Master as Junior to vote first, but the Master told them he thought it was his Duty to acquaint their Lordships with the State and Constitution of that Hospital before they proceeded to vote. This was oppos'd by some, but after a little Debate the Master was heard, and acquainted their Lordships that to admit a Pensioner into that Hospital without taking the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, was not only contrary to the Constitutions of the House, but also to an Act of Parliament provided in that Case, which he nam'd, and repeated the Clause relating to the Charter-House. When the Master had done, one of the Governors said, What's this to the Purpose? The Duke of Ormond reply'd, I think it is very much to the Purpose, for an Act of Parliament is not so slight a thing, but that it deserves to be consider'd. Upon which, after some Discourse, the Question was put whether Andrew Popham should be admitted or no, and it was carry'd in the Negative. The Governors intended to return an Answer in writing forthwith to the King's Letter; but as soon as the Vote was pass'd Jefferies flung away, and some others following him, there was not a Number left to act as an Assembly. The Archbishop attempted several times to have another Assembly in order to write that Letter, but could not get a full Number till Midsummer-Day.

While the Business was hanging thus, there happen'd an Accident which the Governors thought would have put an end to the Controversy. Another Person appear'd with a Letter of Nomination from the King of a Date antecedent to Popham's, and it was a Person qualify'd for the Place, one Cardonel, a French Protestant naturaliz'd; this they thought had been a soft Method invented by the Court to supersede Popham's Letter, and so let the Controversy fall without noise; but it prov'd otherwise, for when this Man's Pretensions came to be made known at Court, the King sent another Letter to exclude Cardonel, and to reinforce his former Order for Popham. Thus there were two Letters under the Signet, and there wanted only a Broad Seal, that all the Forces of the dispensing Power might be employ'd in this Attack against the Charter-House. At length a Broad Seal was sent to compleat and ratify Popham's Dispensation for not taking the Oaths, and Witnesses came to prove the Delivery of it. The King's second Letter to the Governors was read at their Midsummer Meeting, as was also the Dispensation for Popham; upon which a Letter was drawn up to give Reasons to his Majesty why they could not comply with his Pleasure as to the Admission of Andrew Popham into that Hospital. This Letter was sign'd by eight Governors.

When it was read to the King he gave it to Jefferies, saying, Find out a Way that I may have Right done me at that Hospital; and the Charter-House was threaten'd with a Quo Warranto, and Dr. Burnet the Master with a Prosecution before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners; but the Governors were of so great Character, so much consider'd by the Nation, and so well able to defend their Cause, that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who were the Support of the Dispensing Power, had no mind to meddle with them; besides, they had their Hands full of other Business, they being at the same time quarrelling with the two Universities on the same Point.

We

A. D. 1686. We are now to look into the Affairs of Scotland and Ireland, where Popery appears more barefac'd even than in England, especially in Ireland, where instead of a Toleration for themselves, the Papists begin to threaten the Protestants that it will be a very great Favour if they are tolerated.

Scotland. Mention has been made of the severe Act pass'd in the Scots Parliament, and the Consequences of it were such as made the Tyranny in Scotland intolerable. Perth the Chancellor had behav'd well at his first Appearance in the World, but to advance himself in Posts and Honours, he engag'd deeply in the foulest and blackest of Crimes, to use Bishop Burnet's Expression. The Duke of Queensbury, the King's Commissioner, gave very full Assurances in the point of Religion, that the King would never alter it, but would maintain it as it was establish'd by Law; and in Confirmation of them he propos'd the Act enjoining the Test, which was pass'd, and was look'd on as a full Security, tho' it was very probable that all the Use the Council would make of the discretionary Power lodg'd with them, would be only to tender the Test to the Covenanters, and not to the Papists. They had a Power by another Act to require all Persons, under Pain of Treason, to answer such Questions as they should put to them; upon which it was easy to have grafted an Inquisition, as soon as the King pleas'd. The Parliament did not sit long, but they did a great deal of Mischief, and gave the King for Life all the Revenue that had been given to his Brother, with some additional Taxes.

Mr. Carstairs, who had been put to the Torture in the late King's Time, having drop'd some Words in his Confession, which touch'd Sir Hugh Campbell and his Son, then Prisoners in London; the Earl of Melfort, Perth's Brother, got the Promise of his Estate, about 1000*l.* a Year, as soon as he should be convicted of Treason; upon which, an Act was brought into the Scots Parliament, which was to last only six Weeks, and enacted, that if within that Time any of the Privy Council would depose that any Man was prov'd guilty of High Treason, he should upon such Proof be attainted; upon which, as soon as the Act was pass'd four of the Privy Council stood up and affirm'd that the Campbells were prov'd by Carstairs's Deposition to be guilty; then were both Father and Son brought to the Bar to see what they had to say why Sentence should not be executed. The old Gentleman near eighty, seeing the Ruin of his Family was determin'd, and that he was condemn'd in so unusual a manner, took Courage, and said the Oppression they had groan'd under had driven them to Despair, and made them think how they might secure their Lives and Fortunes; he own'd he had some Meetings with Baillie in London, and that one was sent to Scotland to hinder all Risings; that an Oath of Secrecy was indeed offer'd, but was never taken; upon all this. What he said was term'd a Confession, and he was condemn'd, but out of a Shew of Mercy pardon'd; the Earl of Melfort possessing his Estate, the old Gentleman died soon after, and very probably his Death was hasten'd by his long and rigorous Imprisonment, and this unexampled Conclusion of it, which, according to the Bishop of Salisbury, was so universally cry'd out against, that when the News of it was writ to Foreign Parts, it was not easy to make People believe it possible.

And can any thing be more monstrous and incredible than that the Representative of a Christian Nation should make a Law to last six Weeks only, on purpose to destroy an antient

Member of their Body, and put another Man in Possession of his Estate? Melfort to deserve it turn'd Papist, as his Brother Perth did, who came to Court upon some Difference with Queensbury to complain of him; but when his Complaints were heard, they were so slight that the King was sham'd of them, and all the Courtiers justify'd the Duke of Queensbury. The Earl of Perth speaking of it to the Marquis of Hallifax, and expressing some Concern about what might happen upon it, Lord Hallifax said, Fear nothing, your Faith will make you whole, and so it prov'd; the Duke of Queensbury was soon after turn'd out of the Treasury, and the Earls of Perth and Melfort had the Management of Scotland. Perth prevail'd with his Lady to turn Papist as she was dying, and a few Weeks after her Death very indecently marry'd the Duke of Gordon's Sister, his first Cousin: They did not stay for a Dispensation, and Cardinal Howard could not without great difficulty obtain one. In return for this, Perth set up a Chappel for Mass in the Palace, the Rabble of Edinburgh broke into it, and defac'd the Chappel, and if Perth had not been convey'd off in Disguise he had probably been torn to pieces. The Guards dispers'd the Mob, some were taken, and the Ring-leader hang'd, who at his Execution told Mr. Macom a Minister, he was offer'd his Life if he would accuse the Duke of Queensbury as the Person that had set on the Tumult, but he would not save his Life by so false a Calumny. Macom did not call any of those that were present to bear Witness of it, but being an honest Man, went in the Simplicity of his Heart to the Archbishop of St. Andrews, and told him what had pass'd; the Archbishop acquainted the Duke of Queensbury with it, and he writ to Court and complain'd of it. The King order'd the Matter to be examin'd, and the poor Minister having no Witness to attest what the Criminal had said, was declar'd the Forger of the Calumny, upon which he was turn'd out. My Lord of Sarum reflects thus, "How severely soever those in Authority may handle a poor incautious Man, yet the Publick is apt to judge true; and in this Case as the Minister's Weakness and Misfortune was pitied, so the Earl of Perth's Malice and Treachery was as much detested." Such were the Converts the King made to his Religion! such were the Fruits of their Conversion!

In the Summer 1686, the Earl of Murray, another new Convert, was sent the King's Commissioner to hold a Parliament in Scotland, and to try if it would be more compliant than the English Parliament had been. The King by his Letter recommended to them in very earnest Words the taking off all Penal Laws and Tests relating to Religion, and all possible Methods were us'd to prevail on a Majority; but two Accidents happen'd before the opening of the Parliament, which made great Impressions on the Minds of many.

We must not forget with what Applause Mr. Echard brings off the Murderers of Dr. Doriflaus, and we will now see what was the Behaviour of one of them in his last Moments, when he apprehended himself about to appear before that Tribunal, at which those who have dispens'd the Judgments of the Almighty without his Warrant, will be call'd to a strict Account, and receive everlasting Doom.

Whitford, says Bishop Burnet, "Son to Whitford one of their Bishops, before the Wars had in Despair turn'd Papist, he was the Person that kill'd Doriflaus in Holland; and that he might get out of Cromwel's reach, he had gone into

He had himself committed many barbarous Murders, and had a small Pension given him after the Restoration. He died a few Days before the Parliament met; he declar'd to some Ministers his forsaking of Popery, and his Abhorrence of it for its Cruelty. He said he had been guilty of some execrable Murders in Piedmont, both of Women and Children, which had pursu'd him with an intolerable Horror of Mind ever after that; he had gone to Priests of all Sorts, the strictest as well as the easiest, and they had justify'd him in his Massacres, and had given him Abolution; but his Conscience was so stung, that he died as in Despair, crying out against that bloody Religion.

Sir Robert Sibbalds recants Popery. The other Accident was the Remorse and Recantation of Sir Robert Sibbalds, a Doctor of Physick, and the most learned Antiquary in Scotland, who had liv'd in a Course of Philosophical Virtue, but in great Doubts as to Reveald Religion, and was prevail'd on by the Earl of Perth to turn Papist, which he had no sooner done than he began to be ashamed that he had made such a Step upon little Enquiry: Upon which he went to London, and retir'd for some Months from all Company; he went into a deep Course of Study, by which he came to see into the Errors of Popery with so full a Conviction, that returning to Scotland some Weeks before the meeting of the Parliament, he could not be at quiet till he had publish'd his Recantation in the Church. The Bishop of Edinburgh was so much a Courtier, that apprehending many might go to hear it, and that it might give offence at Court, he sent him to do it in a Church in the Country; but the Recantation of so learned a Man, upon so much Study, had a great Effect on many.

Scots Bishops for the Papists, and against the Presbyterians. The two governing Bishops, Rosse and Pater-son, resolv'd to let the King see that their Submission was as absolute as his Power, and procur'd an Address to be sign'd by several of their Bench, offering to concur with the King in all he desir'd, with relation to those of his own Religion, provided the Laws might still continue in force, and be executed against the Presbyterians. With this Pater-son was sent up to Court. He communicated the Matter to the Earl of Middleton, who advis'd him never to shew that Paper, for it would be made use of against them, and render them odious. The King and all his Priests were so sensible of it, that they were resolv'd to have a general Toleration, or none, so the Address was never presented; but it shew'd that the Scots Bishops, who are in such high Esteem with the Archdeacon, were more eager to promote Popery and destroy Presbytery than even the King and his Priests. When the next Sessions of Parliament was open'd, Duke Hamilton was silent in the Debate about the Penal Laws and Tests, having promis'd not to oppose the Motion, tho' he would not be active to promote it. The Duke of Queensbury was also silent, and the King was made to believe he managed the Opposition under-hand. Pater-son and Rosse did so entirely forget what became their Characters as Protestant Bishops, that they us'd their utmost Endeavours to persuade the Parliament to comply with the King's Desire. The Archbishop of Glasgow oppos'd it fearfully, the Bishops of Galloway and Dunkeld made a resolute Opposition: The rest were silent, but were resolv'd to vote for the Continuance of the Laws, yet such was the Meanness of most of the Nobility, and of the other Members, that few of them did so much as hope for an effectual Resistance to the Court-Measures. However the major Vote was against the Repeal, and for a Suspension of those Laws during the King's Life. The King despis'd this, so the Session was put off, and the Parliament quickly dissolv'd. The Archbishop of Glasgow, and the Bishop of Dunkeld were immediately turn'd out by the King's express Command. The worthless Pater-son was made Archbishop of Glasgow, and one Hamilton, noted for Persecutions and Impiety, which sometimes broke out into Blasphemy, was made Bishop of Dunkeld. No Reason was assign'd for turning out these Bishops but the King's Pleasure. This Proceeding provok'd the Nation in general, and they began to return to their old Zeal against Popery. Few Profelytes were made, and tho' the Presbyterians were freed from the great Severities they had long smarted under, yet, according to Bishop Burnet, they express'd on all occasions an unconquerable Aversion to Popery, and the Court was soon convinc'd they were not to be depended on; notwithstanding which, the King began his formal Proclamation of Toleration in Scotland, with asserting his Sovereign Prerogative, Authority The King Royal and Absolute Power, which all his Subjects were to obey without RESERVE: he us'd the Phrase, Moderate Presbyterians, which left the Construction of their Moderation in the Council still, but the Papists were allow'd their Religion in the full Extent of it, and all the Laws that prohibited it were at once vacated and annull'd by the King's Royal Edict, which was to pass now as the Edicts pass in France, and Parliaments were either to be nothing, or no more than the Parliaments in France, Tools of the King's Will and Pleasure.

No sooner was King James settled in the Ireland. Throne, than he sent Orders to the Duke of Ormond to come to England. The Duke foreseeing that the new Hospital, a stately Fabrick near Dublin, erected for poor Soldiers, would inevitably fall into Popish Hands, he sat several Days with the Council and Judges privately in the Castle to consult how to prevent it, and they went as far as they could in it; but whatever Provision they made against it, was no Fence against such a Tyrant as Tyrconnel, under such a King as James II. His Grace appointed a Dinner at the Hospital for all its Officers, and the Officers of the Army then in Dublin, which being over, he took a large Glass of Wine in his Hand, bid the Servant fill it up to the Brim, then stood up, and said, Look here, Gentlemen, they say at Court I am now become an old dotting Fool, you see my Hand does not shake, nor does my Heart fail, nor doubt but I will make some of them see their Mistake. Upon his Arrival at Court he soon saw how the King was breaking down all the Barriers of the People's Liberties and Properties, and preparing the Way for Popery and Slavery. An Attempt was made to charge him with imbezelling the Publick Money, under pretence of the Charge of the Hospital: but they were ashamed of it, and it came to nothing.

The Lord Primate and the Earl of Granard were appointed Lords Justices, who were very vigilant and prudent in the Exercise of that important Trust. The Irish pretended daily to discover Plots, and their Grandees appear'd to support their Evidence, pressing the Lords Justices for Orders of Council to empower Papists and Mongrel Protestants, such as Worth before-mention'd to examine them, and to commit without Bail any Person impeach'd. The Lords Justices and Council would not agree to this Arbitrary Power, yet were so insulted by them, that they issu'd out such Orders of Council, but they were always directed to Protestants, which made the Irish weary of that Stratagem. Several Privy-Counsellors had been turn'd out by Command from England for their Zeal and Activity in their Country's Cause; but as yet no Papists were put in, however it will not be long before there will be scarce any one else. They grew daily more and more insolent, and began to affront and bully the Protestants before Lord Clarendon came over. The Lord Clanrickard, Sir Valentine Brown, (made a Viscount by King James) Col. Moor, and some others being at Lefflip, seven Miles from Dublin, fell on their Knees, and drank Confusion to all Protestants and their Religion. This made a noise, and to stifle it, such as were Eye-Witnesses of the Fact, and threaten'd for not pledging the Health, were seiz'd with Warrants, and menac'd to have their Throats cut if they did not deny it. Sir Standish Hartstong, one of the Barons of the Exchequer, was given to understand he should lose his Employ, if he did not take off his Son-in-law, who was one of those that reported it. These repeated Insolences made the Lords Justices weary, and one of them, the Lord Granard, writ to England to be dismiss'd: But the Papists representing that he had a great Interest among the Presbyterians, his Lady being one, he was continu'd, the King writing him a Letter with his own Hand, containing great Promises and Assurances, that nothing should be acted prejudicial to the Protestant Interest, for which this Lord was then thought so very zealous, that some were apt to believe he inclin'd to declare for the Duke of Monmouth. The Irish were perpetually teasing the Lords Justices with false Informations against the English, as if they had Night-Meetings to plot the Destruction of the Irish. Examinations were taken before Justices of the Peace put in Commission for such Purposes; and as false and irrational as they were, yet Complaints were sent to the King, that the English were not prosecuted, and he sent private Instructions, with a Reprimand to the Lords Justices about this Affair, upon which they issu'd a Proclamation, forbidding all Night-Meetings, tho' the Lords knew well there was no such thing. This Contrivance was in order to make way for greater Mischief, by preparing Evidence to bring the most considerable of the English into Plots.

They began with one Moor of Clonmel, who was indicted for High-Treason before Sir John Mead in the Palatinate of Tipperary. Moor had a vast Estate, and they bent their whole Force against him. To countenance the Business, the Earl of Tyrconnel and Justin Maccarty came to the Trial at Clonmel, and in the publick Court presum'd to reproach the Judge and the Jury. Maccarty call'd him Fanatick, and both he and Talbot, now Tyrconnel, aspers'd him and the Duke of Ormond for employing him, calling him Rogue, and using other such foul Language, as, says my Author, was only fit for such Blood-bounds to express. Notwithstanding which, Moor and some others that were impeach'd were acquitted. But such an extravagant partial Account of the Matter was sent over to the King, that he question'd the Duke of Ormond how he came to employ such a Fanatick. The Duke answer'd, I did it in duty to your Majesty, as believing I could not intrust a better Man than one of your Majesty's Servants; for so he was when Duke of York, being his Attorney-General in Ireland.

A. D.

Tyrconnel then began to model the Army; but before he ventur'd on that bold Step, he thought it convenient to disarm the Protestants. In order to this, the King and Council wrote over to the Lords Justices, that there was reason to believe the Rebellion of Monmouth had been of such spreading Contagion, as to infect many, wherefore it was not safe to have the Militia Arms dispers'd abroad. They would be in a greater readiness both for the Militia and their own Defence, if they were deposited in the several Stores of each County. A Proclamation was issu'd pursuant to this Order, and, as has been observ'd, the Papists found Protestants who refus'd not to do their Work for them. Boyle the Prime, and one of the Lords Justices, sent for the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of Dublin, and in a florid Speech magnify'd their unshaken Loyalty in the worst of Times, adding that their ready Obedience and prevalent Example would be of great Service to the King and Kingdom; and in the close he told them, it was expected they should bring their Arms, which should be always ready for their Service. The City was sensible of their Condition, but not knowing how to help it, their Arms were brought in, and the Country did the same. To render the Design more effectual, the Irish gave out, that if any Arms were reserv'd in Protestant Hands, such would be interpreted as disaffected to the King and Government, and that it would be no Excuse to say they were their own Arms, and not belonging to the Militia. This frighted many, and operated so powerfully, that great Numbers of People deliver'd in their Arms bought with their own Money. The Protestants being thus disarm'd, Tyrconnel proceeds to destroying the Army then about 8000 Men, and began with the Officers in the same Method which was design'd in King Charles's time, and that was to displace all Officers who had been in the Parliament or Oliver's Army, or were the Sons of any such. The Duke of Ormond had had Directions to do this, but he made no Progress in it, under pretence of gaining time to find them out, for he foresaw it was to make room for Papists.

When Tyrconnel had turn'd out two or three hundred Officers, he went for England to receive new Instructions, and took with him one Neagle, a cunning Irish Lawyer, afterwards knighted and made Secretary of War, whose Character however was such, as the King would not at first see him, he being a furious insolent Man, very obnoxious to the English, and even to the most generous Papists. The Lords Bellasis and Powis were for having him sent back to Ireland immediately: But the Queen, Father Petre, and the most bigotted Catholics sav'd him from that Disgrace, tho' he was not now much hearken'd to. Tyrconnel's Design in coming over was to get the Lieutenancy, if possible; but things were not yet ripe enough for that. At a Consult upon the Subject of the Lieutenancy of Ireland, he was mention'd with Tenderness. He was so hated and dreaded by the English, that it was not then thought seasonable to bring him upon the Stage in that Quality: So Lord Bellasis was propos'd, but being infirm, it was thought he would not be able to carry on their Designs; and till they could come to other Resolutions, it was resolv'd that the Earl of Clarendon should be Lord-Lieutenant, and Tyrconnel return Lieutenant-General of the Army, to be a Check on the other, who, tho' well dispos'd, had it not in his power to do the Protestants Justice, and had the Court thought otherwise, they would not have sent him. My Lord of Sarum writes thus of it: "The King resolv'd also to model Ireland, so as to make that Kingdom a Nursery for his Army in England, and to be sure at least of an Army there, while his Designs were to go on more slowly in Britain. The Earl of Clarendon was declar'd Lord Lieutenant, but the Army was put under the Command of Talbot, who was made Earl of Tyrconnel, and he began very soon to model it a-new. The Archbishop of Armagh had continu'd Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and was in all Points so compliant to the Court, that even his Religion came to be suspected on that account; yet it seems he was not thought thorough-pac'd, so Sir Charles Porter, who was a zealous Promoter of every thing that the King propos'd, and being poor, was thought a Person fit to be made a Tool of, was declar'd Lord Chancellor of Ireland. To these the King said he was resolv'd to maintain the Settlement of Ireland. They had Authority to promise this, from Echard's King of his Word, "and to act pursuant to it; but as both the Earl of Clarendon and Porter were poor, it was hop'd that they would understand the King's Intentions, and see thro' those Promises which were made only to lay Men asleep, and that therefore they would not insist too much on them, nor pursue them too far.

"However, the Earl of Clarendon, upon his first coming over, gave publick and positive Assurances, that the King would maintain their Act of Settlement. He did it very often and very solemnly, and proceeded accordingly. In the mean while the Earl of Tyrconnel went on more roundly: He not only put Irish Papists in such Posts in the Army as became void, but upon the slightest Pretences he broke the English Protestant Officers, to make room for the others: And in conclusion, without so much as pretending a Colour for it, he turn'd them all out. And now an Army paid by virtue of the Act of Settlement to secure it, was wrested out of legal Hands, and put into the Hands of those that were engag'd both in Religion and Interest to destroy the Settlement, and those concern'd in it, which was too gross a Violation of Law to be in any sort palliated. So the English Protestants of Ireland look'd on themselves as at Mercy, since the Army was now made up of their Enemies. And all that the Lord Lieutenant, or the Lord Chancellor could say, did not quiet their Fears."

They were indeed too well grounded to be blown away by good Words. The Tyranny of Tyrconnel, countenanc'd by his Master King James, is hardly to be parallel'd in any History antient or modern. The Irish Papists in all parts of the Kingdom proceeded in their Stratagem to impeach Protestants for Plots; but these were generally so ridiculously contriv'd, and made up of such palpable Contradictions and Incongruities, that they serv'd only to demonstrate the Innocence of the Protestants, and the horrid Perjuries and implacable Malice of the Papists, who, failing in this, apply'd themselves to other Courses. Many of them went out Tories, and robb'd upon the Highway. They broke open Houses, stole Cattle, kill'd them in the Field, and cut out the Tongues of Sheep alive, with innumerable Barbarities all acted upon the English; who were so dismay'd and discourag'd with these Tragedies, that Thousands deserted the Kingdom and came for England, under as great Fears and Jealousies as if there had been an open Rebellion. Five hundred together transported themselves to Virginia, Carolina, Pensylvania, New-England, and the West-Indies; which still weakening the English Interest in Ireland, was extremely grateful to the Irish; who, to use Bishop King's Words, "openly declar'd that they lik'd no Government but that of France; that they would make the King as absolute as the French King was; and they publickly and privately affirm'd with many Oaths, that they would in a short time have the Estates and Churches of the Protestants; and if they suffer'd them to live, they would make them Heavers of Wood, and Drawers of Water: That Ireland must be a Catholick Country whatever it cost, and as for the English, they would make them as poor Devils as when they first came into Ireland."

Bishop King gives numberless Instances of Facts, to prove that this was the Design of King James and his Irish Ministry, and Tyrconnel's modelling the Army was alone a sufficient Proof of it. In the room of my Lord Shannon, Captain Robert Fitzgerald, Captain Richard Coote, and Sir Oliver St. George, he put in Kerney, one of the Fellow-Conspirators with Pickering and Grove to murder King Charles II. Ander-son a mean Fellow, Sheldon a profess'd Papist, and one Graham. Tyrconnel himself, by the Name of Richard Talbot, was nam'd by Oates in his Narrative for this very Employment of modelling the Army: Upon which, many who before did not believe his Plot, gave credit to it now, saying, If Oates was an ill Evidence, he was a good Prophet; and his way of proceeding in his Model, was as barbarous and provoking as 'twas unjust and dangerous. See Bishop King. "He exercis'd at the same time so much Falshood and Barbarity, that if the Army had not been the best principled with Loyalty and Obedience of any in the world, they would have mutiny'd, or at least dispatch'd him. In the Morning he would take an Officer into his Closet, and with all the Oaths, Curses and Damnations, that were never wanting to him, he would profess Friendship and Kindness, and promise him the Continuance of his Commission, and in the Afternoon cashier him with all the Contempt he could heap on him; nay, perhaps while he was thus caressing of him, he had actually given away his Commission. As for the Soldiers and Troopers, his way with them was, to march them from their usual Quarters to some distant place, where he thought they were least known, and would be put to greatest Hardships; there he stripp'd them of their Clothes, for which they had paid; and from the Troopers took their Horses, Boots and Furniture, bought with their own Money, and set them to walk bare-footed 100 or 150 Miles to their Homes, or their Friends, if they had any. Sometimes he would promise them something for their Horses, but then he told them they must come to Dublin for it; and if any came to demand that small Pittance, he contriv'd it so, that they should be oblig'd to wait till they had spent twice as much as they expected, and most of them, after all, got nothing. In the mean time, the new-raisd Forces and Officers being put into Arms and Command to which they were strangers, into good Clothes, and mounted on Horses for which others had paid, behav'd themselves with all the Insolence common to such sort of Men when unworthily advanc'd. They every where insulted over the English, and had their Mouths continually full of Oaths, Curses, and Imprecations against them. They rail'd on them, and gave them

" them all the opprobrious Names they could; and if any chastised them for their Sauciness, tho' ever so much provok'd, they had the Judges and Juries on their side. They might kill whom they pleas'd without fear of Law, as appear'd from Capt. Nangle's murdering his disbanded Officer in the Streets of Dublin; but if any kill'd or hurt them, they were sure to suffer, as Captain Aston found to his Cost, who was hang'd for killing a Papist, upon his abusing the Captain's Wife in the Streets."

Let it not be pretended, that King James knew nothing of this Tyranny and Cruelty. Can any one suppose that he was unacquainted with the Character of Tyrconnel, or that he did not like it from the Semblance it had with his own?

What little Regard the Lieutenant-General had for the Lord-Lieutenant, appears from the following Story.

The Earl of Clarendon going to Church upon a Sunday Morning, perceiv'd an Irish Officer he never saw before, commanding the Guard of Battle Axes that attend'd his Person, which exceedingly surpriz'd him. He stopp'd and demanded who he was, and who put him there. The Irishman was as much frighted as the Lord-Lieutenant was disturb'd; but with some difficulty, and with broken Expressions, occasion'd by Fear, he said, He was a Captain put in by the Lord Tyrconnel. The Earl of Clarendon ask'd when? The Fellow reply'd, This Morning. Lord Clarendon bid his Attendants call the former Captain, and dismiss'd Tyrconnel's, whom he sent for the next day, and question'd him for this Action. Tyrconnel reply'd, I did nothing but by the King's Order. To which the Lord-Lieutenant return'd Answer, While his Majesty intrusts me with the Government, I will not be dispos'd by the Lieutenant-General. Complaints on both sides were made to the King, and so it ended.

A Consultation of the Papists at the Savoy.

Some time after Tyrconnel went to England to assist at a general Meeting of the Catholics, which was held at the Savoy, in order to consult what Method was fittest to be pursu'd for the Promotion of the Catholick Cause. They were afraid of the King's Weakness or Timorousness. They were sensible that he advanc'd in Years, and thought their carrying the main Point, the changing Religion, to be so impracticable, that some of them were for moving the King to procure an Act of Parliament for the Security of their Estates, and only Liberty for Priests in their own private Houses, and to be exempted from all Employments. Father Petre oppos'd this as too terrestrial, and founded upon too anxious a Solitude for the Preservation of their secular Interests. Others of the Papists were for addressing the King to have Liberty to sell their Estates, and that his Majesty would intercede with the French King to provide for them in his Dominions. At last it was agreed to lay both these Proposals before his Majesty; and some of their number to receive his Answer, which was, That he had, before their Desires came to him, often thought of them, and had provided a Sanctuary and Retreat for them in Ireland, if all those Endeavours should be blasted in England, which he had made for their Security; and of whose Success he had not yet reason to despair. This Encouragement to the Papists in England was attended with the most zealous Expressions of his ardent Love to the Catholick Church, for which he said he was ready to be a Martyr. Then fresh Consults were set on foot, relating to the Government of Ireland, which, by accident, came to the knowledge of the Earl of Rochester Lord-Treasurer, who immediately acquainted the King with it, and he absolutely deny'd there was any Intention of changing the chief Governor, but, on the contrary, assur'd him of his great Satisfaction in the Lord-Lieutenant there. Within a few days the Earl of Rochester receiv'd the same Intimations from his Brother Clarendon, which he inform'd the King of, who disown'd the whole Matter as positively as before; and to remove the Jealousies of the Lord-Lieutenant, wrote a Letter to him with his own Hand, assuring him there were yet no Thoughts, and he believ'd never would begin him whilst both liv'd, to remove him from the Government of Ireland.

Notwithstanding which, the Papists in Ireland State-confidently affirm'd, that the day before the King wrote the Letter, he had given Assurance to Father Petre, that Tyrconnel should be Lord-Lieutenant. This is Edward's King of his Word; and it was not long before the King himself, in Council, pretended, tho' he had before resolv'd, to ask their Advice, who was fit to be plac'd in the Government of Ireland, and himself at last nam'd Tyrconnel, who was oppos'd by all but Sunderland. Powis, whom the King had once, in a Passion, call'd both a Coward and a Fool, was consider'd as a Person of moderate Carriage, and being naturally covetous, his Friends advis'd him to agree with Sunderland, as the Lord Berkley did with the Dutchess of Portsmouth, and the Bargain was made for 4000 l. a Year. But whatever the bottom of the Design was, Sunderland never forsook Tyrconnel at the Council-Board; and some conjectur'd, that having acquainted the King of his Bargain with Powis, the King made Tyrconnel agree to the same. The News of his being prefer'd to the Lieutenantcy of Ireland, threw all the Protestants there into the most terrible Consternation. Every one lamented the deplorable Condition they were fallen into, almost all that could; deserted the Kingdom. Every thing discover'd a gloomy and melancholly Prospect. At last he arrives, and the Lord Clarendon deliver'd up the Sword to him at the Archbishop of Dublin's Palace, where he made a Speech, wherein, among other things, he said, We of the Church of England can brag, that when Rebellion overspread the three Kingdoms, not one orthodox Member of our Church was engag'd against the Crown. His Lordship would not allow the Archbishop of York to be Orthodox, for he did engage against the Crown. But this occasion of Bragging has occasion'd the frequent printing of this Speech, which has nothing in it more remarkable.

The Duke of Ormond, the Lords Justices, and the Earl of Clarendon, by their wise Administration, had brought the Affairs of Ireland into a good Method of Management, till the Russian Tyrconnel had the Sword put into his Hands; Trade increas'd, Lands were improv'd, and Ireland was a flourishing Kingdom, as may be seen by the State of the Revenue for the Years

Which not only maintain'd the Army and Civil List, but enabled that Government to make Remittances to England, to the Value of 100,000 l. per Ann. But this fair Prospect darken'd on Tyrconnel's being made chief Governor. The thriving Inhabitants fled to England, Scotland, the Isle of Man, and America. For there was nothing but Ruin, Slavery and Death, to be expected from his intolerable Tyranny. Sir

A. D. 1686. Charles Porter was turn'd out, and the Seal given to one Fitton, whom King James afterwards made a Lord. He had been detected of Forgery, not only at Westminster and Chester, but also fin'd by the House of Lords. This vile Fellow was taken out of Goal, and set on the highest Court of the Kingdom to keep the King's Conscience. He did not stick to say publicly, that all the Protestants were Rogues, and amongst 40000 there was not one who was not a Traytor, a Rebel and a Villain. One Nugent, the Son of an attainted Popish Rebel, was made Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench. Rice, a Gamester and Sharper, was made Lord Chief Baron. Beggarly Kerns were made Justices of the Peace, and Sheriffs; one of them, Turlough Donnelly, Sheriff of Tyrone, lifted himself for a Soldier, to avoid paying a Debt of 16 l. upon Bond. Having fill'd the Courts of Justice with proper Instruments, Tyrconnel took away the Charter of Dublin, and the other Corporations in Ireland. The first Proclamation he issu'd was in breach of an Act of Parliament to take off the Duty upon Iron, to encourage the Importation of Spanish Iron, in hopes that Silver would come along with it; which was so ill lik'd in England, that the King put forth a contrary Proclamation, and Tyrconnel's Folly was so much condemn'd in Council, that Lord Bellasis swore, That Fellow in Ireland is Fool and Madman enough to ruin ten Kingdoms. Father Petre reprimanded him for it in a Letter, and said, If you do not act with greater Caution, it will be impossible for the King to preserve you in that Government.

A. D. 1687. Tyranny being thus establish'd in Scotland and Ireland under Perth, Melfort, Tyrconnel, and the Petty-Tyrants, King James the more strenuously endeavour'd its Establishment in England; the Dispensing Power had been declar'd to be a Part of our Law, by hiring Judges in Westminster-Hall, and in the Exercise of it, the King declar'd to the Privy-Council, he resolv'd to issue out his Declaration for a general Liberty of Conscience to all Persons, which Declaration came forth the 25th of April, and contain'd, among other things, That it had been a long time his constant Sense and Opinion, That Conscience ought not to be restrain'd, nor People forc'd in Matters of mere Religion, and that it was contrary to his Inclination, as he thought it to be the Disinterest of the Government, by spoiling Trade, and depopulating Countries, &c. Coke's Reflection upon this is not amiss: "Sure no Power ever acted so in extremes, yet his Actions so diametrically opposite to his Profession. Here you see a Jesuited Prince pleading for Liberty of Conscience, to the breaking down the Laws which before he had so often profess'd to maintain; and for such a sort of Men whom but a little before he had slaughter'd, banish'd, and imprison'd, as if he had design'd to extirpate the whole Race of them. If to reconcile these to Truth or Reality be not as great a Miracle as is in any of the Popish Legends, I'll believe them all, and be reconcil'd to the Catholick Church how inconsistent soever the Terms be."

Eckhard's History and Reflection upon it are here false and malicious to Astonishment. I am sensible of the Respect a Writer owes to his Readers, and that he ought no more to appear in passion before them, than before his Superiors; but one cannot, without Indignation, see a Trifler insult great Bodies of sober religious Men, and one in whose Writings, with regard to Religion, there is a Coldness, Deadness, and Insensibility enough to quench all Fervour in a devout Mind, abuse with frigid Raillery Men of Conscience and Piety. He says the Dissenters receiv'd this Declaration with Joy and Satisfaction: They were so transported, that they caught greedily at the Bait, without the least discerning the Hook in it; which is directly contrary to the Truth. Coke above-mention'd says, the Dissenters did both dread and detest it, of his knowledge, and I can say the same of mine. Bishop Burnet tells us, The wiser Men among the Dissenters saw thro' all this, and perceiv'd the Design of the Papists was now to set on the Dissenters against the Church. Tho' they return'd to their Conventicles, yet they had a just Jealousy of the ill Designs that lay hid under all this sudden Grace and Kindness. Again, Some Conduct of few of the hotter Dissenters answer'd the Expectations of the Court; angry Speeches and virulent Books were publish'd, yet these were dissu'd as to own'd by the wiser Men amongst them. Eckhard the Ad-dresser. then, with very mean Malice, repeats Paragraphs in some of their Addresses, and reflects particularly on the late Learned and Reverend Mr. Alsop of Westminster, who having had a Son in Monmouth's Business, or some other such Peril, he was pardon'd by King James, and it is excusable, if his Son's Life, and his own Liberty, produc'd some lively Expressions of Gratitude in a generous Mind. Why could not Eckhard have told us as my Lord of Sarum does? Some of these Addresses were penn'd by Persons whom the Court had gain'd; few concurr'd in them, and the Persons that brought them up were mean and inconsiderable. Why could not some such Thoughts as these, taken from Dr. Welwood, have enter'd into the Archdeacon's Head?

"The Dissenters were not so fond of Persecution and ill Usage, as to refuse a Liberty that was frankly offer'd them, which neither their Prayers nor Tears could obtain before; nor did they think it good Manners to enquire too narrowly how that Liberty came about, as long as they were shelter'd thereby from the Oppressions they lay under."

Dr. Calamy writes of it thus: "As thankful as they were for their Ease and Liberty, they were fearful of the Issue:" Eckhard told us, they did not in the least discern it; neither can any Number of them, of any Consideration, be charg'd with hazarding the publick Safety, by falling in with the Measures of the Court, of which they had as great a dread as their Neighbours. I am not the Person that would undertake to vindicate all the Addresses which were made by the Dissenters after their Liberty, but I should think their Brethren of the Church of England should tread softly when they lay them to their Charge, considering that some of the Churchmen concurr'd with King James to over-turn the legal Establishment."

Five of the Bishops, Cress of Durham, Barlow of Lincoln, Carrwright of Chester, Wood of Litchfield and Coventry, and Watson of St. David's, prevail'd on some of their Clergy to sign Addresses; but Parker Bishop of Oxford was not so successful, his Clergy refusing to sign one. In the mean time the King continu'd increasing his Army, and the Soldiers grew intolerably insolent. The Officers whenever they pleas'd pretended to be exempt from the Civil Power; and tho' the King was in perfect Peace, yet an old obsolete Act of Parliament that made it Death for Soldiers to desert their Colours, was now made to extend to the new-raisd Army on Hounslow-Heath. And because the worthy Re-

A. D. 1687. corder of London, Sir John Holt, would not expound that Law according to the King's Decree, he was put out, and Sir Bartholomew Shower, a Renegado Presbyterian, was put in his Place. Sir Edward Herbert was also remov'd from being Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, to make room for Sir Robert Wright to hang a Soldier on that obsolete Statute. Wytbens, who had charg'd himself with the Guilt of so much Blood in the last and this Reign, was turn'd out, and Sir Richard Allibone, an angry Papist, put in his Place on the King's-Bench. Milton's Brother Christopher, whom he scorn'd even to take notice of, was remov'd from the Exchequer to the same Court of King's-Bench.

Parliament.

Echard speaks still of the Parliament, as if it had been such a Senate as the two last Parliaments at Oxford and Westminster; there were great Expectations to see them meet. My Lord of Salisbury says, It would not have been easy in all England to have found 500 Men so weak, so poor, and so devoted to the Court. Richest and Wisest, says Echard. The King dissolv'd them the 2d of July, and then he and his Creatures set themselves to work, by Closettings, Promises, and Threats, by Quo-Warranto's, and altering Magistrates and Officers, indeed by all the Arts and Artifices they could think of, to get the People to chuse such Members for the next Parliament, as would take off the Penal Laws and Test.

Pen the Quaker sent to the Prince of Orange.

Pen the Quaker was sent to Holland to persuade the Prince of Orange to come into the King's Measures concerning it. He had two or three long Audiences of his Highness, who readily consented to a Toleration of Popery, as well as of the Dissenters, provided it were propos'd and pass'd in Parliament; and he promis'd his Assistance, if there was need of it, to get it to pass: But for the Tests, he would enter into no Treaty about them. He said it was a plain betraying the Security of the Protestant Religion to give them up.

Pope's Nuntio's Audience.

*The Day after the Dissolution of the Parliament, the Pope's Nuntio Signor Dada had a publick Reception at Windsor. He was very civil in all his Deportment, but it did not appear that he was a Man of great Depth, nor had he Power to do much. It was by Law High-Treason for any one to assume the Character of the Pope's Nuntio, yet was he admitted to Audience with more than ordinary Ceremony and Magnificence. But the People could not help shewing their Indignation at seeing him in his Pontificalibus, preceded by a Cross-Bearer, and a Herd of Priests and Monks in their Habits. His Grace the Duke of Somerset, as illustrious for his Love to his Country, as for his high Birth and Rank, being then the Lord of the Bed-Chamber in waiting, the King order'd him to attend the Nuntio at his Audience. But his Grace desir'd his Majesty to excuse him from an Office which the Laws of the Land made criminal. The King reply'd, Don't you know I am above the Law? His Grace answer'd, If the King is, I am not. The King reiterated his Orders; and my Lord Duke persisting in his Denial, his Majesty told him in a Passion, I will trouble you no more with any Commands, and therefore I expect you will resign your Places of Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber and Colonel of Dragoons. To which the Duke was obedient, without the least Concern, as being content to preserve his Conscience and Honour, while he lost nothing but the King's Favour. The Duke of Grafton obey'd that Command which the Duke of Somerset refus'd. A Court-Bishop was less scrupulous, and made part of the Nuntio's*

Duke of Somerset in Disgrace about him.

*Train; tho' his Coachman, a sturdy Protestant, refus'd to drive him: of which the Bishop might have been asham'd, if he had had any shame in him. The Nuntio wanted an Opportunity to appear publickly at London, and therefore it was projected that he should be invited to come with the King himself to dine in Guild-Hall with the Lord-Mayor, and he was accordingly receiv'd very ceremoniously at Temple-Bar by Sir John Parsons and Sir Basil Firebrass, the two Sheriffs, both staunch Churchmen: Which I should not have taken notice of, if Echard had not remember'd that Sir John Shorter the Lord-Mayor was a profess'd Dissenter. The King knighted the two Aldermen who were deputed to make this Invitation, Sir John Bawdon and Sir William Ashurst, who were both Dissenters. Jenour, who was then Recorder, and the Mouth of the Deputation, was order'd to invite the Princess Anne and Prince George of Denmark. The Princess pretended Indisposition, but it is thought it was only a pretence to avoid being seen with the Nuntio; and I remember it was then reported, that Jenour, that Blunderer and Bigot, should say to the Princess, If your Royal Highness cannot come yourself, will you please to let the Prince come? To which her Royal Highness answer'd, The Prince will do what he thinks fit; which was also to avoid giving any Countenance to Dada.*

A. D. 1687.

*There were great Hopes that those open avow'd Acts of Arbitrary Power, and in favour of Popery, would have so united all British Protestants, that we should never more have heard of Fanaticism, and Conventicles, and Schism, and Forty-one, and the Jargon in the History of the Rebellion, and the Archdeacon's History. We were promis'd it by the Marquis of Halifax in his Declaration in behalf of the Church Party, an admirable Piece equally rational, nervous, elegant and polite. He declares, *That all their former Haughtiness was for ever extinguish'd, and that the Spirit of Persecution was turn'd into a Spirit of Peace, Charity, and Condescension; that the Church of England was convinc'd of its Error in being severe to them, and all thinking Men were come to a general Agreement, no more to cut ourselves off from the Protestants abroad, but rather enlarge the Foundations upon which we are to build our Defences against the common Enemy.

We have mention'd the Tricks and Contrivances of the Court to procure such a Parliament as would enter into the King's Measures, which, and the King's Religion, were the Courtiers Cant at this time. The Judges were directed to feel the Pulse of the Gentry in their Circuits, commission'd in the Militia, or in the Peace, and where they found any averse to those Measures to turn them out of all Offices and Employments: The Practices of this kind were so mean and unwarrantable, that a Man, and much more a King, of any Spirit and Honour would have scorn'd it. 'Tis said in a Memorial sent to the Prince of Orange, "His Majesty has personally solicited and attack'd so many of the Electors for Parliament by his Frowns and Smiles in secret to accept of such for their Deputies in Parliament as will comply with his Intention, that his closetting Electors is become a By-word among People; he has made them consent to be barr'd of their Freedom in electing for Parliament, and in voting therein if they be chosen, to be a Test of their Fitness to hold their Offices or Employments of Profit and Trust, and to have a Place in the Magistracy." Dr. Welwood makes this Observation upon it in a Discourse about calling a new Parliament in the

A. D. 1687. "What woful Breaches have been made of this our native Privilege, we have had too many Experiences in the last Reigns, when Letters, Promises, and Threats from Court were made use of to promote Elections, and when few durst venture to serve their Country, if not recommended by those at the Helm. But in order to set our present Condition in a better Light, it may be perhaps not amiss to give a Letter communicated to me from a noble Person, to whom it was written in King James's Reign, by a great Minister of State, upon a Design of calling King James's Parliament."

My Lord,

It being his Majesty's Royal Intention to render all his Subjects, of whatever Persuasion in Religion, happy and easy under his Government, and for that great End to call a Parliament to meet at Westminster on ——— next; it is expected of your Lordship, and I am commanded by his Majesty to acquaint you, that it is his Pleasure you make use of your Interest in the County of ——— for getting, [here are two Persons nam'd] duly Elected Knights of the said County in the ensuing Parliament, as Persons of whose Loyalty and good Affection his Majesty has receiv'd sufficient Information. And I am to assure your Lordship, that as your hearty Compliance herein will be esteem'd singular good Service done to his Majesty, and incline him to put some Mark of his Favour upon you for so doing; so a Neglect herein will be look'd upon by his Majesty with Displeasure, which will be more than enough to ruin you in the present Circumstances your Lordship is in. I put no Doubt in your Lordship's hearty Compliance in this Matter, and am,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's Humble Servant.

Welwood thinks very justly upon it. I question after all, whether the Parliament, which King James was thus labouring to model, would have answer'd his Expectation, had they come to sit, for Men's Eyes were open'd more and more every day, and the noble Principles of English Liberty began to kindle afresh in the Nation. He proceeds, "Tho' the Dissenters who might be chosen into Parliament upon this new Model, would probably have made Terms for themselves to prevent their falling under any future Persecution; yet being as averse to Popery as any others whatsoever, it is not to be imagin'd that they would have unhing'd the Constitution of England upon that Consideration, to enable the Roman Catholicks to break in upon the establish'd national Church, which in the End might have inevitably ruin'd both it and themselves." And if one might guess at the Sentiments and Intentions of the Electors all over England, by the Characters of the four Citizens that were talk'd of for London, Sir Robert Clayton, William Love Esq; Sir John Eyles, and Sir John Barwood, it is more than probable that King James's intended Parliament would have been of the Opinion of Mr. Love before-mention'd, who, when a Member, told the House of Commons, That tho' he was a Dissenter he did not desire any Favour for themselves, if it was to make way for the favouring of Papists.

A little before this there fell out an Accident which help'd mightily to buoy up the sinking Spirits of the Nation, and which was occasion'd by the forward Zeal of some about the King, contrary to their Intentions. While the Project was going on to take off the Penal Laws and Tests, King James was set upon making a Trial of the Inclinations of the Prince and Princess of Orange in that Matter; their Higaneſſes had look'd on with a silent Regret, and observ'd all the irregular Steps that were making in England. They were unwilling to publish their Opinion of them, since they knew it could not but be displeasing to King James. To know the Mind of the Prince and Princess concerning the Test and Penal Laws was a thing the most desir'd by the Protestants; but it would hardly have been possible for them to come to this Knowledge, if King James himself had not help'd them to it.

There was one Mr. James Stewart a Lawyer, afterwards Sir James, who had given over the Practice of the Law, because all that were admitted to the Bar in Scotland were requir'd to renounce the Covenant, which he would not do; this recommended him to the Confidence of the Covenanters, who made great use of him, and trusted him entirely. The King had long consider'd him as the chief Manager of all the Designs against him, more particularly of Argyle's, and one of Pen's Errands to Holland was to engage him to come over, upon Promise not only of Pardon, but Favour, which was made good to him; before he cross'd the Seas he came to the Prince of Orange, and assur'd him of an inviolable Fidelity to him, and to the common Interests of Religion and Liberty. He had been often with Pensioner Fagel, and had a great measure of his Confidence. Upon his coming to Court he was caress'd to a degree that amaz'd all who knew him. He either believ'd the King was sincere in the Professions he made; that he design'd only a full Liberty of Conscience, or he thought that it became a Man who had been so long in Disgrace not to shew any Jealousies at first, when the King was so gracious to him. He undertook to do all that lay in his power to advance his Majesty's Designs in Scotland, and to represent his Intentions so at the Hague, as might incline the Prince to a better Opinion of them, which he endeavour'd to do in several Letters to the Pensioner, and press'd him vehemently in the King's Name, and by his Direction to persuade the Prince to concur with the King in procuring the Laws to be repeal'd. He laid before him the inconsiderable Number of the Papists, so that there was no reason to apprehend much from them; he also enlarg'd on the Severities which the Penal Laws had brought on the Dissenters, which Laws the King was resolv'd should not be repeal'd, unless the Tests were taken away with them, and the refusing to consent to this, might at another time bring them under another severe Prosecution. Stewart, after he had witten many Letters to this purpose without receiving any Answers, try'd if he could serve the King in Scotland with more Success than it seem'd he was like to have at the Hague; but he found there that his old Friends were much alienated from him, looking on him as a Person entirely gain'd by the Court.

Pensioner Fagel laid all his Letters before the Prince, they were also brought to Dr. Burnet, then marry'd and naturaliz'd in Holland. The Prince thought upon this, that a full Answer made by Fagel in such a manner, as that it might be publish'd as a Declaration of his Intentions, would in many respects be a Service to him, especially in Popish Courts, which were on civil Accounts inclin'd to an Alliance against France, but were now possess'd with an Opinion of the Prince, and of his Party in England, as designing nothing but the Ruin and Extirpation

King James's Mistake as to a Parliament.

A. D. 1687. tirpation of all the Papists in those Kingdoms ; so the Pensioner wrote a long Letter in French to Steuart, and Dr. Burnet put it into English.

Fagel's Letter about it to Stewart.

He began it with great Assurances of the Prince and Princess's Duty to the King. They were both of them much against all Persecution on the account of Religion, they freely consented to the covering Papists from the Severities of the Laws made against them on the account of their Religion, and also that they might have the free Exercise of it in private, they also consented to grant a full Liberty to Dissenters ; but they could not consent to the Repeal of those Laws that tended only to the Security of the Protestant Religion ; such as those concerning the Tests, which imported no Punishment, but only an Incapacity of being in publick Employments, which could not be complain'd of as great Severities. This was a Caution observ'd in all Nations, and was now necessary, both for securing the publick Peace and the establish'd Religion. If the Numbers of the Papists were so small as to make them inconsiderable, then it was not reasonable to make such a Change for the sake of a few ; and if those few that pretended to publick Employments would do all their own Party to great a Prejudice, as not to suffer the King to be content with the Repeal of the Penal Laws, unless they could get into the Offices of Trust, then their Ambition was only to be blam'd, if the Offers now made were not accepted.

The Letter was carry'd by Stewart to the King, who brought it to the Cabinet Council, but nothing follow'd upon it. The King order'd Stewart to write back, He would either have all or nothing. It is said the main Body of the Papists were for what was offer'd, that the Emperor of Germany was fully satisfy'd with it, and promis'd to use his Interest at Rome to get the Pope to write to the King to accept of this as a Step to the Test ; but the Jesuits and the French Ambassador were for Extremities, and the King was in all Points govern'd by them.

Father Petre's ill Conduct chastiz'd.

Father Petre affected great Modesty, when it was propos'd to make him a Privy Counsellor, and Lord Sunderland seem'd to meet with much Difficulty in prevailing with him to consent to it. It was given out, that the King resolv'd to obtain a Cardinal's Cap for him, and make him Archbishop of York. If this Pope continued firm in his Resolution against it, it was hoped the next would be more complying. This Jesuit was very officious in serving the King which way he pleas'd, whether to the Prejudice of Protestant or Papist ; and the Colony of Maryland being under a Popish Proprietor, Lord Baltimore, who considering the Interest of his Propriety more than that of the Priests, was very kind to his Protestant Tenants ; it was resolv'd, to take it into the King's hands, and put the Papists there, in Possession of the Government. In order to this, Petre was very earnest with his Lordship to part with it for a Sum of Money: and one time in Discourse with him about it, using some hard Words, which his young Son, the late Lord Baltimore, took to be an Affront to his Father, he ran immediately to the Jesuit, pull'd off his Cap or Wig, and flung it into the Fire, which frighted this Petre so heartily, that he made off as fast as he could, and never again mention'd Maryland to the Lord Baltimore.

Popish Bishops confirm.

There was then a Faction between the secular Priests and the Jesuits, which was sometimes near breaking out into a Rupture ; but the King was so partial to the Jesuits, that the Priests found they could maintain no Competition with them. Bishop Leybourn, and three other Bishops, who had been consecrated in England, were ordered

A. D. 1687. to make a Progress all over the Kingdom, confirming and doing other episcopal Offices wherever they came, and great Numbers gather'd about them.

The Jesuits thought all was sure, and that their Scheme was so well laid, it could not miscarry, as appear'd by the Behaviour of their contemptible Tool Albeville, at the Hague. It is fit to give some Account of that miserable Wretch: he was an Irish Man, his true Name White, and he had been long a Spy for the Spaniards, who not paying his Appointments well, he accepted of the Title of Marquis d'Albeville from them, in part of Payment. He then turned to the French, who paid their Spies and Emisaries more punctually ; Bishop Burnet tells us, he was a most despicable ridiculous Creature, who had not the Appearances either of Decency or Truth. Such Instruments as these were made use of, by both King Charles and King James ; and the Work they had to do, would not admit of better.

Lord Sunderland had a vast Genius, but his Conscience was of a like Extent, and by those Qualifications, he became so intimate a Favourite, that nothing could be got at Court, but by his Interest, and when the King was told, he got all the Money, his Answer was, he deserves it. Nay, his Interest at last was become so remarkable, that his Majesty himself would ask, when any Grant was given, Have they spoke with Sunderland? Fagel's Letter was communicated to him and Melfort, by Stewart, and we shall see presently, how complying both his Conscience and his Honour was in that Affair.

Chudleigh, who was the English Envoy in Holland at this King's Accession to the Throne, behaved so insolently to the Prince of Orange, that he would not see him, and his Successor, Skelton, manag'd Matters with so little Sense, and such an universal Dislike, that the King thought fit to send him to France, where there was little to do, Barillon the French Ambassador at London, having all that Business in his hands.

Albeville was such a Fool, that he did not stick to speak out, what was not fit to be spoken, tho' he had known it to be true. One day, when the Prince of Orange was talking of the King's Promises, and the Oath he had taken to maintain the Laws, and the establish'd Church ; instead of pretending, the King had still kept his Word, this blundering Irishman said, Kings must upon some Occasions forget their Promises. And when the Prince said, the King ought to have more Regard for the Church of England, which was the main Body of the Nation ; Albeville reply'd, The Body you call the Church of England, will not have a Being two Tears to an end. He thus talk'd too plainly and too openly, and at the same time behaved in all other Respects so poorly, that he became the Jest of the Hague. The Foreign Ministers, Mons. d'Avaux the French Ambassador not excepted, did not know how to excuse or bear with his Weakness, which appear'd on all Occasions, and in all Companies.

What he wrote to England upon his first Audiences in Holland, was not known ; but it was soon spread about the Kingdom, that the Prince and Princess had now consented to the Repeal of the Tests, as well as of the Penal Laws. His Highness, to prevent the ill effects which might follow on such Reports, gave Orders to print the Pensioner's Letter to Stewart, which was sent to all Parts of England, and received with universal Joy.

The Dissenters saw themselves now safe in the Prince's Intention towards them. The Church-Party was confirm'd in their Zeal for maintaining the Tests ; and the Lay-Papists seem'd also

But it was not easy to judge, whether this was sincerely meant by them, or whether it was only a popular Art to recommend themselves under such a moderate Appearance. The Court saw the Hurt this Letter did them, and hop'd at first to have stifled it by calling it an Imposition. This is Bishop Burnet's Account of it, and the Way they took to stifle it was a Piece of impudent Falshood,

A. of N-t. which the greatest Chicaner in the Kingdom might have been ashamed of; for there was a Pamphlet publish'd, intitl'd, Parliamentum Pacificum, another healing Parliament being expected to take off the Penal Laws, wherein it was affirmed, that Pensioner Fagel's Letter was not only supposititious, but also that the Author misrepresented the Sentiments of the Prince and Princess of Orange. This Pamphlet with this starr'd Lye in it, was licens'd by the Earl of Sunderland principal Secretary of State, and President of the Council; upon which, Mr. Fagel wrote a Letter to Albeville, which he caus'd to be printed with some of Stewart's Letters. In that to Albeville, the Pensioner tells him, His Majesty and all the Court knew the Letter to be genuine; That Albeville knew Fagel had own'd it to him; That the Earl of Sunderland knew as well as any body, that the Letter to Stewart was not supposititious; That Albeville himself knew and had often own'd it; That their Highnesses, and particularly Her Royal Highness the Princess, had several times told the Envoy their Opinion concerning the Test, as he had express'd it in the Letter to Stewart: notwithstanding all which, the Court got a Pamphleteer to aver 'twas an Imposition, and oblig'd Mr. Stewart to deny that he ever wrote to Mr. Fagel, tho' the latter had the Originals of his Letters by him.

Earl of Sunderland licenses what he knew to be false.

Fr. Hist. Rev. p. 120.

After this unsuccessful Attempt, the King took a large Progress, and one of his Closet Attendants was William Pen the Quaker. His Intention was said to be to view Portsmouth and other Ports and Harbours, but the secret Design was to influence and prepare the Electors of every Corporation thro' which he pass'd, to make such a Choice of Members for the next Parliament, as would answer his Ends. The People receiv'd him every where with Shouts and Acclamations, and dutiful Acknowledgements were paid him at Portsmouth, Bath, Gloucester, Worcester, Ludlow, Shrewsbury, Chester, where Tyrconnel met him from Ireland, and receiv'd Encouragement to go on in the Project of destroying the Protestants in that Kingdom.

His Majesty was receiv'd in the same manner at Newport, Litchfield, Coventry, Banbury and Winchester; and I think we should not forget that he kill'd a Dog at Banbury, that Action being celebrated in the State-Poems. But these Acclamations and Shouts did him more mischief than the free Speeches of those that dreaded and hated his Measures. He thought they proceeded from the Heart, whereas they were the Breath of the Multitude; and he found by sad Experience soon after, that he depended upon them to his ruin—as he might have foreseen, if his Foresight had been but equal to his Zeal: For having on Sunday, December 11, declar'd in Council, that he would have no Lord-Lieutenants, nor Deputy-Lieutenants, nor Justices of the Peace in the several Counties, but such as shall concur with, and assist him to have his Toleration pass'd into a Law; the Lord-

Lieutenants by his Order, and in his Name; summon'd the Chief Officers and Gentlemen in their respective Shires, and laid the Case before them, so as to flatter or terrify them out of their Freedom in the Election of Parliament-Men, as the Regulators did in Corporations. But notwithstanding all these Wiles and Weapons, the King found himself disappointed in his hopes of having a Parliament at his devotion. In some Counties almost all the Gentry disappear'd on a sudden to avoid the Summons of the Lords-Lieutenants. The Gentlemen of Dorsetshire being assembled by the Earl of Bristol, were not sooner acquainted with the King's Intentions, than they answer'd, That an Affair of so great Importance deserv'd to be discuss'd in the great Council of the Nation, to which they would send their Representatives when his Majesty should think fit to call a Free Parliament. The like Answer was made in several other Counties; and in Chester, of about 700 Persons, there were only 17 who could be made to promise a Consent to the repealing of the Penal Laws.

The Opinion of the Prince and Princess of Orange having gone a great way towards the spreading of it in the Nation, the King in his Resentment order'd Albeville to demand the six Regiments, three English and three Scots, in the Dutch Service: but the States refus'd to send them, alledging, they were not oblig'd by Treaty to do it, unless England was in War; that they were levy'd at their Charge, and by frequent filling up, most of those Troops were now natural Hollanders, or of other Provinces, or Germans. However, they order'd Passports for all English and Scots Officers who were willing to quit their Service, and about 40 took them; at which the Prince of Orange was not displeas'd, for those Officers having been corrupted by Chudleigh and Skelton, were very insolent and troublesome.

The King in his Progress visited the Queen at the Bath, where he staid only a few Days, two or three at most, and she continu'd on in her Course of Bathing. Many Books were now writ for Liberty of Conscience; and since all People saw what Security the Tests gave, some of these spoke of an Equivalent to be offer'd, that should give a further Security beyond what could be pretended from the Tests. It was never explain'd what was meant by this. But the Marquis of Hallifax sufficiently explain'd, it could mean nothing, in his Anatomy of an Equivalent. People took it to be an artificial Method to lay them asleep with a high-sounding Word. Some talk'd of new Laws to secure civil Liberty, which had been so much shaken by the Practices of these last Years, ever since the Oxford Parliament: Nay, we are told by Bishop King Burnet, that a very extravagant thing was given James out upon it, how the King was resolv'd to set up a sort of Commonwealth; and the Papists began to talk very high every where for publick Liberty, trying by that to recommend themselves to the People.

When the King came back from his Progress, he resolv'd to change the Magistracy in most of the Cities of England. He began with the City of London, where he not only chang'd the Aldermen, but the Government of many of the Companies. Among other Dissenters, he made Mr. William Kiffin, a Baptist Preacher, an Alderman. He did all this by virtue of the great Powers reserv'd in the new Charters. Those who had stood up for the King during the Debate about the Exclusion, were now turn'd out with Disgrace. And those who had appear'd most violently against him, were put into the

My Lord of Sarum adds, "All this turn'd upon the King, who was so given up to the Humours of his Priests, that he sacrific'd both his Honour and Gratitude as they dictated; and the new Men that were brought in, saw this too visibly to be much wrought upon by it. The King threw off his old Party in too outrageous a manner ever to return to them again. But he was much surpriz'd to find the new Mayor and Aldermen took the Test, and order'd the Celebration of Gunpowder-Treason-day."

Changes the Magistracy of London.

Nuntio not invited into the City by the Lord-Mayor.

We have mention'd the Nuntio's being invited to dine at Guild-hall when the King din'd there, but we should have remember'd, that the Mayor and Aldermen disown'd the Invitation, and made an Entry of it in their Books, that the Nuntio came without their knowledge: Which the King took very ill, and said, I see the Dissenters are an ill-natur'd sort of People that cannot be gain'd. He signify'd to the Lord Mayor that he might use what Form of Worship he lik'd best in Guildhall-Chapel, designing by this to engage the Dissenters to make the first Change from the establish'd Worship. And if a Presbyterian Mayor should do this in one Year, a Popish Mayor might do it in another. But the Mayor put the Decision of the matter upon those to whom the governing of the Diocese of London was committed during the Bishop's Suspension, and ask'd their Opinion in it, which three Bishops could not but give in behalf of the establish'd Worship. So the Church-Service was kept up in Guildhall-Chapel, and the Room where, now is the Receipt of the Bank in Grocers-Hall, where Sir John Shorter kept his Mayoralty, was made a Place for Worship in the Presbyterians way.

Steps towards the Revolution.

In this languishing desperate Condition Great Britain cast her mournful Eyes on Holland, where only she was in hopes of finding a Deliverer in the midst of her Distress and Despair; and it is very certain his Highness the Prince of Orange had his Eye as much upon Britain, to watch for her Preservation and Safety. King James's ill and arbitrary Government, and his Design to establish Popery and Slavery, awaken'd in him a lively Concern for our Religion and Liberties, long before he receiv'd a personal Provocation, by an attempt to impose a pretended Heir on the Nation, and to deprive his Consort the Princess and himself of their Right of Succession to the Crown.

In the Years 1685 and 1686, the Prince often took occasion to speak of the Affairs of England, which he did very freely. He was highly dissatisfy'd with the King's Conduct, apprehending he would give the People such Jealousies of him, as would throw him into a French Management, and force violent Remedies. He had very faithful and large Accounts of all Proceedings at Court, in the City and Country, from Persons of good Intelligence, by word of Mouth, and by Letter: And upon setting up of the Ecclesiastical Commission, some from England press'd the Prince and Princess to write over against it; but he did not think fit to intermeddle at that time, waiting for further Advices and Instances from his Friends: of which he had enough, upon the Proceedings against the Universities: The breaking in upon the Statutes of Magdalen-College, and turning out Dr. Hough the President, and the Fellows by force, was thought an open piece of Robbery and Burglary, when Persons authoriz'd by no legal Commission came and forcibly turn'd Men out of their Possession and Freehold. Bishop Burnet informs us, "This highly inflam'd the Church Party Addresses to the Prince of Orange.

"and the Clergy, who sent over very pressing Messages upon it to the Prince of Orange, desiring he would interpose and espouse the Concerns of the Church, and that he would break upon it, if the King would not redress it." His Highness did not think fit to shew such Letters as these; but he often said he was press'd by many of those, who were afterwards his bitterest Enemies, to engage in their Quarrel. The first thing he resolv'd on, was to send Monsieur Dykvelt to England, with Directions how to talk to all sorts of People, to the King, to those of the Church, and to the Dissenters. Dr. Burnet drew his Instructions, which he follow'd very closely.

A. D. 1687.

Dykvelt sent into England.

He was order'd to expostulate decently, but firmly, with the King upon the Methods he was pursuing both at home and abroad, and to try, if possible, to bring him to a better Understanding with the Prince.

He was to assure the Church Party, that the Prince would ever be firm to the Church of England, and to all our national Interests. The Clergy, by the Bishop of London, had desir'd him to use all his Credit with the Dissenters, to keep them from going into the Measures of the Court; and sent over very positive Assurances, That in case they stood firm now to the common Interest, they would in a better time come into a Comprehension of such as could be brought into a Conjunction with the Church. How these Assurances agreed with the Behaviour of Jane, Aldrich, and the Convocations, after the Prince of Orange had done their Business; how with the Schism Bill and Occasional Bill, after Sacheverell's Tumult, is too well known to need remembrance here. Nay, the Clergy were so complying at this time, that they desir'd the Prince to send over some of the Dissenting Preachers, whom the Violence of the former Years had driven to Holland, and to prevail effectually with them to oppose any false Brethren, such as Lob, &c. whom the Court might have gain'd to deceive the rest. The Prince did this. Mr. Howe, Mr. Showers, and many others return'd to England, to several of whom his Highness gave such Presents, as enabled them to pay their Debts, and undertake the Journey. Dykvelt was order'd to persuade all to stand off, and not to be drawn in by any Promises the Court might make them to assist in electing such Members as would repeal the Test and Penal Laws. Dr. Calamy tells us, "he gave the Nonconformists great Assurance, that they should find Respect from the Prince, when Opportunity offer'd, and that they might be satisfi'd he was no Friend to Rigour and Severity in religious Matters, but a great Friend to Liberty of Conscience." He was to try all sorts of People, and to remove the ill Characters that had been given them of his Highness.

Albeville did all he could to divert this Journey; for he knew well Dykvelt's way of penetrating into Secrets, he himself having been often employ'd by him, and well paid for several Discoveries made by his means. He assur'd the Prince and the States, that the King was firmly resolv'd to maintain his Alliance with them; that his Naval Preparations were only to enable him to preserve the Peace of Europe: For he seem'd much concern'd to find that the States had such Apprehensions of these, that they were putting themselves in a Condition not to be surpriz'd. Albeville in his secret Negotiations with the Prince and Princess, positively assur'd them, the King intended never to wrong them in their Right of Succession: That all he was now engag'd in, was only to assert the Rights of the Crown,

Albeville's Discourse with the Prince of Orange.

A. D. 1687. Crown, of which they would reap the Advantage in their turn. That the Test was a Restraint on the King's Liberty, and he was therefore resolv'd to have it repeal'd, as well as all Penal Laws in Matters of Religion. They saw too well the Advantages Holland had by Liberty of Conscience among them, to oppose the King in this Particular. His Majesty could not abandon Men, because they were of his Religion, had serv'd him well, and suffer'd only on his account, and on account of their Conscience. He told their Highnesses how much the King condemn'd the Proceedings in France, and that he spoke of that King as a poor Bigot, who was govern'd by the Archbishop of Paris and Madam de Maintenon. Whereas he knew Pere de la Chaise had oppos'd the Persecution as long as he could, but his Master hated those Maxims; and therefore he receiv'd the Refugees very kindly, and had given Orders for a Collection of Charity over the Kingdom for their Relief.

King James condemns the French King.

I have been the longer upon this, because it was not only the Substance of what Albeville said to the Prince and Princess, but what the King said to Dykvelt, who return'd a like Answer to the King, as their Highnesses did to Albeville.

The Prince and Princess of Orange's Answer to Albeville.

That they were fix'd in a Principle against Persecution in Matters of Conscience, but they could not think it reasonable to let Papists in to sit in Parliament, or to serve in publick Trusts. The restless Spirit of some of that Religion, and of their Clergy in particular, shew'd they could not be at quiet till they were Masters. And the Power they had over the King's Spirit, in making him forget what he had promis'd upon his coming to the Crown, gave but too just a ground of Jealousy. It appear'd they could not bear any Restraints, nor remember past Services, longer than those who did them could comply in every thing with that which was desir'd of them. They thought the Prerogative, as limited by Law, was great enough, and they desir'd no such exorbitant Power as should break thro' all Laws. They thought the surest as well as the best way was to govern according to Law. The Church of England had given the King signal Proofs of their Affection and Fidelity, and had comply'd with him in every thing, till he came to touch them in so tender a Point, as the legal Security they had for their Religion. Their sticking to that was very natural; and the King's taking that ill from them, was liable to great Censure. His Majesty, if he pleas'd to improve the Advantages he had in his Hand might be both easy and great at home, and the Arbitrer of all Affairs abroad; but he was prevail'd on by the Importunities of some restless Priests to embroil all Affairs to serve their End. They could never consent to abolish those Laws, which were the best, and now the only Fence of that Religion, which they themselves believ'd to be true. Albeville said the Princess was more intractable than the Prince; Dykvelt argu'd often with the King on these Topicks, but found him obstinately fix'd in his Resolution.

The King's Discourse of the Family, and the Prince ought to comply with Dykvelt. The King said, I am the Head of the Family, and the Prince ought to comply with me, but he always sets himself against me. Dykvelt reply'd, The Prince cannot carry his Compliance so far as to give his Religion to your Pleasure; but in all other things he has shew'd a ready Submission to your Will. The Peace of Nimeguen, of which your Majesty is Guarantee, is openly violated in the Article relating to the Principality of Orange; yet since you do not think fit to espouse the Prince's Interests in that Matter, he has been silent, and has made no Protestations upon it: Thus you see he is ready to sacrifice his own Concerns rather than disturb your Majesty's. To this the King made no Reply; but the Earl of Sunderland, and the rest of the Ministry press'd Dykvelt mightily, to endeavour to bring the Prince to concur with the King, they engaging to him, that if that were once settled, his Majesty would go into close Measures with his Highness against France. The Ambassador put an end to all those Propositions, by saying, The Prince will never be brought to hearken to them. Thus his Negotiation at London, and Albeville's at the Hague, had no Effect on either side. Dykvelt succeeded much better with those whom he had Instructions to apply to, as the Marquis of Hallifax, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Devonshire, the Earl of Nottingham, the Earl of Dauby, the Lord Mordaunt, the Lord Lumley, Admiral Herbert, Mr. Russel, who were the Persons chiefly trusted, and upon the Advices that were sent over by them, the Prince govern'd all his Motions.

A. D. 1687.

Lords consult with Dykvelt.

This Year Dr. Burnet, to whose Memoirs we are so much indebted, fell under a severe Prosecution. Prosecution for the many admirable Pieces he wrote abroad in Defence of our Religion, Rights, and Liberties, which were carefully dispers'd, and greedily read by the well-affected of all Denominations. He had finish'd his Travels in France, Italy, Switzerland, and Germany, and was settled in the United Provinces, where he was about to be marry'd to a considerable Fortune; and with a spiteful Intent to prevent it, the King's Advocate in Scotland was order'd to cite him before the Parliament, to answer a Charge of High Treason for holding Correspondence with the Earl of Argyle, James Stewart, then in the King's Favour, Robert Ferguson, Chaplain to the late Earl of Shaftesbury, as it is said in the Citation; but is an impudent Falshood, for he was never Shaftesbury's Chaplain, the Earl being no Dissenter, and Ferguson a Cameronian, &c. The Witnesses whose Names were put to this Citation, according to the Custom in Scotland, were Sir John Cockran, John Cockran Esq; his Son, Mr. Robert West, the perjur'd Evidence in the pretended Presbyterian Plot, Mr. Zachary Bourn, another such Evidence, Mr. William Carsfairs, Minister, Mr. Robert Baird, Merchant in Holland, and Mr. Richard Baxter, the two latter at least were no doubt put in without their knowledge. The Appearance was to be the 27th of June, and the Doctor publish'd a full Answer to the Charge the 17th of May, at what time he wrote also an elegant Letter in his own Vindication to the Earl of Middleton, Secretary of State.

In his Answer he sets forth that he had not seen the Earl of Argyle in nine Years before his Condemnation, that he had had no Correspondence with James Stewart in twenty Years past, that he had not seen Sir John Cockran in four Years, that he never saw West and Brown to his knowledge, that he knew not Carsfairs, nor if there was such a Man as Baird in Holland, that he had had no Conversation with Mr. Baxter in twenty-two Years last past, unless once or twice by Accident at a third Person's House, and had not then any private Discourse with him; notwithstanding all which, the Doctor was condemn'd for Contumacy, that is, for not putting himself into the hands of Persons, who would surely have murder'd him. He wrote other Letters to the Earl of Middleton; but instead of an Answer, Albeville was order'd to demand of the States General, that he should be banish'd their Provinces, and at the same time several Russians were

A. D. 1687. were hir'd to assassinate him, and once he had a narrow Escape in his Garden; but being married, and in consequence of it naturaliz'd, the States granted him their Protection, according to the Law of Nations. However, Albeville so often, and so earnestly press'd the Prince and Princess of Orange to forbid him their Court, that their Highnesses could not at last refuse it without a Quarrel, yet they constantly maintain'd a secret Correspondence with him, communicated to him their Advices from England had him consulted upon them, and made use of his Pen upon all Occasions. Among other Pieces in Vindication of the Church of England, and the Laws of the Land, which Dr. Burnet wrote, was an Answer to Parker Bishop of Oxford's Book, entitled, Reasons for abrogating the Test impos'd on all Members of Parliament, which Book was licens'd by the Earl of Sunderland, and his Majesty commanded the Booksellers not to print any Answer to it, which was equally foolish and tyrannical; for it at once gave People an Itch of reading and answering, and took away the natural Right which every Man has to make use of his Reason in all sorts of Argument. Parker insulted the Divines of our Church with an Insolence superior to that of the Papists, and, as might easily have been foreseen, several sharp Answers came out against it, notwithstanding the King's Command, but none made so much noise as Dr. Burnet's, who very luckily turn'd Parker's Title against him. Parker having said in his Title-Page, Written for the Author's own Satisfaction, and now publish'd for the Benefit of all others whom it may concern; Burnet said the Words were certainly wrong plac'd, for the Truth of the Matter is, that it was written for the Author's own Benefit, and now publish'd for the Satisfaction of all others whom it may concern. Speaking of the whole Body of the Bishops, he says, If there were two or three such as he among the twenty-six, they may comfort themselves with this, that a Dozen of much better Men had one among them, that I confess was not much worse, if it was not for this, that he let the Price of his Treachery fall much lower than Sam. Oxon. does. The Apostate had a very good Word from Echard, and others of his Stamp, when he was abusing Protestant Dissenters, till Marvel lash'd even his Impudence out of countenance. Dr. Burnet added, "When one reflects on two of the Bishops that were of that venerable Body, whose Memory will be bless'd in the present and following Ages, those two great and good Men that fill'd the Sees of Oxford and Chester, Fell and Pearson, we must conclude, that as the World was not worthy of them, so certainly their Sees were not worthy of them, since they have been plagu'd with such Successors.—With what sensible Regret must those who were so often edify'd with the Gravity, the Piety, the Generosity and Charity of the late Bishop of Oxford, look on, when they see such a Harlequin in his room?" Parker charg'd Burnet with writing Lampoons upon the present Princes of Christendom; upon which Dr. Burnet retorted with this satyrical Period, It is Lampoon enough upon the Age that he is a Bishop, but it is a downright Reproach that he is made the Champion of a Cause, which if it is bad of itself, must suffer extremely by being in such hands. This Tool of Arbitrary Power and Popery was so ignorant of Facts, or so maliciously wicked, that he makes the Test to be one of the Productions of Oates's Perjury. His first Reason for abrogating it, is, because it had a shameful Origin, being the first Production of Oates's Conspiracy, made on

Burnet's Answer to Parker.

A. D. 1687. purpose to give Credit and Reputation to Perjury. Now the Test Act pass'd in 1672, and Oates's Discovery of the Popish Plot was not till six Years after. King James himself sent Parker Dr. Burnet's Answer, hearing no body else durst put it into his hands, and hoping it would raise his Indignation to make a Reply; but he died about that time, and one Timothy Hall, a sort of a Presbyterian, was made Bishop of Oxford, and Gifford, a Popish Bishop, President of Magdalen College.

The Jesuits having settled a College in the Savoy, had a Design upon the French Chapel there, and Pulton their Rector tamper'd with Mr. Dubourdien the Hugonot Minister, in order to engage him to resign that Church, promising him, as from the King, to build them another on any Ground they should chuse between Whitehall and Temple-Bar, with a large Sum of Money besides. Monsieur Dubourdien made answer, that being but one, he desir'd Time to communicate the Proposal to the other Ministers and Church-Wardens in the Savoy. These being met upon this critical Affair, it was agreed, that before they gave the Jesuits a positive Answer, they should consult with such Lords as were most conspicuous for their Wisdom and Affection to the Protestant Interest. Accordingly Mr. Dubourdien waited upon the Marquis of Hallifax, the Earl of Danby, and Earl of Nottingham, and others, who all freely advis'd them never to hearken to any Terms with the Jesuits; let them pursue their violent Measures, suffer yourselves to be thrust out of your Church, for by that means you will do your own and the Nation's Business.

I have not been very curious about the Honours and Preferments in these Reigns, for a Reason already mention'd; but lest any body else should have more Curiosity, I will copy from the compleat Historians, who tell us, that this Year,

The Earl of Sunderland was made Knight of Honours the Garter, as was also the Duke of Berwick; and the Duke of Albemarle, Governor of Jamaica; Sir Francis Ratcliff, Baronet, of Northumberland, Earl of Derwentwater; Roger Earl of Castlemain, William Duke of Hamilton, and the Anabaptist Quack, Sir Nicholas Butler, Privy Counsellors. The latter, an obscure Fellow, turn'd Papist, and after the Revolution went again to the Baptist Meeting; Charles Carteret Esq; Edward Vaudrey Esq; and Captain William Phips of New England, were knighted: The latter for bringing home a great Treasure, which was taken out of the Sea, after it had lain there forty-four Years. He had been diving for it before, and being pretty sure of finding it, came to London in the Year 1685, and was there some time without being able to get any one to engage in his Design; he try'd the Merchants in vain, and then made a Trial of the People of Quality. At last the Duke of Albemarle agreed to go half of the Charge, and Phips offer'd a Merchant a Quarter for the Ship he embark'd in, then call'd the Bridgewater Merchant, but the Owner chose rather the Money for her, which was 1500*l.* and he heartily repented it afterwards. The Duke of Albemarle had for his Half above 300,000 Pieces of Eight, and Phips got for himself about 80,000 Pieces, clear of all Charges.

I do not enter into the Biography of the Compleat Historians, being writing a History, and not Lives; but I cannot omit taking notice of the Death of so considerable a Person as the Duke of Buckingham, George Villiers, the famous Statesman and Wit. He had above 30,000*l.* a Year at the Restoration, which some time before his Death was reduc'd to 10,000 Pounds, and that so encumber'd,

A. D. 1687. encumbered, that he had been obliged to pass it over by Deed to Trustees for Payment of his Debts to Sir Robert Clayton, Serjeant Rotheram, &c. reserving to himself 2500 Pounds per Ann. which was all he had left for his Subsistence, and being much too little for his profuse way of living, he took with him a Company of Ruffians, and went down to Helmsley in Yorkshire, a Manor worth about 5000 Pounds a Year, bought afterwards by Sir Charles Duncomb. Here he and his Companions took Money from the Tenants by force contrary to a Decree in Chancery, and were guilty of a Riot in an Inn, for which he must have been try'd, had he return'd to London, but it threw him into a Distemper, of which he died, and with him expired the Buckingham Villiers Family and Estate in the second Generation. And may all Fortunes and Honours, so acquired as theirs were, so expire.

A. D. 1688. ONE of the first Events in this wonderful Year was the greatest Wonder of it, and that was the publishing a Proclamation the second of January declaring very falsely and blasphemously, That it had pleas'd God Almighty to give his Majesty apparent Hopes and good Assurance of his having Issue by his Consort, who was now with Child. Wherefore a Thanksgiving Day was appointed a Fortnight after, and a Form of Prayer made by three Bishops, Crew of Durham, Sprat of Rockester, and White of Peterborough; Two Toms and a Nat, as the Lampoon upon it said. This Form was stich'd into the Common-Prayer and had these Expressions in it, Blessed be that good Providence, which has vouchsafed us fresh Hopes of Royal Issue by our Gracious Queen Mary. Strengthen her we beseech thee, and perfect what thou hast begun. Command thy Holy Angels to watch over her, an Idolatress, and defend her from all Dangers and evil Accidents, that what she has conceived may be happily brought forth to the joy of our Sovereign Lord the King, the further Establishment of his Crown, the Happiness and Welfare of the whole Kingdom, and the Glory of thy great Name. Echard minces the matter, and says the greatest part of the Clergy did not pronounce these Expressions; but if they pronounc'd any Expressions by way of Solemn Prayer on that Thanksgiving-day for that pretended Blessing, they mock'd God and the World. The Day was kept every where with great Coolness and Indifference, the People from the very Whisper of the Great-Belly believing it to be a Cheat, and the bloody Popish Queen Mary and her Cushion, were in every one's Mouth except the Papists, who were so elevated with the Sham, that they gave out, tho' the Child should prove a Daughter, yet it would cut off the Princesses of Orange and Denmark from the Succession, on a vain Supposition, that a Daughter born since the King's advancement to the Throne ought to take place before Princesses born while he was Duke of York; but they took care to prevent any such Litigation by securing a Son and Heir, the Effect of a solemn Petition, as the Jesuits said, which the late Duchess of Modena had put up in Heaven to the Blessed Virgin with a Present of a golden Image: Others say a Smock enrich'd with precious Stones; and I verily believe this is the truest Circumstance in all the Story. I do not build very much upon what I am going to say of this miraculous Conception, but I remember, that being at Bath in the Year 1690, I went with a Gentlewoman a Relation of mine, to see one Mrs. Chapman an Apothecary's Daughter, who was one of those that waited on the Queen as a Guide when she bath'd, and tho'

the Decency of the Sex did not admit of my hearing what was said on this Subject, yet my Kinswoman, who was indeed a very near one, assured me afterwards, that Mrs. Chapman said she could not be with Child when she left Bath, for Reasons fitter to be imagined than express. Bishop Burnet writes, "After the King left her, she pursued a full Course of Bathing, and having resolv'd to return to London in the end of September, an Accident took her to which the Sex is subject, and made her stay there a Week longer. She came to Windfor the sixth of October. It went current, that the Queen believed herself to be with Child in that very Instant in which her Mother pray'd to the Lady of Loretto, where there is a solemn Record of it. A Conception said to be thus begun, look'd suspicious. It was now fix'd to the sixth of October; so the nine Months were to run to the sixth of July. She was in the Progress of her big Belly let blood several times, and the most stringent Things that could be propos'd, were used. It was soon observed, that all things about her were manag'd with a mysterious Secrecy, into which none were admitted but a few Papists. She was not dress'd nor undress'd with the usual Ceremony. Prince George told the Bishop, that the Princess went as far in desiring to be satisfy'd by feeling the Motion after she said she was quick, as she could go without breaking with her, and she had sometimes staid by her even indecently long in Mornings, to see her rise and to give her her Shift. But she never did either, she never offer'd any Satisfaction in that Matter by Letter to the Princess of Orange, nor to any of the Ladies of Quality, in whose Word the World would have acquiesced. The thing upon this began to be suspected, and some Libels were writ treating the whole as an Imposture. The Use the Queen made of this, was to say, that since she saw some were suspecting her as capable of so black a Contrivance, she scorn'd to satisfy those who could entertain such Thoughts of her."

This is the poorest Evasion that ever Tricksters pretended to; what is Modesty or Decency to Ambition and false Zeal? She knew if she was really with Child, 'twas no matter who got it, and rather than have left any room for Suspicion if she could have help'd it, she would have been delivered upon Charing-Cross, or in the most open manner, as other Princesses have been on the like Occasions. The Empress Constantia Wife to the German Emperor Henry VI. being in Years, and the People suspecting she was past Child-bearing, the Emperor gave abundant Proof of her being big and of her Delivery; he prepared a Place in publick, where she remain'd till her Labour Ventre Custodito, with Keepers, that no supposititious Child might possibly be convey'd to her, and there in sight of the Citizens and all the Matrons that would and could possibly approach her, none being excluded, she brought forth a Prince, who was afterwards the Emperor Frederick II. A like Story is told of a Queen of Arragon. 'Twas absurd and ridiculous to say she scorn'd to satisfy them. If she had so done, she would have been sufficiently reveng'd on them for suspecting her. Bishop Burnet gives us some other Reasons against her Conception prior to those already given.

"The Queen had been for six or seven Years in such an ill State of Health, that every Winter brought her near Death. Those about her seem'd well assured that she, who had bury'd all her Children soon after they were born, and had now for several Years ceased bearing, would have no more Children. Her own Priests apprehended

A. D. 1688. "prehended it, and seem'd to wish for her death. She had great and frequent Distempers that return'd often, which put all People out of their Hopes and Fears of her having Children."

Upon the whole, it appears as plain as any thing can appear, which is not to be determin'd by the Senses, that she was in no Condition to conceive, and that she did not conceive, and that the Tricks and Oaths made use of afterwards to prove it, were the Juggles of wicked or deluded People, in which the Legerdemain was so clumsy, that it discover'd itself.

Another Author assures us, she never had the first most natural, known and common Signs of Conception, her Mensis Profluvium continu'd, her Breasts never swell'd, nor was there ever any Milk seen in them by any credible Witnesses. All the outward Parts of her Body that encompassed the Womb, were of the same Proportion as at other times. She, contrary to her former usual Course, always withdrew into her Cabinet, or some other private Room, when she chang'd her Linnen, and would never suffer any Protestant Lady to be by. A French Author says, Bien des Protestans soupconnerent que cette Grossesse n'etoit qu'un coup de politique, d'autant plus que les Moines debitoient & vouloient meme parier que ce seroit un Fils. A great many Protestants suspected that the Queen's Big-belly was only a Trick, and the rather because the Priests gave out, and offer'd to lay Wagers that it would be a Son. Echard with his usual Wisdom says, Great stress was laid on the Incredibility of the Imposture; "That a King and a Queen should conspire to put such a Cheat upon themselves, as well as the Nation, was unnatural and shocking." No stress in the world was laid upon this by any Protestant in his Wits. There was not one Circumstance of the Imposture, but what was credible; and for such a King and such a Queen to cheat a Princess the next Heir, and a Nation whom they hated for the sake of a Religion to which they were Bigots, is unnatural and shocking indeed to good Englishmen and good Protestants; but very natural and agreeable to Papists. The Compleat Historian writes thus of it: "The Queen's Physicians and Domesticks were not satisfy'd in the Signs of her Conception. The Impatience of the Popish Party in presuming and prophesying the Birth of a Son, and several other concurring Reasons, made the Protestants suspect a Fraud, and they were confirm'd in their Suspicion by reflecting that a like Deceit had been put upon the People in the Reign of Popish Queen Mary: for then to relieve themselves from the Fears of a Protestant Princess in Succession, the Romish Priests gave out that the Queen was with Child. Prayers were order'd for her safe Delivery, and a Popish Preacher at St. Paul's pretended to tell of the Birth, and describe the Boy; when after all, the Sham was carry'd no farther." What follows is very silly, but it is in other Histories as well as the Compleat One; "Because, as verily believ'd, King Philip was too just and generous to consent to any such Imposture." Philip was one of the greatest Tyrants then reigning in the whole World, and it was not his Justice or Generosity that hinder'd his permitting of the Cheat, but because such an Impostor must have succeeded him in all his Kingdoms, both in the old World and the new.

If the Talk of a Child by the Queen was design'd to divert the People from fixing their Eyes and Hearts upon a Protestant Successor, it had not that effect: On the contrary, the Nation look'd more and more towards the Court in Holland, and the Princess Anne at home. The King was sensible of it, and found the Prince and Princess of Orange to be more popular for refusing to approve of the Repeal of the Penal Laws and Test. Under this Apprehension, he began to give out Commissions for the raising of new Troops, and was preparing a better Fleet with extraordinary Diligence; which gave the Dutch a good Pretence to go on with their Armaments by Sea and Land, especially considering the great Power and Preparations of Lewis the XIV. who they had good reason to believe was in a secret League with King James for like their Destruction, as his Brother King Charles had been. The Dutch make war-like Preparations.

Petre the Jesuit had by this time gain'd such an Ascendant, that he was look'd on as the first Minister of State. The Nuntio Dada mov'd the King to interpose and mediate a Reconciliation between the Courts of Rome and France; but the King answer'd, Since the Pope will not gratify me in the promotion of Father Petre, I will leave him to free himself of the Trouble in which he has involv'd himself the best way he can. And the Court of England reckon'd that as soon as the Pope felt himself press'd, he would fly to the King for protection, and grant him every thing he ask'd of him in order to obtain it. Petre gave daily new Proofs of a weak and ill-govern'd Passion, and discover'd all the ill Qualities of one that seem'd rais'd up to be the common Incendiary, and to drive the King and his Party to the Precipice.

On the 27th of April, the King renew'd the Declaration he had set out the former Year for Liberty of Conscience, with an Addition, declaring, that he would adhere firmly to it, and that he would put none in any publick Employments, but such as would concur with him in maintaining it. He also promis'd to hold a Parliament in November following; which Promise, so long before-hand, was somewhat extraordinary: But Father Petre and William Pen persuaded the King to it, tho' with a different Prospect. Pen, and all the Tools that were employ'd by him, had still some hopes of carrying a Parliament to agree with the King, if too much time was not lost, Whereas the delaying a Parliament rais'd Jealousies as if none were intended, but that it was only talk'd of to amuse the Nation till other Designs were ripe. On the other hand, Petre and his Cabal saw the King was kept off from many things they propos'd with the Expectation of the Concurrence of a Parliament: And the fear of giving new Disgusts, had begot a Caution that was very uneasy to them. They thought much time was already lost, and that they made but a small Progress. They began to apprehend that the Regulators of Corporations, who were still feeding them with hopes, and were asking more Time and more Money, intended only to amuse them to wear out the Business into more length, and keep themselves the longer in Credit and in Pay; but that they did not in their Hearts wish well to the main Design, and therefore acted an insincere Part with the King. For these Reasons, they resolv'd to put that Matter to the last trial, reckoning if the King saw it was in vain to hope for any thing in a Parliamentary Way, he might be more easily carry'd to extreme and violent Methods.

These were the Counsels that hurry'd on this King, otherwise weak and impetuous, to his Ruin.

The Lord Sunderland continu'd still in full Favour, having promis'd the Queen to turn Papist if she was deliver'd of a Son. About this time Letters were sent by the Penny-Post from an

A. D. 1688. an unknown Hand to several Lords, as the Marquis of Hallifax, the Earl of Dorset, the Lord Lumley, and others, admonishing them to change their Religion, and make their Peace with God and the King, and threatening if they did not so do, they should not survive the sixth of February. The Lord Lovelace was summon'd to appear at the Council-Table, for saying, that the Judges and Justices of the Peace put in by the King's Dispensing Power, ought not to be obey'd, they being prefer'd contrary to Law.

Declaration order'd to be read by the Clergy. The King was not satisfy'd with the publishing his Declaration. He resolv'd to oblige the Clergy to read it in all their Churches in time of Divine Service. "And now, says Bishop Burnet, it appear'd what bad Effects were like to follow on that officious Motion that Sancroft had made, for obliging the Clergy to read the Declaration King Charles set out in the Year 1681, after the Dissolution of the Oxford Parliament." An Order pass'd in Council, May the 4th, requiring the Bishops to send Copies of the Declaration to all their Clergy, and to order them to read it on two several Sundays in time of Divine Service.

Clergy refuse to read the Declaration. This put the Clergy under great Difficulties, and they were at first much divided about it, even many of the best and worthiest of them were under some Distraction of Thought. They had many Meetings, and argu'd the Point long among themselves in and about London; at last they came to a Resolution not to read it. They saw of what Importance it was that they should be unanimous in it; nothing could be of more fatal Consequence than their being divided in their Practice; for if any considerable Body of the Clergy, such as could carry the Name of the Church of England, could have been prevail'd on to give Obedience, and only some Number, how valuable soever the Men might be, should refuse to obey, then the Court might still pretend, that they would maintain the Church of England, and single out all those who had not given Obedience, and fall on them. Thus the Church would be broken within itself upon this Point, and the one Half be destroy'd by means of the other. The Court depended upon this, that the greater part would obey, and so they would be furnish'd with a Point of State, to give a colour for turning out the disobedient, who were like to be the Men that stood most in their way, and crossed their Designs most, both with their Learning and Credit. And indeed the Behaviour of the Clergy on this occasion was worthy of the Priesthood in the Primitive Christian Church, and had the same Virtue and the same Temper prevail'd from that time to this, the Happiness of this Nation would have been admir'd or envy'd by all Christendom.

Bishops betray the Church. The Bishops who were engag'd in the Design of betraying the Church, Crew, Watson, Carterwright, Hall, Wood, Barlow, were persuaded this would be the Event of the Matter, and possess'd the King with the Hope of it so positively, that he seem'd to depend upon it. The Correspondence over England was manag'd with that Secrecy, and these Resolutions were so communicated to the Clergy in the Country, that they were generally engag'd to agree in their Conduct, before the Court came to apprehend that they would be so unanimous, as it prov'd in Conclusion that they were.

Dr. Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, wrote round his Province, and desir'd such Bishops as were able, to come up and consult together in a Matter of so great Concern; and he ask'd the Opinion of those, whom their Age and Infirmities disabled from taking the Journey. He found that 18 of the Bishops, and the main Body of the Clergy, concurr'd in the Resolution against reading the Declaration; so himself, with the six Bishops who came up to London, and had a Consultation in his Palace at Lambeth, resolv'd upon a Petition to the King, in which they would lay before him the Reasons that determin'd them not to obey the Order of Council which had been sent them. This flow'd from no Want of Respect to his Majesty's Authority, nor from any Unwillingness to let Favour be shew'd to Dissenters, in relation to whom they were willing to come to such a Temper, as should be thought fit, when that Matter should be consider'd and settled in Parliament and Convocation. We must not go further without observing how well this Temper has appear'd in all the Convocations that have been held from that time to this, how well in Oxford Sermons, Bath Sermons, Assize Sermons, Town Sermons and Country Sermons on the 30th of January, and at other Times; how well it agreed with the pious Bills Schism and Occasional, which cannot be remember'd with too much Indignation and Abhorrence. The Archbishop about two Months after, while he and his Brethren were under Prosecution, sent certain Articles to his Clergy, wherein he explain'd this good Temper a little farther, and exhorted them to have a very tender Regard to our Brethren the Protestant Dissenters, to visit them at their Houses, and to receive them kindly at their own. I knew a Vicar, who not long ago, turn'd off his Curate for visiting a Presbyterian Neighbour. To treat them fairly wherever they meet them, to take all Opportunities of assuring and convincing them, that the Bishops of the Church are really and sincerely irreconcilable Enemies to the Errors, Superstitions, Idolatries and Tyrannies of the Church of Rome: There spoke the divine Spirit of the true Church of England; And that the very unkind Jealousies which some have had of the Bishops to the contrary, were altogether groundless; and in the last place warmly and most affectionately to exhort them to join with us in daily fervent Prayer to the God of Peace for an universal blessed Union of all Reform'd Churches both at home and abroad, against our common Enemies, &c. How contrary are these pious charitable Sentiments to those of Bancroft, Laud, Sheldon, Morley? How contrary to the Lord Clarendon's, who would not allow the Reform'd Church at Charenton to be a true Church, as Archbishop Sancroft calls it, nor give his Consent that King Charles should go to it. The Bishops alledg'd in their Petition, That the Declaration being founded on such a dispensing Power as had been often declar'd illegal in Parliament, both in the Year 1662, and in the Year 1672, and in the Beginning of the King's own Reign, and being a Matter of so great Consequence to the whole Nation, both in Church and State, they could not in Prudence, Honour and Conscience make themselves so far Parties to it, as the Publication of it once and again in God's House, and in the Time of divine Service must amount to.

The Archbishop being then in an ill State of Health, he sent the other six Bishops with the Petition. Orleans, who sets an Example to Echard, affirms that the Archbishop presented it Person. The six Bishops were St. Asaph, Bath and Wells, Ely, Chichester, Peterborough, and Bristol, who went the very same Day, May the 18th, the Friday before the Declaration was first to have been read, to Whitehall, where being introduc'd by the Earl of Sunderland, they deliver'd their Petition to the King. Upon the reading of it he startled, seem'd very much incens'd, and made this Answer in a very angry Tone, I have heard

They promise Kindness to the Dissenters.

Archbishop Sancroft desires the Prayers of the Presbyterians.

A. D. 1688. of this before, but did not believe it; I did not expect this from the Church of England, especially from some of you, meaning Ken I suppose; if I change my Mind, you shall hear from me; if not, I expect my Command shall be obey'd.

The King's Answer.

The Bishops with all Reverence reply'd, We resign ourselves to the Will of God. The King's threatening Answer terrify'd the Bishops a little. However they remain'd firm and unshaken, and only five of the Prelates of England caus'd the Declaration to be publish'd; nay, it was observ'd that in some Churches, where the Ministers either thro' Fear or Mistake comply'd with the Orders of their Superiors, the greatest part of the Congregation disappear'd as soon as they began to read the Declaration. In London it was only read in four or five Churches, and of those that comply'd we have the Names only of three, Hall, Elliot and Thompson. There were not above 100 Ministers in all England that read it. Matters were now brought to a Crisis, the King was engag'd on his part as the Bishops were on theirs. All People look'd on with great Expectations, reckoning that upon the Issue of this Business a great Decision would be made, both of the Designs of the Court, and of the Temper of the Nation. The King for some Days consulted with all that were now employ'd by him, what he should do upon this Emergency, and talk'd with People of all Persuasions. Mr. Lob, who preach'd in the Meeting-House in Fetter-Lane, was entirely gain'd to the Court, and advis'd the King to send them to the Tower: This Lob had been as deep in Plots against him as any Man; there was once a Proclamation to apprehend him, but having been pardon'd, and taken into Favour, he flatter'd King James with the most dangerous Counsels, finding they were most grateful to him. Father Petre seem'd transported with Joy, for he thought the King was engag'd to break with the Church of England, and it was reported that he broke out into that indecent Expression upon it, They shall be made to eat their own Dung. The King was long in doubt. Some of the Popish Nobility earnestly entreated him to let the Matter fall, but he was hurry'd on by his evil Genius to do every thing that might hasten his Destruction; and the violent Advices of Father Petre, and the Jesuit Party, were so fatally suited to his own Temper and Passion, that they prevail'd over the wiser Counsels of almost all that were advis'd with. After a Fortnight's Consultation the Bishops were cited to appear before the Council. The Petition was offer'd to them, and they were ask'd if they own'd it to be their Petition; they answer'd, It seem'd they were to be proceeded against on that Account, so they hop'd the King would not press them to a Confession, and then make use of it against them. At last the Archbishop of Canterbury own'd that he wrote the Petition with his own Hand, and that himself and the other Bishops sign'd it. They were then charg'd with the Publication of it, for it was then printed, but they absolutely deny'd that it was done by their means. The Archbishop had taken no Copy of it, and had never shewn it to any Person. Thus it was not publish'd by them, but must have been done by some of those to whom the King had shewn it. They were then required to enter into Bonds to appear in the Court of King's Bench, and answer to an Information of Misdemeanor. They excepted to this, and said, that by their Peerage they were not bound to do it, and insisting still upon it, they were sent to the Tower, by a Warrant sign'd the 8th of June, by Father Petre did not sign it, being excus'd by the King's express Order. The Court was so apprehensive of the People's Resentment, that the Bishops were sent to the Tower by Water; but both Sides of the River were crowded with People, who with loud Acclamations extoll'd the Bishops Constancy, and on their Knees crav'd their Benedictions. Some Companies of Soldiers were order'd to be up in Arms for fear of a Tumult; but the Tyranny the Nation groan'd under was too great for tumultuous Motions, and nothing could have reliev'd them but a thorow Change in the Government. The King being told what Demonstrations of Tenderness and Respect were paid to the Bishops, order'd the Tower Guard to be doubled; his Army was then encamp'd on Hounslow Heath, and the News of the Bishops being sent to the Tower affected them as much as the Citizens of London.

I shall be very large in my Account of the Imposture of the Pretender, having a Manuscript Information which was taken from Dr. Lloyd late Bishop of Worcester, by a very worthy Gentleman now living, a Man of Honour and Character in the World: But before I enter upon that, I will repeat what Bishop Burnet says of it, and desire the Reader to excuse Repetitions, if there are any in the two Accounts, the one in those places confirming the other.

Things went on thus till Monday in Easter-Week. On that Day the King went to Rockingham, to see some of the Naval Preparations; but was soon sent for by the Queen, who apprehended she was in danger of miscarrying. Dr. Scarborough was come to Knightsbridge to see Bishop Ward; but the Queen's Coach was sent to call him in all haste, since she was near miscarrying. Dr. Windebank, who knew nothing of this Matter, staid long that Morning upon an Appointment for Dr. Wallgrave, another of the Queen's Physicians, who the next time he saw him excus'd himself; for the Queen, he said, was then under the most apparent Signs of miscarrying. Of this the Doctor made Oath, and it is yet extant.

On the same day, the Countess of Clarendon being to go out of town for a few days, came to see the Queen before she went, knowing nothing of what had happen'd to her. And she being a Lady of the Bed-Chamber, did, according to the Rule of the Court, go into the Queen's Bed-Chamber, without asking Admittance. She saw the Queen abed bemoaning herself in a most doleful manner, saying often, Undone! Undone! And one that belong'd to her carry'd somewhat out, which she believ'd was Linnen taken from the Queen. She was upon this in some Confusion. And the Countess of Powis coming in, went to her, and said with some Sharpness, What do you here? and carried her to the Door. Before she had got out of the Court, one of the Bed-Chamber Women follow'd her, and charg'd her not to speak of any thing she had seen that Day. This Matter, whatever was in it, was hush'd up, and the Queen held on her Course.

J. D. 1688. The Princess had miscarry'd in the Spring, and as soon as she had recover'd her Strength, the King press'd her to go to the Bath, since that had so good an effect on the Queen. Some of her Physicians, and all her other Friends were against her going. Lower, one of her Physicians, told Bishop Burnet he was against it: He thought she was not strong enough for the Bath, tho' the King press'd it with an unusual Vehemence. Millington, another Physician, told the Earl of Shrewsbury, that he was desir'd to go to the Princess and advise her to go to the Bath. The Person that spoke to him told him, the King was much set on it, and expected it of him, that he would persuade her to it. Millington answer'd, he would not advise a Patient according to Direction, but according to his own Reason. Scarborough and Wytherley took it upon them to advise it; so she went thither in the end of May.

As soon as she was gone, those about the Queen did all of a sudden change her Reckoning, and began it from the King's being with her at Bath. This came on so quick, that tho' the Queen had set the 14th of June for her going to Windsor, where she intended to lie-in, and all the Preparations for the Birth, and for the Child, were order'd to be made ready by the end of June: Yet now a Resolution was taken for the Queen's Lying-in at St. James's, and Directions were given to have all Things quickly ready. The Bath Water either did not agree with the Princess, or the Advices of her Friends were so pressing, who thought her absence from the Court at that time of great Consequence, that in compliance with them, she gave it out it did not, and that therefore she would return in a few days. The Day after the Court had this notice, the Queen said she would go to St. James's and look for the good Hour. She was often told, that it was impossible, upon so short a warning, to have Things ready: But she was so positive as to say, I will lie there this Night, tho' I lie upon the Boards. And at night, tho' the shorter and quicker Way was from Whitehall to St. James's through the Park, and she always went that way, yet now by a sort of Affectation, she would be carry'd thither by Charing-Cross, thro' the Pall-mall. And it was given out by all her Train, she was going to be deliver'd. Some said it would be next Morning, and the Priests affirm'd very confidently it would be a Boy. The next Morning about nine a-clock, she sent word to the King that she was in Labour. The Queen Dowager was next sent to. But no Ladies were call'd; nor were any Women in the Room, but two Dressers, one Under-Dresser, and the Midwife. The Earl of Arran sent notice to the Countess of Sunderland, so she came. The Lady Bellasis came also in time. The Protestant Ladies who belong'd to the Court, were all gone to Church before the News was let go abroad; for it happen'd on Trinity Sunday, which was that Year on the 10th of June. The King brought over with him from Whitehall a great many Peers and Privy-Counsellors, and of these, 18 were let into the Bed-Chamber; but they stood at the furthest end of the Room, and the Ladies within the Alcove. The Curtains of the Bed were drawn close, and none came within them, but the Midwife and Under-Dresser. The Queen lay all the while a-bed; and in order to the warming one Side of it, a WARMING-PAN was brought: But it was not open, that it might be seen there was Fire and nothing else in it; which gave great cause for Suspicion, and all People were fill'd with it.

A little before Ten the Queen cry'd out as in a strong Pain, and immediately after the Midwife said aloud, she was happily brought to bed. The Lords cry'd, Of what? The Midwife answer'd, The Queen must not be surpriz'd. Only she gave a Sign to the Countess of Sunderland; who upon that touch'd her Forehead, by which, it being the Sign before agreed on, the King said, I know it is a Boy. No Cries were heard from the Child, nor was it shew'd to those in the Room. It was pretended more Air was necessary. The Under-Dresser went out with the Child, or somewhat else in her Arms to a Dressing-Room, to which there was a Door near the Queen's Bed. But there was another Entry to it from other Apartments. The King continu'd with the Lords in the Bed-Chamber for some Minutes, which was either a sign of much Phlegm upon such an occasion, or it look'd like the giving time for some Management. After a little while, they went all into the Dressing-Room, and there the News was publish'd. Nobody was call'd to lay their Hands on the Queen's Belly, in order to a full Satisfaction. And when the Princess came to town three Days after, she had as little Satisfaction given her. Chamberlain the Man-Midwife, who was always order'd to attend her Labour before, and who brought the Plaisters for putting back the Milk, wonder'd that he had not been sent to. He went, according to custom, with the Plaisters; but he was told they had no occasion for him. All that concern'd the Milk, or the Queen's Purgations, was manag'd still in the dark, which made every one believe there was a base Imposture put on the Nation. One Hemmings, a very worthy Man an Apothecary, who liv'd in St. Martin's-Lane, the very next door to the Family of an eminent Papist, Browne, Brother to the Viscount Montacute, the Wall between his Parlour and theirs being so thin, that he could easily hear any thing that was said with a louder Voice than ordinary; heard, the Night after, one coming into that Parlour say in a doleful Tone, the Prince of Wales is dead; upon which, a great many that liv'd in the House came down stairs very quick. They were in Confusion, and he could hear no more. The next Morning he went to the Bishops in the Tower, and told them. The Countess of Clarendon came thither soon after, and said she had been at the young Prince's Door, but was deny'd Access; at which she was amaz'd, and ask'd if they knew her? They said they did, but the Queen had order'd that no Person whatsoever should be suffer'd to come into him. This gave Credit to Hemmings's Story, and look'd as if all was order'd to be kept shut up close till another Child was found. One that saw the Child two days after, told Bishop Burnet, that he look'd strong, and not like a Child so newly born. Windebank met Walgrave the Day after this Birth, and remember'd him of what he had told him eight Weeks before. He acknowledg'd it; but added, God works Miracles, to which no Reply could or durst be made by the other. It needed none; So healthy a Child being so little like any of those the Queen had borne, it was given out he had Fits, and could not live: But those who saw him every day, observ'd no such thing. On the contrary, the Child was in a very prosperous State. None of those Fits ever happen'd when the Princess was at Court; for she could not be deny'd Admittance, tho' all others were. It was thought this was reported to make the Matter more credible. 'Tis true, some Weeks after that, the Court being gone to Windsor, and the Child sent to Richmond, he fell into such Fits, that four Physicians were sent for. They all look'd on him as a dying Child. The King and Queen were sent for. The Doctors went to dinner, and wondering often why they were not call'd, they took it for granted the Child was dead. But when they went to him after dinner, they saw a sound healthy Child, that seem'd to have had no sort of Illness on him. It was said the Child was strangely reviv'd of a sudden. But some of the Physicians told Bishop Lloyd, that it was not possible for them to think it was the same Child. They look'd on one another, but durst not speak what they thought.

Most of these Passages were Informations sent over to the Prince and Princess of Orange, from whom Bishop Burnet had them. He adds, I do not mix with these the various Reports that were both then and afterwards spread of this Matter; of which Bishop Lloyd has a great Collection, most of them well attested. This very Collection is fallen into my hands, and I shall insert it as I had it from the Gentleman, who had it from the Bishop himself, in the following Letter.

Bishop
Lloyd's Account of the Imposture.

Finding myself and others likely to be oblig'd to take the Abjuration Oath, I thought it would be much for my Satisfaction, if I could get some Information of the Birth of the pretended Prince of Wales. For which purpose I wrote to a Friend then in London, desiring him, if he could, to make some Discovery of the Matter; which I thought he might do, by consulting with some considerable Persons whom I mention'd.

In a little time my Friend return'd me Answer, that he had consulted the Bishop of Worcester, (who was one of them;) and that he told him, if I would make a Journey to him at Hartlebury, he did not doubt but that he should give me full Satisfaction as to the suppos'd Birth of the pretended Prince of Wales. Upon which, on Monday the 15th of June 1702, being accompany'd with my Friend Mr. M. I attended his Lordship at his House at Hartlebury, where we were very kindly receiv'd, and entertain'd a Night and two Days, in which time we had much of the Bishop's Company; and being alone with him, his Discourse for the most part related to that Subject, which we heard with great Satisfaction, and took Minutes of it with his leave. He began it with the Marriage of King James and Queen Mary, which he said was doubtless intended by the French King, for the Ruin of England. Upon which account, the then Bishop of Salisbury and he being together when they heard the News of the Match's being concluded, put up their Prayers for averting the Mischiefs thereby design'd. She was made a Daughter of France, and had 40000*l.* assign'd for Dowry, that being the Sum given by King Charles to the Duke of Orleans with his Sister.

The Marriage (he said) was in 1673; and in the Years 74, 75, and 76, she had three Children, who all died within the compass of a Year after their Birth, the Physicians concluding there were Mala Stamina Vitæ, by reason of the D's Distemper; and the same being hereditary in her Family, in as high a degree or higher than in any Family in Italy, they thought there would be no Child to live.

From 76 to 87 we heard of nothing but Miscarriages, but then it was resolv'd that a Child must be had. November the 27th, Proclamation was given out for Days of Thanksgiving to be kept in January, (when it might be suppos'd that the Queen would be quick) the Tokens till then were somewhat uncertain; and about that time, 'twas with great Confidence given out by a Popish Priest at Chester, that the Queen was with Child of a Son; and it being demand'd of him how he knew it to be a Son, his Answer was, because the King had pray'd for a Child and a Son to St. Winefred, whose Rule was to grant all that was ask'd, or nothing; and therefore since it appear'd that the Queen was with child, they might certainly conclude it to be a Son.

But whatever it were, the Queen miscarry'd on Easter-Monday, which appears thus: The Bishop of Worcester being with some Friends at Samuel Bishop's in Oxfordshire, there came to him the Earl of Clarendon, desiring him to go with him to London about some Business of the Earl's. The Bishop ask'd the Earl what News, and whether the Queen had miscarry'd, (which they had heard some little time before.) The Earl answer'd, He would tell him nothing of the matter then, but he should know more of it when they came to London, where, being come on the Saturday following, they met the Countess, who was come home the same day from her Estate in Berkshire, and being by the Earl desir'd to acquaint the Bishop with that Business, she seem'd to be somewhat at a stand; but the Earl telling her that he had not told him any thing of it, but had promis'd him he should know it, the Countess gave him this Account: That designing to go into Berkshire on Easter-Tuesday, she was oblig'd (as being Lady of the Bed-Chamber) to attend the Queen, and to ask her leave. Accordingly she went to Court on Monday, and coming into the Lodgings, she could see nobody: but when she came to the Bed-Chamber, she heard a lamentable Voice crying, I am undone! I am undone! At which being surpris'd, she cast about to find whence the Voice came, and found it to come from the Bed, where she saw the Queen sitting up, and beating herself in a fearful manner, uttering these Words; at which she being herself ready to sink, the Marchioness of Powis came flying upon her, and laying hold of her, said, Madam, what makes you here? and so thrust her out of the Room.

The same day, Easter Monday, Sir Charles Scarborough, and the Bishop's Apothecary were invited to dine with the Bishop of Salisbury at Knight's-bridge, and desired to be there before the rest of the Company, that my Lord of Salisbury might have Leisure to consult with them about his Health, where they came accordingly at eleven a-Clock; but they had not been there long, before Sir Charles, being the Queen's Physician, was told there was a Messenger from Court to speak with him; upon which the Doctor went forth, and coming presently in again told them he must be gone, for the Queen had miscarried, which Information Bishop Lloyd had from the Doctor, and Mr. Hemmings the Apothecary. The same day, as his Lordship was also inform'd by Dr. Windebank, Dr. Walgrave, another of the Queen's Physicians and a Papist, had appointed to meet the said Dr. Windebank at a certain Place and Time upon a Consult, where Dr. Windebank waited a great while for him; but Doctor Walgrave not coming, the other Doctor was much offended, and signify'd his Resentment to him when he came, or when he saw him the next time; upon which Doctor Walgrave excused himself, telling him that he could not help it, being detain'd with the Queen, with whom he stay'd till he plainly saw it to be a Miscarriage, by tokens then mentioned.

Dr. Windebank meeting Dr. Walgrave in St. James's Park on Trinity Sunday in the Evening,

A. D. 1688. evening, asked him whether he did not tell him two Months before that the Queen had miscarried, whereas a Child was that Day born; to which Walgrave reply'd, that nothing was impossible to God; the other answer'd, no, if you have Miracles among you, I know not what to say. Her late Majesty Queen Anne did not believe the Queen to have been with Child at all, as she told Bishop Lloyd, till his Lordship gave her this Account; and her Reason was this, that it being the Custom, when the Queen, or Dutchess, did shift herself, for the greatest Person present to do the Office, she had often had the doing of it, at which times she had the Opportunity of seeing her naked Body, and when she was quick with Child she would put the Princess's Hand on her Belly, and ask her, whether she felt her Brother kick'd her; but she was never admitted to this Office and Freedom all the time of this Breeding; the Reason of which Bishop Lloyd conceived to be, that there being Apprehensions of a Miscarriage, she was kept thus at a distance, that she might not discover it. The Bishop ask'd her Highness whether she was sent to the Bath, who said no, that she went upon the Advice of her Physicians, but that she stay'd there longer than she would have done, before she could get leave to come home; and when she came, she was not admitted to that free Access to the Queen, which she might have expected. His Lordship was inform'd by Captain Wright, and a Boat-swain, or from some Person that had it from them, that they brought over, with the Countess of Tyrconnel from Ireland, two big-belly'd Women, the one being taller than the other, and from the Hostels at Lichfield he was inform'd there were two such lodged at her House with the said Countess, and she said she heard that one of the Gentlewomen was deliver'd on the Road to London, he thought at St. Albans.

On the Saturday before Trinity Sunday, the Queen being at Cards was pull'd by the Coat, upon which she started up and left the Company; about eight a-clock the next Morning, as it appears by some of the Depositions, her Travail begun, it being affirm'd that then her Water broke down, notwithstanding it does not appear that she had any Company to stay with her till about nine: Those few that came in, as Turini an Italian, &c. all Confidants, being told by her Majesty that she thought herself to be in Travail, (whereas the Water is said to be only the Beginning of it) those Persons were all sent to call some others.

The Countess of Sunderland deposes, that she went that Morning to St. James's Chapel about eight a-clock, designing to receive the Sacrament, and that at the Beginning of the common Service, one came and told her that she must come to the Queen, who answer'd, that she would come when the Service was ended; afterwards she being at the Altar, another came and told her the Queen was in Travail, upon which she went, which must be near nine a-clock at least, and was told by the Queen that she thought she was in Travail. All this while the Midwife was not there, neither did she come, as may be gathered from what passed, till near Half an Hour after Nine, about which time she came in at a Door on the dark Side of the Bed, which Bishop Lloyd supposes to be towards Mrs. Grey's Lodging, and there kneel'd down, the Queen being in Bed; after her comes Delabady the dry Nurse, and kneeling down by her, as she herself deposes, gave her some Clothes for the Queen, in which Clothes the Bishop suspects the Child newly brought from Mrs. Grey to have been; for soon after, precisely three Quarters after Nine, the Child was brought out of the Bed, not naked, but in loose Clothes, as the Depositions say, and being shew'd, appear'd to be a Boy. On that side of the Bed there were not above three or four Persons, all Confidants; but on the other side, the Curtains being open, several Persons stood; the Room was long, but one Window in it, four Doors, the Bed at the dark End, and the Feet towards the Window.

It is to be observ'd, that tho' several of the Deponents affirm that they saw her Majesty's Shift stain'd or stiffen'd with Milk, yet there was no mention of drawing her Breasts, nor of seeing the Milk run out of them after her Delivery; but in February, and without specifying the Day there is, which might be at the Time of her Miscarriage.

The King told the Privy Council that he was with the Queen all the while of her Travail; yet the Lord M. as I remember, swore that he was several times talking with them in the Drawing-Room. Note the time of the Travail from the coming of the Midwife could not be much more than a Quarter of an Hour.

Here again we must observe, that this was the first time that her Majesty was delivered in Bed, she being ever before deliver'd openly upon a Paller-Bed; but then 'twas pretended not to have been air'd, and so not safe for her Majesty to make use of it. Note, as Dr. Wallis in a Letter to the Bishop of Worcester, dated December the 6th or 7th, 1701, which I myself read, observes, she was not removed into any other Bed after she was deliver'd, nor so much as to the other side of that, as any the meanest Woman must have been on Peril of her Life. Several Persons that saw the Child on Sunday said it was black in the Face, and they generally concluded that it could not live till the next Morning. It is supposed that this was occasion'd by its being kept so long without Air.

The next Day being Monday 'twas reported that the Prince was dead. On that Day the Countess of Clarendon went to the Tower to visit the Bishops, who ask'd her what News, and whether the Prince was dead; the Countess told them that she going that Day to the Lodgings, had the Door shut against her by a Page, of which she demanded the Reason, having Authority, as Lady of the Bed-Chamber, to command any Door to be open'd unto her; but the Page answer'd, he had done no more than what he had Command for: upon which, she order'd the Deputy Governess, the Lady Strickland, to be call'd, who came and open'd the Door a little, holding it, and told her that by the Queen's Command she must not be admitted in.

On Tuesday Mr. Hemmings the Apothecary came to his Lordship, then in the Tower, the Bishop enquired also what News; Hemmings said the Prince is dead. Bishop Lloyd ask'd him how he knew it; he answer'd, your Lordship knows that there is but a Lath Wall between me and Mr. Brown, Brother to the Lord Montacute, a zealous Papist; and I heard in the Night great Lamentation there, that the Prince was dead. On that Day several Persons came bringing the same News with like Lamentation; among which, one being ask'd how he knew it, said he saw it: But towards the Evening came a Popish Priest, and ask'd why they cry'd, and made such ado, and to comfort them told them the Prince was not dead.

Bishop Lloyd was told by a Lady that saw the Child on Sunday, that the Make of its Face was fine and round, the Eyes black, and that she doubted doubted not but that the Hair would have been so; but coming to see it some time after, the Form was much chang'd, the Face long, the Eyes of a Hazel Blue, or Grey, and the Hair of a reddish Yellow, which she observing, put her Face very near it; insomuch, that the Lady Strickland spoke to her, and told her that she would hinder its breathing. The said Lady ask'd her how she lik'd it; she said not at all, for that she did believe it to be decaying, and that it would not live, she observing some Lines in its Face to be the same that had been in the Faces of two of her own, who both died; and this Lady added, that she would swear 'twas not the same Child which she saw on Sunday.

Bishop Lloyd ask'd the Lady of . . . . . how the Queen's Milk was, who said, that she coming to her ask'd that Question, and that the Queen reply'd, that whatever the Matter were, she had none that time. The Bishop had the same Account from the Countess of M. since he came to Worcester.

Dr. Chamberlain the Man-Midwife, one of the Queen's Physicians, who had been with her at the Birth of all her other Children, but was not call'd at this time, as neither was Mrs. Jackman her old Midwife, being with the Bishop, his Lordship ask'd him how the Queen's Milk was wont to be at other times; the Doctor said it was her Disease, her Blood turning all to Milk, so that they could not dry it up with Plaisters and Powders, but with great Difficulty, being under Apprehensions of its throwing her into a Fever. Upon which the Bishop said, But Doctor, what think you of a Friend of mine that has had a Child, and yet no Milk at all; to which Dr. Lower, who was also present, reply'd, then I will burn my Books. After this the Child was carried to Richmond for Air, where it had a sort of an Issue made in its Neck on the 4th or 5th of August, being Sunday, and the Princess was at Tunbridge where Dr. Wake was to preach before her; but before they went to Church, a Messenger came from Richmond, bringing an Account that the Prince was dying, and that 'twas suppos'd he would be dead before the Messenger could come thither; upon which, her Highness forbore going to Church, but desired the Doctor to preach before her in her Lodgings in the Afternoon.

It was said by the Physicians, that they staid with it so long that they saw it dead upon the Bed; and it is further said that the Surgeon who made the Issue, and his Wife that assisted him, and, as I think, by holding the Child, looking afterwards on the living Child, found it had no such Issue.

Bishop Lloyd was also told by one Cob a Hat-Maker, that he was wont to sell Hats to a certain Popish Haberdasher who liv'd near Somerset House, and whom his Lordship named, who having given off the Trade, came for Monies that were owing him, at which time the Woman having a young Child in her Arms, bid Cob look upon it, and then went to the Window, bidding him to come and look well upon it, seeming to be under some Concern, and then she ask'd him whether he thought that would not have made as fine a Prince of Wales of, as any of the rest. Upon which her Husband coming in, ask'd what they were talking of; the Wife answer'd, that she was speaking to Mr. Cob to take Hats for Part of the Money; and Cob to cover the Matter, said he would take those again that were his own, but he would take no others: so the Husband was kept from knowing what the Discourse was. Bishop Lloyd spoke once of these Matters to the Bishop of London, it being supposed that several Children were laid out for about this time, to be in readiness. My Lord of London told him there was one, which his Lordship of St. Asaph, afterwards of Worcester, knew not of, but might inform himself from the Wife of a certain Bricklayer that work'd at St. Paul's, who was the best Workman there, and a very honest Man, but the Bishops had forgot his Name. So Dr. Lloyd meeting with the Deputy Surveyor, ask'd who was the best Workman about St. Paul's, who told him such a one, naming him, and said he believ'd him to be the best Workman in England, and a very honest religious Man.

The Bishop ask'd him whether he might speak with the Man's Wife, and the Deputy told him he should, and that she should come to him, which accordingly she did, and gave him this Account of the Matter, that she being with Child, and near her time, not long before Whitsuntide there came to her one day, as she was alone in the Shop, she living with her Father and Mother in King's-street, a busy intriguing Popish Woman that liv'd thereabouts, and ask'd her whether she would part with her Child, saying she would help her to a Place for it. To which she reply'd, that they were well enough able to breed up their Children, and therefore she desir'd no such thing; upon which the Gossip said she would help her to 1000*l.* for her Child, and that he should be bred up like a King. Her Mother over-hearing the Discourse came forth in some Passion, and said, *What will you have my Daughter's Child from her, Children are God's Blessings, and she shall not part with it for 100,000*l. upon which the Gossip hastened away with great Speed. Her Father, who was sitting at the Door smoking a Pipe, hearing his Wife in a Passion, came in and ask'd what the matter was? who being told the Business, said they were certainly seeking for a Prince of Wales.

Bishop Lloyd gave us the sight of two Letters he receiv'd from Dr. Wallis, the one dated November the 19th, the other December the 6th, 1701. In the first of which the Doctor gives account of a Messenger that came to Oxon, and from thence to a Place in the Country, bringing him a Letter for the Earl of . . . . . then Secretary of State, in which Letter there was an inclosed Paper somewhat sullied, written in Cyphers; the Earl desir'd the Doctor to decypher it, and to return it by the same Messenger, if it might be done in a short time, or by another, if it requir'd a longer time, who should be well paid if the Contents of it were of Concern. The Letter was taken in a Trunk among other Papers in Pater-noster-Row, and was mark'd in the Margin N<sup>o</sup> 4: and had several Names and Marks of Names on the Side, supposed to be Witnesses at the opening the Trunk; the Superscription was to Mr. Labadie; I saw it in the Doctor's Letter as in Cyphers 'twas written, with the Doctor's Key for opening it, as 'twas decypher'd by him. The Doctor adds, that he shew'd the Copy of the Letter to the then Archbishop Tillotson, who did not appear to look upon it as being strange to him, but said, that they did not want for Evidence, if 'twere thought fit to make it publick.

His Lordship talking with Dr. Turner Bishop of Ely about these Matters in the time of his Suspension, the said Bishop told him, that all was to no purpose, for he should never take the Oaths whilst King James was living, but when he should be once dead, he would take them. After King James was dead, the Bishop met with Dr. Windebanke an old Acquaintance of his, Uncle to Bishop Turner: The Doctor said to him,

A. D.

A. D. 1688. now if my Nephew the Bishop of Ely were living he would take the Oaths; for which the Bishop said Dr. Hicks was angry with Dr. Windebank, as flandering the Bishop when he was dead.

The Subject of the before mention'd Letter to Delabadie, is to this Effect, and in these Words, as near as I remember.

My Dear,

I Am extremely solicitous to think how her Majesty will behave herself in this hazardous Undertaking, but I have hope, that by reason of the Ingenuity of her Country she will go through with it; Lord! what a happy thing it would be if we could get a Successor to our King that would restore the Worship of our Forefathers, which can never be but this way. I think it would be well if those Hereticks could be removed from her. Adieu, my Dear, pray do not fail to write to me, and in the same hand.

I find I was mistaken in saying, there is no mention made in the Depositions of Milk running out of the Queen's Breast, several of them making mention of it; but it is to be observed, that none of them say 'twas after the time of the pretended Delivery: but one says she saw it in February, and others say they saw it without fixing any time, which the Bishop says might well be about the time of her Miscarriage.

But had they affirm'd it to have been after the pretended Birth, they had contradicted the Queen, who had declar'd to the Countess of Clarendon, (his Lordship no more doubts of the Countess of Clarendon's Salvation than of any Person's not recorded in Scripture,) a most religious Person, and to the Countess of M. &c. that she had none. Bishop Lloyd observes, that they had at that time no Apprehensions of the Business ever being brought into question, there being then a great Standing Army, a Fleet bigger than that of the Dutch, and the French King to back them, and so the Queen was willing to save herself the trouble of plastering and physicking, &c. which she must have endur'd under pretence of drying up her Milk had she pretended to have any, it being a Work (as Dr. Chamberlaine affirmed) to be done with great difficulty, and not under a Month or six Weeks time.

But when the Prince's Declaration came over, questioning the matter and giving notice that he would have it clear'd in Parliament, then Depositions must be made, and some Appearance of Milk must be provided; I was told before Easter last by a Gentlewoman who abode at Richmond the last Summer, (as I believe she might several others before) that the Gentry there say the Child certainly died, and they believe it to be buried at Chiswick; that 'twas said there, the Child being sick the King came to see it by Water, and sent in the Lord Feversham to see whether 'twere living, saying if it were dead he would not go in, and that the Lord brought him word again that 'twas alive, but there was no hope. The same Gentlewoman said, that she was told by one that was present in the Room when the Servants came crying out, and saying the Prince is dead, yet the next Morning it appeared very well, and a strong lively Child; which agrees with what a Gentlewoman told the Bishop of Worcester, that she was to see the Child whilst it was ill, when it was poor and weakly; and that having been away about a Week, she coming to see it again, found it to be strangely altered, and that she told them she could not have thought it possible for them to have so improv'd the Child in that time.

I was told by another Gentlewoman, that being at London when King James was crowned, there came to see the Gentlewoman where she was, being with Child, Mrs. Jackman the Midwife, to whom Mrs. Mills said, it would be brave for her to be Midwife to the Queen, she having been so for all her Children; to whom the Midwife reply'd, that were it not for the Money, she had rather be Midwife to a meaner Person, the Business being usually very offensive, and she added that tho' she did not doubt but that she might conceive, yet she did believe she could not bring any to live: which agrees with what Dr. Walgrave told Dr. Windebank, that for a Reason that he knew, there would be no Child to live; with which Dr. Windebank charg'd him in St. James's Park at the time before mentioned; however Mrs. Jackman was not call'd at the time, as neither was Dr. Chamberlaine, which as the Bishop observes was for this good Reason, because there was no need of him. The same Gentlewoman told me, that being since in London, there came into the House where she was, one Mr. Major, a Gentleman of 6 or 700 l. per ann. living in Southwark, of whom the Gentlewoman of the House desir'd that he would tell her what he had observ'd of the Prince of Wales, who told her this Story, that he had a Daughter married against his Will to a Courtier and a Papist, who was proffer'd a Roker's Place, whom he frequently visited, and he was wont to observe that there was not that Attendance about the Prince as might have been expected, of which he spake to his Daughter, who told him that 'twas thought to be better for the Child's Health. But once coming after some time of absence, he observ'd a great Change, and challeng'd his Daughter upon it, who begg'd him upon his Life not to mention such a Thing; but yet by some means it got some light, and he was brought upon Examination, but no Evidence appearing, he came off.

I was also told by another Gentlewoman, that she conceiv'd the Queen Dowager did not believe it to be a true Birth, for that being well acquainted with the Master of her Wardrobe, a Welch Man and a Protestant, she ask'd him what his Mistress thought of it, and he said Queen Dowager told them, that coming into the Room after the Business was over, there was shew'd her a Child newly born, but she did not seem to be of Opinion that 'twas born of the Queen's Body.

Here the Letter ends that contain'd Bishop Lloyd's Information.

The Princess Anne, then at Tunbridge, hearing the Prince of Wales was dangerously ill, sent Col. Sands her Gentleman Usher to Court with a Compliment to know how he did. The Duke of Beaufort was the Lord of the Bedchamber in waiting, and the Colonel met him as he was coming up the great Stair-Case. As soon as the Duke saw him, he cry'd, Is it you, Sands? Yes, my Lord, reply'd the Colonel; I am sent by the Princess and the Prince to know how the young Prince does, and desire your Grace to introduce me to the King as soon as can be conveniently. The Duke went away in order to it, and Col. Sands going forwards, came into a Room, where he saw a Child dead in a Cradle, and Labadie weeping by it, her Hood over her Face, it had a long pale Visage full of Pustles like the small Pox. Sands held his Head down, and try'd to find if it breath'd or not, but saw it was dead. He hasten'd to his Audience, and the King having heard his Message, inquired of the Prince and Princess of Denmark's Health. After which he ask'd him, if he had seen the Child. Col. Sands apprehending that it was intended he should be thought alive, and that there was Danger in saying otherwise, said, No Sir, I was in the Room,

A. D. 1688.

Another corroborating Circumstance.

A. D. 1688. but I did not see the Prince. The King said, Then you shall see him presently. But he was before that introduc'd to the Queen, who in an extraordinary manner came forth as far as the Stair-case, her Eyes swollen and red with weeping, and he made her the same Compliment as he had done the King from their Royal Highnesses. Then a Table was laid, and several Officers, most of them Irish, attended with a Design to drink him to a pitch, as was very plain by their toasting Bumpers; which he avoided, under pretence that he was to return to Tunbridge that Day, and drinking would so disorder him, he should not be able to perform the Journey. Having refresh'd himself, he was shewn the Prince, the Marchioness of Powis on one side of him, and Mrs. Labadie on the other. He was a lusty Boy, playing with the Fringe of the Curtain in full Health, plump visag'd, and to appearance several Months old. As soon as Colonel Sands had a convenient Place, he wrote it down all; and riding Post back to Tunbridge, arriv'd there so tir'd, that he could not relate the Facts at large, but deliver'd it in Writing to the Princess; who having read it, cry'd, Good God! Is it possible? Some Years after, when she was Queen, she shew'd the Paper to Dr. Lloyd Bishop of Worcester, telling him, She would send for Sands to confirm it. The Bishop told her he knew him, and would speak with him about it. A few Days after he met the Colonel in St. James's Court; and the Bishop taking him aside, had the Matter repeated and circumstantiated to him. The Queen, in the latter part of her Reign, grew out of humour with this Story, and look'd coldly on the Colonel for telling it, tho' he had always, till then, been in her good Graces. This, with other Circumstances forgotten by me, I had from Colonel Sands, in Presence of a very worthy Gentleman now living. The Colonel told this frequently, and there are many Persons of Note who can bear witness to it. Bishop Lloyd had not spoken with Colonel Sands when he gave my Friend the foregoing Account of the Impossi-

As there is no where so full and so clear an Account of it, we must endeavour to remove an Objection or two that may be made to it.

The first is, as to the Information from Bath, That the Queen was not with child when she left that Place, which does not agree with her miscarrying at Easter. It must be observ'd, that she might have conceiv'd afterwards, and have had the Miscarriage at Easter. And the Princess Anne did not think the Queen was with Child at all, till she had heard the Account we have given of it after Bishop Lloyd.

In the next place, if she had really been with Child, she might, as usual, have safely discover'd it to the Princess: But she, and all her Confidants might, even in such case, have been apprehensive of the Miscarriage: And being resolv'd, at all adventures, that there should be a Child, and a Son, the Princess was not admitted to her former Privacies, to prevent her discovering the Cheat, if she should miscarry, and they should be oblig'd to put a sham Prince upon the Nation.

The King was well advis'd by some of his true Friends, to take hold of the pretended Delivery of the Queen, for an occasion of granting a general Pardon to celebrate the Joy of the Birth, in which Pardon the Bishops would be included, and that Matter well over; but he was inflexible, saying, My Authority will be- come contemptible, if I suffer such an Affront to pass unpunish'd. A. D. 1688.

A Week after their Commitment, June 15th, the Bishops were brought up on a Habeas Corpus to the King's-Bench Bar, where their Counsel offer'd to make it appear to be an illegal Commitment, but the Court allow'd it good in Law. They were requir'd to enter into Bonds for small Sums, the Archbishop 200 l. and other Bishops 100 l. each, to answer the Information that Day fortnight. Then they were discharg'd of their Imprisonment, and People of all sorts ran to visit them as Confessors, one Company going in as another went out. The Appearance in Westminster-Hall was very solemn, all the Streets were full of Shoutings the rest of the Day, and with Bonfires at Night.

When the fix'd Day for their Trial came, there was a vast Concourse in Westminster-Hall, and all the Places about were full of People, who were strangely affected with the Matter.

This noble Appearance was owing to the indefatigable Care of the Clergy, especially Dr. Tennison, late Archbishop of Canterbury. What follows, is copy'd from Bishop Burnet's History.

The Trial coming on, was chiefly manag'd against the Bishops by Sir William Williams, who had been Speaker to two successive Parliaments, and was a zealous Promoter of the Exclusion. He had continu'd many Years a bold Pleader in all Causes against the Court; but he was a corrupt and vicious Man, who had no Principles, and in all things follow'd his own Interests. Sawyer the Attorney-General, who had for many Years

A. D. 1688. Years serv'd the Ends of the Court in a most abject and obsequious Manner, would not support the Dispensing Power; so he was turn'd out, and Powis put in his Place. He acted his Part in this Trial as fairly as his Post could admit of. But Williams the Solicitor-General took very indecent Liberties, and had great Advantages over Sawyer and Finch, who were among the Bishops Counsel, by reflecting on the Precedents and Proceedings during their being the King's Counsel. There was no sufficient Proof that the Bishops Hands were truly theirs, and the King's Counsel were forc'd to have recourse to the Confession they had made at the Council-Board, which was thought very dishonourable since they had made that Confession in confidence, trusting to the King's Honour. Their publishing it was not prov'd, which was the main Point. Their presenting it to the King, and afterwards their owning it to be their Petition, when it was put to them at the Council-Board, was all that the King's Counsel could offer for proof of this, and which was such an apparent Strain, that even those Judges who were the surest to the Court did not seem to be satisfy'd. It was much argu'd against them, that this Petition was a Libel, tending to the defaming the King's Government. To this it was answer'd, That they, having receiv'd an Order, to which they found they could not give Obedience, thought it was incumbent on them as Bishops and as Subjects, to lay before the King their Reasons for it. All Subjects had a Right to petition the King. They as Peers were of his Great Council, and so had yet a better Claim to that, especially in Matters of Religion; for the Act of Uniformity in Queen Elizabeth's time had requir'd them, under a Curse, to look carefully after those Matters. The Dispensing Power had been often brought into debate in Parliament, and was always voted to be against Law; and the late King had yielded the Point, by recalling his Declaration. Thus they thought they had a Right to represent these things to the King. Occasion was often taken to reflect on the Dispensing Power. The King's Counsel said in answer to this, That the Votes of one or both Houses were not Laws, till they were enacted by King and Parliament; and the late King's passing once from a Point of his Prerogative, did not give it up, but only wav'd it for that time. They urg'd much the Sacredness of the King's Authority, that a Paper might be true in fact, and yet be a Libel; as good Nonsense as one could expect from the Jargon of Chicane. That in Parliament the two Houses had a Right to petition, but it was Sedition to do it in a Point of Government out of Parliament.

The Trial lasted above ten Hours, the Croud continuing all the while in expectation, and expressing to great a Concern for the Bishops, that the Witnesses who were brought against them were not only treated with much Scorn and loud Laughter on every occasion, but were in such danger, that they escap'd narrowly, going away by a back Passage. Two of the Judges, Powell and Holloway, deliver'd their Opinions, that there was no seditious Matter in the Petition; and that it was no Libel. Wright the Chief Justice call'd it a Libel, but did not think the Publication was prov'd. Allibone said it was a Libel, but in giving his Opinion made such a Blunder, that little heed was given to any thing he said afterwards. The Jury were all along very well satisfy'd of the Bishops Innocence, and were soon agreed to acquit them; but it was thought to be the more solemn and the safer

Way, to continue shut up till the Morning. The King still flatter'd himself with the Hope that the Bishops would be brought in Guilty. He went that Morning to the Camp, for the ill Humour the Soldiers had appear'd in the Day before on news of the Bishops Trial, made him think it necessary to go and keep them in Awe and Order by his own Presence.

The Court sat the next day, and then the Bishops acquit. The Jury came in with their Verdict Not guilty. Upon which the Marquis of Hallifax waving his Hat over his Head, cry'd Huzzah! The Lords and Gentlemen took the shout from him. It in Great Rejoicing. An instant fill'd the whole Hall with the loudest Acclamations of Joy, which were immediately taken again by the Crouds waiting in Palace-Yard and in Westminster: from whence, like a Roll and Roar of Thunder, it was carry'd in and thro' the City of London, and spread over the Parts adjacent, and as fast as it could fly, over the whole Kingdom. Every Man seem'd transported, and notwithstanding the King dispatch'd an Order to the Lord Mayor to hinder Bonfires, and the Constables were every where out to execute it; yet several Bonfires were made, and many Illuminations of seven Candles, the longest in the middle to represent the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the six Bishops, then term'd the seven Golden Candlesticks. Sir William Williams was much offended with the Shoutings in Westminster-Hall, where, during the Trial, he had been several times hiss'd. He mov'd, that such as shouted should be seiz'd, as was a Gentleman of Gray's-Inn, to whom the Chief Justice said, Sir, I am as glad as you can be that my Lords the Bishops are acquitted; but your manner of rejoicing here is indecent, you might rejoice at your Chamber or elser here, and not here. With this Reproof he was discharg'd. When the Soldiers heard at the Camp on Hounslow-Heath that the Bishops were acquitted, there was such an universal Shout, that it startled the King then at an Entertainment in the Earl of Feversham's Tent, whom he sent out to know what was the matter. Feversham coming back, told the King, It was nothing but the Soldiers shouted upon the News of the Bishops being acquitted. The King stamp'd his Foot on the Ground, and said, Do you call that nothing? But so much the worse for them. 'Tis generally thought the King meant so much the worse for the Soldiers, whom he would cashier as he could fill their Places with Irishmen and Papists: But I read in a French Author that he spoke it of the Bishops, Tant pis pour eux, so much the worse for them. His Presence kept the Army in some Order, but he was no sooner gone out of the Camp, than he was follow'd with a loud and general Shout, as if it had been a Victory obtain'd. He began now to be afraid he should not be able to get a Parliament to answer his Ends, and that he should be oblig'd to make use of open Force. In order to this, he thought fit to propose the taking off the Penal Laws and tries the Test to all the Regiments one by one. A Writing was drawn up for them to subscribe, where by they engag'd themselves to contribute, as far as in them lay, towards the Repeal of the Penal Laws and Penal Laws. He began with the Earl of Litchfield's Regiment, the Major of which was order'd to open his Majesty's Desire to that Battalion, and command all such as would not instantly comply with it, to lay down their Arms. And he was not a little surpriz'd, when he found that except two Captains, and four or five Popish Soldiers, the whole Regiment obey'd the latter part of his Command. The King remain'd speechless for a while, and having recover'd ver'd himself of his Astonishment, he commanded them to take their Arms; adding, with a discontented sullen Look, I for the future will not do you the Honour to ask your Advice. And from that time he made all the haste he could to model the Army, by cashiering both Protestant Officers and Soldiers, sending for others over from Ireland, to incorporate them in the English Regiments. Several of the latter were put into the Duke of Berwick's Regiment at Portsmouth.

The Lieutenant Colonel John Beaumont Esq; and five Captains remonstrated to the Duke, That they did not think it consistent with their Honour to have Foreigners impos'd upon them, without being complain'd of that their Companies were weak, or Orders had been sent to recruit them, not doubting if such Orders had been given, that what first in very ill Times rais'd them Hundreds, could easily now have made them according to the King's Complement; therefore they humbly petition'd, that they might have leave to fill up their Companies with such Men of this Nation, as they should judge most suitable for the King's Service, and to support their Honours, or otherwise that they might be permitted with all imaginable Duty and Respect to lay down their Commissions. These Officers rais'd their Companies at their own Charge in the Time of Monmouth's Expedition. The King being inform'd of it, immediately order'd Lieutenant Colonel Beaumont, Captain Paston, Captain Pack, and three other Captains to be taken into Custody, and a Court Martial was appointed to try them for their Lives as Mutineers, and no doubt he would have put them to death, if the News from abroad had not somewhat moderated his Counsels, for he could not but see by the very Respect that was paid, not only to the seven Bishops, but to the six Captains, whose Pictures hung up in almost every House, that the Measures he had been taking were bringing him into the utmost Peril, and that it was high Time for him, who had been upon the Gallop ever since his Accession to the Throne, to think of a more gentle Pace; yet he could not help shewing his Resentment against Judge Powell, and Judge Holloway, whom he discarded, and made Sergeant Baldock, one of the Counsel against the Bishops, a Justice of the King's Bench. He was under such Infatuation, that even after the Acquittal of the Bishops, he permitted the Tools of the Ecclesiastical Commission to do the Work of the Papists, by proceeding violently against the Protestant Clergy, who had not read the Declaration. Citations were sent out, requiring the Chancellors and Archdeacons to send in the Lists of all the Clergy, as well those that had obey'd, as those that had not. Some of the latter were now so much animated with the Sense the Nation had express'd of the Bishops Imprisonment and Trial, that they declar'd they would not obey the Order, and others excus'd themselves in softer Terms. When the Day came to which they were cited, August the 16th, the Bishop of Rochester, tho' he himself had obey'd the Order, and had hitherto gone along sitting with the other Commissioners, but had always voted on the milder side; yet now, when he saw Matters were running so fast to the Ruin of the Church, he not only would sit no more with them, but wrote a Letter to them, in which he said it was impossible for him to go on with them any longer, for tho' he himself had obey'd the Order of Council, which he protested he did, because he thought he was bound in Conscience to do it; yet he did not doubt but that those who had not obey'd it had gone upon the same Principle of following their Conscience, and he would much rather chuse to suffer with them, than to concur in making them suffer. This stop'd Proceedings for that Time, and put the Court to a Stand; so they adjourn'd themselves, and never sat more.

It was apparent to those that were least clear-sighted, that the whole Constitution of England was subverted; and that the Administration was in all its Branches arbitrary and illegal. The King assum'd to himself a Power to make Laws void, and to qualify Men for Employments, whom the Law had put under such Incapacities; that all they did was null and void. The Sheriffs and Mayors of Towns were no legal Officers. Judges, one of them being a profess'd Papist, who took not the Test, were no Judges. Thus was the Government broken. A Parliament return'd by such Men was no legal Parliament. All this was done by virtue of the dispensing Power, which chang'd the whole Frame of our Constitution, and subjected all the Laws to the King's Pleasure; for upon the same Pretence of that Power, other Declarations might have come out, voiding any other Laws which the Court found stood in their way, since we had scarce any Law that was fortify'd with such Clauses to force the Execution of it, as those that were laid aside had in them. And when the King pretended this was such a sacred Point of Government, that a Petition offer'd in the modestest Terms, and in the humblest manner possible, calling it in question, was made so great a Crime, and carried so far against Men of such Eminence, it was plain the Destruction of the Constitution was total, avowedly begun, and violently prosecuted; and according to the Principles of the highest Asserters of Submission and Obedience, it was now lawful for the Nation to look to itself, and see to its own Preservation. Wherefore as soon as Men were convinc'd this was lawful, there remain'd nothing but to look to the Prince of Orange, who was the only Person that either could save them, or had a Right to it. Since by all the Laws in the World, even private as well as publick, he who has in him the Reversion of any Estate has a Right to hinder the Possessor, if he goes about to destroy that which is to come to him after the Possessor's Death. Let us here turn to the learned Acherley: "King James had parted with the last Parliament in Indignation, and had exercis'd a Government so arbitrary and unwarrantable, that every one concluded he never intended to assemble another until he could force the Elections. The Lords and Commons therefore, in order to disturb his arbitrary Administration, sent a grand Invitation to the Prince of Orange, a Prince of the Royal Family, incomparably qualify'd, and equally great in the Field and in the Cabinet, requesting him as their Captain to come and attempt their Deliverance, and to compel the assembling a free Parliament: At the same time those Inviters solicited the States of Holland to furnish the Prince with a Fleet and Army suitable to the Undertaking, promising not only to reimburse the Charges, but to make Returns suitable to the Kindness, if their State should ever want the like Assistance.

"Happy it was for Britain, that Holland at this time was under terrible Apprehensions of Invasion from France by Land, and from England by Sea, in Execution of the secret League between the two Kings, which made the Dutch readily embrace the Invitation, to extricate and wrest Britain from the French Alliance." And it is to be remember'd that the Bishops, according to the Prince's Declaration

Not long before this Noise and Clamour upon the Bishops Trial, and the Attempt to entail Popery and Slavery upon us by securing a Popish Successor, Mr. Russel, afterwards Earl of Orford, went to Holland at the Desire of many of great Power and Interest in England, to speak very freely to the Prince, and know positively of him what might be expected from him. Mr. Russel had much Discourse with his Highness on the Situation of Affairs, the Danger Religion and Liberty were in, and the Hopes People had of his interposing effectually to prevent it. The Prince answer'd at last, that if he was invited by some Men of the best Interest, and the most valued in the Nation, who should both in their own Name, and in the Name of others who trusted them, invite him to come and rescue them, he believ'd he could be ready by the End of September to come over; which acceptable News Mr. Russel carry'd to England, and return'd soon after with an Invitation in Form from a great Number of Lords and Gentlemen, and some, but not many, Bishops.

More Steps towards the Revolution.

Orleans says, all the seven Bishops invited him. He had the important Letter made up in the Heel of one of his Shoes, and Mr. Zuylestein, whom the Prince had sent to England to congratulate the Birth of the Pretender, when he return'd to Holland, confirming and corroborating all the Information Mr. Russel had given him, he was fully fix'd in his Purpose, and set himself with great Application to prepare for the intended Expedition, in which he was very much encourag'd by the Accounts he receiv'd of the Hatred the Soldiers and Seamen daily express'd against the Papists: The latter had shewn it in a particular Manner, by threatening to throw some Priests over-board, whom Sir Roger Strickland had brought to the Fleet to say Mass.

It has been hinted, that the English apply'd to the States-General as well as to the Prince of Orange, and it is confirm'd by what is said of it in a Treatise written by John Hampden Esq; The deplorable State of things awaken'd the Minds of those of our Nobility and Gentry, who had any thing remaining in them of the English Liberty, and Impatience of Slavery, which has so often rescu'd the Nation from the Brink of Ruin. They saw to what the Necessity of Self-Defence oblig'd them, and resolv'd to shake off the Yoke they could not bear. In order to this, many of them apply'd to some principal Members of the States General of the United Provinces, and to the Prince of Orange their Stadtholder and Captain General, representing to them how nearly they were concern'd in what then past in England, which was but one Branch of the Designs driven on by the French King and his Adherents, for enslaving all Europe, and rooting out what they call'd the Northern Heresy, both Name and Thing. They shew'd them, that if they suffer'd the Conspiracy of our common Enemies to go on any further, they would infallibly be involv'd in our Ruin, and that very speedily, and must necessarily fall under the French Yoke, of which they had felt the Weight in the Years 1672 and 1673; and had lately heard more of it from those great Numbers of French Protestants, who had taken Refuge in their Country. They put them in mind of what had heretofore been done for their Re-publick by the English Nation, when they had newly cast off the Spanish Tyranny, and were forc'd to implore the Succour of their Neighbours, against a Power which then carry'd on the same Designs, and much by the same Methods, which we have seen copy'd from them by the French in our Time. They convinc'd them that all Reasons of Gratitude, Humanity, Policy, and Christianity concurr'd to incline them to the Request of the English, and put a helping Hand for opposing a Bank to that Torrent, which otherwise would overflow all Christendom. Neither was this Business of a nature to admit Delay; they prov'd to them by unanswerable Reasons, that if they slipt the present Opportunity, by the French King's drawing his Forces to the Upper Rhine, to begin the War by the Siege of Philipsburgh, it would in all probability be too late to attempt any thing hereafter: The two Kings hoping by their joint Counsels and Powers in a short time to put both the Dutch and English out of a Capacity to dispute their Pleasure."

The French King, at the same time that he attack'd Philipsburgh, had gone a great way to secure Cologne to himself, by means of Cardinal Furstemberg, whom his Money had corrupted so far as to betray his native Country Germany to France; and having by the same Money got a Majority to chuse him Elector of Cologne, he was to have put that City and Country into the French King's hands, who would by that means have had a Passage open to fall on the Spanish Netherlands, and the United Provinces at his pleasure. The Pope would not confirm the Election of Furstemberg, and the Confederates got Prince Clement of Bavaria chosen Bishop, by a sufficient Number of Voices to procure the Pope's Confirmation: But to support this Election against France, 'twas necessary for the Allies to make warlike Preparations; and it furnish'd the Prince of Orange with so good a Blind for his, that neither the King of England, nor the King of France had any Jealousy of their being design'd against England, till the Operations of the Campaign on the side of Germany were concluded upon, which left the Prince at liberty to pursue his intended Expedition for the Deliverance of the English.

The Elector of Brandenburg came heartily into the Design, as soon as it was communicated to him, so did Dankleman his chief Minister and Favourite, who had great Influence over him.

The Emperor of Germany, and even the Pope approv'd of it, as the only Means to hinder the King of England's putting his whole Weight into the French King's Scale, and utterly destroying the Ballance, which in good Policy and Interest he ought to have maintain'd.

The King of Sweden fell generously in with it, and offer'd to supply the States with any Number of Troops which they should send to England with the Prince.

The Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, the Duke of Lunenburg-Zell, who had a particular Regard and Affection for the Prince of Orange, made the like Offers; and several other German Princes, as well Papists as Protestants, had the Design communicated to them, and not only gave it their Approbation, but promis'd their Assistance, by pursuing those Measures on the Continent, which would be most favourable to it.

In the mean time several Lords and Gentlemen went forwards and backwards to and from Holland under various Pretexes, and the Court of England was so exalted with the Hopes of a Popish Successor, that they did not much concern

The Disposition of forces towards the Enterprize.

A. D. 1688. cern themselves about Foreign Affairs, but remain'd in great Security till they were in the Extremity of Danger.

Carry'd on I have mention'd Mr. Ruffel's coming to England for the Invitation in Form; besides him the Lord M—— came privately over with Instructions to feel the Pulse of the principal Citizens of London; and he had several Meetings with them in the House of one of the Houblons, from whom he receiv'd all the Assurances that were desir'd of them. And I remember very well that after one of those Meetings I was at Dinner with two Aldermen, Sir J. B. and Sir J. F. when much Discourse was of a speedy Deliverance; and the former being going to Tunbridge in August, told the latter, he hop'd they should have the good News by the Time he came back again. I was too young to give them any Caution as to my hearing them, and had it explain'd to me after the Revolution.

About the same time one Joseph Flight, afterwards a Tobacconist near the Royal Exchange, brought over near Fourscore Letters to as many of the prime Nobility and Gentry; he mention'd to me the Earl of Devonshire in particular, that Lord being very open with him, and delivering him some Advices by word of Mouth, he carry'd back Answers with great Dispatch and Safety.

And in Holland.

The Prince prevail'd with the States to provide a Fund for 9000 Seamen, and order'd a select Body of Troops to rendezvous near Nimeguen, not far from the Elector of Brandenburg's Camp, who had march'd his Army thither, to act in conjunction with the Confederates, alarm'd by the Dauphin's Hostilities in Germany.

The Prince's frequent Journeys to the Army had given Umbrage to the Count d'Avaux and Marquis d'Albeville, Ambassadors of England and France at the Hague; especially when there was an Interview between the Prince and the Marquis de Casta naga Governor of the Spanish Netherlands on the Frontier, wherein Matters were concerted for the Defence of those Provinces in the Prince's absence. His Highness's Friends gave out it was about some Affairs depending between the Prince and the Count de Solme, concerning certain Lands in the Dependence of Conde, France having undertaken the Protection of that Count. This was in August, and tho' the Marquis d'Albeville went to London about that time, so secret were the Prince of Orange's Counsels, that King James had then no manner of Notice of his Highness's Intentions. The whole Expedition was manag'd with so much Secrecy and Caution, as fully confirm'd the Character which common Justice extorted from the Mouth of his implacable Enemy, the French King, who said of him, that he was, Le meilleur Homme de Cabinet en l'Europe, The greatest Man for Counsel in Europe.

The Prince having detach'd from his and the Brandenburg Camp, what Forces he thought necessary, the King of Sweden furnish'd the Dutch with a Body of Troops equivalent to those his Highness had order'd to march nearer the Coasts, to be ready for Embarkation. The several Cities of Holland had provided their several Quota's of Ships, Men of War and Transports, pursuant to the Orders that had been sent them three Months before, which were executed with all possible Chearfulness and Dispatch. There was not a Man in Holland, Papists only excepted, who was heard to murmur at the Charge and Hazard of the Enterprize. Men, Women and Children lifted up their Prayers to Heaven for his Highness's Success, and the Deliverance of England.

A. D. 1688. Both the Prince and the States still kept up the Forms that are usual between Princes and Powers not in War. King James still continu'd to write Letters of Civility, till near the Time of the Expedition; and the King's Statesmen complain'd, that the Secret of a Business, which depended entirely upon Secrecy, was not communicated to them; tho' it would have shewn the Court at the Hague to be as ill Politicians as that at Whitehall, if they had given the latter an Opportunity to obstruct the Design by calling in French Forces.

We must leave the Conduct of this important Affair for a while, to see how it was become extremely necessary in the Kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland.

Nothing very remarkable happen'd in Scotland; from the Proclamation for Liberty of Conscience to the Revolution. The Proclamation having blunted the Edge of Persecution for a time, we shall content ourselves with a summary Relation of the Sufferings of the Protestants in Scotland under Sharp, and his Successors, made by one who had it from a Reverend Minister of the Church of Scotland. "That including the People who died in Prisons and in Banishment, an Account was taken of above 18000, whose Blood their Persecutors have to account for; besides the Numbers, who at the Time of the Revolution were actually in Prisons, in the Isle of Bass, Dunotter Castle, Blackness, Edinburgh, and other Places, which were very great." But to continue it in the Words of one of the Sufferers: "To speak of the Numbers, we must do Justice to the Miracle of God's working, whereby the very Means us'd to extirpate us from the Face of the Earth, was by the wise Disposer of all things made to increase our Numbers; for that tho' they went on many Years imprisoning, banishing, and butchering our dear Brethren; yet all the Prisons they could fill with us, and all the Ships they could freight with us, and all the Gibbets they could hang us on, could never either exhaust or lessen our Number; but the more we were afflicted, the more we grew, and the Design to destroy us prov'd always ruinous to the Destroyers. When they had try'd all ways possible to root us out from the Earth, after they had hang'd, shot, tortur'd, and banish'd for Slaves all they could catch of us, they were further from their Purpose than when they began. Our Numbers were not diminish'd, our Meetings for Gospel Ordinances were not disappointed, but we enjoy'd the Administrations in their Purity and Power, with greater Certainty, and in larger Assemblies than ever, our Numbers encreasing more and more."

Which extremely exasperated their Persecutors, who, notwithstanding the Toleration, rag'd still against them, as in the Case of the Reverend Mr. James Renfrew, whom the Prelatical Party in Scotland murder'd, even after the Prince of Orange was landed in England; and just at the same time did the Scots Prelates send a Letter to King James, wherein they say, We magnify the Divine Mercy in blessing Your Majesty with a Son, and us with a Prince, whom we pray Heaven may bless and preserve to inherit with your Dominions, the Illustrious and Heroick Virtues of his august and most serene Parents. We are amaz'd to hear of the Danger of an Invasion from Holland, which excites our Prayers to God to give such Success to Your Majesty's Arms, that all who disturb the Peace of your Realms may be cloath'd with Shame; and that you may have the Hearts of your Subjects, and the Necks of your Enemies. Sign'd by,

A. D. 1688.

The great Barrier of the People's Liberties in Ireland, as well as England, was their Right to chuse their own Representatives in Parliament; which being once taken away, they became Slaves to the Will of the Prince. The Protestants of Ireland finding a Necessity of securing this Right in their own Hands, had procur'd many Corporations to be founded, and had built many corporate Towns at their own Charges: from all which, the Roman Catholics were by their Charters excluded. To break this Barrier, Tyrconnel began with the City of Dublin. In order to this, he had got a Letter from the King in the Lord Clarendon's time, to admit Papists to the Freedom of that City, and all other Corporations: Which the then Lord Mayor refus'd, but his Successor Castleton pass'd the Irish Freemen, and the Example was follow'd throughout the Kingdom. However, the Papists were so mean and beggarly in most of the trading Towns, that the Protestants still kept the Majority. Upon which, Tyrconnel resolv'd to call in the Charters by the King's Authority; and sending for the Lord Mayor, told him it was his Majesty's Pleasure, that the Charter of Dublin should be surrender'd into his hands. All Application to him being to no purpose, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council sent their Recorder Sir Richard Rieves to London, with a Petition to the King; to whom he was introduc'd by the Duke of Ormond, and deliver'd the Petition on his Knees; but the King had been so prepossess'd against it by Tyrconnel, that upon the first sight of Sir Richard, he ask'd him, If he had the Lord Deputy's Leave to come with it; adding, I have those in Ireland that understand the Law better than yourself, and so he turn'd from him. The Duke of Ormond told him frankly, he could do him no Service, so Rieves went back as he came. And the Charter of Dublin being dissolv'd by Quo-Warranto, there was no hope of saving any other Corporation, tho' there was not the least Shadow of Law for dissolving them. New Charters were granted to all the Corporations, with a Clause in every one of them, by which they were subjected to the Will and Pleasure of the King, and consequently were put into the power of the Chief Governor to turn out and put in whom he pleas'd, without shewing a Reason or formal Trial at Law.

Having formerly made mention of Sheridan, who was now become Prime Minister in Ireland, as far as Tyrconnel would let him, we must add something of both of them out of a Treatise State-entitled, The secret Consults and Intrigues of the Traiti. Romish Party in Ireland. Tyrconnel having VOL. III. discover'd that Sheridan had a separate Purse in P. 646. the Business of selling of Places, and being both Principal Secretary of State and first Commissioner of the Customs, had great Opportunities of doing it, was much disgusted; but much more, when he found out that many of those Bargains were made under pretence of the Persons being recommended by himself: For Sheridan overdoing of it, made one Dickinson, another Commissioner, write to the Lords of the Treasury against putting in unqualify'd Persons, which were recommended by Tyrconnel as he thought; and the Lords wrote back, that the Commissioners should take no notice of any such Recommendation, and Orders were sent to the Lord-Deputy not to intermeddle in the Revenue. Tyrconnel highly resenting it, and Sheridan from that time

P. 188. This Letter, written at a time when the reverend Bishops and Clergy of England were deeply engag'd in the Design to defend their Religion, Laws and Liberties, which this King had so often and so tyrannically invaded and broken, gave universal Offence, and prepar'd the way for rooting out Prelacy and Persecution in Scotland, where, ever since the Reformation, they had always gone hand in hand. The Author of the Memoirs of the Church of Scotland informs us, that Mr. Renfrew the Minister was put to death the 17th of February, the beginning of the Revolution Year, testifying that the Prelatical Party in Scotland, who were in such high Esteem with Archdeacon Echard, never " abated or relented, were never " fatiated with Blood; but went on as long as " they had power, even till they saw the very " Cloud hovering, and the Storm ready to break " upon their Heads. Nor had their Thirst of " Blood been quench'd to this day, or as long " as there had been a faithful Member of the " Church of Scotland left alive, had their Power " lasted; so that it was the end of their Government which put an end to their sanguinary Severities, and no Clemency, Pity, or " Compassion in them. No such things were so " much as nam'd among them." Mr. Renfrew before he was executed, made a very affecting Speech, in which was this remarkable Expression: Do not fear that the Lord will cast off Scotland, for he will certainly return again, and shew himself gracious in our Land. He added, I leave my Testimony against all Profaneness, and every thing contrary to sound Doctrine. I leave my Testimony against all Usurpations made upon Christ's Rights, who is the Prince of the Kings of the Earth, who alone must bear the Glory of Ruling his own Kingdom the Church. And in particular, I leave my Testimony against the absolute Power usurp'd by this Usurper, that belongs to no Mortal, but is the incommunicable Prerogative of JEHOVAH, and against this Toleration flowing from that absolute Power. Here he was bid have done, and the Executioner did his Work. Is there any great difficulty in distinguishing the Cause that ought to have been espous'd? That of the Scots Prelates, who in the midst of their Glory and Pride, bore their Testimony for that absolute Power; or that of the Scots Minister, who with his dying Breath, and when he was about to yield up his Spirit into the Hands of God who gave it, bore his Testimony against it.

Ireland. We have mention'd the Alteration made in the Government of Ireland upon Tyrconnel's Advancement to it; and the Advances towards Tyranny and Popery were every day there more forward and direct. The Privy-Council of Ireland is a great Part of the Constitution, and has considerable Powers and Privileges annex'd to it. This was so model'd, that the Papists made the Majority; and those few that were Protestants, chose for the most part to decline appearing at the Board with such a sorry Company, since they could do those of their Religion no Service. A Gentleman then on the spot tells us, " Except Rice, Daly and " Nagle, there was not a Man of them that had " common Sense; insomuch that Rice and Daly time contriv'd to undermine him. His first Stratagem was, to prepossess the Romish Clergy against him; and to accomplish it, he contracts an intimate acquaintance with Tyrconnel's Chaplain, who most frequently officiated. The Priest pick'd up what he could of Tyrconnel's Contempt of the Mass and Prayers. One particular Charge was, that when the Army was in the Camp at the Currah of Kildare, the Deputy being at play in his Tent, his Chaplain came to know if his Excellency would go to Mass; he reply'd, No, I will send one, naming somebody by him, to stand in my Place, and that will do as well.

This and other such Sayings being put together, were transmitted to Father Petre, whose Niece Sheridan had marry'd, and his Zeal recommended him to the Favour not only of that Jesuit, but all the Irish Clergy, particularly the titular Primate of Armagh, who contracted an intimate Familiarity and Acquaintance with him; and in conjunction with the beforemention'd Priest, form'd Articles against Tyrconnel, which Sheridan was to carry to Court; but the Deputy deny'd him a Licence to go to England: upon which, Sheridan writes to a Cousin of his at London to take out a Licence from the King. Tyrconnel came to the Knowledge of it, and consulted with his two Confidants Rice and Nagle, what he might intend by it; and it was resolv'd, that another Priest belonging to the Deputy should get into the Confidence of Sheridan and the Chaplain: which he effected by speaking against Tyrconnel, and pretending to add Articles against him to their Information, he was let into the whole Secret of it; and a Charge being drawn up by Sheridan himself, was inclos'd in a Letter to his Cousin, under Covert with other Letters. The Priest having seen Sheridan do all this, gives notice of it immediately to Rice and Nagle, who with the Lord-Deputy consulted how to intercept the Packet, which was easily done. A Messenger was sent at twelve a'clock at night aboard the Boat for the Mail, which they open'd, took out Sheridan's Packet, open'd that also, and taking out the Letter with the Charge in it, sent the rest forward in the Mail.

Rice and Nagle advis'd Tyrconnel to write to Lord Sunderland, setting forth Sheridan's Briberies and other sinister Practices, without taking any notice of Sheridan's Contrivances against himself. Lord Sunderland acquainted Father Petre with it, and Tyrconnel not doubting but Sheridan would have it all from that Jesuit, came to an open Rupture with him, upbraided him with sending a Charge against him to London; and on the Secretary's denying it, he shew'd it to him under his own Hand. Upon which, Sheridan charging him with writing against him, Tyrconnel call'd him Rogue, Cheat, Traytor, and offer'd to kick him; but Judge Daly pieced them together again, leaving still mutual Jealousies working in their Breasts.

Tyrconnel, out of hatred to Sheridan, reviv'd the Quarrel the Irish Clergy had with the titular Primate, who was Friend to Sheridan; and it went so far, that the Archbishop of Cashel and others apply'd to the King to have a Coadjutor impos'd on the Primate: For the Popish Bishops in Ireland behav'd as if they had been already in possession of the Powers and Revenues belonging to the Protestant Prelates. The King wrote to the Pope about it, aggravating the Primate's Miscarriages: But the Pope answer'd, He was one of his own chusing, and Father Petre wrote a Letter of Reprimand about it to Tyrconnel, the Church being made ridiculous by this Jarring. So the Matter was hush'd up, and the Primate reconcil'd to the Deputy.

Sheridan being a second time refus'd Leave to go to England by Tyrconnel, apply'd a second time to the Court of England, and by his Wife's means obtain'd it. But when he arriv'd at London, he waited near four-and-twenty Hours before he could speak with the Earl of Sunderland, and had then but a cold Reception; and he found by his other Applications, that Tyrconnel was supported by the French Interest, being more a Deputy to King Lewis than King James; infomuch, that when News came to Paris that Tyrconnel was turn'd out, 'twas said, There was none in England durst move him.

The Lord Castlemain and Lord Powis wish'd well to Sheridan's Project, but were afraid to trust him with their Sentiments; nor would Father Petre carry him to the King. At last, upon his dissembling the Matter, and protesting he had no Articles against the Lord-Deputy, Sunderland introduc'd him: yet even then the King would not hear him speak, so afraid was he of offending the French King, whose Creature Tyrconnel was.

Sheridan had not been three Days in London before he was follow'd by the Lord Dungan, Son to the Earl of Limerick, who brought Letters to Sunderland, setting forth Sheridan in such black Characters, that Father Petre would admit him no more into his presence. The Lords Powis and Castlemain deserted him, by which means he was wholly left to himself, and Tyrconnel's Party vigorously prosecuted him as a Delinquent, and the Matter was by the King's Order referr'd to the Judges in Ireland. After the Secretary's Place had been taken from him, Lord Sunderland wrote to Tyrconnel to have compassion on the poor Man in consideration of that. Upon his return to Dublin, he repair'd to the Castle, but the Deputy would not see him. He then went to the Custom-House to take his Seat at that Board. Upon which the Judges were consulted, and they advis'd Tyrconnel to suspend him. An Order of Suspension was accordingly sent him, and he coming to the Castle, disputed the Matter as not being in the Power of the Deputy. This aggravating his former Crime, upon further Consult with the Judges 'twas agreed, that the Commissioners of the Customs should write to all the Collectors in the Kingdom to hold no Correspondence with Sheridan, in regard he was suspended from acting in the Revenue. A Day being appointed for hearing him, he mov'd for longer time, which was readily granted, on account of a Storm that threaten'd Tyrconnel from Rome, which requir'd the best Cunning of his Counsellors and Creatures to divert it.

The Earl of Castlemain, who had ventur'd his Neck for a vain useless Embassy to the Pope, found no notice taken of him at his Return, which made him write back to his Friends at Rome, to represent his Merits to the Holy See, and the Disregard he met with in England. The Pope wrote to his Nuntio to address the King in his behalf, but at present there was no Vacancy. So to make one, Father Petre struck at Jefferies, whom he accus'd of dealing doubly in the Affair of Magdalen-College, and of Backwardness in other Instances, to the Prejudice of the Catholic Cause; which could never be establish'd, unless the Prime Ministers and the World were given to understand, That no Service they had done, or could do, should protect them, if they fail'd in the least Circumstance. Upon this, the Lord Castlemain's Affair was brought into the Cabinet-

A. D. 1688. Cabinet-Council the 17th of December 1687, at Night, when it was resolv'd, That Jefferies should be put out, and that three of the Lords of the Treasury should be made Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, and the Earl of Castlemain Lord Treasurer. Which Resolve continu'd ten Days. The Scene was on a sudden chang'd, and Jefferies fix'd faster than ever, suppos'd to be by the Interest of the Queen and Sunderland. This administer'd fresh Cause of Disgust to Castlemain, and to the Church Party; for now it began to appear, that Affairs went as France directed, even in opposition to the Pope. Such insuperable Difficulties, says my Author, had the Folly of that poor unfortunate King expos'd him to! His Zeal and Affection led him to adhere to Rome, but his Dependence was entirely built upon France.

The Church-Party embrac'd the Opportunity of Sheridan's Quarrel with Tyrconnel to recommend Castlemain as a fit Person for the Government of Ireland, Tyrconnel proceeding by too slow a Motion, and Castlemain was a Man of great Parts, who would win upon People by his prudent Carriage, whereas Tyrconnel had frightened away Thousands out of the Kingdom. The Lord Deputy had soon Intimation of it, so had his Friends at Paris; and he held a new Consultation with Rice and Nagle how to avoid the Danger that threaten'd him, and the best way they could think of, was to draw up an Act of Parliament, which in a manner put the Lands of the whole Kingdom in the power of the King, and then the only Hope that remain'd for the keeping them, would be by being of the King's Religion. They doubted not of getting a Parliament to pass it, the Corporations and Sheriffs being already their own. With the Draft of this Act Rice and Nagle went to London, where they soon had the Term of the Irish Ambassadors confer'd on them. Rice made his Court to Sunderland, whom he found not very favourable to his Design, neither was Petre at first; but the French Faction encouraged him, and Petre was brought over by the Assurances he gave him of Tyrconnel's Zeal and Constancy in the Cause, as was also Lord Sunderland in an Opinion, that it would preserve Tyrconnel in the Lieutenancy, out of which he had so good Rent. The King approv'd of the Project presently, and took upon him to bring it into Council, which he did in few Words, acquainting them with its Contents and Importance, and by whom presented to him. No Man spoke for or against it, but they desir'd it might be heard; which being done, the Lord Bellasis inveigh'd bitterly against it, saying, If such Designs as these are encourag'd, they of England, meaning the Papists, had best in time look out for some other Country, and not stay to be made a Sacrifice for Irish Rebels. Powis according to the best of his Understanding seconded it, and in a word 'twas so run down, that neither Sunderland nor Petre durst attempt to speak a Word in its Vindication, but only desired that those Gentlemen who brought over those Papers might be heard. Lord Bellasis was for committing them, or commanding their immediate Return, but 'twas at last thought reasonable to hear them, so a Day was appointed.

The Noise of this, and the Success it met with at the Council-Board, flew abroad with great Exclamations, the Boys in the Street running after the Coach where Rice and Nugent at any time were, with Potatoes stuck on Sticks, and crying, Make room for the Irish Ambassadors.

When the Hearing came on, Rice made a Speech in answer to the Lord Bellasis's and Lord Powis's Objections; but when Nugent came to speaking, my Author says, "He kick'd down all that Rice had done, and Bellasis presently discover'd the Defect of his Wild-Irish Understanding, as he call'd it, railing at him beyond the Respect due to the Place where the King was, calling him Fool and Knave, &c. Lord Powis did the same."

They were not long in tearing this fine Project to pieces, which when they had done, Bellasis bid them make haste to the Fool their Master, and bid him next Message he sent, to employ wiser Men, and upon a more honest Errand. Powis said, Tell him the King has better use to make of his Catholic Subjects in England, than to sacrifice them for a Reprize to the Protestants of Ireland in lieu of their Estates there. After this the Irish Ambassadors appear'd no more.

Then new Attempts were made in behalf of Castlemain, and many just and reasonable Allegations were laid down before the King for the Removal of Tyrconnel by sober considering Persons, yet were they all to no purpose; for tho' the King kept it private from most of the Council, yet, continues the same Writer, certain it is, he had promised the French King the Disposal of the Government of Ireland.

Upon the Return of Rice and Nugent, Sheridan began to resume his former Insolence, expecting that their ill success would have ruin'd Tyrconnel; and he himself thought he should be removed, saying to some Officers, Tho' I have had great Assurance from the King, that I shall not be displac'd, yet now I hear I shall, and wish I had given 500 Pounds to have known it a Month sooner.

The Charge against Sheridan was for Bribery and Extortion, and tho' the Proof was sufficient, his Punishment was only to lose his Employments.

About the same time, News was brought to Ireland of the Birth of the supposed Prince of Wales; for which, the Bearer Sir Mat. Bridges, receive the Honour of Knighthood, and no Tongue can express the Extravagance of the Joys of the Irish. They so insulted the English upon it, that the latter were become the Scorn of their very Slaves and Vassals, insomuch that the meanest Labourer would now on the least Provocation threaten to hang his Master. My Author was an Ear-Witness of one Instance of it. A Labourer came to his Master very soberly, and told him, he ow'd him a Cow; and bid him give it him presently. The Gentleman laugh'd at him as owing him nothing: the Fellow grew angry; the Gentleman call'd him Rascal, and offer'd to beat him, but the Servant was not only too quick but too strong for his Master, whom he was very fairly about to cudgel, if Company had not interpos'd and diverted him from his Intention. However he said in Irish, You English Churl, by St. Patrick I will hang thee with these Hands, as well as ever thou wast hang'd in thy Life. The poor Gentleman was afraid he would have given him such a hanging as is never used but once.

As soon as it was said the Queen had conceived, the Irish were confident it would be a Son, and would lay Twenty Guineas to One upon it.

The Deputy took away Christ-Church from the Protestants for the Use of the Papists. Priests and Monks appeared every where in their Habits, and when the Protestants were celebrating the anniversary Festival for the Extinction of the Irish Rebellion in 1641, the Papists fell upon them, and some Troops were order'd to disperse or kill them. Certain Soldiers nail'd a Bible to the Gallows, and making a Fire, tore the Leaves out by Parcels and flung them into the Flames as a Traytor condemned to such Punishment; but a

I might here fill a large Volume with Instances of the Injustice, Cruelties, Robberies, Rapines, and Rapes exercis'd by the Irish against the English, from this time to the Revolution; but it is related so copiously in the above-mention'd Tract, and Bishop King's State of the Protestants of Ireland, that I must refer to them.

Tyrconnel had the first News of the Prince of Orange's intended Expedition by a Ship from Amsterdam: he sent the Letter to England; the Lord Sunderland shew'd it to the King, who made a Jest of it, as appear'd by Sunderland's ridiculing his Intelligence. However, the News coming every day, it was at last generally believ'd; and the Deputy for a while behav'd as if he was in great Doubt and Consternation: But the impudent Nugent told the Grand Jury of Dublin, The States of Holland are weary of the Prince, and have sent him over to be dress'd as Monmouth was, but that is too good Fortune for him; I doubt not before a Month passes, to hear that they are hung up all over England in Bunches, like Ropes of Onions. This poor Creature was made Lord Riverston by King James, and a Seat given him in the House of Peers in Ireland, when he much better deserv'd a Place in the Pillory, or rather on that Gibbet, to which his Countrymen nail'd the Bible.

The Progress of the Revolution.

Lords and Gentlemen engage with the Prince of Orange.

Thus we see the whole Constitution of the three Kingdoms, Spiritual and Temporal, entirely subverted, the Coronation Oath broken, the Laws violated, and Religion alter'd, as far as the King could do it; what then remain'd, but for the three injur'd Nations to apply for Deliverance, to the Prince who had a Right and an Inclination to deliver them. The means for accomplishing it continu'd to be concerted in England and Holland, and things by the latter end of August were in such Forwardness, that it was not possible to keep it long a Secret. The first Cause of Suspicion which made Impression on King James, was an Information daily given of vast Remittances made to Holland, as near 40,000*l.* by the Earl of Shrewsbury, who borrow'd it on his Estate.

Besides Mr. Russel before-mention'd, Mr. John Stoun, Son to the Laird of Waristoun, past from England to France, and so to Holland, with very good Intelligence; on which his Highness the Prince of Orange built very much, and made use of him as his Secretary, for the English Correspondence to the Time of the Embarkation. This worthy Gentleman is the same who was afterwards Secretary of State for Scotland, and who has on many Occasions distinguish'd himself by his Services to the Publick in the Cause of Religion and Liberty, for which he has the best Qualifications, by Genius and Experience.

Mr. Hampden.

Richard Hampden Esq; Son of the great Hampden in Charles the First's Time, was very instrumental in forwarding the Prince's Expedition, by engaging in it many Persons of great Worth and Interest, and he was in the Depth of the Secret; as was also his Son John Hampden Esq; before-mention'd, and Mr. Powle, afterwards Speaker of the House of Commons.

Admiral Herbert.

Admiral Herbert had been hardly us'd by the King in passing his Accounts, and was also disgusted that Lord Dartmouth had more of the King's Confidence than himself, which, according to Bishop Burnet, was believ'd the Root of all the Sullenness he fell under towards the King, and of all the Firmness that grew out of that. But his Behaviour after the Revolution, and at his Death, gave reason to believe that he acted out of Principle.

The Lord Mordaunt, now Earl of Peterborough, went to Holland in 1686 with the King's Leave, and press'd the Prince of Orange to undertake the Business of England, representing it so easy, that Bishop Burnet says, it appear'd too romantical; but he could not represent it more easy, than by God's Providence it prov'd to be. His Highness told him, If the King went about to change the establish'd Religion, or to wrong the Princess in her Right, or to raise forg'd Plots to destroy his Friends, he would try what he could do.

We have spoken of the Earl of Shrewsbury already, he came over to the Hague in 1687, and was extremely welcome to his Highness, in whom his modest Deportment gave him such an Interest, that he never seem'd so fond of any of his Ministers.

Mr. Russel communicated the Design first to this Earl, and then to the Lord Lumley, afterwards Earl of Scarborough, who were both Converts from Popery; and their Zeal for the Protestant Religion and the Liberty of their Country, was a just Reproof to many, who never had been of any other Religion.

Mr. Sidney, Brother to the Earl of Leicester and Col. Sidney, had been in Holland in the Beginning of this Reign, and having no mind to put himself under it again, he went to travel till Matters were ripe for Negotiation. In Italy 'tis said he had private Audiences of the Pope, and propos'd to him Methods to hinder England's joining with France against the Liberties of Europe. There could be no other Method but the Revolution, and so far 'tis probable Odescalchi fell in with it. Mr. Sidney returning to Holland, found things were ripening, and from thence he past over to England, where he try'd the Marquis of Hallifax, as to inviting the Prince of Orange, which that Lord did not at first approve of, as too rash and impracticable an Experiment. The Earl of Danby came heartily into it, and drew in the Bishop of London, who from that Time held a constant Correspondence with their Friends at the Hague. The Earl of Nottingham agreed to it at the first Proposition, but fell off afterwards; however, he promis'd to be as far criminal as Concealment could make him.

The Earl of Devonshire had been find 30,000*l.* for striking Col. Culpeper, who had affronted him in the Verge of the Court. King James offer'd to excuse the Fine, but that had no effect on that brave and generous Nobleman. He chose rather to expose himself and Fortune to the Rigour of the Court, than to desert the Interest of his Country in such a Time of Peril; so he join'd in the Undertaking with great Readiness and Resolution.

Then the Officers of the Army were try'd, and the chief, Lord Churchil, Col. Kirk, and Col. Churchil. Trelawny engag'd in it, as did also the Bishop of Bristol, Sir Jonathan Trelawny, whom his Brother the Colonel prevail'd on. As to Lord Churchil's Engagement, he has been so often, and so unjustly accus'd for it, that we cannot do Justice to his glorious Memory, without inserting what Bishop Burnet says in his Vindication. "He never discover'd any of the King's Secrets, nor did he ever push him on to any violent Proceedings, so that he was in no Contrivance to ruin or betray him. F. Orleans, whom Eschard recommends, affirms, He laid a Plot to deliver him up to the Prince of Orange. On the contrary, whensoever he spoke of the King's Affairs, which he did but seldom, because he could not fall in with the King's Notions, he always suggested moderate Counsels.

The Earl of Gallway told me, that when he came over with the first Compliment upon the King's coming to the Crown, he then said to him, If the King is ever prevail'd on to alter our Religion, I will serve him no longer, but withdraw from him, so early was his Resolution fix'd in him; when he saw how the King was set, he could not be contented to see all ruin'd by him. He was also very doubtful as to the pretended Birth, and resolv'd when the Prince of Orange should come over to go in to him, but to betray no Post, nor do any thing more than the withdrawing himself, with such Officers as he could trust with such a Secret." The Lord Churchill also undertook that Prince George and the Princess Anne should leave the Court, and come to the Prince as soon as possible.

Earls of Macclesfield and Wiltshire. The Earl of Macclesfield had been in Holland ever since the Duke of Monmouth's Embarkation there.

The Earl of Wiltshire, afterwards Duke of Bolton, was one of the first that went to the Hague, accompanied by the Lord William Pawlet his Brother.

Ld Wharton. The good old Lord Wharton took the Prince of Orange's Court in his way to Germany, where he was most honourably entertain'd by several Princes, and presented with a very fine Set of Horses by the Elector of Brandenburg. It is not question'd but he had Matters to negotiate with them, relating to his Highness, and the Expedition to England. His Sons Thomas Wharton Esq; and Col. Henry Wharton, were not only in the Secret, but went early to the Prince of Orange.

Ld Eland. The Marquis of Halifax coming into the Design afterwards, his Son, the Lord Eland, was a voluntary Hostage with the Prince, for his Father's Sincerity.

Dof Leeds. The Duke of Leeds, then Lord Dunblain, went also to the Hague, to offer his Highness his Service, which was of very great Importance.

Earl of Argyll. The Earl of Argyll, whose Father and Grandfather had been sacrificed to Popery and Arbitrary Power, was imprison'd by King James on Suspicion; but there being no Proof, he was at last discharg'd, and going over to Holland, had his Share in this glorious Undertaking: A Glory inherent in the House of Campbell.

E. of Bath. E. of Dorset. The Earls of Bath and Dorset, sent the Prince a Promise, that they would join him, by Mr. Russell.

Lord Herbert. Mr. Herbert, afterwards Lord Herbert of Cheshire, went to the Hague to attend the Prince of Orange in his Expedition, as did also

Col. Herbert. Col. Herbert, Brother to the Admiral.

Ld Cutts. Talmash. Mackay. Mr. Harbord, afterwards Privy Counsellor, and Ambassador in Turkey; Col. Cutts, afterwards Lord Gowran; Col. Talmash, and Col. Mackay, with other Chief Officers of the English and Scots Regiments in Holland. Sir Rowland Gwynn, that eminent Member of Parliament, came from Holland with King William, and from Hanover with King George, at the first and second Deliverance of England, since the Restoration.

Major Wildman, Major Manley, Mr. Isaac Manly his Son, and some Gentlemen, who had shelter'd themselves in Germany, against the Tyranny in England, repaired to the Hague, to be assisting in her Deliverance.

Mr. Fletcher. Mr. Andrew Fletcher, who distinguish'd himself in the Scots Parliaments afterwards, joined with others who had been with the Duke of Monmouth, in this Expedition, as Col. Matthews, Col. Foulks, Robert Ferguson, &c.

Sir R. Peyton. Sir Robert Peyton, Sir John Guise, and many other English Gentlemen of Character and Interest, waited at the Hague to attend his Highness, and have their Share of the Peril and the Honour

The Gentlemen who staid in England, were not less useful by engaging their Friends and Dependants, and preparing to join him after he was landed, as Sir Scroop How, Mr. John How his Brother, Mr. Russel, Brother to Admiral Russel, the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Delamere, Lord Lovelace, Lord Colchester, Lord Willoughby of Eresby, and at last the Marquisses of Winchester and Halifax.

Matters having been concerted between the Earl of Shrewsbury, Mr. Russel, Mr. Sidney, and Mr. Johnston, who were to return to the Prince in Holland, and the Earl of Devonshire, the Earl of Danby, the Lord Lumley, and other Lords and Gentlemen, who were to stay in England; the former cross the Seas, and the latter disperse themselves in the North, and other Parts of England, for which they had undertaken. The Thing was in the hands of many thousands, yet none of them made any Discovery, nor was any Suspicion given, till about September, when it was known in Holland that many Arms were bespoke; and tho' 'twas given out to be for the King of Sweden, and some German Princes, yet it was thought to be a Blind. France took the Alarm, and gave it first to the Court of England, who publish'd the Advertisements they had received a little too rashly; for all People were much animated when they heard it from such a Hand. The King soon saw his Error, and to correct it, said on many Occasions, Whatever the Designs of the Dutch may be, I am sure they are not against me. It was given out sometimes that they were against France, and sometimes they were against Denmark. However he ordered 14 Ships more to put to Sea, with many Fireships. He recalled Strickland, and gave the Command of the Fleet to the Lord Dartmouth.

When the French King gave K. James Notice that the Dutch Armaments were against him, he offer'd him Assistance, 15000 Men, or as many more as he desir'd, provided Portsmouth was put into his hand, to keep the Communication open with France. All the Priests, and most of the Popish Lords were for it, and the Earl of Sunderland was the only Privy Counsellor in Credit who oppos'd it. His Reasons were such as will convince any reasonable Man, he could not have given his Master better Counsel. He said, the Offer of an Army of 40000 Men might be a real Strength; but then it would depend upon the Orders that came from France. They might perhaps master England, but they would become the King's Master at the same Time, so that he must govern under such Orders as they should give: thus he would quickly become only a Viceroy to the King of France. An Army less than that would lose the King the Affections of his People, and drive his own Army to Desertion, if not to Mutiny. Tho' the Offer was not accepted, yet it was not dropt, and 100 Merchant Ships were bargain'd for, to transport Forces from France, when King James desired them. The French King made a greater Step, ordering the Count d'Avaux, his Ambassador in Holland, to present a Memorial to the States, declaring, there was a strict Alliance between his Master and the King of England, and that he would look on every thing done against England, as an Invasion of his own Crown. This put King James and his Ministers quite out of Countenance, and the French King shew'd by it that he car'd not what became of his dear Brother of England, if he could by any means hinder the English and Dutch joining against him, which would be the Consequence of the Prince's Success against K. James, who had always deny'd

Nay, the King himself deny'd it afterwards to Van Cutters the Dutch Ambassador at London. The Blame of the putting it into the Memorial was laid to Skelton the King's Envoy at Paris, who was disown'd in it, and upon his coming over to England, sent to the Tower: But to shew the Giddiness, as well as Weakness of their Counsels, a few days after he was made Governor of the same Place he was imprison'd in. The French Ambassador at Constantinople shew'd the English Ambassador Sir William Trumbal a Letter to him, from a Minister of State in France, importing that now an Alliance was concluded between the two Kings. One would think such Princes and such Ministers were Infidels, and believ'd neither God nor Devil, Heaven nor Hell, so solemnly and so frequently to deny a Fact, on which the spiritual and temporal Welfare of so many Millions of People depended.

French King the first that publicly term'd the Prince of Wales an Impostor.

About this time the French King publish'd two Manifestos; one against the Emperor, which was the beginning of that War which lasted till the Peace of Resweyck. The other against the Pope. In the latter of which, the French King himself made the first mention of the Imposture of the Prince of Wales, by charging the Pope with giving the Prince of Orange's emissaries the Boldness to term it so; whereas an Author of a Book writ for that purpose in Holland was punish'd.

The Prince of Orange and the States at leisure to mind England.

In the mean time the German Princes were every where making Preparations to oppose the Invasions of the French. The Prince of Orange, under the pretence of the Business of Cologne, had an Interview at Minden in Westphalia with the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh, the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and the Lunenburgh Princes, when Measures were concerted to recover England, as well as depress France. The Brandenburgh Troops increasing in the Country of Cleve, Mareschal Schomberg, who commanded there for that Elector, sent a Body of them to Cologne, which were admitted into that City, and prevented its falling into the hands of the French; by which means the States were safe on all hands for this Winter, and the Prince of Orange had great Quiet in prosecuting his Designs upon England: The Elector of Brandenburgh having also sent the States a Message, that there should always be a Force in readiness in the Dutchy of Cleve, to secure them from all danger on that side. The States had hired 10000 German Troops to augment their Army, besides those from Brandenburgh and Sweden; so that when the Forces intended for the Expedition were march'd from the Encampment near Nimeguen, they could easily, in a few days, make up the miss of them. But how to raise Money for the Prince, without declaring for what use, was the great Difficulty: which was remov'd by that great Politician Fagel, who, under colour of repairing the Fortifications on the Frontier towards Cologne, from whence look'd the Danger, got the States to create a Fund to pay Interest for a Loan of four Millions of Guilders, which they readily lent the Prince of Orange. It pass'd the States without any Opposition, to the Amazement of all that saw it: For it had never been known that so great and so dangerous an Enterprise had been so easily agreed to in such a Season, without so much as one disagreeing Vote.

Admiral Herbert went to Sea with the Dutch Fleet, to look on the English, and try if any would come over, of which some hopes were given, or to engage them while they were not a Fleet.

above twenty Ships strong; but he was hinder'd by contrary Winds. Things being so forward, it was thought fit to draw up a Declaration. Heads of one had been sent from England, penn'd by the Earl of Danby, who five or six Years before was for executing the Lord Shaftesbury for penning an Association, which indeed he did not pen. Major Wildman made a Draft of a Declaration, which being not enough in favour of the Church Party, was not made use of, tho' approv'd of by the Earl of Macclesfield, the Lord Mordaunt, and many others: But the cooler Heads, the Lord Shrewsbury, Mr. Sidney and The Mr. Ruffel, were for striking out every thing that reflected on the Management in King Charles II's Reign, it being to go too far back, and would disgust the Nobility, Gentry, and Clergy, who had encourag'd Persecution and Passive-Obedience. Besides, it was by no means prudent to upbraid People with Non-Resistance, when they were inviting them to resist: so a Temper was found, and the exceptionable Parts of several Drafts being thrown out, that which pass'd was printed, and is the same which is to be seen in almost all Histories of that Time.

In the beginning of October the Troops march'd from Nimeguen, and were put aboard in the Zuyder-Zee, where they lay above ten Days before they could get out of the Texel. Never was so great a Design executed in so short a time, a Fleet of 500 Transports hired in three Days! All things, as soon as they were order'd, were so quickly got ready, that every body was amaz'd at it. Messieurs Bentinck, Dykvelt, Mr. Herbert, and Vankulst, were for two Months constantly at the Hague, giving the necessary Orders with so little Noise, that nothing broke out all that while. Mr. Bentinck was the Person most trusted and employ'd by his Highness. I take what follows verbatim from Bishop Burnet.

"I waited on the Princess a few Days before we left the Hague, she seem'd to have a great Load on her Spirits, but to have no scruple as to the Lawfulness of the Design." After much other Discourse, I said, If we got safe to England, I made no great doubt of our Success in all other things. I only begg'd her pardon to tell her, that if there should happen to be at any time any disjointing between the Prince and her, that would ruin all. She answer'd, You need fear no such thing; if any Person shall attempt that, I shall treat them so, as to discourage all others from adventuring on it for the future. "She was very solemn and serious, and pray'd God earnestly to bless and direct us."

I come now to one of the most moving Passages in all History, the Prince of Orange's taking his leave of the States: in which there is something so affecting, that the celebrated Parting of Titus and Berenice is insipid in comparison with it, as it is thus told by my Lord of Sarum.

"On the 16th of October, the Wind, that had stood so long in the West came into the East; so Orders were sent to all to haste to Helvoet-sluys. That Morning the Prince went into the Assembly of the States General, to take leave of them. He told them he was extremely sensible of the Kindness they had all shew'd him upon many Occasions: He took God to Witness he had serv'd them faithfully, ever since they had trusted him with the Government, and that he had never any End before his Eyes, but the Good of the Country: He had always pursued it, and if at any Time he err'd in his Judgment, yet his Heart was ever set on procuring their Safety and Prosperity. He took God to Witness, he went to England with no other

The Princess's saying of the Expedition

The Prince's parting with the States General.

A. D. 1688. "other Intentions, but those he had set out in his Declaration. He did not know how God might dispose of him, to his Providence he committed himself: whatsoever might become of him, he committed to them the Care of their Country; and recommended the Princess to them in a most particular manner. He assured them she lov'd their Country perfectly, and equally with her own: He hoped, that whatever might happen to him, they would still protect her, and use her as she well deserved. And so he took his Leave. It was a sad, but a kind Parting. Some of every Province offer'd at an Answer to what the Prince had said, but none could speak; all melted into Tears and Passion. At last some broken Words dropt from them, very short and extreme tender, only the Prince continued firm in his usual Gravity and Phlegm."

The Dutch Fleet sails.

Put back by a Storm.

On the 19th of October his Highness went on board, and the whole Fleet put out that Night; but the next Day the Wind turn'd to the North, and settled in the North-West. At Night a great Storm rose; the Dutch Fleet wrought against it all that Night, and the next Day, and ran no small Hazard, being a great Number of Ships, and obliged to keep together, yet not to come too near one another. On the 21st in the Afternoon the Signal was given to go in again, and on the 22d the far greater Part got in. Many Ships were at first missing, and were believed to be lost, but after a few Days all came in safe, and there was not at last a Ship missing, and but one Man, who was blown from the Shrouds into the Sea. Some Ships were shatter'd, and render'd unserviceable, and about 500 Horses dy'd for want of Air. The States were not at all discourag'd with this hard beginning, but gave the necessary Orders for Supplies of every thing that was needed.

We must now see what Preparations were making in England, to oppose the Prince of Orange, and we shall find the King in great Perplexity, both as to Counsel and Action.

He had but small Satisfaction, from the States Answer to his Irish Envoy Alberville in Holland; who having demanded of their High Mightinesses, What they meant by their great and surprising warlike Preparations, both by Sea and Land, at that Time of the Year, had for Answer, That they arm'd in Imitation of his Britannick Majesty, and might with more Reason demand an Explanation about the Alliances into which he was lately enter'd; and which was confirm'd by d'Avaux's Memorial to the States, who had Orders for it from his Master the French King, who, as great a Politician as he was, sent those Orders at the meer Motion of Skelton, without any previous Direction from England. France, to recover this false Step, offer'd, by Barillon, the French Minister in England, that his Master would abandon the Siege of Philipsburgh, and turn his Arms against Holland, if the King of England would accept of Assistance from him; which was approv'd of by four or five of the Council, who would rather have been Slaves to France, than Subjects to the free Constitution of England. The wiser of K. James's Counsellors objected, that such a Violation of former Treaties with Holland, would raise the Clamours of the whole Nation, and alienate the Minds of all the English Protestants from the King. These French Negotiations, which were indeed desperate and dangerous, were improv'd to the advantage of the Prince of Orange's Expedition, by causing a Report, that the Dutch Armament was only design'd to hinder the French from landing in England, where, in purisance of the secret Treaty made with King James, they were to extirpate the Protestant Religion. Such use was there made of Skelton's blundering Advice, and the French King and his Ministers pursuing that Blunder to the Ruin of the unhappy Prince they pretended to save. After all the false Reasonings of the Jesuit Orleans, and his Copist Echard, about Lord Sunderland's treacherous Advice, in hindering his Master's accepting the Assistance of France, it appears to be very prudent and faithful Counsel; for supposing that King James's Soldiers were generally Well-wishers to the Prince of Orange's Undertaking, and his Seamen the same, as I think no body questions, and that the Appearance of French Forces, tho' they had been 30000 Men, had occasion'd a general Revolt; that the English Army had join'd the Dutch, and the English Fleet the Dutch Fleet, which was more than probable, notwithstanding what Lord Dartmouth told Bishop Burnet to the contrary, and that upon these two Junctions, the whole Body of the Nation had taken Arms against King James, and his Frenchmen; can any one doubt but the Issue of it must have been fatal, not only to King James, but to the French King himself, who having lost such an Army, would have been in an ill Condition to make War with the Dutch in the Winter, when he had the German Confederates at the back of him?

King James's rash Counsellors, the Earl of Melfort, and all the Papists, advis'd the seizing all suspected Persons, and sending them to Portsmouth. The Earl of Sunderland oppos'd it vehemently, saying, "It will not be possible to seize on many at the same time, and the seizing on a few would alarm all the rest: It would drive them in to the Prince, and furnish them with a Pretence for it." He propos'd rather, that the King would do such Popular Things as might give some Content, and lay that Fermentation, with which the Nation was then, as it were, distracted: which Advice was follow'd in a few Instances; tho' the Papists hated Sunderland heartily for giving it.

On the 19th of September the King went to Chatham to view the Fortifications there and along the Medway, and forward the Equipment of the Ships that were to join his Fleet.

The same Day he set out for Chatham, the Princess of Denmark return'd from Tunbridge, and tho' the Queen was alone, and Prince George with the King, she did not go to Court as usual, her Reception there being lately very cold, and the Reason of it was said to be, that she was thought to hold too good Intelligence with the Princess of Orange her Sister.

When the King came back, he caus'd his Proclamation for calling a Parliament to be publish'd, wherein he declar'd, "His Intention to establish an universal Liberty, and to preserve the Church of England by such a Confirmation of the several Acts of Uniformity, that they should never be alter'd." He excluded Roman-Catholicks from the House of Commons only, which, it was said, imply'd that the Popish Lords might sit, and with that view the Lord Stafford was restored to the Dignity of Viscount. This Proclamation was so ambiguously worded, that it had little Effect on the People, who look'd upon it as a forc'd Business, and all their Eyes were cast towards the East, from whence they had News next day, that the Dutch Troops were embarking, and that the Prince of Orange was at Rotterdam to oversee it. Upon which, a fresh Augmentation of Forces was resolv'd on, and more Men added to the Troops of Horse and Dragoons, and to the Companies of Foot. A

A. D. 1688.

Lord Sunderland's Advice good.

A Proclamation for a Parliament.

A. D. 1688. Regiment of Horse was raised, and the Command of it given to Armand de Bourbon Marquis de Miremont, descended from the famous Charles de Bourbon kill'd at the Assault of Rome. He was a French Refugee, and Nephew to the Earl of Feverham and to the Count de Roye. The King offer'd the Command of his Army to the Count de Roye another Refugee, who declining that Office, 'twas given to the Lord Feverham, who was no better a General than he was a Protestant.

The Lord Dartmouth was dispatch'd to take on him the Command of the Fleet, and the King sent for the Lord Mayor and Aldermen to recommend the Care of the City to them. He offer'd three of the Bishops Seats at the Council-board, but they excus'd themselves, for that there were several Papists Members of the Council; and to quiet things abroad as well as at home, Albeville, who had disown'd d'Avaux's Memorial as to the Secret League, had Orders to offer the States a new Treaty for maintaining the Peace at Nimeguen, and the twenty years Truce concluded in 1684: but the Dutch Ministers easily saw thro' this Disguise, and it had success accordingly. There was a Talk that the Lord Godolphin should go to the Hague and forward this Negotiation, which it is suppos'd that Lord was not willing to engage in, as knowing it was a Feint, and taken for such by the Dutch. About the latter end of September, Advice came from Holland, that 12000 Foot, 2000 Horse, and 1000 Dragoons were put aboard the Transports; and it was reported, the Descent would be at Burlington in Torkshire, tho the Secret was communicated to none but Fagel, Bentinck, Russel, Sidney, and Dykvelt. That the Expedition was against King James, was no more made a doubt of, and the Count de Neville, who call'd himself an Envoy from Poland, declar'd at London, that the Duke of Zell told him so. The next Courier finish'd King James's Consternation, for Albeville having told Monf. Fagel that Van Citters had assured the King the Fleet and Army were not designed against England, the Pensioner reply'd, He had no Orders from the States to say so. The Envoy further inform'd the King, that many English Lords and Gentlemen were arriv'd at the Hague to accompany the Prince of Orange. Upon reading this Letter, The poor King, says Echard, turn'd pale, and for a while remain'd speechless and astonish'd; and may one not now imagine the injured Ghosts of Russel, Sidney, Bailie, Cornish, and the Hecatombs in the West and in Scotland, haunted his Dreams amidst the Extremity of his Distress and Despair; that now his bloody Whippings, his Dungeons, his intolerable Fines, his Violation of Oaths and Laws, were like so many Vultures to his tortured Soul! For Affliction makes it sensible of every Touch; whereas it is harden'd by Success and Prosperity. Echard, who waited on his triumphal Chariot, when he was riding over the Lives, Liberties, and Properties of Protestant Dissenters; even Echard cannot help remarking, The airy Castle of unlimited Power rais'd by the Magick of jesuitical Counsels, now vanish'd in a Moment, and the misled Monarch, by the Prince's Approach, freed from his Enchantment, found himself upon the Brink of a Precipice, while all his intoxicating Flatterers stood thunderstruck at a distance, without daring to lend him a helping Hand, for fear that both he and they should be involv'd in the greater Ruin. Here are a pretty many Words indeed, and the Sense is only, the King being misled by jesuitical Conjurors, was abandon'd by his dastardly impotent Flatterers, tho no body has flatter'd him more than the Archdeacon himself.

The King knows the Design to be against him.

He is in despair.

In this Fright he sent for the Bishops, Winchester, Chichester, Peterburgh, Rocheſter, Ely, Bath and Wells, and desir'd the Assistance of their Counsels, assuring them he was ready to do whatever they should think necessary for the Security of the Protestant Religion. The Bishops pray'd for time to consult together about so weighty a matter, and repairing to Lambeth, had the Sentiments of the Archbishop in their Answer. On the 28th of September he issu'd out a Proclamation, setting forth the Advice he had received of the Prince's intended Invasion to conquer these Kingdoms, and subdue and subject them to a foreign Power, which oblig'd him to recall his Writs for electing Members of Parliament; and which should rather have oblig'd him to have hasten'd its sitting. To cajole the People, the Bishop of London's Suspension was taken off; Sir John Eyles a Baptist, whom he had nominated to be Lord Mayor, was remov'd, and Sir John Chapman a Churchman, put in his Place. He also restor'd the Charter of London, which Jefferies himself carry'd back, and put on the the Appearance of Joy and Heartiness when he gave it to the Mayor and Aldermen at Guild-hall. Every body saw through this Affectation, for he had rais'd himself chiefly by advising or promoting the Surrender.

The Confusion the King was in, appear'd by the Unsteadiness of his Counsels, undoing to-day what he did yesterday, being for a thing and against a thing in the Compass of a few Hours and always shewing that every Popular Act was against his Will, and as a Force put upon him might be disavow'd or disannull'd, when he was out of danger. Intelligence being given him, that several Persons past over to Holland to avoid being seiz'd, as Melfort advis'd, he publish'd a general Pardon, excepting several Persons; but some Words in it concerning the Church of England giving the Bishops Offence, a second Proclamation came out with particular Exceptions, as,

Persons excepted out of the Pardon.

This Pardon was drawn up by Jefferies, and in the main, by several Clauses, excepted the whole Nation, but none regarded it. The Thunders of Whitehall were no more minded now in England, than those of the Vatican. So fearful was the Court of every one's Motions, that Mr. Goodwin Wharton being near Portsmouth seeking after Marcassites to make use of them in his Chymical Experiments, he was seiz'd and sent to London; but his Business being better understood, they did not detain him.

It was some Consolation to the despairing Monarch, that his Friends, real or pretended, did not all forsake him.

The Duke of Newcastle wrote him a Letter to offer him his Service against all his Enemies; so did the Earls of Lindsey and Derby.

The Earl of Ailesbury came to London on purpose, and presented to the King two of his Brothers, who had agreed to serve as Volunteers in Sir John Lanier's Regiment of Horse.

The Duke of Ormond propos'd to accompany the King in the Army as a Volunteer also, attended by Lieutenant-Colonel Beaumont, and the five Portsmouth Captains.

The Earl of Burlington made a Tender of his Service, and after the Prince was landed, sent only a Page on horseback.

The

Lords offer the King their Assistance.

A. D. 1688. The Lord Viscount Falconbridge, Oliver Cromwell's Son-in-Law, made the like Tender.

The Earl of Dyfart, Col. Talmaſh's Brother, did the ſame, as alſo the Lord Dover and the Lord Baltimore. The latter was ſo unlucky, that after King James had endeavour'd to take from him his Plantation of Maryland, he rais'd a Troop of Horſe to ſerve him againſt the Prince of Orange, which was remember'd after the Revolution, and the ſame Endeavours continu'd by the then Government.

Preparations made by him. Commiſſions were given to the Duke of Newcaſtle, Col. Henry Gage, and Col. Solomon Richards, to raiſe three Regiments of Foot. Two Thouſand Foot and five Hundred Horſe were transported from Dublin to Cheſter, and three Thouſand Scots advanced to Carliffe. Thus if the King's Troops had been all together, they would have form'd an Army of about Thirty Thouſand Men; but their chief Officers were under other Engagements, and the greateſt part of the Soldiers as unwilling to fight the Prince's Army, as the Engliſh Seamen were to fight his Fleet; and I have been well inform'd, that if the Lord Dartmouth had attempted it, he would have been deſerted by many of the Captains, who were under the ſame Engagements as were the Land Officers. Beſides, it did not ſeem as if he himſelf had Intention to engage the Dutch, he having but forty Men of War, and the Dutch fifty-two, larger Ships and better provided. As to Biſhop Burnet's Objection, that he might have diſpers'd the Transports, 'tis obvious he could have done them little hurt till he had beaten the Fleet, of which there was little Hope.

The King having reſtor'd the Charter of London, a Council was held to conſider the Affair of the other Charters, October the 17th.

Present.

Above half of theſe are Cornish Boroughs, and we need not doubt but the other Corporations were in the Hands of Perſons of equal Parts and Importance.

This Condeſcenſion was ſuppos'd to be one of the Effects of the Biſhops Propoſals, which they deliver'd to the King. 1. To put Perſons qualify'd into Offices. 2. To annul the Eccleſiaſtical Biſhops Commiſſion. 3. To grant no Diſpenſations for Propoſals.
Qualifications, and reſtore the Preſident and Fellows of Magdalen College. 4. To ſet aſide all Licences for Popiſh Schools. 5. Not to exerciſe the Diſpenſing Power. 6. To inhibit the four Popiſh Biſhops. 7. To fill the vacant Biſhopricks in England and Ireland, particularly York.
8. To reſtore the Charters. 9. To iſſue Writs for calling a Parliament. 10. To bear Reaſons for his returning to the Church of England. Moſt of which Propoſals were comply'd with, but in ſuch a manner as like the Caſe of Magdalen College, ſhew'd the King would undo what he was doing as ſoon as he was out of the Fright he was then in. For the Biſhop of Wincheſter, Vi-ſitor of Magdalen College, having on the 16th of October caus'd a Citation to be fix'd on the Gates of that Houſe, to recall Dr. Hough the Preſident, and the Fellows, upon News of the putting in of the Dutch Fleet, this weak King, and his weak Council, could not help ſhewing their Infirmity ſo far as to recall the Biſhop to London; and upon other News of the Prince of Orange's being ready to put to Sea again, the Biſhop a Week after was ſent back to Oxford, to finiſh his Work at Magdalen College: which confirms the Opinion I have always given of the Heads, as well as the Hearts, in this unfortunate Admi-niſtration.

On the 20th of October a Proclamation was publiſh'd to watch the Coaſt, and on the Appearance of the Enemy to drive all Horſes, Oxen, and Cattle for Draught twenty Miles from their Places of Landing; which is ſaid to have been done by Advice of the Count de Roſe, whoſe Conduct at the Revolution has been much condemn'd; as well as that of the Marquis de Miremont, another Hugonor, his Nephew.

The King ſent an Order to the Biſhops to compose Prayers againſt the Prince of Orange.
How the Nonſenſe runs thro' every thing? He-retical Biſhops, according to him, to make Prayers for a Catholick King. If he thought the Prayers of Hereticks avail'd any thing, when according to his Church they were in a State of Damnation, why was he ſo obſtinate againſt the Church of England, in which he was baptiz'd?
The Prayers were ſo well drawn, that even thoſe that wiſh'd for the Prince might have join'd in them. Biſhop Burnet's Obſervations here are very juſt. "The Church Party did
"now ſhew their Approbation of the Prince's Church for "Expedition in ſuch Terms, that many were Reſiſtance.
"ſurpris'd at it both then and ſince that "Time. They ſpoke openly in favour of it.
"They expreſs'd their Grief to ſee the Wind ſo
"croſs. They wiſh'd for an Eaſt Wind, which
"on that occaſion was call'd the Proteſtant
"Wind. They ſpoke with great Scorn of all "that the Court was then doing to regain the "Hearts of the Nation; and indeed the Pro"ceedings of the Court that way were ſo cold,
"and ſo forc'd, that few were lik'd to be de-
"ceiv'd by them, but thoſe who had a mind to "be deceiv'd. The Writs for a Parliament "were often order'd to be made ready for the "Seal, and were as often ſtop'd. Some were "ſeal'd and given out, but they were call'd in "again. The Matter of the greateſt Concern,
"and that could not be dropp'd, was the Birth "of the Prince of Wales. And therefore the "Court thought it neceſſary, now in an After-"Game, to offer ſome ſatisfaction in that Point.
"So

A. D. 1688. "So a great Meeting was call'd, not only of the Privy-Counsellors and Judges, but of all the Nobility then in Town; to whom the King complain'd of the great Injury that was done both him and the Queen by the Prince of Orange, who accus'd them of so black an Imposition. He said he believ'd there were few Princes then alive, who had been born in the Presence of more Witnesses than were at his Son's Birth; he had therefore call'd them together, that they might hear the Proof of that Matter." The Depositions, obscene to a Degree of Horror, were made by,

It is great Pity but their Names should be remember'd!

On a Supposition that the King and Queen were really capable of such an Imposition, one cannot but suppose they were capable of every thing for the Support of it. Bishop Burnet's Account of this bawdy Business is the best and modestest.

"It was first prov'd that the Queen was deliver'd a-bed, while many were in the Room, and that they saw the Child soon after he was taken from the Queen by the Midwife; but in this the Midwife was the single Witness, for none of the Ladies had felt the Child in the Queen's Belly. The Countess of Sunderland did indeed depose, that the Queen call'd to her to give her her Hand, that she might feel how the Child lay, to which she added, which I did; but did not say whether she felt the Child or not." If she had so said, it would indeed have been good Evidence; but instead of that she told the Dutchess of Hamilton, who told it to the Bishop of Salisbury, that when she put her Hand into the Bed, the Queen held it, and let it go no lower than her Breasts.

All the Proofs destroyed by one. After this, what signify a hundred Witnesses? The Queen herself call'd for her to feel the Child in her Belly, and when she came, the Queen would not let her feel it. Besides, tho' the Queen was too modest or too proud to give the People Satisfaction, was it not in her power, by letting the Princess Anne feel the Child as

A. D. 1688. she was wont to do, to confound all Gainsayers, and to put the thing out of question? 'Tis monstrous to think she would not have done it, if she had had a Child in her Belly, before the Princess went to Bath.—The Bishop again speaking of Lady Sunderland's Deposition.

"So that really she felt nothing, and this Deposition, brought to make a Shew, was an Evidence against the Matter rather than for it, and was a violent Presumption of an Imposition, and of an Artifice to cover it. Many Ladies depos'd they had often seen the Marks of Milk on the Queen's Linnen near her Breasts; two or three depos'd, that they saw it running out at the Nipple. All these depos'd, that they saw Milk before the pretended Delivery, but none of them depos'd concerning Milk after the Delivery, tho' Nature sends it then in greater abundance; and the Queen had it always in such a Plenty, that some Weeks past after her Delivery, before she was quite freed from it. The Ladies did not name the Time in which they saw the Milk, except one, who nam'd the Month of May: But if the Particulars mention'd before, that happen'd on Easter Monday, are reflected on; and if it appears probable by these, that the Queen miscarry'd at that time, then all that the Ladies mention'd of Milk in her Breasts, particularly she that fix'd it in the Month of May, might have follow'd upon that Miscarriage, and be no Proof concerning the Birth. Mrs. Pearse the Laundress depos'd, she took Linnen from the Queen's Body once, which carried the Marks of a Delivery, but she spoke only to one Time; that was a main Circumstance, and if it had been true, it must have been done often, and was capable of a more copious Proof, since there is occasion for such things to be often look'd on, and well consider'd. The Lady Wentworth was the single Witness that depos'd, that she had felt the Child move in the Queen's Belly; She was a Bed-Chamber Woman as well as a single Witness, and she fix'd it on no Time; if it was very early she might have been mistaken, or if it was before Easter Monday it might be true, and yet have no relation to this Birth."

This was the Substance of all the Evidence, which was order'd to be enroll'd and printed, and had no other Effect than to make Jest for lewd People. "The Presumption of Law before this was all in favour of the Birth, since the Parents own'd the Child; so that the Proof lay on the other side, and ought to be offer'd by those who call'd it in question. But now that this Proof was brought, which was so apparently defective, it did not lessen, but increase the Jealousy, with which the Nation was possess'd; for all People concluded that if the thing had been true, it must have been easy to have brought a much more copious Proof than was now publish'd to the World."

This Matter is pretty well discuss'd in the Memorial of the Church of England, address'd to their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Orange, said to be written by Major Wildman. It contain'd the Grievances of the English Nation under King James, and the Imposition of the Pretender; 'tis very long and very curious. The Charge of the Imposition oblig'd King James to collect these obscene Depositions, for the Memorial had not been long dispers'd in Holland, before Care was taken to disperse it in England also.

The King offer'd to have the Queen sworn as well as her Ladies, but the Company were too good Courtiers to admit of that; and indeed one can't see the use of it, for he or she who makes no Conscience of a Cheat, will certainly make no Conscience of swearing to it. Lord Hallifax said, when the Printing the Depositions was talk'd of, It must be for the Rabble only, Persons of Honour do not want them. The Child was christen'd about the same time, and nam'd James Francis-Edward, the Pope's Nuntio being his Godfather. The King told some Lords he had three Witnesses more to prove the Birth, but he would not produce them out of respect to their Profession; he meant Father Petre, Father Galli the Queen's Confessor, and the Abbot Massa, Mastro di Camera to the Nuntio; Rare Evidence! and it would have been pleasant to have met them among the other Witnesses. On the 28th of October the Earl of Sunderland was remov'd from his Places of President of the Council, and Principal Secretary of State. It was thought the King had some Diffidence of his having Correspondence with the Prince of Orange; but whether he had or not, 'tis no question his Lady had with the Princess. Skelton, to justify his Conduct in France, inform'd the King, that he receiv'd Information of the Prince of Orange's Design from Mr. Bude de Verace, of Geneva, who had been Steward of the Household to the Princess Dowager of Orange, of which he had written six or seven Letters to the Earl of Sunderland, and having had no Answer, he apply'd to the French King, who upon that sent Bonrepos to London, and Orders to d'Avaux at the Hague to expostulate the Matter with the States. This Account of the prime Minister confirm'd all former Suspicions of him, which had still further Confirmation by the Deposition of one Wickstead, formerly a Monk, who being seiz'd for holding Correspondence with the Enemy, charg'd the Earl of Sunderland to his face, with revealing his Majesty's Secrets to the Prince of Orange. Upon which, Wickstead was committed to a Messenger, from whom he made his Escape out of a Window two Pair of Stairs high, and Lord Sunderland own'd the Receipt of Skelton's Letters; but added, he took no notice of them, out of an invincible Contempt for that Tool and all his Intelligence, which was generally second-hand News. Lord Sunderland had taken out a particular Pardon, so had Jefferies, Sir Nicholas Butler, the Bishops of Durham and Chester. Sunderland expecting to be remov'd, turn'd off above a Dozen of his Domesticks twelve Days before; and the next Day after retir'd to his House, which had been Prince Rupert's, at *Windso*r, from whence he withdrew into Holland; after the Prince was sail'd for England, and there publish'd his Apology; as Dr. Sprat, Bishop of Rockester, did in a Letter to the Earl of Dorset; and the Earl of Mulgrave in a Letter to Dr. Tillotson; but neither of them are clear'd, even by the Account they themselves give of their own Conduct.

By this time the Prince of Orange's Declaration was almost in every one's hand. It was first brought over by Captain Langham, who commanded a Company of Foot in an English Regiment in the States Service; who coming to London, was recommended to lodge at a Man's House, who had been with the Duke of Monmouth. Langham ask'd him to get somebody to shew him where the Dutch Ambassador dwelt, and enquiring the Price of a good Horse, said he did not value ten or twenty Guineas more or less, if he could have a good one. When he went out he was very earnest with the People of the House to take great care of his Portmanteau; all which Circumstances rais'd a Suspicion, and the Man of the House having been pardon'd by King James, either out of Gratitude, or in hope of Reward, open'd his Portmanteau, took out the Declarations, and carry'd them to the Lord Mayor, who order'd Langham to be seiz'd, and sent him and the Declarations to Whitehall, where the Council was presently summon'd to examine him. Langham boldly deny'd that he brought over any such Paper, alledging he came for England, purely to take hold of his Majesty's most gracious Pardon lately publish'd; and adding, that such Usage would fright People from venturing into England upon it. Skelton seeing the Captain, said he was a great Enemy to the King; upon which he was committed, and set aside for Trial. A Proclamation was publish'd November 2: against reading, or keeping that Treasonable Libel, as it was call'd, and great Care was taken to hinder its being dispers'd; insomuch, that a Copy of it could not be procur'd for Silver or Gold. The Grand Jury, before whom a Bill of High Treason was laid against Langham, refus'd to find it, because no Declaration appear'd; however, in a few Days it was reprinted, and spread about Town and Country. The King then finding there was no way to hinder it, permitted the printing of it, with a sorry Answer, said to be written by Pen; tho' I must confess I think the Prince of Orange's first Declaration to be by no means worthy his glorious Cause: 'tis dry and tedious, and wants the Spirit and Fire, which is the Characteristick of the Genius of Liberty; it has Truth every where, and it might have had Life and Beauty, had Bishop Burnet had the penning of it. The Substance of it was the Enumeration of the Grievances of the three Kingdoms, and the means of redressing them by a Free Parliament; to which he referr'd every thing, in an additional Declaration the 24th of October N. S. His Highness publish'd this to remove any ill Impressions that might have been made by the King's saying, that he came to conquer these Kingdoms; for he assur'd them he was coming only to deliver them from Popery and Slavery, of which they were in the most extreme Danger.

The King was indecently elevated with the false Accounts, which had been given of the Ruin of the Dutch Fleet; he suffer'd it to be printed in the Gazette, that 400 Horse had been thrown over-board, and several dead Men; that 1500 Horse were render'd unserviceable, &c. The Harlem and Amsterdam Gazettes were order'd to give a dismal Relation of the great Damage the Prince's Fleet had sustain'd, on purpose to encrease King James's Security, and it had such Effect on the English Court for a few days, that the King could not help discovering his Mind so far as to begin to recall some of his late Acts of Grace, and to shew, says Echard very quaintly, They were more the Result of Necessity than Inclination. When that Expression in the Prince's Declaration was first read to him, That his Highness was invited over by divers of the Lords both Spiritual and Temporal, and by many Gentlemen and others, he startled, and in great Perplexity sent for the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Rockester, Peterborough, and others, of whom he demanded, Whether their inviting the Prince of Orange was true? The Bishops seeing the Bishops of Chester and St. David's with the King, told the Lord Preston, Secretary of State, that they should not speak as long as those Prelates were there; so they were sent away. The other Bishops not giving him a satisfactory Answer, he fell into a Passion, and requir'd them, fixing a Bishops imitate 1640.

The Prince sails from Holland.

"This Juncture brought into View the Exactness of the Parallel between the King, now in want of Assistance, and his Father; for when the Scots invaded England in 1640, King Charles required the Lords and great Commoners at York, to sign a Protestation, containing, that the Subscribers did disclaim and renounce their having any Correspondence with those Rebellious Invaders. But the Lord Viscount Say, and the Lord Brook, positively refused, even in the King's own Presence, to make any such Protestation, insisting, that if the King suspected their Loyalty he might prosecute them as he thought fit; but that it was against Law to impose Oaths, or Protestations, which the Law did not enjoin, and in that respect they ought not to betray the Common Liberty, but would submit to his Majesty's Prosecution, if any should be. The King therefore imprison'd them, but the Complaints against that illegal Proceeding being general, they were dismissed. The Bishops now in 1688, follow'd those two Lords Example, even in King James's own Presence, in declining to obey his express and personal Commands, and refusing to betray the publick Liberty. From which two Instances may be collected these short Remarks: That King James was now come over to Sidney's Opinion; That some Power is derived from the People; That Britons, whatsoever be their Pretences, will, when Pressures and Sufferings come to be their own Case, fly to the Constitution for shelter; and that the Bishops now thought it no Disparagement to imitate the Proceedings in 1640."

The King told them he must have their Abhorrence, for his Success depended upon it, and he had left room to print it in his Proclamation against the Prince, which he was forced to publish without it.

The Bishops offer'd to disown verbally what was said of them in the Declaration, and he might make what use of it he pleas'd. The King could get nothing more from them, and when he dismiss'd them he said sullenly, I'll depend upon my Army.

His Highness wrote a Letter to the Army, and Admiral Herbert another to the Fleet, which had great Influence on the Minds both of Soldiers and Seamen, well enough prepared to receive such Impressions as were in the Contents of those Letters.

All the Damage his Highness's Ships had receiv'd being repaired, he set sail from Helvoetsluys the 1st of November, and it is certain, he even then design'd for the North of England, for the Fleet try'd till next day at Noon, if it was possible to sail Northward. About Noon November 2, the Signal was given to steer Westward, and the Wind being full East, it not only happily diverted them from their first intended Course, but kept the English Fleet in the River; nor was it possible for them to come out, tho' they were fallen down so low as the Gunfleet. By this means the Prince had the Sea open to him, with a fair Wind and a safe Navigation. On the 3d of November he pass'd between Dover and Calais, and before Night came in sight of the Isle of Wight. The next Day, November the 4th, on which the Prince was both born and married, he fancy'd if he could then land, it would look auspicious to the Army, and animate the Soldiers; but it was the general Opinion, that the 5th of November, being Gunpowder-Treason Day, would be thought the more fortunate for their landing, as an Aera of Deliverance from Popery, which his Highness was now attempting. It was resolv'd to land in Torbay, or where it could be best done near it, that being at such a distance from London, Horses might be got, and every thing put in order, before the King could march his Army against the Prince; besides, the Men might be refresh'd at Exeter. The Pilots overshot the Bay in the Night, and found themselves past not only that, but Dartmouth in the Morning, so that 'twas thought the Fleet must sail on to Plymouth. Admiral Russel, who saw the Pilots Error was in great Disorder upon it, when on a sudden, to the Wonder of all, the Wind turn'd into the South, and a soft and happy Gale carried the whole Fleet in four Hours into Torbay. Lands in Torbay.

On Saturday the 3d of November, News came to Whitehall, that the Dutch Fleet was in the Channel between Dover and Calais, half Seas over, sailing Westward with a fair Wind, so numerous that they were seven Hours passing those Streights. Courier after Courier arriv'd from the South Coasts to bring an Account of its Motions. The King expected the Prince would land in the North, and for that Reason the Scots halted at Carlisle. But it would not have been the better for him; the Earl of Danby, Earl of Devonshire, Earl of Stamford, and Lord Fairfax having secured those Counties for the Prince. The Earl of Devonshire caus'd the Prince's Declaration to be read in the Town of Derby, from whence he wrote a Letter to the Lord Middleton, to assure him that he took not Arms out of enmity to the King's Person, but for the Good of his Country, and to obtain a Free Parliament; and whereas it was said in the Prince's Declaration, that he was invited by several Peers of the Realm, he own'd that himself was one of them; which Letter he caus'd to be printed, and it very much mortified the King and his Adherents. He pleas'd himself with thinking that the Prince would not be able to recruit his Cavalry in the West, Albeville having written him that the Dutch had lost 1500 Horse. The Court gave out that the Lord Dartmouth was in pursuit of them; and the King himself said, If the Wind is the same at Sea as at Land, he doubted not he would soon be up with them, and a terrible Battle ensue. He founded this Judgment on the Milan Almanack, where such a Combat was prophesied to fall out in the last Quarter of the Moon; but Great Heroes build nothing upon Almanacks. Capt. Aylmer, afterwards Lord, who commanded the Swallow Frigate, seeing a large Dutch Pink lagging in the Tail of the Fleet, made sail to her, and found her just ready to sink; she had 4 Companies of Foot on board, belonging to Col. Babington's Regiment; they were commanded by Major Columbine, and one of the Companies was Capt. Langham's who brought over the Declaration. Another Dutch Transport, laden with Hay, was brought into the Thames by the Master, to whom the King gave both Ship and Cargo. Captain Aylmer follow'd the Dutch Fleet till he saw them into Torbay, and on Tuesday sent an Express to the King, that the Troops were landing. The Man made such haste, and was so tir'd, that he fell down at the King's Feet, and could not speak, which was the greater Disappointment to the Court, because the Particulars were refer'd to the Express; but he was soon followed by other Couriers, from whom the King had full Intelligence, which however was kept as secret as possible. He proceeded with the utmost Diligence, to get a fine Train of Artillery in readiness, and the Troops were

There was, from the first News of the Prince's Landing, no great Fear of their doing the Dutch any harm, for as they were marching thro' the City of London, and thro' great Crouds, that came to see them, to testify their Hopes of the Prince of Orange's Success, many of them drank to it privately, People waiting with Bottles of Wine and other Liquors to give them : The Officers might easily have seen it, but they would not, and the Soldiers knew very well that they were in no danger of them.

Prince of Orange's Standard.

Upon the Arrival of the Dutch Fleet in Torbay, the Prince of Orange gave Orders that his great Standard should be put up. It had this Motto, THE PROTESTANT RELIGION AND LIBERTIES OF ENGLAND, and underneath JE MAINTIENDRAI, I will maintain, the Motto of the House of Nassau. The White Flag was put uppermost, signifying his most gracious Offer of Peace to all such as would live peaceably, and under that the red or bloody Flag was set up, signifying War to all that oppos'd his just Designs. Drawing into the Bay's Mouth, they discover'd the People of Devonshire flocking in great Numbers to the Sea-Shore, not to oppose the Prince's landing, but to welcome their Deliverer, with joyful Shouts and Acclamations, and to furnish him and his Followers with Provisions for their Refreshment. Coming very near, just before any landed, a Divine of the Church of England, on board the Golden Sun, got upon the Poup of the Ship, and flourishing his Bible in his Hand, cry'd out, For the Prince and the Protestant Religion. The Bells rung all along Shore, as the Prince coasted it. The English and Scots Regiments were order'd to land first, himself follow'd about Noon, on the fifth of November, and took his Quarters at a Fisherman's in Torbay, ordering a Camp to be mark'd out on the Top of the Hill, which consisted of 26 Regiments, having, 1000 Inferior Officers.

78 Field Officers.

15400 Soldiers, Horse and Foot.

About 2000 more than the List publish'd by King James's Order. As soon as the Prince and Marechal Schomberg got ashore, they were furnish'd with such Horses as the Village of Broxholme could afford, and rode up the Hill to view the Ground, which was found to be as convenient as could be imagin'd for the Foot in that Season. The Prince sent for all the Fishermen of the Village, and ask'd them which was the properest Place for landing his Horse, and he was next Morning shew'd one below Broxholme, where the Ships could be brought very near the Land, against a good Shore, and the Horses would not be put to swim above 20 Yards. This prov'd so happy for landing, tho' known by meer Accident, that there could not have been found a properer Place in the whole Island.

There was a dead Calm all that Morning, and in three Hours time all the Horse were landed, with as much Baggage as was necessary, till the Army got to Exeter. By next day Noon it was in full March, and march'd 4 Miles that night, being then about 20 Miles from Exeter. No sooner were they thus disengag'd from their Fleet, than a great Storm blew from the West, but the Dutch Ships were cover'd by the Land; and the King's Fleet, which was come as far as the Isle of Wight, in pursuit of them, were so shatter'd by this contrary Wind, that being forc'd into Portsmouth, they were no more fit for Service that Year.

Besides the Marechal de Schomberg, his Highness had with him of Foreigners, Count Charles and Count Meinhardt Schomberg, Monsieur Bentinck, Monsieur Zuylenstein, Seigneur Auverquerque, Monsieur Keppel, Count Nassau, Baron Genkle, the famous Generals Fagel and Hompesch, Monsieur Caillemotte, Brother to the Lord Galway. The Prince made haste to Exeter, where he staid 10 Days to refresh his Troops, and give the Country time to shew their Affections, which they did by shouting and ringing of Bells, but did by no means crowd in to him, as they did to the Duke of Monmouth; the Devonshire Men telling the Prince's Officers, You are enough of yourselves to do the Business. His Highness brought Arms sufficient for as many more as he had with him; but he, having a regular Army, and not standing in so much need of Assistance as the Duke of Monmouth did, was not hasty in giving out Commissions. The first he gave were to the Lord Viscount Mordaunt, Sir John Guise, and Sir Robert Peyton, who being curious in their Men, did not compleat their Regiments in the Time that Monmouth compleated his whole Army.

The first Place the Prince of Orange's Declaration was publickly read at, was Newton Abbot, a Market Town near Exeter, and the first Man who read it was a Clergyman. His Highness staid two Nights at Sir William Courtney's, and was nobly entertain'd; from thence he went to Chudleigh; and thence, on the 8th of November, to Exeter, where he made a splendid Entry, which was mightily magnify'd at London, and a Paper came out, with an Account of the Form and Manner of it, adding such a terrible Description of his Finland Guards, cloath'd in Bear Skins, and his Swiss with Whiskers, as made a strong Impression on the Vulgar, who look'd on King James's List of his Forces, tho' not much short of the Truth, as a Fable to lessen his Strength. The Cannon and heavy Baggage was brought by Water to Topsham, three Miles from Exeter. The Clergy and Magistrates of Exeter were very fearful and very backward. The Prince sent for them, and spoke very obligingly to them. The Bishop ran out at one Gate while the Prince enter'd at another, and was made Archbishop of York, for his Cowardice, or something worse. The Dean too scamper'd in the Fright, but he return'd before his Highness was gone from his House, which he took for his Lodgings. Te Deum was sung in the Cathedral, and after the Collect was ended, Dr. Burnet read his Highness's Declaration; at the beginning of which the Clergy shuffled out of their Seats, but the People were very attentive; and when at the End of the Declaration, the Doctor cry'd God bless the Prince of Orange, they shouted for Joy. The Clergy almost every where else shew'd their Assent to the Prince's Undertaking, by their cheerful Reception of his Followers, and opening the Church-Doors, to ring the Bells in the Places thro' which he pass'd. Those of Exeter were order'd by Dr. Burnet, in the Prince's Name, not to pray for the pretended Prince of Wales; but one of them so doing, two of the Lords who came over with the Prince, stood up and put on their Hats, in Abhorrence of it, kneeling down at all the other Collects. His Highness was three Days at Exeter before he was join'd by any of the Nobility or Gentry who had invited him over, or were in his Interest. The Mayor and Aldermen of the City were very cold, and only one Tutchill and another Alderman declar'd for him. The Army was kept under such exact Discipline, that every thing was paid for, where it was demanded; tho' the Soldiers were contented with such moderate Entertainment, that the People generally ask'd

His Highness at Exeter.

A. D. 1688. ask'd but little for what they had of them. The Prince was a Week at Exeter, before any of the Gentlemen of the Country came in to him, tho' Persons of Condition came every Day from other Parts. The first was the Lord Colchester, Son to Earl Rivers, Lieutenant of the Lord Dover's Troop of Guard, who brought some of the Troopers with him to Exeter; with him, or soon after, arriv'd Thomas Wharton Esq; Son of the Lord Wharton; Col. Godfrey, who had married the Duke of Berwick's Mother; John How Esq; Mr. Ruffel, Brother to the late Lord Orford; at last came Mr. Edward Seymour, Sir William Portman, Sir Francis War, Col. Palmer, Major Bowyer, and many West Country Gentlemen. As soon as Mr. Seymour, afterwards Sir Edward, was come, he sent for Dr. Burnet, and ask'd him, Why they were a Rope of Sand? Why they had not an Association? which was then drawn up, and laid on the Prince's Table, where the Lords and Gentlemen of his Court sign'd it as follows.

Sir Edward Seymour's Association. WE whose Names are hereunto subscrib'd, who have now join'd with the Prince of Orange for the Defence of the Protestant Religion, and for the maintaining of the antient Government, and the Laws and Liberties of England, Scotland, and Ireland, do engage to Almighty God, to his Highness the Prince of Orange, and to one another, to stick firm to this Cause in the Defence of it, and never to depart from it until our Religion, Laws, and Liberties, are so far secur'd to us in a Free Parliament, that we shall be no more in danger of falling under Popery and Slavery. And whereas we are engag'd in this Common Cause under the Protection of the Prince of Orange, by which Case his Person might be exposed to Danger, and the cursed Attempts of Papists and other bloody Men; We do therefore solemnly engage to God and one another, that if any such Attempt be made upon him, we will pursue not only those that make it, but all their Adherents, and all that we find in Arms against us, with the utmost Severity of a just Revenge to their Ruin and Destruction. And that the Execution of any such Attempt, which God of his infinite Mercy forbid, shall not divert us from prosecuting this Cause, which we do now undertake, but that it shall engage us to carry it on with all the Vigour that so barbarous an Action shall deserve.

Oxford for Resistance. While the Prince was in Exeter, there came to him from Oxford a Head of a College, who invited him thither in the Name of that University, and his Highness design'd to go to Oxford, had not King James's Flight from London call'd him thither when he was got as near it as Abington; however the abovemention'd Association was carry'd thither, and signed by the Heads of the Houses and others, with Expressions of the greatest Zeal in this Resisting Cause, that their Hearts went with their Hands.

Ld Cornbury joins the Prince. After the abovementioned Gentlemen, the Earl of Abington, Captain Clarges, and other Persons of Quality arriv'd at Exeter, as did also the Lord Cornbury Colonel of a Regiment of Horse, with which, and Part of the Duke of St. Albans's Regiment of Dragoons and the Royal Regiment of Horse, he pretended to attack some of the Pr. of Orange's advanc'd Guards, as he gave out, by the Kings Order. His Highness had notice of his Design to come over to him, and commanded a Body of his Men to advance and assist him in case the subaltern Officers should make any Resistance. They were within twenty Miles of Exeter, and within two

A. D. 1688. Miles of the Prince's Body, when a Whisper ran among them that they were betray'd. Bishop Burnet says, the Lord Cornbury had not the Presence of Mind, which so critical an Affair required; so they fell in Confusion, and many rode back. One entire Regiment and about a Hundred of the other two came forward with him to Exeter, which much encourag'd the Prince's Friends, and shew'd them they had not been deceiv'd in what was told them of the Inclinations of the King's Army. On the other hand, those who study'd to support the King's Spirit by Flatteries, assur'd him, he might even at this time depend entirely upon his Army, since those that intended to carry over those Regiments, were forc'd to manage it with so much Artifice, and durst not discover their Design either to Officers or Soldiers; and as soon as the latter perceiv'd it, the greater Part of them turn'd back. False News, which is poor Food for Men in Distress to feed upon. The Truth and Circumstances of this important Defection, are as follows.

On Sunday three Regiments of Horse, the Duke of Berwick's, late Earl of Orford's, commanded by his Lieutenant-Colonel Sir Francis Compton Brother to the Bishop of London; the Duke of St. Albans's, commanded by his Lieutenant-Colonel Langston; and Sir John Fenwick's, commanded by Sunderland his Lieutenant-Colonel; and the Regiment of Dragoons, commanded by the Lord Cornbury in Person, arriv'd in the Evening at Salisbury, and about three a-Clock on Monday Morning they founded to Horse, and the Dragoons beat a March. Sunderland Lieutenant-Colonel to Fenwick, sent his Major to Sir Francis Compton to know What Orders? Compton reply'd, their three Regiments of Horse were ordered to march farther Westward. Sunderland desiring to see those Orders, Compton said he had them not, but Lord Cornbury had, who commanded that Detachment. Upon this, Sunderland went to be satisfy'd by that Lord, who was not in the way. The three other Regiments march'd, and those that were in the Secret told the rest they were to seize an Out-Post before the Dutch were advanc'd to it. These Regiments rode 18 Miles without stopping, then they halted two Hours, and rode on 20 Miles more without unbridling. At length Major Clifford of Cornbury's Dragoons perceiving they drew near the Dutch, mistrusted the Design, which when he discover'd, he, with three other Officers and about thirty Dragoons, refus'd to go further. The Duke of Berwick arriv'd at Salisbury the same Evening, and understanding his Regiment was gone, follow'd Post, but he could not overtake them. He pick'd up about a hundred Troopers and Dragoons of the three Regiments, which the Court gave out were 400, but the contrary was apparent.

The King was come to Salisbury, in very great need of Assistance both in Mind and Body, King James at his Spirits sunk extremely; so it is always with Salisbury. Guilt in Despair, his Blood was in such Fermentation, that he had frequent Bleeding at the Nose: he sent many Spies to observe the Motions of the Prince, and they all took his Money, but never return'd to him; or if they did return, they brought him only common Reports, which magnify'd the Numbers of the Dutch, as much as he and his Creatures lessen'd them. He had not been long at Salisbury before he heard that London was unquiet, that the Earls of Devonshire, Danby, and the Lord Viscount Lumley were drawing great Bodies together in the North, that York and Newcastle had declar'd for the Prince, notwithstanding the Bluster made by the Duke

A. D. 1688. Duke of Newcastle. That the Lord Delamere had arm'd and mounted his Tenants in Cheshire, making above 200 Horse; and among this, and a great deal more ill News, he had only the Comfort to hear, that the Lord Lovelace passing thro' Cirencester to join the Prince, with about 50 Horse, had been intercepted and taken by Beaufort's Militia after a Skirmish, in which several of the Militia were so stout as to be kill'd, among whom was the Major and his Son. 'Twas talk'd of bringing Lord Lovelace to Salisbury, and trying him immediately by a Council of War; but the Defection from King James came on too fast, and he, and those about him, became more solicitous to save themselves than to destroy others.

The Substance of it was, that he would call a free Parliament, and enter into a Treaty with the Prince. These Peers had been inform'd the King should have said, He would take it highly ill of any Man that offer'd such a thing to him. But instead of so high a Tone, the Answer was, My Lords, what you ask of me I most passionately desire, and I promise you on the Faith of a King that I will have a Parliament, and such a one as you ask for, as soon as ever the Prince of Orange has quitted this Realm; for how is it possible a Parliament should be free in all its Circumstances, while an Enemy is in the Kingdom, and can make a Return of near 100 Voices? One would think it impossible for a Man who had liv'd near threescore Years in the World, and been conversant with Courts and Councils, to discover so much Weakness; he promises on the Faith of a King, who had in the most notorious manner broken it; he calls the Prince an Enemy, when all the Nation took him to be their best Friend; he says it is not possible to have a free Parliament while he's in the Kingdom, and every Soul in it believ'd there never would be a free Parliament, if he once left it.

Several Lords, as the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Oxford, the Marquis of Hallifax, the Earl of Nottingham, and the Lord Carbery, refus'd to sign the Lords Petition, because it was not strong enough; and they insisted upon it, that the English Peers who were with the Prince of Orange might have Writs of Summons to Parliament, and that it should be mention'd.

The King's Journey to Salisbury was hasten'd by the Advice of the Count de Roye, whose Officioufness in this Business gave great occasion of Scandal to the French Protestants. Before the King went, he nominated Dr. Lamplugh, late Bishop of Exeter, for the Archbishoprick of Tork, and Sir Jonathan Trelawny, Bishop of Bristol, for the See of Exeter. He made the more haste, upon hearing that the City of London, the Counties of Tork, Kent, and other Shires, were preparing Petitions to the same Purport with that of the Peers. The Duke of Grafton, who had sign'd that Petition, told the King he did it, because he thought it was for the Interest of his Country, but that he would accompany him, and fight to the last Drop of his Blood for his Service; adding, If Your Majesty brings in any French, I'll be d—n'd if any one will serve you. The King reply'd, Nobody can speak plainer. There was then a Report that the Sieur Gaberet, Commander of a Squadron of French Ships, was taking in Troops at Bologna or Calais, to be transported to England, which Report, tho' false, set the Nation still more against the Court. As the King depended much upon the Milan Almanack, the London Mob built much on the Falling of the Scepter out of the Hand of Popish Queen Mary's Statue on the Royal-Exchange, as portending the Downfall of Popery. They had been alarm'd with a Talk of Cauldrons, Gridirons, Knives and Spits being found in the Popish Seminary at St. John's, which was assaulted by them, as was that in Bucklersbury, where they gutted the Romish Chappel; and a Priest sneaking off with one of the Silver Candlesticks, had his Hand, Candlestick and all, cut off, by a Goldsmith's Apprentice whom I knew. The Mafs-House at Lime-street was reliev'd by the Trained Bands, or it had been utterly demolish'd, both Priests and People that frequented it, having been more insolent than those in Bucklersbury. The Mob's Justice here, and at the Mafs-House in Wild-street, was remarkable; for having decreed the Furniture and Implements to the Fire, there was nothing of it plunder'd, and when some Rascals endeavour'd to purloin some part, they were immediately taken hold of, and us'd in a worse manner than the Law uses Pilferers. Before the King left London, or while he was yet almost in the Hearing of it, there was a Hue and Cry after Father Petre, who shelter'd himself in the Train of the Lord Waldegrave, who was sent Ambassador to France, the only Place where an Ambassador from King James now signify'd any thing.

The King had sent for the chief Officers of the Army, upon hearing of the Defection of the Lords Cornbury and Colchester. The Duke of Grafton, the Lord Churchill, Col. Trelawny and Col. Kirk attending him, he told them he was resolv'd to call a free Parliament to redress Grievances, and do what was desir'd of him; with which, if they were not satisfy'd, he would grant them Passes to go to the Prince of Orange, and spare them the Shame of deserting their lawful Sovereign. He can't help it; the grand Air must always be kept up, and whatever unlawful things he did, must still be the lawful!

The King arriving at Salisbury on the 19th of November, was complemented by such Officers of the Army as were most devoted to him, who all express'd their Abhorrence of the Lord Cornbury's Desertion; but the next day most of the chief Officers, and even some of the last mention'd, who disapprov'd of the Lord Cornbury's Defection, apply'd to the Earl of Feversham, desiring him to assure the King, They would spill the last Drop of their Blood in his Service, but could not in Conscience fight against a Prince, who was come over with no other Design than to procure the calling of a free Parliament for the Prince of Security of their Religion and Liberties.

The King intended to go that day to Warminster, to view four or five Battalions which lay thereabouts, under the Command of Col. Kirk, but he was hinder'd by the bleeding of his Nose, for which he was twice let blood. A Party of the Brigade in and about Warminster, being inform'd that there was a Party of Scots detach'd from the Prince's Army, advanc'd as far as Bruton, they march'd thither, and hearing the Scots were at Wincaunton in Somersetshire, four Miles off, they resolv'd to surprize them, their Commander

Scots lining the Hedges, receiv'd them so warmly, that they thought fit to retire, the Miller and others crying out, the Dutch, the Dutch. Cornet Webb was mortally wounded. The next day the Lord Churchill, who commanded a Brigade of 5000 Men, went over to his Highness, with the Duke of Grafton, Col. Berkeley, four or five Captains, and as many as were willing to follow him, leaving a Letter behind, containing great Expressions of Duty and Gratitude, but nothing ought to come in competition with his Conscience; he join'd the Prince at Axminster. The next day, November the 29th, on a false Alarm of the Duke of Schomberg's advancing with the Dutch Army, whose Fort was indeed within four Miles of Salisbury, to give the King Battle, he left that City with great Precipitation, and at Andover was himself left by Prince George of Denmark, the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Drumlanerig, Sir George Hewett, and others. The Prince wrote him a Letter, representing that his Religion, and the Concern he had for the Liberties of Europe, now in danger from the French King, oblig'd him to use his Endeavours for the Preservation of both. When the News came to London, the Princess was so struck with the Apprehension of the King's Displeasure, that she said to the Lady Churchill she could not bear the Thoughts of it, and would leap out at Window rather than venture it. The Bishop of London then lodg'd very secretly in Suffolk-street, Lady Churchill knew of it, and went to him immediately; they concerted the Method of the Princess's withdrawing from Court. Her Highness went sooner to bed than ordinary; about Midnight she went down a back Stairs from her Closet, attended only by the Lady Churchill and Lady Berkeley, in such haste, that they carry'd nothing with them. They were waited for by my Lord of London, who carry'd them to the Earl of Dorset's, whose Lady furnish'd them with every thing, and so they went Northward as far as Northampton, where that Earl, attended with a Body of Horse to serve as a Guard to the Princess, and in a little while a small Army was form'd about her, who chose to be commanded by the Bishop of London, and Bishop Burnet says, he too easily accepted it. These things put the King in an inexpressible Confusion, he saw himself now forsaken, not only by those whom he had trusted and favour'd most, but even by his own Children; and the Army was in such Distraction, that there was not any one Body that seem'd entirely united and firm to him. Bishop Burnet takes notice that a foolish Ballad was made at that time, treating the Papists, and chiefly the Irish, in a very ridiculous manner. It was sung in the Play-house by the Officers of the Army between the Acts; some Irish Officers resenting it, Col. Harry Wharton, and 40 or 50 English Officers, who were there by Concert, rose from their Seats to vindicate their Ballad, and the Irish Burthen of Lero Lero Liliburlo-ro, which made an Impression on the Army that cannot well be imagin'd by those who saw it not. At last all People both in City and Country got it, and were perpetually singing it, and perhaps never had so slight a thing so great an Effect.

The Prince of Orange having staid twelve Days at Exeter, left the Government of that City with Mr. Seymour the Recorder, and a small Garrison, to take Charge of his heavy Artillery, under Col. Gibson, whom he made Deputy Governor as to the military Part.

At Crewkern in Somersetshire, Dr. Finch, Son to the Earl of Winchelsea, Warden of All Souls College in Oxford, was sent to the Prince from some of the Heads of Colleges, to assure him they would declare for him, and to invite him to come thither, telling him that their Plate should be at his Service, if he needed it. Bishop Burnet observes, This was a sudden Turn from those Principles that they had carried so far the high a few Years before.

The Earl of Shrewsbury and Sir John Guise enter'd Bristol without Opposition; the latter sent to the Keeper of the Castle at Glover, to discharge the Lord Lovelace and his Followers, which was done immediately. The Earl of Bath prevail'd with the Garrison of Plymouth to declare for the Prince of Orange, and most of the Dutch Men of War harbour'd there for some time. One of the King's Ships commanded by Captain Churchill, afterwards Admiral, came in to them, the Captain having read the Prince's Declaration on board it. At Shireburn the Gentlemen of Dorsetshire came in a Body to the Prince, who hasten'd his March towards London, where things were in a high Fermentation.

The Northern Lords before-mention'd, with a great Concurrence of Nobility and Gentry, met at Nottingham, and declar'd for the Prince; and in their Declaration explain'd what Rebellion is, and what a just Resistance. We hope all good Protestants will with their Lives and Fortunes be assistant to us, and not be bugbear'd with the opprobrious Term of Rebels, by which the Court would fright them, to become perfect Slaves to their tyrannical Insolences and Usurpations; for we assure ourselves that no rational and unbiass'd Persons will judge it Rebellion to defend their Laws and Religion, which all English Princes have sworn at their Coronations; which Oath, how well it has been observ'd of late, we desire a Free Parliament may have the Consideration of. We indeed own it a Rebellion to Resist a King that governs by Law; but he was always accounted a Tyrant that made his Will his Law, and to Resist such a one, we justly esteem no Rebellion, but a necessary Defence.

At Shireburn his Highness had Advice that the King was retir'd to London, and the broken Remains of his Army to Reading; upon which he immediately proceeded to Salisbury, where he made a publick Entry, accompany'd by the Prince of Denmark, the Dukes of Ormond and Grafton, Mareschal Schomberg, Count Solmes, Count Nassau, Messieurs Zuylestein, Bentink, Overkirk, the Earl of Shrewsbury, the Earl of Macclesfield, the Lord Viscount Mordaunt, the Lord Wiltshire, the Lord Churchill, the Lord Cornbury, the Lord Colchester, with many other Lords and Persons of Quality. His Highness rode in a triumphant manner to the Bishop's Palace, which was prepar'd for his Reception. The Mayor, Aldermen and Corporation of Salisbury attended in their Formalities; the Spectators were innumerable; their Joy and Exultation extatick, and vast Multitudes crowded in from all Parts of the Country to get a sight of him, whom they look'd on as the Hope and Deliverer of the Nation. Happy had it been if they had been as grateful afterwards as they were glad then; and why they were not, the Gentlemen who sent his Highness an Offer of their Plate can best tell.

The North was secur'd with a great deal of Ease for the Prince: York by the Earl of Danby, Lord Dunblain, Lord Fairfax, Lord Willoughby. Newcastle, by the Lord Lumley. Hull by Col. Copley, who made the Lord Langdale, the Papish Governor, the Lord Montgomery, and other Papists, Prisoners. The Earl of Stamford join'd the Lord Delamere, and both of them advanc'd to assist the Earl of Shrewsbury, in his

A. D. 1688. Design upon Bristol; who, however, wanted not their Assistance. The Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Oxford, and many other Lords came in to the Prince daily. The unhappy Duke of Ormond was then so animated with Revolution, Principles, and was so zealous for the Protestant Religion, and English Liberties, that taking with him a Party of the Prince's Horse, he went to Oxford, and caus'd his Highness's Declaration to be publicly read there. The Town of Berwick follow'd the Example of York, and declared for the Prince: and tho' the Duke of Gordon was sent from London to secure Edinburgh Castle for the King, yet the Scotch Lords sent the Duke of Queensberry, the Earl of Balcarras, and three other Deputies to London, to demand a free Parliament. Thus in a few Days only, the Defection became almost universal, and as Echard says it ought to be remembred, "That the chief

The Revolution on Ch of England Principles.

"Actors were all Church of England Men, and "proceeded, as Bishop Sprat terms it, upon "Church of England Principles." For, as the Earl of Danby writes, in a Tract, intitled, Thoughts of a private Person, It is neither against Scripture, nor Moral Honesty, to defend their just and legal Rights, against the illegal and unjust Invaders of them.

We have mention'd the Retreat of the Princess of Denmark, which when the King heard of, he burst into Tears, and cry'd, God help me, my own Children have forsaken me: But he consider'd not, that he himself had forsaken God, his Country, and even his own Children, in forsaking the Church of England, in introducing Arbitrary Power, and in setting up an Impostor, to prevent the Succession of his Daughters.

Her Royal Highness the Princess Anne left a Letter for the Queen, wherein she complain'd of her Father's being misled by the violent Counsels of Priests, and tells her, she's fully persuaded the Prince of Orange designs the King's Safety and Preservation. The Bishop of London convoy'd the Princess to Nottingham, where the Earl of Devonshire gave her a Guard of 200 Horse, by whom she was safely conducted to Oxford, and was there joyfully receiv'd by her Husband, who met her with a strong Detachment of the Prince of Orange's Forces.

In the mean time, the Lord Molineux made a fruitless Attempt to raise the Papists in Lancashire; and Sir Edward Hales, a Papist, Governor of the Tower, pointed two Mortar-Pieces on the Tower Battlements, as if he intended to bombard the City, which being rumoured, several skilful Engineers and Sea Officers, were consulted by the Prince's Friends, how to seize the Tower in case such an Attempt was made. It is said, that the Project was laid to enter it at the Wharf, which would have been made easy by Communication with some Officers and Soldiers of the Garrison. The City complaining of Hales's mounting his Mortar-Pieces to terrify them, that worthless Piece of Chivalry was turn'd out, and a Man of not much greater Worth put in his Place.

Third Declaration a bold one.

Before the Prince of Orange left Salisbury, a bold Man, probably Mr. Samuel Johnson, publish'd a third Declaration in the Prince's Name: It was penn'd with great Spirit, and had as great an Effect. One Hugh Speke, whose Character is spared out of Respect to a very worthy Name and Family, pretended to be the Author or Contriver of it; but Echard thinks 'twas a vain Pretence, only to assume the Merit of a Thing, after the Prince succeeded, for which he wou'd have been hang'd, had his Highness been unsuccessful; and indeed he could no more write it, than he could have written Mr. Locke's Essay on Human Understanding. It set forth the desperate Designs of the Papists, and the extreme Danger the Nation was in, by their means; and requir'd all Persons immediately to fall on such Papists, as were in any Employments, and to turn them out; to secure all strong Places, and do every thing that was in their power, to execute the Laws, and to bring all Things again in their proper Channels. This set all Men at work, for no doubt was made that it was truly the Prince's Declaration, tho' he knew nothing of it; and it was never certainly known who was the Author. The King was under such Consternation, that he neither knew what to resolve on, nor whom to trust. As no King in Pity is due to the Pitiless, instead of sympathy, zing in his extreme Misery, I presently call to mind the bleeding Essex in the Tower; the murder'd Russell in Lincoln's Inn-Fields; the quarter'd Cornish in Cheapside; the scourg'd and mangled Mr. Johnson, all the way from Newgate to Tyburn; the infamous Chancellor and Judges; the Bishops in Prison; the Franchises of Corporations forcibly taken away from them; the Herds of Frock'd Priests in City and Country, and I can without relenting see him mourn over his Misfortunes.

The pretended Declaration put the City in a Flame. It was carried to the Lord Mayor, Sir John Chapman, by Captain Henry Baker, and he required him to execute it. The Papists were seized with inexpressible Terror, and it is wonderful that the People had not every where fallen upon the Popish Party. The Protestants were so encouraged, that a Bill of Indictment was preferred to the Grand Jury of Middlesex, against the Earl of Salisbury, nor one of the wise Cecils, for turning Papist, contrary to the Laws of the Land. The King return'd to Whitehall, November 26, and two Days after, order'd the Lord Chancellor to issue out Writs, for summoning a Parliament to meet at Westminster the 15th of January next, in which he was no more sincere, than in that he pretended to call two Months before, being all the while consulting with his Queen and Creatures, how to amuse the Prince of Orange and the Nation, till he could send away his Wife, her pretended Son, and then follow them himself, out of the Kingdom 'Twas rumour'd, that the Lord Dartmouth refus'd to transport the Queen and the Impostor from Portsmouth to France; so the Marquis of Powis, who carried him thither, return'd with him to London.

He had consulted the Lords, who were then in Town, on the present wretched State of his Affairs, and they all advis'd him, not only to call a Parliament, but to send Commissioners to the Prince, to treat with him, which was much against his Inclinations; yet he was in such Dejection that he consented to it. The Earl of Clarendon propos'd it, as also a general Pardon, and to turn all Papists immediately out of Employments. To the latter, the King said he would leave it to the ensuing Parliament, but agreed to every thing else. The Lords in Nomination to be Commissioners for the Treaty, were the Marquis of Halifax, the Earl of Rochester, the Lord Godolphin: the Bishops of Winchester, and Ely; but after a long Consultation their Number was fix'd to these three, the Marquis of Halifax the Earl of Nottingham, and the Lord Godolphin. The Earl of Rochester was left out, on account of the irreconcilable Enmity between his Family and the Marquis of Halifax; whose greater Genius gave him greater Credit with the Prince of Orange. That Enmity is suppos'd to quicken the Earl of Clarendon's joining his Highness, in hopes of perplexing the Negotiation, or lessening the Marquis of Halifax's Reputation in it. On this Resolution a Trumpeter was dispatched patch'd by the Earl of Feverſham, to demand the neceſſary Paſſes of the Prince of Orange, whom he found at Edington, between Bath and Salisbury, in his way to Oxford. This Trumpeter ſet out the laſt of November, the ſame day with the Date of the Proclamation for calling a Parliament, and having obtain'd thoſe Paſſes, the Prince ſent a Trumpeter to demand a Paſs for a Gentleman to wait on the Princeſs of Denmark. The Dutch Ambaſſador alſo demanded a Paſs to go to the Prince of Orange, and the King granted it ſo readily, 'twas thought he expected ſome Good from that Miniſter's Mediation; for he was now in the moſt terrible Deſpondency. Whatever he had ſaid of the Prince's deſigning a Conqueſt, and to take his Crown from him, he did not himſelf, at that time believe it, and indeed there does not ſeem to be any ſuch Deſign in the Prince, and thoſe that invited him. If he had in earneſt ſet about redreſſing of Grievances, in conjunction with good Counſellors, and a free Parliament; if he had ſecur'd the Succeſſion of his Daughters, and the Maintenance of the Church and the Laws, to the Satisfaction of his People, no doubt he might have reign'd to his Death; but his implacable Hatred to our Religion and Liberty, his obſtinate perſiſting in it, when he was at the laſt Extremity, had ſo ſet the Hearts of all the Nation againſt him, that he was in mortal Fear of their Reſentment; and his Flatterers being as fearful as himſelf, it is probable that they had all come to a Reſolution to leave the King, if the Commiſſioners did not ſucceed in their Treaty; and they could have no Succeſs if they did not ward off a free Parliament, for which only the Prince of Orange came to England. At this time the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Lieutenant of that County, rais'd the Militia, and aſſembling the Citizens of Norwich, declar'd to them his Reſolution to aſſiſt his Highneſs in obtaining the Ends of his Declaration. The Town of Lynn put themſelves under his Grace's Protection, and declar'd the ſame.

Barillon, the French Ambaſſador, was now the King's moſt Chief and Secret Counſellor. He was very buſy, both with him, and with the principal Lords who wiſh'd well to the Prince. He repreſented to theſe that the Engliſh would do well to act with Moderation; that the Emperor was a great Bigot to his Religion, and would not fail of defending it in England.

The Pope's Nuntio was very deſirous to be gone, and ſaid Father Petre would answer to God Almighty for all the Miſchief he had been the Cauſe of. The Queen was all the while packing up her Jewels, and preparing to get off.

The three Commiſſioners began their Journey December the 2d, and came next day to Reading, where they met the Trumpet with the Paſſes deſired from the Prince. Three Days after they acquainted the King, that they were to meet the Prince that Night at Amesbury; but they inform'd him next day, that his Highneſs had made a new Appointment to meet at Hungerford. They came thither, and having delivered their Meſſage, the Prince call'd all the Peers, and others of chief Note about him, to adviſe with them what Answer ſhould be made. A Day was taken to conſider of it: The Marquis of Hallifax ſent for Dr. Burnet; but the Prince ſaid, Tho' I will ſuſpect nothing from ſuch a meeting, others may, upon which it was put off, and the Doctor ſaw him only in publick; yet the Marquis took occaſion to ask him, ſo as no body obſerv'd it, Have you a mind to have the King in your hands? The Doctor reply'd, By no means, for we will not hurt his Perſon. Lord Hallifax ſaid, What if he has a mind to go away? Dr. Burnet's Answer was, Nothing is ſo much to be wiſh'd for. The Doctor told this to the Prince, and he lik'd it. His Highneſs order'd the Earls of Oxford, Shrewsbury and Clarendon, to treat with the Lords the King had ſent, and they deliver'd the Prince's Answer to them on Sunday the 8th of December. He defired a Parliament might be preſently called, that no Men ſhould continue in any Employment who were not qualified by Law, and had not taken the Teſts; that the Tower of London might be put into the Keeping of the City; and all the ſtrong Places of the Kingdom might be put into the hands of the Proteſtants; that a Proportion of the Revenue might be ſet off for the Pay of the Prince's Army; and that during the Sitting of the Parliament, the Armies might not come within 20 Miles of London; but that the Prince might come on to London, and have the ſame Number of his Guards about him, that the King kept about his Perſon. The Lords Commiſſioners for the King ſeem'd very well ſatisfy'd with this Answer; and when the King read it, he ſaid, It was as fair as he could have expected; but he had then fix'd the very Hour for his going off. In the mean time there happen'd a Skirmiſh at Reading, between a Party of the King's Iriſh Men, and a ſmaller Party of the Prince's, who drove the other out of the Town, by the help, as 'twas ſaid, of the Townſmen, who fir'd out of Window at the Iriſh Men, of whom another Party was poſted at Maidenhead Bridge; but ſome of the Inhabitants bearing a Dutch March in the Night, the Iriſh abandon'd their Poſts, leaving their Cannon behind them. The Priests, to frighten away the Queen, told her ſhe would certainly be impeach'd; upon which ſhe reſolv'd to fly for it immediately, and carry the Child with her. The Midwife, and all thoſe that aſſiſted at the Birth, were alſo carry'd over to France, or ſo diſpos'd of, that it could never be learn'd what became of them afterwards. The King promis'd to ſtay only a day or two after her, in hopes that the Shadow of Authority might keep Things ſo quiet, that ſhe might have an undiſturb'd Paſſage. The Queen and her Company croſt over to Lambeth in a ſtormy Night, December the 10th, went on board a Yatch at Greenwich, and had a very quick Paſſage to Calais. I think Biſhop Burnet errs in ſaying ſhe embark'd at Portsmouth. The King having read the Prince's Answer, ſent for the Lord Chancellor to come to him next Morning, but he ſecretly order'd the Great Seal to be brought him, and the Parliament Writs to be burnt, and about Three next Morning, Decemb. 11. he went away in Diſguiſe, with truſty Sir Edward Hales, one Skeldon a Papiſt, and Labadie the Dry-Nurſe's Husband: he paſſ'd for Hales's Man. As they croſt the River they flung the Great Seal into it, which was ſome Months after taken up by a Fiſherman, near Vaux-Hall, and went down to a miſerable Fiſher-Boat, which Hales had provided for them.

With this, ſays Biſhop Burnet, his Reign ended, for this was a plain Deſerting his People, and the expoſing the Nation to the Pillage of an Army, which he had order'd the Earl of Feverſham to diſband; and the doing this, without paying them, was the letting ſo many arm'd Men looſe upon the People, and they might have done much Miſchief, if the Execution of thoſe Orders that he left behind had not been ſtopp'd.

The Night before the King went away, a whole Battalion of Douglas's, an old Scots Regiment, went off to the Prince. That Morning the King ſent the Letter he left for the Earl of Feverſham, about diſbanding the Army, to the Counteſs de Roye, the Earl's Siſter, to be convey'd

The Marquis of Miremont, who had lately repented of what he had done, got his Regiment together, five Hours after the King went, and told his Officers, he thought it best to declare for the Prince of Orange; they all joining with him, he commanded all the Papish Troopers to alight, and quit their Arms and Cloaks, which 15 of them did. The Duke of Northumberland, Captain of a Troop of Guards, declared also for his Highness, as did his whole Troop.

The Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, meeting at Guildhall, the Peers agreed upon a solemn Declaration, to assist his Highness, in obtaining a free Parliament, to secure the Church of England, the Laws and Liberties of the Nation, and a due Liberty of Conscience to Protestant Dissenters. They promis'd to take care of the City, to disarm all Papists, and apprehend Romish Priests and Jesuits. It was sign'd by,

And sent to the Prince by the Earl of Pembroke, Lord Viscount Weymouth, and Bishop of Ely.

Bishops and Lords for Resistance. The Lords at the same time sent for Col. Skelton, Governor of the Tower, who was posted there by the King's Commission, and demanded the Keys of him; than which I defy all Historians to shew me a greater Act of Disloyalty, according to High Church Interpreters. Having turn'd him out, they made the Lord Lucas Governor, and if this is not Resistance with a vengeance, there can be no Instance given of it. Among these Resisters, were four Nonjuring Bishops, and ten Lords, whose Names may be found among the Abhorers.

The Lieutenant of London sent an Address of Thanks to his Highness, by Sir Robert Clayton, Sir Basil Firebrace, Sir William Russel, and Charles Duncomb Esq;

The Earl of Feverſham, Sir John Lanier, Sir John Fenwick, and Col. Oglethorpe, General Officers of the King's Army, sent a Letter to the Prince, notifying, that by the King's Command, they had disbanded the Troops that were with them; which the Prince, not at all approving of, he return'd them no Answer. Several Regiments and Troops had deserted to the Prince before the disbanding Order came, among which was even Sir John Lanier's Regiment, and he follow'd it himself, notwithstanding he sign'd the above-mention'd Letter. Most of the Lords at London look'd upon the Earl of Feverſham's Conduct as rash and dangerous. The letting so many Soldiers loose, threw the whole Kingdom into a Panick, the most general and astonishing that was ever heard of. It began at Westminster, December 11. about eleven a-clock: Some Country Fellows reporting, that the Irish, in a desperate Rage, were advancing to London. It went from Street to Street thro' the City, Southwark, and thence thro' all the Cities, Towns and Pa-ishes in England; at one City, they were said to be burning and massacring in the next, and so in every Town and Parish. The Train'd Bands were every where rais'd; People every where ran to Arms; Lights were every where hung out; The Irish are coming! The Irish are coming! was in every one's mouth. This Fright and Alarm was suppos'd to be a Stratagem of the Duke of Schomberg's: But I do not see what End it could answer, unless it was to discover the Bent of the Nation at this Juncture; for it could not be to put them in Arms against the disbanded Irish, because 'twas universal in one Night, and must have been concerted long before there was any Thought of their being disbanded in that manner. His Highness publish'd a Declaration, requiring the Commanders of those Soldiers to re-assemble them, and keep them in good Order and Discipline till further Orders. He wrote to the Earl of Danby to come to him, and sent the Lord Churchil to London, to gather his Troop of Guards together; and the Duke of Grafton to Tilbury Fort, to garrison it, with his Regiment of Foot: With which, as he was marching at their Head thro' the Strand, a Trooper of the Irish Regiment of Salisbury presented his Carbine against him to shoot him, which a Soldier of his first File observing, shot the Trooper dead on the Spot. The Duke alighted, and gave the Soldier all the Pilgrage of the Trooper. The next day the Peers and Privy Counsellors issued an Order for all Irish Officers and Soldiers to repair to their respective Bodies, and deliver up their Arms to the Officers of the Ordnance. It was sign'd December the 14th, 1688.

As soon as it was known in London, that the King was gone, the Prentices and the Rabble, who had been a little quieted when they saw a Treaty on foot between the King and the Prince, now broke out again upon all suspected Houses, where they believ'd there were either Priests or Papists. They spar'd not the Houses of Ambassadors, particularly those of the Spanish and Florentine Ambassadors. The Spanish Ambassador, Don Pedro de Ronquillo, had forwarded the Revolution more than any other Foreigner. The Populace knew not that, but they knew he was a Papist, and therefore rifled his House, where many Catholics had deposited their best Effects, for which the next Parliament made him ample Satisfaction. No body was killed in this Uproar, no Houses were burnt, no Robberies were committed; never was so much Fury seen under so much Management.

Jefferies finding the King was gone, saw what reason he had to look to himself, and apprehending he was now expos'd to the Rage of the People, whom he had provok'd with so particular a Brutality, he disguis'd himself in a Seaman's Habit, and was in a Seaman's House in Wapping in order to escape to Hamburg; but was discover'd as he was looking out of a Window, by a Chancery Clerk, who accidentally pass'd that way. Upon which he was seized immediately, and was insulted by the Populace, with as much scorn and rudeness as they could invent. After he had been tost about many Hours, they carried him before the Lord Mayor, Sir John Chapman, in his Seaman's Habit: The Lord Mayor was so struck with the Terror of such a boisterous Multitude, and the Disgrace of a Man, who had made all

Jefferies runs away, and is taken.

A. D. 1688. People tremble before him, that he fell into Fits upon it, and was never well afterwards. The Populace held Whips and Halters up to Jefferies's Nose, as near as they could come at it, and growing warmer by Communication, would doubtless have torn the wicked Wretch in a thousand pieces, had not the Train'd Bands been rais'd, and no less than two Regiments appointed to guard him to the Tower. When he was in the Coach, they continued pressing on the Militia, who kept them off with their Pikes, as they would Horle, to come at him. He held up his Hands, sometimes on one side of the Coach, sometimes on the other, crying, For the Lord sake keep them off! For the Lord sake keep them off! I saw him, and heard him, and I truly say, without Pity; tho' I never saw any other Malefactor in his Distress, without Compassion and Concern. The Lords at Whitehall sent the Lord Lucas a Warrant for his Commitment. He promis'd to confess something that would merit Pardon; but he chose rather to save himself from a publick Death, by large Draughts of Brandy, which soon dispatch'd him. He very much complain'd of Sprat, Bishop of Rockester, who incited him to go those Lengths in the Ecclesiastical Commission, and then publickly charg'd it upon him. Sprat wrote the Romance of the Rye-house Plot, and Jefferies hang'd the pretended Plotters.

His ill End.

In the mean while the Prince of Orange came to Littlecot, a Seat of the Pophams in Wiltshire, from thence to Hungerford and Abington, designing to visit the University of Oxford, and meet the Princess Anne there; but being surpriz'd with the King's Desertion, and the Disorders which the City and Neighbourhood of London were falling into, he could hardly believe it, till he received an Express from the Lords Halifax, Nottingham and Godolphin, upon which he saw how necessary it was for him to make all possible haste to London. So he sent to Oxford to excuse his not coming thither, and to offer the Association to them; Which, says Bishop Burnet, was sign'd by almost all the Heads, and the Chief Men of the University; even by those, who being disappointed in the Preferments they aspir'd to, became afterwards his most implacable Enemies. For none but Idiots can be impos'd upon so far as to believe, that those very Men, who offer'd the Prince of Orange their Plate to enable him to resist K. James, did afterwards, from Conviction, when the Danger was over, return again to their Vomit, and again preach up the Doctrines of their detestable Decree.

Why the Pr. went not to Oxford.

Their Gratitude to him.

The King being come to the Coast of Kent, embark'd aboard a Smack, commanded by Capt. Sanders, who was to carry him to a Frigate, commanded by Capt. Mackdonald, an Irish Papist, who, by concert, waited for him at Margate. When they were aboard, Hales sent his Footman to the Post-Office at Feverham: A Gunner belonging to Dover Castle, whom Hales had formerly cashier'd, knowing the Footman by his Livery, and hating his Master, dogg'd him to the River-side, and saw him make Signs to some on board the Smack; upon which he got a Rabble together, carry'd them to the Water-side, boarded the Vessel immediately, and soon discover'd Sir Edward Hales. As for the King, who was in a plain Suit, and a Bob-Wig, they took him to be a Popish Priest, and suppos'd him to be Hales's Chaplain; for which Reason they put many gross Indignities upon him, and searching his Pockets found 400 Guineas, several valuable Seals, and other Jewels; but several People, continuing to crowd aboard the Smack, among the rest was a Constable, who knowing the King, kneel'd down, and begg'd Pardon for the Rudeness of the

K. James taken.

People, which he was afterwards so far from complying with, that out of the Abundance of his Humanity, he excepted three of the poor Fishermen Hunt, Edwards and Stapleton, out of his Declaration of Indemnity, together with the Duke of Ormond, Duke of Bolton, Duke of Leeds, Earl of Nottingham, Earl of Clarendon, Earl of Marlborough, Bishop of London, Sir Stephen Fox, and Alderman Duncomb. The Constable bid the Fishermen return what they had taken from him; he only took the Jewels, and said, I hope you will use me well. Notwithstanding the Respect that was paid him, he earnestly endeavour'd to be gone; but they forc'd him to go to Feverham, from whence he sent for the Earl of Winchelsea, whom he made Lord Lieutenant of Kent, and was prevail'd with by him, to return to London. The Management at London, was very odd, on this Occasion. The Peers had sent a Deputation to compliment the Prince on his approaching near London, and now they heard of the King's being at Feverham, they sent another Deputation to compliment him without consulting the Prince, or communicating their Intention to him. The Earl of Middleton, the Earl of Ailesbury, the Earl of Tarmouth and the Earl of Feverham, were order'd to wait on the King, and invite him to Whitehall; and after they had resolv'd so to do, they let the Prince know that the King was in England still.

A. D. 1688.

Bad Management the Occasion of all future Troubles.

Bishop Burnet has some judicious Remarks on the King's being brought back to Feverham. "Here was an Accident that seem'd of no great Consequence, yet all the strugglings of the Jacobite Party since did rise out of it. For, if he had got clear away, by all that could be judg'd he would not have had a Party left; all would have agreed, that here was a Desertion, and that therefore the Nation was free, and at liberty to secure itself; but what follow'd upon this, gave them a Colour to say, he was forced away. Till now scarce any one was for him but Papists, but from this Incident a Party grew up, that has been long active for his Interests. Two Gentlemen came from Kent, to the Prince at Windsor, to inform him of what had happen'd at Feverham; upon which his Highness order'd Monsieur Zuyestein to go thither immediately to see the King safe, and at full liberty to go wherever he pleas'd." What the Bishop, and others say, of the King's being received, at his return to London, with joyful Acclamations, is exaggerated. I remember it well, that there was some shouting, by Boys chiefly, and that some of the Guards bid them hollow. At his coming to Whitehall he had a great Court again about him, even the Papists crept out of their lurking Holes, and appear'd there with much Assurance. One of their Priests sent to the Earl of Mulgrave, Lord Chamberlain, to new-furnish his Lodgings, for he intended to continue in them. The King himself began to take heart, and both at Feverham and Whitehall talk'd in his ordinary high Strain, justifying all he had done. Only he spoke a little doubtfully of the Business of Magdalen College: But when he came to reflect on the State of his Affairs, and on a Free Parliament, which it was impossible for him to prevent, he found there was no way left for him, to make good his Allegations; so he sent the Earl of Feverham to Windsor without a Pass, and order'd him to desire the Prince to come to St. James's, to consult with him of the best Way for the settling of the Nation.

Rise of the Jacobites.

King returns to London.

The Prince of Orange did not think the Privy-Council at London had us'd him well in sending for the King without consulting him, after they had sent to him to take the Government upon

A. D. 1688. upon him. He call'd his Friends about him at Windsor, and ask'd their Advice. All agreed that it was not convenient that the King should stay at Whitehall; neither the King, nor the Prince, nor the City could have been safe, if they had been both near one another. The Guards and the officious Flatterers of the two Courts would have been unquiet Neighbours. It was thought necessary to stick to the Point of the King's Deserting his People, and not to give up that by entering upon any Treaty with him; and since the Earl of Feverham, who commanded the Army against the Prince, was come without a Pass, he was for some days put in Arrest. The Result of these Consultations was, that the Marquiss of Hallifax, the Earl of Shrewsbury, and Lord Delamere, should go to London, and order the English Guards that were about the Court to be drawn off; when that was done, Count Solms, with the Dutch Guards, was to come and take all the Posts about Whitehall and St. James's. It was Midnight before all was settled. The English Guards having receiv'd no Orders from their General, the Lord Craven, to quit their Posts, stood to them in a Posture of Defence, and the Dutch Guards advanc'd in a fighting Posture; but the former understanding that matters were so concerted, retir'd, and the Dutch Guards posted themselves in their Places. Then the three Lords sent to the Earl of Middleton to desire him to let the King know they had a Message to deliver to him from the Prince. He went to the King, and sent them word from him, that they might come with it immediately. They came and found him a-bed. They told him the Necessity of Affairs required that the Prince should come presently to London, and he thought it would conduce to the Safety of the King's Person, and the Quiet of the Town, if he retir'd to some House at a little distance, particularly Ham-House near Richmond. The King seem'd much cast down, and said, Must it be done immediately? they told him, he might take his Rest first: and they added, he should be attended by a Guard, who should not only guard his Person, but give him no sort of Disturbance. Having said this, they withdrew. The Earl of Middleton came quickly after them, and ask'd, if it would not do as well if the King went to Rocheſter? for since the Prince was not pleas'd with his coming up from Kent, it might be perhaps acceptable to him, if he should go thither again. It was very visible this was propos'd in order to a second Escape, and very probable that the Prince would not dislike it. The three Lords promised to send word immediately to his Highness, who lay that Night at Sion, eight Miles from London. He very readily consented to it, and the King went next day, December 18, to Rocheſter, having order'd all that which is call'd the Moving Wardrobe to be sent before him; Count Solms ordering every thing to be done as the King desired, who was attended by the Earls of Ailesbury, Litchfield, Arran, and Dumbarion, six of his own Yeomen of the Guard, and about a hundred of the Prince's Forces, who left him at full Liberty, and paid him rather more Respect than his own Guards had done lately. Most of them, as it happen'd, were Papists, so when he went to Mass, they assisted at it very reverently; and when they were ask'd how they could serve in an Expedition that was intended to destroy their own Religion, one of them answer'd, My Soul is God's, but my Sword is the Prince of Orange's. The King was so much delighted with this Answer, that he repeated it to all that came about him.

In the short time the King staid in London, which was but two Days from his first to his second Desertion, as it proved to be, and as he intended, he had time to summon his Privy-Council the 16th of December, and pass an Order for suppressing all riotous and tumultuous Meetings. The Design was to hinder the demolishment of Mass-houses. This was his last Act of Government, if it deserves the Name, for no body minded it. The Privy-Counsellors were,

Not a Papist amongst them; except Lord Middleton was one.

The Populace did not only burn the Mass-houses, but also the King's Printing-house, the Printer Henry Hills, having turn'd Papist. The French Ambassador was busy Night and Day packing up and moving off his Goods. The Privy-Council sent Guards to secure the House of Mr. Sarotti the Resident of Venice, who had always oppos'd King James's rash and irregular Proceedings.

The same Day the King went to Rocheſter, the Prince came to London: all the way from thence to Sion, was crowded with Spectators, who welcom'd him with Shouts and Acclamations as loudly and heartily as Men could express themselves; but it being a rainy Day, it spoilt much of the Glory of the Show. Orders were immediately given for disarming and disbanding all Popish Soldiers, and for disarming all Papists. The Nuntio and the Envoy of Savoy who had been plundered, were put under honourable Arrest for the Safety of their Persons, his Highness knowing that neither of their Masters wish'd him ill. The Polish Envoy Nepilke was plunder'd also, but 'tis said he had so little to lose, that the Rabble cudgel'd him.

The Council sent three Interrogatories to Jesuits in the Tower: 1. What he had done with the Great Seal? 2. Where the Parliament Writs were, and how many were issu'd? 3. Whether the King had given him leave to depart the Kingdom? To the first he said, the King sent for the Great Seal ten Days before, and tho' he had the Purse and Mace carry'd about with him, yet he had not since then had the Seal. To the second he answer'd, that he had given the King the Writs that were not sent into the Country, and the Clerks of the Chancery could tell better than he what was become of those that were. To the third he said, the King had given him leave to depart the Kingdom, and he had Passes from the French and Spanish Ambassadors.

When the King at his Return was ask'd for the Great Seal, he said, the Queen took it with her. This is James the Just, the King of his Word!

He was then press'd to issue the Writs for summoning the Parliament, but he would determine nothing, only he sign'd Orders to the Treasury for Payment of a round Sum of Money; but the Officers would not pay it, without the Prince of Orange's Consent. There was then 50,000*l.* in the Exchequer, which was of singular Use to his Highness; we are told the King wanted Money so much for his Pocket, that he borrow'd 100 Guineas of Lord Godolphin.

The Lords of the Household, and all other Officers who bore the Badges of their Offices, laid them down upon his Highness's coming to St. James's, who the next day visited Queen Katherine, going by water from Whitehall to Somerſet-

Lord Feverham arrested.

Three Lords sent to desire the King to go to Ham.

King goes to Rocheſter.

A. D. 1688.

The Prince of Orange comes to St. James's.

A. D. Somerset-House; where the Queen Dowager taking notice in Raillery of the Detention of her Chamberlain, the Prince immediately assur'd her Majesty, she should no longer want his Service.

The same day his Highness visited also the Princess of Denmark, who then arriv'd from Oxford, having been in all her Journeys attended by the Bishop of London in a Purple Velvet Coat, Pistols in his Holsters, and a naked Sword in his hand, at the head of her Guards.

On the 20th of December the Aldermen, the Lord Mayor being sick, the Sheriffs and Common-Council of London, waited on his Highness, to complement him on his Arrival, and the Recorder Sir George Treby made a most excellent Speech to him on that happy Occasion, which is very well worth inserting.

The Recorder Treby's Speech to him.

May it please Your Highness,
THE Lord Mayor being disabled by Sickness, Your Highness is attended by the Aldermen and Commons of the Capital of this Kingdom, deputed to congratulate Your Highness upon this great and glorious Occasion; in which, labouring for Words, we cannot but come short in Expression; reviewing our late Danger, we remember our Church and State over-run by Popery and Arbitrary Power, brought to the Point of Destruction by the Conduct of Men, who were our true Invaders, that broke the sacred Fences of our Laws, and which was worst, the very Constitution of our Legislature, so that there was no Remedy left but the Last. The only Person under Heaven that could apply this Remedy, was Your Highness. You are of a Nation, whose Alliance in all Times has been agreeable and prosperous to us. You are of a Family most illustrious, Benefactors to Mankind; to have the Title of a Sovereign Prince, Stadtholder, and to have worn the Imperial Crown, are amongst their lesser Dignities. They have long enjoy'd a Dignity singular and transcendent, to be the Champions of Almighty God, sent forth in several Ages to vindicate his Cause against the greatest Oppressions. To this Divine Commission our Nobles, our Gentry, and among them our brave English Soldiers, render'd themselves and their Arms upon your appearing.

Great Sir,

When we look back to the last Month, and contemplate the Swiftmess and Fulness of our present Deliverance, astonish'd, we think it miraculous! Your Highness, led by the Hand of Heaven, and call'd by the Voice of the People, has preserv'd our dearest Interests, our Laws, which are our antient Title to our Lives, Liberties and Estates, and without which, this World were a Wilderness. But what Retribution can we make to your Highness? our Thoughts are full charg'd with Gratitude; Your Highness has a lasting Monument in the Hearts, in the Prayers, in the Praises of all good Men amongst us, and late Posterity will celebrate your ever-glorious Name, till Time shall be no more.

If I could prevail with the Reader, I would have him, when he has read this truly sublime Speech, turn to the Earl of Clarendon's long Speeches about the Uniformity Act, Militia Act, Corporation Act, Five-Mile Act, and all the Acts which are the Ornaments of his Ministry; and to Speaker Turner's Speeches on those Subjects. Here he sees what is true Eloquence, what the true Sublime? There he will see quite the contrary.

Addressees to his Highness.

The Bishops waited on the Prince, all in Town, except the Archbishop of Canterbury, who agreed to go with the others, but fail'd them. Such Steps as these are not the Motions of a regular Conscience, but the Instigations of Fear and Caution. Old Serjeant Maynard came with the Men of the Law, he was then Ninety; yet he said the liveliest thing that was heard of on that occasion. The Prince took notice of his great Age, saying, You have out-liv'd all the Men of the Law; he answer'd, I had like to have out-liv'd the Law itself, if your Highness had not come over. The Clergy of London, and a great many other Bodies of Men came with their Compliments: The Ambassador of Spain had a private Audience of the Prince, so had the Resident of Venice; and the next day, December the 21st, the Peers assembled at St. James's, to whom his Highness made a short Speech, telling them, he desir'd them to advise the best manner how to pursue the Ends of his Declaration, in calling a Free Parliament. The Prince then withdrew, and the Lords voted their particular Thanks for his coming over, and resolv'd to assemble in their House at Westminster, to consider of what his Highness had recommended to them. They nam'd five of the most eminent Lawyers, as their Assistants, in the room of the Judges, who were most of them out of the way, as Sir John Maynard, Mr. Pollexfen, Sir John Holt, Mr. Bradford, Mr. Atkinson. They also appointed Mr. Francis Gwin, still living, to sign such Orders as should from time to time be made by them. The Lawyers advis'd his Highness to declare himself King, as Henry VII. did; but the Prince would not hear of it, as being contrary to his Declaration, to leave every thing to a Free Parliament.

One of the first Motions made in this august Assembly, was the signing of the Exeter Association, which they all did, to the Number of above sixty. It was refus'd by the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Pembroke, the Earl of Nottingham, my Lord Wharton, and all the Bishops, except the Bishop of London. A French Writer pretends to give the Earl of Nottingham's, and the Earl of Pembroke's Reasons for it; because Mr. Finch, Brother to the one, and Sir Robert Sawyer, Father-in-Law to the other, were not nam'd among the Assistants to the House of Peers; tho' I doubt very much his Authority for it, and that he speaks at random. The same Author pretends to give the Lords Reasons for not naming them; because Mr. Finch pleaded for putting the Lord Russel to death; and what a share Sir Robert Sawyer had in it, has been already related. The Lord Wharton said, he had sign'd so many Associations which had no Effect, that he was resolv'd to sign no more. His Zeal for the Protestant Religion and Liberty was too well known to expose him to any Jealousy; but there seems to be some of the old Leaven in the Bishop's Refusal.

The King continu'd five Days at Rochester, and both he himself, and every body else, saw he was at full Liberty, and that the Guard about him put him under no sort of Restraint. Many of his Friends went to him, and press'd him to stay, flattering him with Hopes that a Party would appear for him, good Terms be got, and things be brought to a reasonable Agreement. He was much distracted between his own Inclinations, and the Importunities of his Friends.

The Queen hearing what had happen'd, writ a most vehement Letter to him, pressing his coming over, and remembering him of his Promise, which she charg'd on him in a very earnest, if not in an imperious Strain. This Letter being intercepted, the Prince sent it to the King, and he presently resolv'd to do what she would have him,

Peers meet the Prince at St. James's.

A. D. him, in which he was like to find no Molestation; so on Sunday Morning, December 23, about three a-clock, he left Rockester without communicating his Design to any one, not so much as to the Lord Dunbarton, who lay in the same Chamber, and wak'd not till alter he was gone. He had not above three or four Persons with him, of whom the Duke of Berwick and Labadie were two. He rode on horseback to a convenient Place in the River Medway, where Mackdonald before-mention'd receiv'd him aboard his small Vessel, and landed him at Ambleuse in France. The Earl of Middleton, who attended him at Rockester, found a Letter written by him on the Table in his Chamber, desiring Middleton to gratify the Captains of the Prince's Guards with 100 Guineas each, the Lieutenants and Ensigns with 50 Guineas, and to reward some others that had attended him in proportion. He also left a Paper behind him, which made a great noise after he was gone, tho' it was capable really of doing nothing else, but making a noise, for it had neither Reason nor Truth in it.

His Paper. He said the Earl of Feverham had been made a Prisoner against the Law of Nations, which was not true; for that Earl, the General of his Army, came into the Prince's Quarters without a Pass, and to seize him was according to the Law of all Nations. As to any other Force put upon him, besides the desiring him to remove to Ham-House, he himself, and every one else knew there was none; but on the contrary, that the Prince's Friends wish'd him his full Liberty, and that he had it, to give him an Opportunity to do what he did, and what he all along intended; for I don't reckon this Elopement to be truly a second one, but a Continuation and an Accomplishment of the first. What follows is not much in the Courtly Manner, I appeal to all that know me, nay even to himself, the Prince, that in their Consciences, whether he nor they can believe me in the least capable of so unnatural a Villainy, nor of so little common Sense to be impos'd on in a thing of such a nature. No, if he had not been in the Secret, and consented to the Imposture, he could not have been impos'd on. But what can one not believe of a Prince, who apostatis'd from his Religion, who broke his Word, his Oath, the Laws, who endeavour'd to destroy the Constitution and Liberty of his Country, eternally sacred! who hated the Protestant Religion, and all who sincerely profess'd it, among whom were his two most religious, most excellent, and most beloved Daughters; who thought he could not merit Heaven by any Act so likely, as by establishing Popery in these Kingdoms; and who could not establish it, but by wronging his Daughters in their Right of Succession. Again, What had I to expect from one, who had taken such pains to make me appear as black as Hell! He had taken no more pains than in the bare Relation of his various Violations of the Laws, and his Attempts against the Religion he had sworn to defend. If Truth had such an Effect, he had better have consulted his Conscience about it than his Passion; but Bishop Burnet and others having animadverted largely on this Paper, I shall say no more of it, but that it is hardly worth the pains we have been at about it.

The News of the King's quitting the Kingdom, as well as the Government, reaching London, the Lords assembled, and agreed upon an Address to his Highness, to take upon him the Administration of the publick Affairs, Civil and Military; and to have a particular Care of Ireland, till the Meeting of the Convention, which was propos'd to be January the 22d; and they presented another Address to his Highness, to desire him to write missive Letters to the Persons to whom Writs were to be issu'd for calling a Parliament, as had been done for calling the Parliament, who call'd home King Charles II. Bishop Burnet tells us, the Earl of Nottingham objected against it, "That such a Convention could be no legal Assembly, unless summon'd by the King's Writ; therefore he mov'd, that an Address might be made to the King, who was by that time in France, to order the Writs to be issued out." Few were of his mind; and indeed it was not likely that the King, who had order'd Writs, and recall'd them two or three times, when he was in England, and on the Throne, should send Orders from France for such Writs, when it was more than probable he would never sit upon it again. The Marquis of Hallifax was Chairman of the House of Lords, and behav'd with great Wisdom, Courage and Zeal for the Good of the Commonwealth. Their Lordships made an Order for all Papists to remove ten Miles from London, with some general Exceptions, and some particular, as the Dutches of Bouillon, the Dutches of Mazarin, the Marquis de Seissac, the Marquis de Flamarin, Monsieur de St. Evremont, and the Chevalier St. Victor.

To confirm the Resolutions of the House of Commons Peers, and know as well as might be the Sentiments of the Commons, his Highness summon'd all such Commoners as had serv'd in any of the Parliaments in King Charles the Second's time, that of King James II. not being fit to be trusted; as also the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Deputies of the Common-Council, to meet him at St. James's, on Wednesday the 26th of December; to whom he spoke to the same Purport as he had spoken to the Peers, and desir'd them to advise the best manner how to pursue the Ends of his Declaration in calling a Free Parliament, for the Preservation of the Protestant Religion, and the restoring the Rights and Liberties of the Kingdom, and settling the same, that they may not be in danger of being again subverted. The Lord Mayor being still indispos'd, the Prince gave the Copy of his short Speech to Sir Thomas Allen, eldest Alderman. These Gentlemen immediately repair'd to the House of Commons, and chose Henry Powle Esq; Chairman. They resolv'd on the Question, that the Request of his Highness was a sufficient Authority for them to assemble. Sir Robert Sawyer, to puzzle matters, ask'd, How his Highness could take upon him the Administration of Affairs without a distinguish'd Name or Title. Serjeant Maynard reply'd briskly, This Assembly will lose a great deal of Time, if they wait till Sir Robert can conceive how that is possible. A Motion being made for signing the Association, 'twas carry'd that it should lie on the Table, and all sign it that would.

This Assembly agreed on an Address to the Prince of the same nature with the Lords, to take on him the Government Civil and Military, the Disposal of the publick Revenues, the Care of Ireland, till the Meeting of the Convention the 22d of January; which Address was read to his Highness the same day by Mr. Powle their Speaker, attended by most of the Members. The Prince took time to consider of it till Friday, December the 28th, and then he accepted of their Offer in a very gracious Speech, first to the Lords, and afterwards to the Commons. The News of which flying about Town, the Tower Guns were fir'd, and all usual Demonstrations of Joy were every where seen.

Barillon the French Ambassador had been very busy in sowing Divisions among the Members of both these Assemblies, and the Prince order'd order'd him to depart from London in 24 Hours. He desir'd longer Time, but it was not granted; and Mr. L'Etang, the Officer who afterwards arrested Mareschal Boufflers at Namur, conducted him to Dover, where he refus'd the Presents Barillon would have given him for his Civility. With him went Signor Ranzoni the Envoy of Modena, who had no more Business here, after Mary d'Este had left the Kingdom.

The Post from France brought Advice that the young Earl of Essex and other Englishmen were put under Arrest at Paris; upon which it was propos'd to stop Barillon at Dover, but the Prince did not imagine that Lord Essex would be long detain'd, so the French Ambassador was suffer'd to embark. He order'd the six English and Scots Regiments in the States Service to be sent back to Holland, to which the Lords had not only agreed, but offer'd his Highness the 10,000 Men that England was oblig'd by Treaty to send to the Assistance of the States, and more if there was occasion.

The Earl of Arran returning from his Attendance on King James, went to make his Excuses to the Prince for not waiting on him sooner; but methinks his Excuses were worse than his staying away, for he said he would not have come then if the King had not been gone. His Highness told him next day, that he had given his Regiment to the Earl of Oxford, who was its old Master.

On the 29th of December the Prince of Orange went to the Treasury, where there was in Cash 80,000*l.* with which he order'd the King's Household Troops and Officers to be paid, and the latter to be discharg'd. He took into consideration the difficult Affair of Ireland, and Preparations were made to ship off Arms and Men, which were interrupted by the Artifices of Tyrconnel, and the Treachery of Richard Hamilton, afterwards Lieutenant General. Tho' Tyrconnel talk'd of raising 30,000 Men and standing it out, yet he sent away his Wife and his richest Moveables to France; nay, he was in such Terror, that he had a Ship always ready to carry him thither after them. Several of the Privy-Council in that Kingdom propos'd to submit to the Government of England, and he pretended to be of the same Opinion sometimes, but said he would not part with the Sword till he was ask'd for it. He pretended to be very kind to the Protestants, in hopes they would be kind to him and his Friends: which was all Grimace. He had disarm'd them, and had them almost every where at Mercy, except in Ulster, where they were stronger than in Munster and the other Provinces. Their chief Leaders the Earl of Granard, and the Lord Montjoy, kept still such Measures with Tyrconnel, that they would not take the Conduct of them. Two Towns that had both very little Defence, and a very small Store of Provisions, were secur'd by some brave young Men, who refus'd to receive a Popish Garrison; these were Londonderry and Iniskilling, both advantageously situated. Great Numbers fled to them, and brought in Provisions; upon which they resolv'd to defend themselves, with a Firmness of Courage that cannot be enough admir'd; for when they were abandon'd by both Gentry and Military Men, those two small unfurnish'd, unfortify'd Places, stood out against good Armies, both Irish and French, till Relief came from England, where some thought Ireland would follow the Fate of that Kingdom, especially after the Protestants, by Tyrconnel's Persuasions and Menaces, wrote over that he would deliver up the Government, if he might have good Terms for himself. They apply'd to Lord

Ireland.

Clarendon, on whom they much depended, and those who were employ'd by Tyrconnel to deceive the Prince, made their Application to Sir William Temple. These said they were sure Tyrconnel would never part with the Sword, if Lord Clarendon was to succeed him; and that it might not hinder the Treaty with Tyrconnel, his Highness avoided speaking to the Earl of Clarendon of these Matters, which so disgusted the Earl, that he ever after gave the Prince all the Opposition he could.

The Treaty manag'd by Temple, and the Advice of the Marquis of Hallifax, that the Danger of Ireland would quicken the Convention in settling the Government of England, are suppos'd to be two fatal Causes of those dilatory Measures, which put the Nation to so great an Expence of Blood and Treasure to preserve the English Interest in Ireland. For tho' I have a Contempt for such Argument in common, as is us'd in the History of the REBELLION, If the Duke of Ormond and General Mackay, as was then talk'd of, had been sent with 7 or 8000 Men to Ireland, as soon as the King was elop'd, and while Tyrconnel was in Terror and Suspence, there's no question but he would have accepted of honourable Terms: Instead of this, the Temples, Father, Son, and Brother, prevail'd with the Prince to send Lieutenant-General Hamilton before-mention'd, an Irish Officer and a Papist, who was a sort of Prisoner of War in England, to Tyrconnel, with whom he had great Credit, and undertook to prevail with him to deliver up the Government, which at that time the Lord Lieutenant was inclining to do, giving every thing for lost in England. But the Traytor Hamilton coming over, and representing to him, that things were like to take another Turn in favour of the King, he resolv'd to dissemble still, till he was strong enough to throw off the Mask, and sent two Privy-Counsellors, Montjoy and Rice, to France, to represent to the King the Necessity of submitting to England. Montjoy was immediately clapt up in the Bastille. Tyrconnel gain'd Time by it, perfected his Levies, sent Forces to the North, and invited the King to Ireland. Hamilton's Treachery had such a terrible Effect on Mr. Henry Temple, Sir William's Son, that he leap'd into the River of Thames near the Bridge, and was drown'd.

Things went on much more smoothly in Scot-Scotland, notwithstanding the Duke of Gordon had got into Edinburgh-Castle, where he had but a very small Force. As soon as News came of the Prince of Orange's being landed with an Army in England, and that King James was not able to stand his ground, the People in the West of Scotland, for they were the first, ran immediately to Arms, and declar'd for the Prince. This was done with so universal a Resolution, and the Consternation the other People were in at the general face of things, was such at the same time, that there was no Capacity, or even Disposition to oppose them. The Western People not only took Arms, but turn'd the Episcopal Curates out of the Churches, which they had possess'd by Tyranny and Oppression; they restor'd the old Worship, and recall'd the banish'd Presbyterian Ministers.

The Populace at Edinburgh broke into all Popish Chapels, and into the Church of Holyrood House, which had been adorn'd at great Charge for the Order of St. Andrew. They defac'd it quite, seiz'd on the Earl of Perth and other Delinquents, and the whole Kingdom declar'd for the Prince, the Castle of Edinburgh only excepted. The Episcopal Party in Scotland finding they had no other Game to play, stuck to the Viscount Dundee. Upon the Prince's coming

A. D. coming to London, Duke Hamilton call'd a Meeting of all the Men of Quality of the Scottish Nation then in Town, where after some small Opposition made by the Earl of Arran, his Son, they agreed on an Address to his Highness to take on him the Government in Scotland, as at the Request of the Lords and Commons he had done in England. This Address was sign'd by above 30 Lords and 80 Gentlemen, and presented to his Highness, who on the 14th of March made a like Answer to it, as he had given to the Address of the English Peers and Commons.

King James's Letter to the Privy-Council.

Before the Convention, summon'd by the Prince of Orange's circular Letters, met, the Privy Council receiv'd a Letter from K. James, dated at St. Germaine en Laie in France, wherein he tells them, It had been his constant Care, ever since his Accession to the Crown, to govern his People with that Justice and Moderation as to give no Occasion of Complaint. His Justice appear'd in suffering the Freeholds of his Subjects to be taken from them by Force, as in the Case of Magdalen College and innumerable other Cases; his Moderation in taking pleasure to hear the Accounts of that Butcher Jefferies's bloody Affizes in the West. Is it not prodigious to Astonishment, that he should boast of his Moderation and Justice, when there was no Part of the Kingdom that was not groaning and trembling under his Tyranny, and deploring the Loss of their Liberties and Properties, and the Danger they were in of losing their Religion? He assures them he had redress'd all Grievances before he went away, and answer'd all the Ends of the Prince of Orange's Declaration. Every Word of which, every one of those Counsellors knew to be untrue. However he goes on, and desires them to carry this good News to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in and about the City of London and Westminster; to the Lord Mayor and Commons of London, that he desires nothing more than to hold a Free Parliament, and have an Opportunity to shew the Sincerity of his Protestations, to preserve the Liberties and Properties of his Subjects, and the Protestant Religion, more especially the Church of England as by Law establish'd. Men of Ingenuity and Modesty cannot conceive how it was possible for any one, who just came from breaking his Word with the Church in the most notorious and enormous manner, which he knew was well known to every Soul in the Nation, to boast of his Sincerity in promising to preserve it. This was a fine Recommendation to his Council to recall him, and the Effect of it was suitable to the Merit; they took no notice of his Letter, and,

Convention.

On the 22d of January, the Convention met at Westminster. Both Houses immediately proceeded to the Choice of their Speakers. The Marquis of Hallifax carry'd it in the House of Lords against the Earl of Danby; and Henry Powle Esq; was unanimously chosen by the House of Commons, tho' it was thought Mr. Edward Seymour would have stood in competition with him. The Chairs being thus fill'd, the Prince of Orange's Letter to both Houses was read to them, containing in Substance,

Prince of Orange's Letter to them.

"A Recommendation to them to answer the Ends of his Declaration, and lay the Foundation of a firm Security, for their Religion, Laws, and Liberties. He mention'd to them the dangerous Condition of Ireland, and the Danger the States of the United Provinces were in, which call'd for their early Assistance."

Mr. Powle's Speech.

This Letter being read, Mr. Powle, the Speaker, represented "the dangerous State of the Nation, the fatal Consequence of Anarchy,

"the deplorable Condition of Ireland, the Growth of the Power of France, the vast Designs of that aspiring turbulent Monarch, not only the Persecutor of the Protestant Religion, but likewise the known Enemy of England. He excited them to put the Nation into a posture, not only to secure themselves against his Attempts, but also to make such a powerful Diversion in the Bowels of his Dominions, as that they might recover their former Conquests in France, &c."

This Speech was universally applauded, and indeed there was such a Spirit then in the People of England, animated by their Deliverance, and glorying in their Deliverer, that nothing less was talk'd of than marching directly to the Walls of Paris; the Wagers running on that side. The first thing the Convention did, was to vote an Address of Thanks to his Highness the Prince of Orange, to acknowledge his Care, and desire him to take on him the Administration of publick Affairs. In this Address the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons joined, and the Prince in his Answer the next day, accepted of the Administration, and recommended to them Dispatch, not only for a Settlement at home upon a good Foundation, but for the Safety of Europe. Even now a Party, who never had ease if any one else were easy, grown proud by Success, and wanton by Security, began early to envy the Peace which was promis'd our Dissenting Brethren, and fall off from the Publick Interest, as it was an Enemy to Persecution. This appear'd by their Opposing the Vote for the Vacancy of the Throne. Mr. Dolben was the first that stood up, January 28, and made a long Speech, tending to prove that the Throne was vacant, which another Member opposing with some Heat, Sir Richard Temple ask'd him, If the Throne is not Vacant, what Business have we in this Place, and what need was there of calling a Convention? The Party, who repented of what they had been doing for the Good of their Country, out of spite to the Non-conformists, who they were afraid would be the better for it, and inclined to invite King James back again, finding they were not strong enough to divide the House, made many Harangues against the Vacancy; and it will doubtless not be amiss to remember the Names of those Gentlemen, that their Memory may have a share of the Glory they ascrib'd to themselves for the Stand they made against the Revolution.

These were all against the Vote that the King had Abdicated, and that the Throne was Vacant; and others spoke against it, who when the last Question was put, either absented themselves, or ran down with the Stream, as probably Mr. F—, who made a very long Speech, and yet he is not in the List of those that voted against the Abdication. The Substance of his Speech was as follows; "That the Prince of Orange was too great and too good to accept of the Crown if it was offer'd him. That the Popish Princes would not suffer a Popish King to be thrust out of his Kingdom, and instead of invading France, we should find it difficult enough to preserve ourselves; that those who with King James's Humiliation do by no means wish his Perdition and Exclusion from the Crown, neither do they believe the Faults to be singly his, or if they were, not to be sufficient to justify the deposing him. "We are also of a Church that has been Singular for her Loyalty and Deference to Kings, and if we have any Honour for her, we ought to tread tenderly in that Point." I can repeat no more of it, 'tis too wordy, and too trifling to entertain the Reader; he clos'd his Speech, with a Motion for an Address to the Prince of Orange, to call back the King his Father, as the only way to make him renowned in all the Histories of Europe. With just such a sort of Renown as the French Monarch deserv'd, of whom the old bald Rhime, The King of France, with forty thousand Men, &c.

This Faction, the Cavaliers first, and the Tories after them, they being one and the same sort of Men, are always executing Tyranny, by transferring the Faults from the King to his Ministers, Who, says this Gentleman, sees by the Eyes and Ears of other People, and therefore is not in fault. If the Prince did not know his Ministers did ill, and was ready to punish them as soon as he knew it, this Argument would have weight in it; but it is not pretended that this was the Case of King James; and if a Prince knows his Ministers do ill, if he protects them in it, if he commands them to do it, which is the Case of that King, the Fault is primarily and principally in him: and as to King James's Faults not being sufficient to abdicate him, we refer to the Declaration of Right, resolv'd by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons assembled at Westminster.

'Tis pretty odd to hear this florid Speaker cry up the Loyalty of the Church, when the Bishops and chief Churchmen had just then been inviting the Prince of Orange to bring an Army against King James, and had as soon as he landed given him all Assistance; as if every Step of that kind which had been taken, would not have been deem'd as errant Rebellion as that of Monmouth, had the Prince of Orange been unsuccessful, and as if the Association drawn up at Exeter, and sign'd by the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Abington, Earl Rivers, John How Esq; late Duke of Leeds, late Earl of Scarborough; nay by Sakerost Archbishop of Canterbury, and eight Bishops more, was not thought by King James and his Adherents, to be as Treasonable as the famous Association, for which he would have hang'd the Earl of Shaftesbury, and against which so many hundred Addresses were sent up to London by the Party Mr. F— means, when he calls them the Church. Incongruity and Inconsistency, Contradiction and Nonsense are Parts of the Composition of these Men's Principles and Practices. The abovemention'd Speech had no more Effect than it deserv'd, and the House proceeded vigorously towards the Settlement of the Nation.

The House of Lords appointed Special Assistants, to advise them in Matters of Law, as Lord Chief Baron Mountague, Sir Robert Atkins, Sir William Dolben, Sir Creswell Levins, Sir John Holt, Sir Edward Nevile, Mr. Whitlock, Mr. Bradbury, and Mr. Pettit. They also order'd a Thanksgiving to Almighty God, for having made the Prince of Orange the Glorious Instrument of the great Deliverance of this Kingdom from Popery and Arbitrary Power; in which the Commons also join'd with them, and eleven Bishops were appointed to compose the Prayers, as Dr. Compton, Bishop of London; Dr. Loyd, Bishop of St. Asaph; Dr. Loyd, Bishop of Norwich; Dr. Turner, Bishop of Ely; Dr. Lake, Bishop of Chichester; Dr. Frampton, Bishop of Gloucester; Dr. Ken, Bishop of Bath and Wells; Dr. White, Bishop of Peterborough; Dr. Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln; Dr. Sprat, Bishop of Rochester; Dr. Trelawny, Bishop of Exeter. Six of whom were afterwards Nonjurors, tho' in this very Act of theirs, they were, in their own King's Sense, guilty of as much Treason, as was Col. Algernon Sidney, who was condemn'd to be hang'd, drawn and quarter'd, for writing against Filmer.

All the World knows King James treated the Prince of Orange as at the Head of a Rebellion, that he call'd his Adherents Rebels, and yet Nonjurors, Loyd, Turner, Lake Frampton, Ken, White, pray, That God, who in Times of Trouble and Danger, does raise up Deliverers of his People, would bless his Highness the Prince of Orange.

ring Bishops make a Form of Prayer for the Prince of Orange.

A. D. 1688. of Orange, whom he has sent to be the Defender of our Laws and Religion, that he would protect his Person, strengthen his Hands, &c. In the general Thanksgiving Prayers, Dr. Ken, Dr. Frampton, Dr. Turner, Dr. Lloyd, Dr. White, Dr. Lake, bless the holy Name of God, who has rais'd up for them a mighty Deliverer, by whom he has wrought this great Salvation. These Nonjuring Bishops here call the Resistance made by the Prince of Orange and his Adherents, The Salvation of the Lord. And in another Prayer, The Work of the Lord, and pray the Almighty to bless the Hands of those, who drew their Swords against King James. Their own Words are, Go on to perfect, O gracious God, the Work that thou hast begun amongst us, bless and prosper the Hands by which thou hast convey'd this Mercy to us. In another Prayer, these Nonjurors say, We give Glory to thy holy Name for our Deliverance from the intolerable Yoke of the Romish Church. Again, It was because thy Compassions fail'd not, that our holy Reform'd Religion was not overwhelm'd with Popish Superstition and Idolatry, that our Laws and Liberties are rescu'd from the Bands of Violence and Oppression. They own King James to have been a Tyrant, and thank the Almighty for the Resistance that delivered them: let us compare this with the Oxford Decree, with the Sermons and Libels of Hicks, Lestey, Hill, Sacheverel, T—p, &c. with the Behaviour of those Bishops afterwards, and then we shall have a just Conception of their Congruity, Consistency, their Sincerity and Piety.

Echard assures us the Motion made by Mr. Dolben, was for the Convention to proceed, as if King James was actually dead, and that this home Motion was seconded by Sir Richard Temple, and supported by Sir Robert Sawyer; which is not very likely, Sawyer being in the black List of those who voted against the Abdication, and it is very likely that he is not injur'd by being enroll'd there.

Sir Robert Howard made an eloquent convincing Speech on the same side of the Question with Mr. Dolben and Sir Richard Temple. Echard affirms, he was the first who ventur'd to assert the Vacancy of the Throne, and the Breach of the Original Contract by a continu'd Series of illegal Acts. 'Tis true as to the latter, but Mr. Dolben first asserted that the Throne was Vacant, and being an Archbishop's Son, did in a manner set the Church at the Head of this Affair. Sir Robert Howard's Allegations were maintain'd by Mr. Sacheverel, Mr. Pollexfen, Sir George Treby, Mr. Somers, Sir Thomas Lee, Mr. Garraway: these Gentlemen were oppos'd by Sir Christopher Musgrave, Mr. Heneage Finch, Lord Fanshawe, Sir Thomas Charges, Sir Edward Seymour, &c. Sir Christopher Musgrave said, that to vote the Throne to be vacant, would be actually to depose the King. What Strength there is in their Arguments? To place one Man in a Chair which another Man has left, is to turn that other Man out of it. Musgrave desir'd to know from the Gentlemen of the Long Robe, Whether that could legally be done? What do these Sophisters pretend to? Why did not he ask the Gentlemen of the Long Robe, whether the Earl of Danby could legally rise in Arms against King James in the North? Whether the Earl of Abington could legally do the same in the West, and the Archbishop of Canterbury legally make a Prayer for those whom King James call'd Rebels, and who would have been treated as Rebels had they not succeeded? Why did he not ask the Gentlemen of the Long Robe, if the Heads of Colleges at Oxford could legally sign an Affociation to stand by a Prince, whom their Sovereign Lord declar'd to be in Arms against him.

'Tis the same Cant that was us'd in King Charles the First's time. That Prince, who had so little govern'd by Law, had, as has been often observ'd, nothing oftner in his Declarations than the Law, the Laws of the Land, and the like. Those who oppos'd the Settlement of the Nation, having no better Reasons than Mr. F—— and Sir Christopher Musgrave; the Committee, Richard Hampden Esq; in the Chair, and afterwards the whole House, January the 28th,

Resolv'd,

That King James the Second, having endeavour'd to subvert the Constitution of the Kingdom by breaking the Original Contract between King and People, and by the Advice of Jesuits and other wicked Persons, having violated the Fundamental Laws; and withdrawn himself out of the Kingdom, hath abdicated the Government, and that the Throne is thereby vacant. Which Resolution was immediately sent up to the Lords for their Concurrence.

Before the Commons came to this Grand Vote, they receiv'd a Letter sent them by the Lord Preston, and hearing it came from King James, they would not so much as open it. The Contents of it were the same with that directed To the Lords and others of the Privy-Council, before mentioned. The like Letter was sent by the same Lord to the House of Peers, where a Motion was made for reading it, but it was warmly oppos'd and rejected. However, their Lordships sent for Preston, and demanded how he came by the Letter, who said, he had it from a Scotsman; upon which, he was order'd to produce him, and attend the House with him within three Days. The Scotsman's Name was Hays, and at the time appointed he appear'd in the House, whom he inform'd, "That when he left Paris, on the Monday before, the King commanded him to call at St. Germain's on the Earl of Melfort for a Packet of Letters to the Lord Preston, which he did, and had delivered them according to his Orders, and that was all he knew of the Matter." A Motion was again made for reading the Letter, but it was again rejected. Echard tells us that the Letter being sign'd by Melfort, disgusted several of the Lords, who had before been zealous for the King.

Debated by the Lords.

On the 29th of January, the Lords consider'd the Grand Vote, sent up to them by the Commons in a Committee of the whole House, the Earl of Danby, afterwards Duke of Leeds, in the Chair. The first Motion was, "Not to agree with the Commons that the Throne was vacant, but only first to suppose it for the present, leaving it to be further examined afterwards, in order to cut short several other Questions by determining this first, Whether the Throne being vacant, it ought to be fill'd by a Regent or a King?"

It is a very unpleasant Task to me to repeat what was said for the Regency, it being in some places trifling, in some absurd, and all so well answer'd by the Marquis of Halifax, the Earl of Danby, and those illustrious Peers and Patriots, who asserted the Liberty of the Constitution, were great in Argument and like Truth prevail'd. It was alledg'd, I must not name Names, "That if upon any Pretence whatsoever the Nation might throw off their King, even after that King had thrown off the Kingdom, then the Crown must become precarious, and the Supremacy be lodg'd in the People, which deposing Power would destroy the happy Mixture in the English Monarchy, and end in a new Species of Government unknown to this Nation." Here is twice Nation in one Sen-

A. D. 1688. tence, yet a Bishop insulted Baxter at the Savoy Conference for making use of the Term as Republican. If the Nation might not on any Pretence whatsoever throw off their King, then the English were oblig'd to submit first to the Pope, and afterwards to the King of Fes and Morocco, when King John had given them his Kingdom; the Absurdity of which, is too visible to need Explanation.

If there's a Mixture in the English Monarchy, what is it that is mix'd with it? Is it not the legislative Power as lodg'd in Lords and Commons? And if that Power is not to guard against the Subversion of the Laws, it is a Shadow only, and has no Substance; of which I shall be convinc'd, when I can believe that One is more than Two, and the Whole less than a Part. Echard adds, that in the same Speech much was brought both from the Laws and History of England, to prove, "That not only the Person, "but the Authority of the King is sacred." Eternal Sophistry! The Person and Authority of the King, governing according to Law and his Coronation-Oath, is sacred, and to resist him a damnable Sin. This is universally granted; but when he throws off the Authority the Law gives him, and assumes an arbitrary tyrannical Power over his Subjects, Body and Soul, is his Authority then sacred? Those that are minded to see more of this edifying Argument against placing King William and Queen Mary on the Throne, against the Succession of Queen Anne, King George I. his present Majesty, and his Royal Posterity, are refer'd to Echard, and the common Histories, where that and other Arguments of equal force are in great plenty. The Archdeacon owns, "Some intended to bring "King James back, and artfully join'd in this, "as the probable means of softning the Nation, "and removing the present Aversion to that "Prince; which done, a little Time might "bring about their Designs."

Lords for the Vacancy.

The noble Peers who insisted that the Throne was Vacant, and that it might be fill'd with a King, urg'd, "That a Regent was as much or "more against Monarchy than what they had "propos'd. If a King's ill Government gave "the People a Right in any case to take away "his Power, and lodge it with another, owning "that the Right to it still remain'd with him; "this would have as ill Consequences as the "pretended Danger by Diversity of Factions, "and Variety of Elections, since recourse would "be had to this violent Remedy as often and as "rashly as the other. By the Proposition of a "Regent, there would be in effect two Kings at "the same time, one with the Title, and the "other with the Power, which was more illegal "and unsafe than the Method then propos'd. "If the Oaths to King James were thought to "be still in force, his Subjects by these were "not only bound to maintain his Title, but all "his Powers and Prerogatives; and therefore "it seem'd absurd to continue a Government in "his Name, and to swear to him as King, "when all the Kingly Power was taken out of "his hands. If the Government should be "carry'd on in the Name of King James by "the hands of others, the Body of the Nation "would consider him as the Person who was "really their King; and if any should plot or "act in his behalf, they could not be prosecuted "for High Treason, as conspiring against the "Person or Government of the King; when it "would be apparent, that they were only de- "signing to preserve his Person, and restore him "to his Government. To proceed against, and "to condemn any to die for such Practice, would "be to add Murder to Perjury." These and other Arguments had such weight in this august A. D. Assembly, that when the Question was put, 1688. there were 51 for a King, and but 49 for a Re- gency. Among the latter were,

Mr. Archdeacon informs us, that the Earl of Huntington, and the Earl of Mulgrave, whom King William afterwards created Marquis of Normanby, did not appear in the House, and the Lord Churchil also absented himself, pretending some Indisposition; but it was suppos'd he was absent out of Decency only, and in consideration of the Favours he had receiv'd from the abdicated King. The Archbishop of Canterbury was always absent, and Mr. Echard adds, "Indeed the Odiousness of a Deposing Power "had made so deep an Impression on the Minds "of the Clergy, that none of the Bishops knew "how to come into the Opinion of filling up the "Throne, but Dr. Compton Bishop of London, "and Sir Jonathan Trelawny Bishop of Bristol." But they knew very well how to come into the Opinion to invite the Prince of Orange to come with a mighty Fleet and Army against the King, who fill'd the Throne, and to make Prayers for the Prince's Success against him, which was as criminal in the Opinion of King James, as the drawing the Duke of Monmouth's, or the Earl of Argyle's Declaration. The Duke of Ormond, and three of King Charles's natural Sons, the Dukes of Southampton, Grafton, and Northumberland, soon left the Party for the Re- gency, and fell in with that for a King.

The Lords proceeded farther on the Grand Vote, January 31. and put this Question, Whether or no there was an Original Contract between King and People? Some maintain'd that Kings held their Crowns by Divine Right, which was vehemently deny'd by others, who asserted, "That all Power originally belong'd Original "to the Community, and to the King only by Contract "Mutual Contract." The former insisted that asserted, there was no such thing in being, and ask'd, Where it was kept, and how they might come at it? We have observ'd of the Cavaliers in former Times, that whenever they pretended to Wit, 'twas as aukard and clumsy as the Jest of Clowns, or the Mirth of Fools. The Original Contract was kept in the Coronation Oaths, till Laud and Sancroft alter'd them, and might there be found as well as in all the Records of antient Times. Sir Robert Philips, Knight of the Shire for Somerset in King James the First's Time, asserted this Original Contract in Parliament, in the very Terms, above Threescore Years before this Convention, as may be seen in that Reign; and now, says Echard, and thinks he says

A. D. 1688. says something, they ask'd where the Original Contract was kept, and how they might come at it? as if it had been Articles of Agreement had and made between John a Nokes, and Tom a Stiles laid by in an old Coffin.

The Archdeacon himself can't help repeating enough of what was said in Answer to it, to justify this Mirth. "Others answer'd it was imply'd in a legal and limited Government, tho' in a long Tract of Time and dark Ages, there was not such an explicit Proof of it to be found." Yet many Hints from Law-Books, antient Histories, and the Proceedings at Coronations, supported the Truth of it; and even the Conqueror himself was receiv'd upon his promising to keep the Laws of Edward the Confessor, which was plainly the Original Contract between him and the Nation. These were often renew'd by his Successors, more especially by their several Confirmations of Magna Charta, and Edward II. and Richard II. were depos'd for breaking these Laws and Contracts, which Proceedings were still good in Law; since they were never revers'd, nor was the Right of Deposing them ever renounc'd or disown'd. It was ask'd, what signify'd all the Limitations of the Regal Power, if when a King broke thro' them all, the People were left without Remedy to maintain their Laws, and preserve their Constitution?"

The contrary Notion is like that Nonsense, with which the same Party complemented Queen Anne, upon H—y's hated Revolution in the Ministry. They cry'd up in their Addresses her divine, hereditary, unalienable, indefeasible Right to the Crown, at the same time that they affirm'd the Pretender to be her true Brother: Thus it was an unmix'd mix'd Monarchy, a limited unlimited Government; for all Limitations, of Regal Power, according to these Men, were no where to be come at, and the Subjects had no Remedy to maintain their Laws and preserve their Constitution. Upon the finishing of this Debate, which was unequally maintain'd by the Regency, the Question, Whether King James had broke the said Original Contract, pass'd in the Affirmative, Yeas 53, No's 46; by which it appear'd, that the Number of those who were for the Regency was much lessen'd. In the mean time the People began to distrelsh these Debates, and the Stand that was put to the wish'd-for Revolution. They were impatient of the old Cathedral Topicks of Jure Divino, and a Petition was drawn up and carry'd about London for Hands, address'd to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, assembled in the Grand Convention, &c. wherein it was said,

A Petition to the Lords.

"Whereas we are in a deep Sense of the Danger of Delays and perplex'd Debates about settling the Government, at this time Vacant, by reason whereof the necessary Ends of Government cannot be duly administred, we humbly desire that his Illustrious Highness the Prince of Orange, and his Royal Consort the Princess, may be settled on the Throne; by whose Courage, Conduct, and Reputation this Nation and the Protestant Religion may be defended from our Enemies, both at home and abroad; and that Ireland, now in a bleeding and deplorable Condition, may be rescu'd from its Miseries, and these Kingdoms settled on a lasting Foundation in Peace and Liberty."

His Highness had not appear'd on any side of the Questions debated in the Convention, which he resolv'd should be free, and that there should not be the least colour for the Enemies to our Liberty and Peace to say they were under any Direction: Therefore to prevent its being insinuated that he approv'd of this Petition, he caus'd the Lord Mayor to issue an Order to suppress it.

King James's Accession-Day, February 6th, approaching, the House of Peers order'd it should not be observ'd as a Holiday, and took into consideration the Word Abdicated, and concluded that the Word Deserted was more proper for this occasion. They next examin'd the Word Vacant, and put this Question, Whether King James having broken the Original Contract between him and his People, and Deserted the Government, the Throne was thereby Vacant? Those who were for bringing back King James, and all the Miseries that he had carry'd away with him, debated this Question with greater Heat, but I can't say with greater Force than any of the former; and some, according to Echard, were for a Tye between him and the Nation, instead of the Original Contract. However the Term Vacant was still too strong for the Major Vote, and when it was put to the question, it was carry'd in the Negative by eleven Voices. And a Motion being made that the Prince and Princess of Orange be immediately declar'd King and Queen, it was also carry'd in the Negative by five Voices. Against which Vote the Marquises of Halifax and Winchester, the Earls of Danby and Devonshire, the Lord Delamere and others, to the Number of Forty, enter'd their Protest. Lord Lovelace offer'd a Petition to the House; upon which the Earl of Clarendon mov'd, "That according to a standing Order of the House he himself should open it, and acquaint the House with the Contents of it, and by whom it was sign'd." The Lord Ferrars seconded that Motion; upon which Lord Lovelace withdrew it, saying, It was not yet sign'd, but should be by Hands enough. Echard adds, "Great Numbers of the Rabble flock'd that Morning to Westminster, with Will. Killgrew at the head of them, but it made little Impression on their Lordships." By Rabble he and his Brother-History-Writers mean every Man, whose Zeal for the Constitution is apt to break out into any kind of Activity. There was to my knowledge among those whom he calls Rabble, Men of superior Character to himself, in whatever light we look upon him; and it would not have been easy for the Enemies of the Revolution to have hinder'd its taking effect, had they continu'd their Endeavours. The Lords the same day, February the 4th, sent a Message to the Commons, That they had consider'd of their Vote of the 28th of January last. Instead of the Word Abdicated they would have Deserted to be put in, and these Words, And that the Throne is thereby become Vacant, to be left out.

Votes against the Vacancy.

Lords Amendment to the Grand Vote of the Commons.

Does there not seem something very extraordinary, I will not say extravagant, in these Amendments? If King James was gone, and as the Earl of Clarendon said, His own Opinion would concur to secure the Nation against his Return, is not the plain Sense and English of it, He has put himself out, and we'll keep him out? Call it Desertion or Abdication, the Consequence is the same to King James; and if the Throne was not Vacant, he must be out of it and in it at the same time, which is a new Doctrine of Transubstantiation, that could not be swallow'd by good Protestants. And as soon as the Commons had consider'd of these Amendments, it was carry'd by a great Majority, February 5th, that a Committee should be appointed to draw up Reasons why that House could not concur with their Lordships; which were as follows: As to the

A. D. the first Amendment, the Word Deserted did not 1688. fully express the Conclusion from the Premises, which the Lords had agreed in agreeing to all the rest of the grand Vote, except the Abdication and Vacancy, their Lordships having

Commons Reasons against the Amendment.

Resolved,

That King James II. had endeavour'd to subvert the Constitution of the Kingdom, by breaking the Original Contract between King and People, and had violated the Fundamental Laws, and withdrawn himself out of the Kingdom.

Now the Word Deserted, as the Commons argued, respected only the withdrawing; but the Word Abdicated respected the whole, for which purpose the Commons made choice of it.

And as to the second Amendment the Commons could not agree to leave out the Words, And that the Throne is thereby vacant. 1st, Because they conceived, that they might well infer, from so much of their own Vote, as their Lordships had agreed to, That King James the Second had Abdicated the Government, and that the Throne was thereby Vacant. So that if the Commons should admit their Lordships Amendment, that he had only Deserted the Government, yet even thence it would follow that the Throne is vacant, as to King James II, deserting the Government, being in true Construction deserting the Throne. 2dly, The Commons conceived, they needed not to prove to their Lordships, that as to any other Person the Throne was also Vacant, their Lordships having, as the Commons conceived, already admitted it, by their Addressing to the Prince of Orange, the 25th of December past, to take upon him the Administration of Publick Affairs, both Civil and Military, and to take into his Care the Kingdom of Ireland, till the meeting of this Convention; and by their Lordships renewing the same Address to his Highness, since they met, and by appointing of Publick Thanksgivings to be observ'd throughout the whole Kingdom. All which the Commons conceived to imply, that it was their Lordships Opinion, that the Throne was Vacant, and to signify so much to the People of England. 3dly, It is from those who are upon the Throne of England, when there are any such, from whom the People of England ought to receive Protection, and to whom, for that Cause, they owe the Allegiance of Subjects; but there being none now from whom they expect Regal Protection, and to whom for that Cause, they owe the Allegiance of Subjects, the Commons conceived the Throne Vacant. These Reasons were given the Lords by Richard Hampden Esq; at a Conference which the Earl of Wiltshire, afterwards Duke of Bolton, had been sent to desire: At which Conference, Mr. Hampden reported, February the 6th, that the Earl of Nottingham said, "The Lords had desir'd this Conference, that they might be as happily united to the Commons in Opinion, as they are inseparable in their Interest, and that they are at this time uneasy, that they cannot concur with the Commons in every thing, because it is of so great Concern to the Nation, and from so great and wise a Body."

"That the Lords did insist upon the first Amendment, because they did not find, that the Word Abdicated was a Word known to the Common Law of England, and because in the most common Acceptation in the Civil Law, Abdicated was a voluntary express Act of Renunciation, which was not in this Case, and did not follow from the Premises, That King James the Second, by having withdrawn himself, after having endeavour'd to subvert the Constitution of the Government, by breaking the "Original Contract between King and People, A. D. 1688. and having violated the Fundamental Laws, may be any more properly said to have Abdicated than to have Deserted."

"That the Lords also insisted on the Second Amendment, to leave out the Words, And the Throne is Vacant; for tho' their Lordships have agreed that the King has deserted the Government, and therefore have made Application to the Prince of Orange, to take upon him the Administration of the Government, and thereby to provide for the Peace and Safety of the Kingdom; yet there can be no other Inference drawn from thence, but only that the Exercise of the Government by King James the Second is ceased; so as the Lords were and are willing to secure this Nation against the Return of the said King into this Kingdom, but not that there was either such an Abdication by him, or such a Vacancy in the Throne, as that the Crown was thereby become Elective, which they cannot agree."

1st, Because by the Constitution of the Government, the Monarchy is Hereditary and not Elective.

2dly, Because no Act of the King alone can bar or destroy the Right of his Heir to the Crown; and therefore in Answer to the third Reason alledg'd by the House of Commons, if the Throne be Vacant of King James II. Allegiance is due to such Person as the Right of Succession doth belong to.

The Reverend Archdeacon's Reflections on these Arguments, I make use of his own Words, are some of the best in his Book. "Their Lordships dissented from a tender Regard to the Protestant Successors, and the respectful, legal Notions of Hereditary Monarchy, which had been too long rooted, to be easily removed at once." That Respectful Notion did not allow to thrust King James out of his Seat, but it allow'd to hinder his ever getting again into it; and to keep a Man out of his Chair, when he strives to get in again, is I think as disrespectful as to displace him, when he was in it. The respectful Notion of Hereditary Monarchy did not hinder this illustrious Assembly, from applying to a Prince who was not apparently Hereditary, to take on him that Government, to which the Hereditary Monarch asserted his Right.

Mr. Hampden having made the Report of the Conference, February the 6th, the Question was put, Whether the Commons do agree with the Lords in the first Amendment? and it pass'd in the Negative with great Unanimity: and then the Question being put, That the House do agree with the Lords in the second Amendment? a warm Debate ensu'd, and the House divided upon the Question. The Yeas to go forth; the Tellers for the Yeas, Sir Joseph Tredenham and Francis Gwynn Esq; Tellers for the No's Mr. Dutton-Colt, and Mr. Herbert. I think Names on both sides ought to be remembered on this Occasion. The Yeas were 151, the No's 282, the Majority 131.

The Debates at this memorable Conference were carried on with great Solemnity and Strength of Argument. But Echard tells us something that is very true upon it, according to the Sense of the Nation, the Commons had much the Advantage, and I have often been puzzled to comprehend what those noble Persons meant by opposing the Settlement. Let us suppose, that out of Complacency to the Oxford Decree, and the respectful Notions of Hereditary Monarchy, a Negative had pass'd in the House of Peers to the last important Question, Whether the Prince and Princess of Orange should be declared King and Queen: It was visible the People of England were bent upon it, and how could any Englishman think of the Consequence of such a Negative without trembling? Had the Arguments for it been stronger than any I have met with, the People were not to be argued out of the Security which they expected for their Religion, Liberties, Rights and Properties, by settling the Government on that Prince and Princess. Instead of abdicating, it was the universal Opinion, as Echard confesses, that King James had forfeited his Right, and as to the pretended Prince of Wales, the Imposture was so generally believ'd that he was not thought worth mentioning. What then was to be done, but to have recourse to the next undoubted Heir, the Princess of Orange, who willingly transferr'd her Divine Right to the Prince, with the Consent of the Legislature?

Mr. Hampden. The Debate at the Conference was open'd by Mr. Hampden, who among other Things said, "That the Common Law of England is not acquainted with the Word Abdicate, is from the Modesty of our Law, which is not willing to suppose there should be any unfortunate Occasion of making use of it."

Mr. Somers. Mr. Somers enlarg'd in answer to that Objection, and urg'd, that there was the same Exception to their Lordships word Desertion, which has not a known Sense in the Common Law of England. Then he explain'd the meaning of the Word Abdicate, as signifying a Renouncing not only by Express Words, or Writing, but by doing such Acts, as are inconsistent with the holding or retaining of the Thing; in which Sense 'tis taken by Grotius, Calvin, Brissonius, Budeus: Whereas Deserted signifies only a bare Withdrawing, which leaves the Party at liberty to return to it again, for which he quotes Spigelius and Bartolus; adding, that to desert in the Canon Law is only Non-residence, with respect to a Benefice, in which Case the Party hath not only a Right to return, but is bound to return again. Mr. Somers added, "As the Commons do not take this to be the present Case, so they cannot think that your Lordships do, because it is expressly said, in one of your Reasons given in Defence of the last Amendment, 'That your Lordships have been, and are willing to secure the Nation against the Return of King James; which your Lordships would not in justice do, if you did look upon it no more than a withdrawing, which leaves the Party at liberty to return.'"

"The Question is not so much, whether the Word Abdicated be as antient as the Common Law, for that will be no Objection against the using it, if it be a Word of a known and certain Signification, because that we think will justify the Commons making use of it." He then prov'd the Signification of it to be the same, as in the Sense the Commons us'd it, out of Cicero, and our Countryman Minsbew; adding, "We have very few Words in our Tongue that are of equal Antiquity with the Common Law. Your Lordships know the Language of England is alter'd greatly in several Successions of Time, and the Intermixture of other Nations, and if we should be oblig'd to make use only of Words then known and in use, what we should deliver in such a Dialect, would be very difficult to be understood. He then prov'd, that the doing an Act inconsistent with the Being and End of a Thing, but quite the contrary, is an Abdication, and formal Renunciation of that Thing.

The Earl of Nottingham said, "The main Reason of the Change of the Word is upon the account of the Consequence drawn in the Conclusion of the Vote, That the Throne is thereby vacant, that is, what the Commons mean by that Expression, whether you mean it is so Vacant, as to null the Succession in the Hereditary Line, and so all the Heirs to be cut off, which we say will make the Crown Elective.

When there is a present Defect of one to exercise the Administration of the Government, I conceive the Declaring a Vacancy, and Provision of a Supply for it, can never make the Crown Elective. The Commons apprehend there is such a Defect Now, and by Consequence a present Necessity for the Supply of the Government. If the attempting the utter Destruction of the Subject, and the Subversion of the Constitution, be not as much an Abdication, as the attempting of a Father to cut his Son's Throat, I know not what is. The Constitution, notwithstanding the Vacancy, is the same; the Laws that are the Foundation and Rules of that Constitution are the same; but if there be, in any particular Instance, a Breach of that Constitution, that will be an Abdication, and that Abdication will infer a Vacancy.

I shall not be very particular, in relating the whole Conference, for tho' the Consequence of it was of the last Importance, yet the Subject seems not to be so: The Difference being chiefly about the Signification of Words; for as to Things, both Houses seem to be pretty well agreed. The Lords allow'd that King James had deserted the Government, and should never return to it, if they could help it; but they did not allow the Word Abdicate; nor that the Throne was Vacant, tho' there was no body in it, which was plain by their agreeing that he had deserted it; for Throne and Government are all one in a Political Sense. I shall only remember some Remarkables in certain Speeches at the Conference,

Dr. Turner, Bishop of Ely: He was for the Abdication of King James, if the Right Line of Succession was continued. This Prelate, after

A. Earl of Clarendon

Said, nobody will make the Coronation-Oath to be the Original Contract. One would think indeed that if a Man swears to do a thing, he does more than contract to do it.

Sir George Treby.

"We are gone back too far, when we offer to enquire into the Original Contract, whether any such thing is known or understood in our Law or Constitution? And I offer this to your Lordships Consideration for two Reasons: First, It is a Phrase and Thing used by the Learned Mr. Hooker, in his Book of Ecclesiastical Polity, whom I mention as a valuable Authority, being one of the best Men, the best Churchman, and the most Learned of our Nation in his time; and his Works are very worthily recommended by the Testimony of King Charles the First." He allows, That Government did originally begin by Contract. What follows proves, that, as I said before, the Difference was about the Signification of Words only. "But I have a greater Authority than this to influence this Matter, and that is your Lordships own, who have agreed to all the Vote but this word Deserted, and the Vacancy of the Throne." Their Lordships had agreed that King James had broken the Original Contract, and it remain'd that he had deserted thereby or abdicated the Throne. It was urg'd, that his Abdication not being a voluntary Act, could not be a Renunciation, no more could it be a Desertion, for that was not voluntary. Now as to Renunciation, King James's indeed was not so solemn and express as Queen Christina's of Sweden: But what then? It was as effectual and legal, as Lord Nottingham granted it to be. I will not undertake to dispute whether a King of England may or may not renounce his Kingdom? For my own part, I think he can, and I may go so far in agreement with those that have spoken to this Point, to yield that he may do it by implicit Acts, contrary to his Kingly Office. In which his Lordship seems to go as far, according to my Understanding, as the Commons intended; for certainly the subverting the Constitution of the Kingdom, and the breaking the Original Contract, are the greatest Implicit Acts contrary to the Kingly Office, and makes the Word Abdicated the only proper one, to express the Sense of the Convention and the Nation. His Lordship confirms what he was pleas'd to say before by what follows: For a King to say, he will not govern according to Law, and for a King to act wholly contrary to Law, and do that which would subvert the Constitution, is, I think, the same thing. I do not repeat what his Lordship adds entirely, because I do not conceive there is the same Force of Reason in it. However I shall add this, If every Transgression or Violation of the Law, by the Prince's Connivance or Command, were such a Breach of the fundamental Laws, as would infer an Abdication, then were it in vain to call any of his Ministers to account. Then the Action is the King's, and not theirs, and then adieu to the Maxim of A King can do no Wrong. This Argument has the Infirmity, which is in most of the Earl of Clarendon's, in his History. The House of Commons and their Committee, and indeed any one reasonable Man in the Kingdom, did not pre-

Earl of Notting-
ham.

tend that every Transgression or Violation of the Law was such a Breach of the Fundamental Laws, as would infer an Abdication; but they did all pretend and assert, and the House of Lords had agreed to it, that King James had endeavour'd to subvert the Constitution, broken the Original Contract, and violated the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, which is infinitely more than a single Transgression. As to the Maxim of a King can do no Wrong, let those make the most of it who believe and preach it. I believe King Charles the First did wrong, when he enter'd the House of Commons with Men in Arms, and that his Ministers were not accountable for it; and many other Instances of Wrong will be met with in the Reigns we write of.

In the Debate about the second Amendment, Mr. Sacheverell, speaking of the Notion of King James's having left the Exercise of the Government, and continuing still the Office, said, "If the Case were so, then all the Actions we have done in this Convention are wholly not justifiable. You are in no Place or Station to relieve yourselves or the Nation in this Exigence, unless you will think of setting up another Regency by your own Authority, without his Consent; which I conceive, by the Laws of England, you cannot do. What then follows upon all we have done? We have drawn the Nation into a Snare by the Steps we have taken, and leave all in such an Intricacy, as we have no Power by Law to deliver them out of." This is one of the terrible Consequences of the Negative to the Commons grand Vote, which I have given Hints of in the preceding Page.

That great Lawyer Mr. Pollexfen spoke as to the Distinction between the Exercise of the Government, which their Lordships agreed to be ceased as to King James, and his Right to the Government, which the Committee understood would remain in the Sense of the word Deserted, and which they were resolv'd should remain no where. Mr. Pollexfen argu'd thus: "The Administration or Exercise of the Kingly Government is in Construction and Consideration of Law all one and the same; and, I think, no body that would reason aright from thence, can say there is any Distinction between Government and the Exercise of Government: for whosoever takes from the King the Exercise of Government, takes from the King his Kingship; for the Power and the Exercise of the Power are so join'd, that they cannot be sever'd. And the Terms themselves, taking them as the Law of England, which we are to argue from this Case, teacheth them, are so coincident, that they cannot either subsist without consulting together. If a Man grant to another the Government of such a Place, this imports the Exercise of the Government there to be granted thereby."

Another Reason which the Managers for the Lords urg'd against the Vacancy of the Throne was, that the Government which was Hereditary would thus become Elective; and indeed the Managers seem'd to have direful Apprehensions of an Increase of the People's Liberty by it, tho', as we have long experienc'd, there was not the least danger of it; for, thanks be to God, the Succession in the Protestant Line has continu'd above forty Years uninterrupted, and is like so to continue longer than any Succession has hitherto done in the Throne of England, for which every good Englishman prays with all the Powers of his Soul.

1688.

The Learned Mr. Pollexfen spoke to this also :
“ For the Conclusion, which your Lordships “ have added to your Reason, as making it from “ the very Words of your Vote, That it would “ infer such a Vacancy in the Throne, as that
“ the Crown should thereby become Elective: This “ we conceive is a Conclusion that hath no Pre-“ misses either from our Actions or our Say“ ings, or our Votes, or any thing else in this “ Case; nay, it is quite varying from all Pre-“ misses: But when such a Conclusion can be “ shewn to follow from them, then it will be “ time enough for us to give our Answer to it.”

The Earl of Clarendon.

How is the Throne vacant? Is it only as to King James, or is it as to him and all or any of his Posterity, or any of those that are in the Remainder in the Royal Line in Succession? I do not find that the Word Heirs or Heirship has been in the least hinted by any one of the House of Commons. That came naturally into confi-deration, after the Vacancy of the Throne was settled, and not before. Lord Clarendon proceeded, If it be as to them too, then it must ne- cessarily follow, that the Kingdom must thereby become ELECTIVE, or the Government changed into a Commonwealth; which no Man in his Wits dreamt of, and his Lordship must needs dread it as much as a Deluge or Conflagration.

Serjeant
Maynard.

“ I am sure if we be left without a Government, as we find we are, sure we must not be perpetually under Anarchy. The Word E- lective is none of the Commons Word, neither is the making the Kingdom Elective the Thing they had in their Thoughts or Intentions; all they mean by this Matter, is to provide a Supply for this Defect in the Government, brought upon it by the late King’s Male-Administration.”

Earl of Pembroke

Said against the Vacancy, You, Gentlemen, ask who the Throne is full of? I think it is sufficient to know that there are Heirs who are to take the Lineal Succession, though we do not, or can- not positively name the particular Person. By which, in my Conception, his Lordship rejects the Prince of Wales as an Impostor; for if he had been a true Son, they could have positively nam’d the particular Person in the Succession.

Earl of Nottingham.

Lord Nottingham spoke about the Heirship, and making the Kingdom Elective. But as to the Heirship, it did not yet come into the Question. As to the Elective, Mr. Sacheverell said,

Mr. Sache-
verell.

“ You put it upon us to say, the Execution or “ Exercise of the Government is ceased, but you “ will not say the Throne is vacant, so much as “ to King James. And if it be not, what have “ we to do to consider or debate of any Conse“ quence, whether it will infer an Election or “ not? What Satisfaction can it be to your “ Lordships, or us, or the Nation, to know that “ such things as are mention’d in the Votes have “ been done by King James, and that he has “ deserted, as you say, the Government, if he “ still retain a Right to it, and your Lordships “ will not declare he hath no Right, but amuse
“ the Kingdom with the doubtful Words of the “ Exercise, as to him, ceasing. If that be all “ you mean, what need the Question be ask’d, “ How far it is vacant? for it should seem it is “ not vacant at all.”

Earl of Notting-
ham.

Will you please to suppose it vacant as to King James; that is, that he hath no Right? then let us go on to the next step.

Mr. Sache-
verell.

“ That, my Lords, we cannot do; for all our Business is to maintain our own, That the Throne is vacant.”

Mr. Somers.

“ My Lords, your Lordships, as a Reason against the Word Abdicate, say, It is not a Word known to our common Law. But the Word vacant, about which we are now disputing, cannot have that Objection made to it; for we find it in our Records, and even applied in a parallel Case to this of ours, in 1 Hen. IV. where it is expressly made use of more than once, and there it doth import what I think it doth import in this Vote of the House of Commons, now in debate; and to require any further or other Explication of it than the Record gives, will be very hard and unreasonable, for we are here to give the Commons Reasons for maintaining their own Vote, and nothing else. If your Lordships please to look into the Record in that Case, there was first a Resignation of the Crown and Government, made and subscrib’d by King Richard II. and this is brought into the Parliament, and there they take notice that the Sedes Regalis, those are the Words, fuit vacua: and the Resignation being read both in Latin and English in the great Hall at Westminster, where the Parliament then assembled, it was accepted by the Lords and Commons.

After that, it proceeds further, and there are Articles exhibited against Richard II. and upon these Articles they went on to Sentence of Deposition and Deprivation, and then followeth the Words in the Record: Et con- fessim, ut constabat, ex premissis & eorum Oc- casione Regnum Angliæ cum pertinentiis suis vacare. Then Henry IV. rises up out of his Place as Duke of Lancaster, where he sat before; and standing so high that he might be well enough seen, makes claim to the Crown. The Words in the Record are, Dic- tum Regnum Angliæ, sic ut premititur, va- cans una cum Corona vendicat. After that the Record goes on: Upon this Claim, the Lords and Commons being ask’d what they thought of it, they unanimously consented, and the Archbishop took him by the Hand and led him ad Sedem Regalem prædictam.

Nay, and after all this, it is there taken notice and particularly observ’d, that præ- cante Sede Regali, by the Leasion and Deposition aforesaid, all the publick Officers ceased; there is care taken for Henry IVth’s taking the Royal Oath, and granting of new Commissions.

My Lords, the Commons do therefore apprehend, that with very good Reason and Authority they did in their Vote declare the Throne to be vacant: But as to the going further, to enquire into the Consequences of that, concerning the Heirs and the Election, or what is to be done afterwards, is not our Commission, who came here only to maintain their Expressions in their Vote against your Lordships Amendments.”

The Lord Rochester had no regard to that Commission, but insisted upon it, that the Vacancy of the Throne would make the Monarchy elective. And did not the Desertion of the Government do it every whit as much, when another was to have it? and since that other Person could not bestow it upon himself, but must have it confer’d on him by others, that Conferring is Electing, and reduces the Debate still to a Difference about Words only.

The Earl of Clarendon continu’d the Doubt of turning the Kingdom into a Common-Wealth, adding, I hope you will take into your Consideration, what will become of the Kingdom of Scotland, if they should differ from us in this Point. And truly they did differ in an extraordinary manner, for they would not make use of either of the two Words De- serted or Abdicated, but I think they us’d a much better

1688.

A. D. 1688. better Word, Forefaulted, declaring that King James by many ill Acts of Government had forfeited the Kingdom, and had no more Right to it, than the late Earl of Mar has to his Lands in North-Britain.

Sir Robert Howard. "We do not doubt but that Power which brought in another Line upon the Vacancy of the Throne by the Leasion of Richard II. is still, according to the Constitution, residing in the Lords and Commons, and is legally sufficient to supply the Vacancy that now is: Use what Words you will, Fill up, or Nominate, or Elect." It being very plain, their Lordships did agree that there was nobody in the Throne, and that it was necessary it should be fill'd, but not with King James, the Difference continues still about the Terms only; and if they us'd, to Elect, or Nominate, or Fill up, either of them would have kept King James out as effectually as Abdicated, but 'twould not have alike preserv'd the Force and Vigour of the Constitution, which the Commons insisted upon.

Earl of Clarendon. "Suppose you say nothing, but fill the Throne, is it not to take away the right Line of Inheritance?" And does not Desertion imply a Vacancy as well as Abdication? That was not disputed.

Sir Thomas Lee. "The Amendments your Lordships have made to the Commons Vote, are not agreeing with your other Votes, nor any of the Acts since the Abdication. You were sensible we were without a Government, by your desiring the Prince to take the Administration, and to issue out his Letters for this Convention. My Lords, I would ask this Question, Whether upon the Original Contract, there were not a Power preserv'd in the Nation, to provide it self in such Exigencies? That Contract was to settle the Constitution; the making of Laws is a Part of that Contract, and that those Laws should oblige all Sides, when made; but yet so as not to exclude this Original Constitution, in all Governments which commence by Compact, that there should be a Power in the States to make Provision in all Times and upon all Occasions, for extraordinary Cases and Necessities, such as ours now is."

Sir G. Treby. "To discourse whether the Crown of England would by this means become Elective, is altogether unnecessary, and I think your Lordships have given no Reasons that are sufficient to make the Objection out, neither any Answers to the Commons Reasons for their Vote. It seems to me an odd way of Reasoning, first to mistake the Meaning, and then give Reasons against that mistaken Meaning. The proper single Question here, is, Whether we have well affirm'd upon the Premises that are mention'd in the former Part of the Vote, that King James has Abdicated, and that the Throne is thereby Vacant. Your Lordships in part agree, for you say he has deserted the Government. Then you say, He is not in it: and it is as much as to say, He has left the Kingdom destitute of a Government. Now, if there be any Sense, in which our Proposition is true, will you deny the whole Proposition, because it may be taken in a Sense that is dubious and uncertain? You cannot say, the Throne is Full; if then there be a Doubt with you, to be sure it is not like to be evident to us, especially in this Case. You are the Persons that usually are, or ought to be present at the Delivery of our Queens, and the proper Witnesses to the Birth of our Princes. If then your Lordships had known who was on the Throne, we should certainly have heard his Name from you, and

A. D. 1688. that had been the best Reason against the Vacancy as could have been given.

Their Lordships would not touch this Point. It would have exasperated the Nation beyond measure. Sir Robert Howard just hinted it, We know something has been pretended to, as an Heir-Male, of which there are different Opinions; and in the mean time, we are without a Government, and must we stay till the Truth of the matter be found out?

Lord Pembroke, The Laws made, are certainly Part of the Original Contract: which his Lordship would not have asserted, if no such thing was to be come at.

"If we look into the Law of Nature, which is above all human Laws, we have enough to justify us in what we are now a-doing, to provide for our selves and the Publick Weal in such an Exigency as this."

If Laws made about the Succession be so obliging, what then shall we say to the Succession of Queen Elizabeth, who had an Act of Parliament, to the keeping of which an Oath was required, against both her and her Sister?

"But to shew what Opinion she herself, and the wise Men of her Times, had, and were of, in this Point, there is an Act made in her Reign yet in being, which declares it to be a Premunire, to affirm that Parliaments cannot settle the Succession of the Crown or alter it." By this Statute, all the Addresses in K. Charles and K. James's Reigns, and at the latter end of Queen Anne's, which affirm'd the Right of Succession to be Unalterable, were subject to a Premunire; and it were to be wish'd, that whenever the Unalienable, Indefeasible, Unalterable, is preach'd up again, a Premunire may be executed upon the Preacher.

I think we are in as full a Capacity to take care of the Government as any of our Predecessors, in such an Exigence, and if we do as they have done before us, that is not to be call'd a Changing of the Monarchy from an Hereditary to an Elective.

Gentlemen, "If any of you can settle this matter in its true Light, it would do very well, and it is you must do it, for the Words are ham-yours, and so we must be told your Signification and Intention by yourselves. If you mean by Abdication and Vacancy only, that the King has left the Government, and it is devolv'd upon the next Successor, that may perhaps satisfy my Lords, and we may agree upon some Settlement."

"We are pursuing those Methods that agree with our Laws and Constitution; for tho' the Monarchy of this Nation be Hereditary in the ordinary Course of Succession, yet there may fall out a Case wherein that cannot be comply'd with, and a plain Vacancy may ensue. For put the Case, the whole Royal Line should fail, as they are all mortal as well as we ourselves are, should we in that Case have no Government at all? And who then should we have but the Lords and Commons? And I think that Case comes nearest to the Case in question, where the Successor is not known; for if he had been, we should have heard of him before now. And what is the Reason that it should then in the former Case devolve to Lords and Commons, but that there is no King? And they being the Representative Body of the Kingdom, are the only remaining Parts of the Government, and are only to supply the Defect by providing a Successor. And is there not the same Reason here? We are without a King, I am sure I do not know of any that

A. D. 1688. "we have; if that fall out to be the Case now, that will infer a Vacancy with a witness; and it will be of Necessity that the Lords and Commons take care to supply it."

My Lords,

Mr. Eyre. "We are led, and I think out of the way, into a very large Field, hunting after the Consequences of a Vote not yet settled or agreed unto: we have, as I conceive, nothing but the Vote itself to consider of or debate upon. We do not pretend to prejudice any legal Right; but what the Consequences of this Vote may be, before the Vote itself be past, I believe no Man can reasonably pretend to ascertain, unless he have the Spirit of Prophecy. The Throne may be Vacant as to the Possession, without the Exclusion of one that has a Right to the Succession, or a Dissolution of the Government in the Constitution; neither will there be room for the Objection of a King de Facto, and not de Jure, which some of the Lords were pleas'd to express their Fears of.

"The Gentleman that stands by me instanc'd in a Record, and that was mistaken, as a Precedent for the Proceeding in this Case: It was only mention'd by him to shew, that by using the Word Vacant, the Commons did no more than our Ancestors did before us, and therefore it was not an unknown Word or Thing to have the Throne Vacant. We do apprehend we have made a right and apt Conclusion from the Premises, for otherwise all the Vote is but Historical. We declare the late King hath broke the Original Contract, hath violated the Fundamental Laws, and withdrawn himself out of the Kingdom; that he hath Abdicated, actually Renounc'd the Government. What occasion was there for such a Declaration as this, if nothing were concluded from it? That were only to give the Kingdom a compendious History of those Miseries they have too well learn'd by feeling them; therefore there was a Necessity to make some Conclusion, and none so natural as this, that we are left without a King, in the Words of the Vote; that the Throne is thereby Vacant, which it may be as to the Possession, and yet the Right of Succession no way prejudiced. But, my Lords, we come here, by the Commands of the House of Commons, to debate the Reasons of their Vote, and your Lordships Amendments, not to dispute what will be the Consequences, which is not at present our Purpose."

This Debate lasted several Hours, and as soon as the Managers for the Lords had made a Report in that House, a new Debate arose there, long and warm, whether or no they should insist on their Amendments, or agree with the Grand Vote of the Commons. Many of the chief Members, who were before for a Regency, came over to the Party who were for a King, which was also increas'd by the Arrival of some Lords; insomuch, that when the two Questions about the Words Abdicate and Vacant were put, they were both carry'd in the Affirmative; upon which Mr. Archdeacon makes a very grave, but childish Observation, "From which Principles, and the general Opinion of both Lords and Commons, that the personal Right of King James was not unalienable, it has been often infer'd, That there can be no indefeasible Right in any of his Heirs, either near or remote." He has no Heirs nearer than his Cousins in Savoy, and the People of England don't care whether their Right be defeasible or indefeasible: They will never draw any Inference from that Vote, which was not before infer'd from the Original Contract, and the natural Right of their Representative to fill up the Throne, when it is at any time Vacant.

The next day after the House of Commons had pass'd their Grand Vote, they resolv'd, "That it hath been found by Experience to be inconsistent with this Protestant Kingdom to be govern'd by a Popish Prince;" which Vote they sent up to the Lords for their Concurrence: And their Lordships having concurr'd in it, did it not imply that the Government of King James was inconsistent with the Government of England, and that that Inconsistency turn'd the Desertion into an Abdication? Nay, Edward himself acknowledges that King James had forfeited his personal Right, which, if he thought so, must make him read the Arguments for the Word Deserted with great Prejudice and Averfion.

While they were debating it, his Highness the Prince of Orange continu'd his remarkable Reservedness and seeming Indifference some time, hearing all that was said to him without making Answers upon this Head. All he said himself was, He came over upon Invitation to save the Kingdom, and now he had brought together a true and free Representative of the Nation, he therefore left it to them to do what they thought best for the Good of the Kingdom; and when of the things were once settled, he should be well satisfied to return back to Holland, in which 'tis probable he preserv'd his Phlegm more than his Sincerity, for not long after he sent for the Marquis of Hallifax, the Earls of Shrewsbury and Danby, and some other leading Members of the House of Lords, to whom he spoke to this effect, "That he had been silent till then, because he would neither say nor do the least thing that might seem to intrench upon any Man's full Freedom of deliberating and voting in Matters of such Importance. He was resolv'd neither to court nor threaten any Person whatsoever, and therefore he had wholly declin'd giving out his own Thoughts. He found some were for putting the Government into the hands of a Regent. He would say nothing against that, if it was thought the best means for settling their Affairs; only he thought it necessary to tell them, that he himself would not be the Regent. Therefore, if they continu'd in that Design, they must look out for some other Person to be put in that Station; for he himself so well knew the Consequences of it, that he would not accept of it."—He said, "He found that others were for putting the Princess singly on the Throne, and that he should reign by her Courtesy; to which he said, no Man could esteem a Woman more than he did the Princess, but he was of that Temper, that he could not think of holding any thing upon such Terms as the Life of a Wife; nor could he think it reasonable to have any share in the Government, unless it was vested in his Person, and that for the Term of Life. If they thought fit to settle it otherwise, he would not oppose them in it, but he would return back to Holland, and concern himself no more in their Affairs." Which I take however to be a kind of Menace. He added, That whatsoever others may think of a Crown, it did not appear such a thing in his Eyes, but that he could live very well, and very well pleas'd without it. He concluded, "That tho' he could not resolve to accept of a Dignity, so as to hold it under the Life of another, yet he thought that the Issue of the Princess Anne should be preferr'd in the Succession to any Issue he might have by any other Wife after the present Princess." It must be own'd, that there was great Reason for the Prince to say what he said, that a Regency would have ill Consequences, an eternal Struggle between that and a prior superior Right, which on all emergent Occasions would have broke out to perplex and ruin the Regent, whose Power being so uncertain and disputable, would be but a small Encouragement for Foreign Princes to enter into Alliance with him, which was what his Highness had most at heart, after the Settlement of this Nation, to put a stop to the Growth of the exorbitant Power of France. His Sentiments were not design'd to be kept secret, and being reported abroad, they had great Influence in the Debates at Westminster, and hasten'd things to a Conclusion.

Princess of Orange.

I do not think there were really so many Difficulties started, with relation to the Right of the Princess of Orange, as Echard pretends, or that her Disposition was so little known as to create Doubts; tho' probably some might be apprehensive, that if she thought herself injur'd, she, who by reason of her Youth and Health was like to outlive the Prince, might take revenge on all that post-pon'd her Succession, when it was in her power. The Satisfaction of these was left to Dr. Burnet, who had discou'd her Highness on that nice Subject two Years before, and knew her Mind. Accordingly he, with the Prince's Leave, declar'd her Royal Highness's Resolution to submit to the Preference that might be given her Royal Consort, on account of his great Genius, Experience, and all Princely and Heroick Qualities. The Princess Anne of Denmark consented to have her Succession suspended in favour of the Prince of Orange; but I have been told her Consent was not procur'd very easily; nor was she ever heartily reconcil'd to it, tho' she did not let it be known to any but her most trusty Confidants.

Earl of Danby for the Princess of Orange.

The Earl of Danby carry'd things very high in favour of the Princess of Orange; he was so officious as to send a Messenger over to Holland with a Letter to her, giving her an Account of the State of the Debate, and desiring to know her own Sense of the Matter; for if it was her Desire, He did not doubt but he should be able to set her alone on the Throne. She return'd him a sharp Answer, letting him know, She was the Prince's Wife, and would never be any other than what should be in conjunction with him, and under him; and that she should take it extreme unkindly, if any, under the pretence of their Care for her, should set up a divided Interest between her and the Prince. Wife and generous Sentiments, worthy so pious and so prudent a Princess; not content with this, she immediately sent both the Lord Danby's Letter, and her Answer, to the Prince, which open Proceeding was the most effectual Discouragement that could be to any future Attempt, to create a Misunderstanding or Jealousy between them. His Highness bore it coolly, and without any Expostulation with the Earl of Danby, who atton'd for this wrong Step by a warm Speech after the Report of the last Conference with the Commons, not only to prove the Vacancy of the Throne, but the Necessity of supplying it by the Prince of Orange, in which he was strenuously supported by the Marquis of Hallifax, who from the first of the Debates to the last had been most zealous for the Prince, and taking advantage of this favourable Opportunity, immediately put the Question, Whether their Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Orange should be declar'd King and Queen? and it was carry'd in the Affirmative by 20 Voices. Yea's 65, No's 45.

Marquis of Hallifax puts the Question for King and Queen to be declar'd.

Resolv'd, "By the Lords Spiritual and Temporal assembled at Westminster, that the Prince and Princess of Orange shall be declar'd King and Queen of England, and all the Dominions thereunto belonging."

Which Vote their Lordships explain'd at their next Session by the following one.

Resolv'd,

"That the Prince and Princess of Orange shall be King and Queen of England, &c. for their natural Lives, and the Life of the longer Liver of them; and that the sole and full Regal Power be in the Prince only, in the Name of both. And that after their Deceases the Crown shall belong to the Heirs of the Body of the Princess; and for Default of such Issue to the Princess Anne of Denmark, and the Heirs of her Body; and for Default of such Issue, to the Heirs of the said Prince of Orange; and for Default of such Issue, to the Person that shall be nam'd, and in such manner as shall be limited by Act of Parliament; and for Default of such Limitation and Regulation, to the lawful Heirs of the said Prince of Orange." A Lord, whom Echard does not think fit to name, mov'd several Lords to enter their Dissents to these Votes; but it seems, tho' they were ready enough in their Inclinations, yet they thought the Case so nice, that they all refus'd to subscribe their Names, for which I am very sorry; it would have been a fine Roll to have oblig'd Posterity with.

Their Lordships having agreed to abrogate the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, which had been so mischievous in the former Reigns; Resolv'd, that the following Oaths should be taken instead of them.

I A. B. do sincerely promise and swear to bear true Allegiance to their Majesties King William and Queen Mary.

So help me God.

I A. B. do swear, that I do from my Heart abhor, detest, abjure, as impious and heretical, this damnable Doctrine and Position, that Princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope, or any Authority of the See of Rome, may be depos'd or murder'd by their Subjects; or any other whatsoever. And I do declare, that no Foreign Prince, Person, Prelate, State or Potentate, hath, or ought to have, any Jurisdiction, Power, Superiority, Preheminence or Authority, Ecclesiastical or Spiritual, within this Realm.

So help me God.

These Votes and Resolutions being sent down by the Lords to the Commons for their Concurrence; the latter, after a short Debate, agreed to them with some Amendments; and to the new Oaths without any Amendment. But they were protested against in the Upper House by eleven Bishops, and twelve Temporal Peers, whose Number within two or three Days increas'd to thirty-seven; and who not only declar'd against the Oaths, but express'd themselves against the Abdication, and the Vacancy of the Throne.

In the mean while a select Committee of the House of Commons, Mr. Somers at their head, were busily employ'd in drawing up a solemn Declaration of Rights, containing the several Facts and Reasons for King James's Forfeiture of the Crown; asserting the undoubted Rights and Liberties of the Subject, settling the Succession of the Crown, and appointing the New Oaths. Mr. Archdeacon Echard discovers a Secret here,

The

A. D. 1688. The Management of the Prince had such an Effect upon the Leaders, as to cause them to hasten and shorten the famous Declaration, which was sent up to the Lords for their Concurrence, February the 11th. At what time the singular Lord he speaks of, who stuck fast by King James, propos'd to those Peers, who in most of the Votes had been of his mind, That they would all agree by Consent to leave the House at once; by which they would have abdicated their Seats there, as King James had abdicated the Throne; and no doubt that August Assembly would have dealt with them accordingly. But two wise and noble Lords, the Earls of Pembroke and Nottingham, could not approve of such Rashness and Temerity, and told them, that it would be of ill Consequence, that they must support the Government as well as they could, and could never answer it if they left the House.

On the 12th of February the Lords had a Conference with the Commons about the Declaration, and the Amendments to the Votes before-mentioned, Managers for their Lordships were,

| Earl of Macclesfield. | Lord Ward.             |
| Lord Montagu.         | Earl of Northampton.   |

The very Names of these Lords lead us to the Expectation of a happy Agreement between the two Houses for the Settlement of the Nation; which was soon compleated, and both Lords and Commons agreed to the Votes and Declaration of Rights by which King William and Queen Mary were settled on the Throne, and the Subjects Liberties asserted and secur'd in the manner following.

It was objected by Mr. F. . . . . against the Grand Vote for the Abdication, that King James's ill Acts of Government amounted not to what was understood by the Word, Such a Violation of his Trust, as was a Subversion of the Constitution, and a Renouncing of it. We shall see best, whether it was so or not, by reading the following Declaration.

"Whereas the late King James II. by the Assistance of divers evil Counsellors, Judges, and Ministers employ'd by him, did endeavour to subject and extirpate the Protestant Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom,

"By assuming and exercising a Power of dispensing with, and suspending of Laws, and the Execution of Laws, without Consent of Parliament,

"By committing and prosecuting divers worthy Prelates, for humbly petitioning to be excus'd from concurring to the said assum'd Power,

"By issuing, and causing to be executed, a Commission under the Great Seal, for erecting a Court call'd, The Court of Commission for Ecclesiastical Affairs,

"By levying Money for and to the Use of the Crown, by pretence of Prerogative, for other Time and in other Manner than the same was granted by Parliament,

"By raising and keeping a Standing Army within the Kingdom in time of Peace, without Consent of Parliament, and quartering Soldiers contrary to Law;

"By causing several good Subjects, being Protestants, to be disarm'd, at the same time when Papists were both arm'd and employ'd contrary to Law.

"By violating the Freedom of Election of Members to serve in Parliament,

"By Prosecutions in the Court of King's Bench, for Matters and Causes cognizable only in Parliament, and by divers other Illegal and Arbitrary Courses,

"And whereas of late Years Partial, Corrupt and Unqualify'd Persons have been return'd, and serv'd on Juries in Trials, and particularly divers Jurors in Trials for High-Treason, which were not Freeholders,

"And excessive Bail hath been requir'd of Persons committed in criminal Causes, to elude the Benefit of the Laws for the Liberty of the Subject,

"And excessive Fines have been imposed,

"And Illegal and Cruel Punishments inflicted,

"And several Grants and Promises made of Fines and Forfeitures, before any Conviction or Judgment against whom the same was to be levied: All which are utterly and directly contrary to the known Laws, and Statutes, and Freedom of this Realm,

"And whereas the late King James II. having abdicated the Government, and the Throne being thereby vacant,

"His Highness the Prince of Orange, whom it hath pleased Almighty God to make the Glorious Instrument of delivering this Kingdom from Popery and Arbitrary Power, did, by the Advice of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and divers principal Persons of the Commons, cause Letters to be written to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, being Protestants, and other Letters to the several Counties, Cities, Universities, Boroughs and Cinque-Ports, for the chusing of such Persons to represent them, as were of right to be sent to Parliament, to meet and sit at Westminster, January 22, 1689, in order to such an Establishment, as that their Religion, Laws and Liberties might not be again in danger of being subverted; upon which Letters, Elections have been accordingly made,

"And thereupon the said Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, pursuant to their respective Letters and Elections, being now assembled in a full and free Representation of this Nation, taking into their most serious Consideration the best means for the attaining the Ends aforesaid, do, in the first place, as their Ancestors in the like Cases have usually done, for the vindicating their ancient Rights and Liberties, DECLARE,

"That the pretended Power of suspending Laws, or the Execution of Laws by Regal Authority, without Consent of Parliament, is illegal,

"That the pretended Power of Dispensing Laws, or the Execution of Laws by Regal Authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal,

"That the Commission for erecting the late Court of Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Causes, and all other Commissions and Courts of like nature, are Illegal and Pernicious,

"That levying Money to, or for the Use of the Crown, by Pretence of Prerogative, without Grant of Parliament for longer Time, or in any other manner than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal,

"That it is the Right of the Subject to petition the King, and all Commitments and Prosecutions for such Petitioning, are illegal,

"That the raising and keeping a Standing Army within the Kingdom in time of Peace, unless it be by Consent of Parliament, is against Law,

"That

A. D.

" That the Subjects, being Protestants, may have Arms for their Defence suitable to their Condition, and as allowed by Law,

" That the Election of Members of Parliament ought to be free,

" That the Freedom of Speech, or Debates and Proceedings in Parliament, ought not to be impeach'd or question'd in any Court or Place out of Parliament,

" That excessive Bail ought not to be requir'd, nor excessive Fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual Punishments inflicted,

" That Jurors ought to be duly impannell'd and return'd; and Jurors, which pass upon Men in Trials for High-Treason, ought to be Freeholders,

" That all Grants, and Promises of Fines and Forfeitures of particular Persons before Conviction, are illegal and void,

" And that for Redress of all Grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving of the Laws, Parliaments ought to be held frequently,

" And they do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the Premises, as their undoubted Rights and Privileges; and that no Declarations, Judgments, Doings or Proceedings to the Prejudice of the People in any of the said Premises, ought in any wise to be drawn hereafter in Consequence or Example,

" To which Demand of their Rights, they are particularly encourag'd by the Declaration of his Highness the Prince of Orange, as being the only means for obtaining a full Redress and Remedy therein. Having therefore an intire Confidence, that his said Highness the Prince of Orange will perfect the Deliverance so far advanc'd by him, and will still preferre them from the Violation of their Rights, which they have here asserted, and from all other Attempts upon their Religion, Rights and Liberties,

" The said Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons assembled at Westminster, do Resolve,

That WILLIAM and MARY, &c.

Then follows the Resolution before-mention'd for the Settlement of the Crown; at the close of which, they say,

" And the said Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, do pray the said Prince and Princess of Orange to accept the same accordingly: And that the Oaths hereafter mention'd be taken by all Persons of whom the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy might be requir'd by Law instead of them, and that the said Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy be abrogated," Which Oaths are there inserted.

Princess of Orange arrives in England.

The Day before this Declaration and Tender of the Crown were offer'd to their Royal Highnesses, the Princess of Orange arrived in England. She had been oblig'd to stay longer in Holland than she desir'd to have done, by Frost and contrary Winds; which gave the Prince's Enemies occasion to give out, she was detain'd there by his Order, that she might not come and put in her Claim to the Crown; for the Cavaliers, Tories, and Jacobites have always been fed with false Reports, to keep up their Spirits in Distress and Despair; and those Reports being ever so foolish, absurd and incredible, have not hinder'd their Currency. They also gave out, That she was not well pleas'd with the late Transactions, with respect both to her Father and the present Settlement. Upon which, it is said the Prince wrote to her, " That it was necessary she should at first appear so cheerful, that no one might be discourag'd by her Looks,

" or made to apprehend that she was uneasy at any thing that had been done:" Which Advice she very punctually follow'd, and put on an Air of Gaiety, which had very little of Affectation in it. The Prince and Princess of Denmark met her Royal Highness at Greenwich; from whence they pass'd by Barge up to Whitehall, amidst the loud Shouts and Acclamations of the Multitude, who doubly rejoic'd for her happy Arrival, and her being just declar'd Queen. Never was Joy so reasonable, so general, and so transporting.

Echard very squeamishly observes, She had some tender Pangs when she enter'd her Father's Palace, and was going to mount his Throne; which is doubtless as false as what follows: She said, She was under Direction, and acting a part that was not natural to her. I can hardly think even he would have ventur'd to have reported such a Falstity, had he seen her then as I did, and there was nothing to be seen in her Looks which was not as natural and as lovely, as ever were Charms in Woman; nor was her Empire less over the Hearts than over the Wills of the English.

A Popish Lady furnish'd the Archdeacon with the next Story. " Falling the same Night into a more private Conversation with the Earl of Danby, she shew'd her Sentiments with full Freedom and Openness." Upon his Discourse to her of the late Proceedings, and the intended Settlements, she said to this effect: Do you but take care to secure the Protestant Religion, the Liberties of England, and the general Good of the Publick, and then make me what you please — I value neither Titles nor Honours, but to support these great Things. When you can make them sure without me, send me back as soon as you please. Such Notions as these, are indeed worthy the Greatness of her Royal Highness's Soul. However, Mr. Echard's pretended Pangs for her mounting her Father's Throne; which, by the way, was then no more her Father's, than it was the Archdeacon's; agree very little with what I have heard that she should say at her Coronation. The Princess of Denmark observing that she was heated with the Royal Robes, the Breath of such a prodigious Crowd as assist'd at it, and tired with the Time and Ceremony, said softly to her, I pity your Fatigue, Madam. Her Majesty reply'd, A Crown, Sister, is not so heavy as it seems to be, or something like it.

The next day, February 13th, both Houses of Convention waited upon their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Orange in a Body at the Banqueting House, where the Prince and Princess sat on two large Seats under a Canopy of State.

The Clerk of the Crown having read the Declaration of Right with a loud Voice, the Marquis of Halifax, Speaker of the House of Lords, in the name of both Houses, the Representative of the Nation, made a Tender of the Crown to them, pursuant to the Prayer in that Declaration. To which his Royal Highness the Prince return'd the following Answer.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

This is certainly the greatest Proof of the Trust you have in us that can be given, which accepts it. is the thing that makes us value it the more, and we thankfully accept what you have offer'd. And as I had no other Intention in coming, than to preserve your Religion, Laws, and Liberties, so you may be sure that I shall endeavour to support them, and shall be willing to concur in any thing that shall be for the Good of the Kingdom,

and

A. D. 1688. and to do all that is in my power to advance the Welfare and Glory of the Nation.

Upon which there was a Shout so just and so loud, that it may bear Comparifon with the Acclaim in Holy Writ, when the Morning Stars sang, and the Sons of God shouted for Joy. Such was the Voice of a People, who had their Deliverer and Liberty before them. The Multitudes without caught the grateful Acclamation, and Joy and Rapture sounded in every Mouth, and sparkled in every Eye.

Both Houses had pass'd a Proclamation in form, and it was solemnly publish'd, with a noble and numerous Attendance, in all the usual Places, filling City and Suburbs, and afterwards the three Kingdoms with such Exultations, as they had never felt or heard of before. The Proclamation was in the following Terms.

Proclamation for King WILLIAM and Queen MARY. Whereas it has pleased Almighty God, in his great Mercy to this Kingdom, to vouchsafe us a Miraculous Deliverance from Popery and Arbitrary Power, and that our Preservation is due, next under God, to the Resolution and Conduct of his Highness the Prince of Orange, whom God hath chosen to be the Glorious Instrument of such an inestimable Happiness to us and our Posterity: And being sensible and fully persuaded of the great and eminent Virtues of her Highness the Princess of Orange, whose Zeal for the PROTESTANT Religion will, no doubt, bring a Blessing along with her upon this Nation; And whereas the Lords and Commons now assembled at Westminster, have made a DECLARATION and presented the same to the said Prince and Princess of Orange, and therein desir'd them to accept the Crown, who have accepted the same accordingly: We therefore, &c. do with full Consent Publish and Proclaim, according to the said Declaration, WILLIAM and MARY, Prince and Princess of Orange, to be KING and QUEEN of England, France and Ireland, with all the Dominions and Territories thereunto belonging, &c.

Thus have I finish'd my Journey with great Pains and Patience. I have travel'd thro' difficult and dangerous Ways, where many Travellers before me have been bewilder'd and lost. Some have fallen from Precipices, and perish'd by their Rashness and Obstinacy; probably the Author or Authors of Clarendon's History will be reckon'd among these. Others have been misled into Bogs and Mire by false Lights, like that of Ignis fatuus, which was the Misfortune of the Compleat Historian and Archdeacon Echard; and none have kept their Way with an equal and sober Pace, which is the only sure one to bring a Man to his Journey's End with Pleasure and Profit.

What I propos'd by this Undertaking, was to shew that the Royal House of Stuart, from the Accession of the First King James to the Throne of England, to the Abdication of the Second, did endeavour to subvert the Constitution, and subject this Kingdom to Arbitrary Power Ecclesiastical and Civil; That in the Prosecution of their Design, they met with vigorous Opposition from the most Virtuous and Generous of the English Nation, who asserted their Liberty upon all Occasions, according as the Necessity of the Case requir'd, and preserv'd it, when in the utmost Peril of being lost, by their Courage and Constancy.

The Fate of King James the Second, which is the Catastrophe of this History, would, like that of a Tragedy, move Pity as well as Terror, if that Prince had been the least sensible of his Misgovernment: But all Compassion is taken off by his glorying in the Attempt to bind these Nations in the Chains of Spiritual and Temporal Bondage, and his shewing no Sorrow, but for his not being able to accomplish it.

There is nothing in his Example which is in any danger of Temptation, but there is much in the Example of our Countrymen to invite us to imitate it, and to leave it in the best manner recommended to Posterity, for whose sake chiefly this Work was undertaken.
